

Florian C. Reiter

Basic Conditions
of Taoist Thunder Magic 道 教 雷 法

2007

Harrassowitz Verlag · Wiesbaden

ISSN 0567-4980
ISBN 978-3-447-05593-2

Contents

Foreword	VII
Introduction	1
The Biography of Yeh Ch'ien-shao	5
Chapter I: Man and Thunder Magic
A First Approach to Thunder Magic	13
Human Nature and Thunder Magic	15
Summoning and Uniting [Thunder Divinities]	19
Assembling the Divine Force	32
The Basis for Writing Amulets	41
Praying for Rain	47
Killing and Crusading, the Martial Side of Thunder Magic	54
The Creative Impetus	62
Chapter II: The Scope of Thunder Magic
The Divine Texts of the Great Methods of the Five Thunders at the Jade Department in the Heaven of Highest Purity:
Preface by Wang Wen-ch'ing	69
The Arrangement of the Offices of Thunder and Thunderclaps	74
Method of Consecrating Seals	79
Locations and Departments of the Five Thunders	81
Sacrifice to the Great Divinity of Law and Order	85
The Application of Thunder Breaths	87
Writing out Amulets to Cure Illnesses, Raise Dragons and Produce Rainfall	88
The Establishment of Hells for Evil Demons	96
Altars and Prayers for Rain or Clear Skies	100
The Crusade against Temples and the Eviction of Wicked Spirits	109
Ritual Steps and Mudrās	112
Conditions for the Ritual Transmission and [Spirit] Promotion	117

Abbreviations	121
Bibliography	123
The Sources in the Taoist Canon.....	126
Glossary	129

Foreword

Today Taoist Thunder Magic or Thunder Rituals (Lei-fa 雷法/Wu-lei fa 五雷法) constitute an established element in Taoist religious culture. Many ritual practices, convictions and emblems of Thunder Magic stem from antique traditions. The ritual specialisation and the name of Thunder Magic emerged during the Sung period (11th-13th cts.), uniting, developing and rationalizing exorcist and ritual methods that were already current in earlier periods of Taoist history albeit without the label of Thunder Magic.

This study intends to describe the basic notions, practices and intentions of Thunder Magic that often is connected with the names of Shen-hsiao (神霄) and Ch'ing-wei (清微) Taoism. The Taoist Canon contains abundant materials that show Thunder amulets, altars, seals and other ritual assets. Learned Discussions (Lei-fa shuo 雷法說) and similar texts show that Thunder Magic is not a unified religious and ritual element of Taoist culture but comprises ritual methods that many different local traditions, documentations and the patronage of legions of divinities identify.

Many texts cannot be attributed to any individual author but later Taoists, for example Pai Yü-ch'an (白玉蟾 fl. 1209-1224), are widely assumed to have had a hand in the actual formation of those texts. However, some texts very likely emerged in the time of Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿 1093-1153) who was a persuasive and famous promoter of Thunder Magic at the imperial court of the Sung (宋) dynasty. I try to focus on materials of that early period of Thunder Magic (12th ct.). Admittedly, the texts are often hard to understand and it is difficult to grasp the practical implications that they only indicate. In a sense, this presentation has a tentative character.

The German Research Foundation (Bonn) and the Ministry of Education of Taiwan (Taipei) supported me to spend some time in Taiwan where I could consult Taiwanese colleagues and ritual specialists, who were very kind and helpful. In this sense, I especially wish to thank Profs. Lee Fong-mao (Academia Sinica) and Hsieh Ts'ung-hui (Taipei Normal University). The Katholische Akademische Ausländer Dienst (Bonn) gave Prof. Li Yüan-kuo (China/Chengdu, Academy of Social Sciences) the financial support to spend a couple of weeks in Berlin and work with me on some of the Thunder Magic materials that I present in this book. Yet, this book is just an attempt on my part to sort out the basic conditions of Taoist Thunder Magic. I hope to draw the attention of the scholarly world to this fascinating field of research that matters for the understanding of Taoist religious culture as we have it today. Concerning the publication of this book I wish to express my sincere thanks for the support by Harrassowitz Company (Wiesbaden), especially Mr. J. Fetkenheuer.

Berlin 2007

Florian C. Reiter

Introduction

Throughout history, the workings of religious Taoism are present on all levels of the Chinese society. Canonical hagiographies of saints and immortals and the biographies of historic persons show the activities and subtle influences that Taoists exerted. We usually read that they were learned persons who mastered the scriptures of Taoism and Confucianism, and they used to employ a great variety of practical skills and rituals. Skills and rituals saved from epidemics, droughts, floods and illness. Taoists acted for the wellbeing of the people, the administration and the state at large. This seems to be the standard range of Taoist aspirations and activities, and it is for this reason that we easily find the appropriate and persuasive rhetoric in Taoist texts throughout all ages.

Never mind the time and the period, Taoists always were very expert at divination. They healed illness and exorcised baleful influences, using amulets and other ritual devices. The Taoist activists seem to make use of a rather secret personal way of life, of prayer and meditation. There is, of course, the need for a protracted and rather complicated education that may lead to the career as a priest (tao-shih 道士), and again there is some secrecy about the actual reality of this career.¹ However, we also notice that in many cases we never learn whether the respective Taoist was a priest or not, whether he knew how to perform rituals or not. Perhaps there was the general understanding that this profession had to be taken for granted.

Some canonical encyclopaedias present superb literary summaries of the Taoist religious culture. Sometimes they were compiled at the behest of emperors and rulers. The series of such encyclopaedias started with the title Wu-shang pi-yao (無上必要6ct.). Encyclopaedias turn out to be major stepping-stones when we take up our studies of religious Taoism.²

On the other hand, biographies and hagiographies often speak about alleged historical persons and pose to feature the actual combination of all those

1 F.C.Reiter: The Aspirations and Standards of Taoist Priests in the Early T'ang Period, pp.133-150, in: AAS 1.

2 J.Jagerwey : Wu-shang pi-yao, somme taoiste du VIe siècle. Paris 1981.

theoretical and practical elements that characterize the Taoist and his vocation. Such sources show that the Taoist can interfere in the course of nature, for example, when he organises his individual essences of life, which goes with the Taoist self-cultivation to strive after an individual immortality. Taoism is characterized by elusive concepts of immortality that point to the very individual and final goal.

The Taoist, who lives in rural settings or even at the imperial court, is employed to fight against rain, drought and other natural disasters that need the deployment of martial spirit forces. Biographies and hagiographies bring us to realize that there must be a special relationship between the individual quality of the practitioner and the outer or social realities of his Taoist activities. We can find elaborate explanations for this delicate relationship in various canonical sources, and some of them are quite prominent in a book that intends to describe the conditions of Thunder Magic or Thunder Rituals.

Many activities in Thunder Magic remind of ecstatic and exorcist performances that certainly call to mind the opaque sphere of shaman culture. Taoist sources on the other hand explicitly reject the idea that Taoists have anything to do with the shaman branches of religious proficiency. We may suppose that the ecstatic state of mind and exorcist performances can hardly be a concern for an educated and learned person. Taoism, however, proves such a supposition to be wrong.

This study of Basic Conditions of Taoist Thunder Magic elucidates the workings of Thunder Magic (wu-lei fa 五雷法). This branch of ritual proficiency is associated with other schools in Taoist history, namely the Shen-hsiao tao (神霄道) and T'ien-hsin cheng-fa (天心正法).

Since the Sung-period the name Thunder Magic is a general and comprehensive name for a vast variety of exorcist rituals that later continued to flourish and were labelled Ch'ing-wei (清微) school (14th ct.). Finally, Thunder Magic became part of the general Taoist religious culture without being explicitly named Thunder Magic and singled out for separate practices. We can study this development, for example, in present day Taiwan, which, however, does not exclude the conscious continuation of Thunder Magic by individual priests or specialists who may claim to have family traditions reaching back to Taoists of the Sung period. The translation “magic” for the Chinese word fa (法) is the formulation that I prefer. In fact, we deal with rituals. Thunder Rituals would also be a good name translating lei-fa (雷法).

We know that the emergence of Thunder Magic in the Northern Sung-period is based on antique traditions of interpreting and handling natural phenomena, which always was and is a major concern in Taoism. There were specific rituals that focussed on the destructive force of thunder and lightning. They were employed in remote periods of Chinese history. For example, the scholar Wang Ch'ung (王充) in the Han-period disputes in his Lun-heng (論衡) the existence of a divinity called Thunder Lord (lei-kung 雷公), saying that thunders are simply fire (huo 火).³ The statement by Wang Ch'ung (王充) seems to prove that ages ago a spirit or divine Thunder Lord was an object for scholarly considerations and, most certainly, for religious veneration. The darkness of history conceals those antique rituals. Anyway, we know for sure that the actual tasks, the purposes and means of Thunder Magic were matters of great concern, and they were integral parts of Taoism long before Thunder Magic explicitly appeared.

The T'ang Taoist Chang Wan-fu (張萬福 fl.711-713) tells us: “concerning the comprehensive rule over all divinities and demons in heaven and on earth, concerning the killing and subduing of wicked demons (hsieh-mo 邪魔), the beheading and the annihilation of bad spirits (yao-ching 妖精), the recruitment of divine forces (ling 靈) and the summoning of vital forces (ch'i 氣), the realisation of control and order for mountains and rivers, the cleansing of filthy atmospheres, the dispatch of petitions and the employment of postal [spirit] agents, the direct communication with the immortals (shen-hsien 神仙), there is just nothing that has any priority to [the methods and rituals of] Orthodoxy and Unity (Cheng-i 正一).” Ages later in the Sung period, Thunder Magic did serve well all these tasks.⁴ It is quite telling that the statements of Chang Wan-fu (張萬福) read like an early summary of the programmatic range of the much later Thunder rituals. We want to keep in mind that there are also some other, additional aspects of the ritual practice in Thunder Magic that classify such rituals as proper parts of Cheng-i (正一) Taoism.

We consider that the Thunder specialists employed mostly secret skills and crafts that go with the name of Thunder Magic to solve individual and communal problems that people believed to have a spiritual or transcendent cause. For example, droughts and floods are such problems that can endanger the wellbeing of agrarian communities. The ritual help by means of Thunder Magic, however, is most seldom a communal event in which the local population can participate, in one way or other joining the festivities. Thunder Magic is a rather personal and secret matter. The communal participation is restricted to a few sections of the old and established thanksgiving rituals (chiao 醮). When the Thunder specialist and priest had secretly performed his Thunder rituals and had been successful, the community may then stage such communal rituals.

3 Wang Ch'ung: Lun-heng 6, 23, 96-103, esp. pp. 100-101 (Lei-hsü p'ien). Shanghai 1974.

4 TT 1241 Ch'uan-shou san-tung ching-chieh fa-lu liieh-shuo 1.4a-4b, following the text Cheng-i fa-wen k'o-chieh p'in (正一法文科戒品). Concerning this text see, U.A.Cedzich, p. 458, in: K.Schipper and F.Verellen eds.: The Taoist Canon, A Historical Companion to the Daozang (henceforth Companion). 3 vols. Chicago 2004.

Before taking up any details, I present the biography of the Taoist Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) who lived in the 9th century, well before the heyday of Thunder Magic. His biography substantiates most of the aspects of Taoist culture that I addressed so far. The text also unites many characteristics that generally describe the Taoist priest and exorcist.

The practical and ritual means that were at the avail of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) have a long history in China. They stem from historical periods before the reputed beginning of organized Taoism in the 2nd century A.D. The Sung (宋) period started in 960 A.D., about one hundred years after the life of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) who shows activities and spiritual potentials that forecast specific elements of the later Thunder Magic. His biography indicates the personal qualities that characterize the practitioners of Thunder Magic. The term Thunder Magic stands for the attempt to rationalize a welter of long established religious notions and rituals, which may be due to the intellectual and rationalistic disposition of the Sung (宋) period. We also remember that emperor Sung Hui-tsung (宋徽宗 r. 1100-1126) developed a great personal interest in the Taoist religion and actually thought himself and his staff to represent the heavenly spirit-administration. On the other side, the priest and Thunder specialist professes to embody a spirit-career with ranks and varied promotions, which enables him to live up to the extraordinary standard of being divine. Our sources do not let us have any doubts about this claim.⁵ We notice that we find in A Dictionary of Official Titles in Imperial China many of the spirit-titles that refer to the assumed power structure of Taoist Thunder specialists and their deities.⁶

5 See the grand spirit-ranks and promotions for the Taoist priest in TT 1220 Tao-fa hui-yüan 56.39a-39b. For a translation of this chapter in TT 1220 see below, Chapter II: The Scope of Taoist Thunder Magic.

6 See Charles O. Hucker, Stanford 1985 (henceforth Hucker).

The biography of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) serves us well as an entertaining example to illustrate the practical and visible role of Taoist Thunder Magic. The biography is contained in the collection “Supplementary Lives of Immortals” (Hsü-hsien chuan 續仙傳) by Shen Fen (沈汾) of the Southern T'ang period (937-975). The biography of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) is one of the twelve items in chapter 2: “Hidden Transformations” (yin-hua 隱化).

The Biography of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶)⁷

(17a) “Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) had the name (tzu 字) Lu-ts'ung (魯聰) and hailed from Chien-ch'ang (建昌) district in Hung-chou (洪州).⁸ When he was young he adhered to the Taoist skills (tao-shu 道術) of his [spiritual] teacher masters, the [two] Taoists from the Western Mountains (hsi-shan 西山), the Perfect Lords (chen-chün 真君) Hsü [Sun] (許遜) and Wu [Meng] (吳猛).⁹ He abstained from cereals and practiced breathing techniques (fu-ch'i 服氣).

7 See Yeh Ch'ien-shao in: TT 295 Hsü-hsien chuan 2, 16b-18b. Also see Hsü-hsien chuan 2, 13a-13b; in: Hsiao T'ien-shih ed.: Li-tai chen-hsien shih-chuan (Tao-tsang ching-hua 5/7, Taipei 1980); Concerning TT 295, see F. Verellen, Xu xian zhuan, pp. 429-430, in: Companion, he also indicates other editions of this title that are either complete or fragmentary. See T'ai-p'ing kuang-chi (太平廣記) 394 (lei 雷 2), 6a-6b (p. 1607, ed.: Kyoto 1972) contains the story of a certain Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉遷韶) who was initiated by Lei-kung (雷公) as to be able to summon thunders and to save people. The deity explained that he had five brothers. The two Yehs (葉) most likely are the same person, although their places of origin read different. Both names most certainly stand for the one person who hailes from Chiang-hsi province. The background of the person in TT 295 sounds better and more learned, whereas the T'ai-p'ing kuang-chi (太平廣記) of Li Fang (李昉, 978 CE) speaks about a young lad who collected firewood when he experienced that divine encounter. I translate the TT 295 version.

8 This is today's Nan-ch'ang district in Chiang-hsi province, where Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) also hails from.

9 Concerning the two famous Taoists (3rd ct.) who allegedly were experts in Thunder Magic, see TT 1220 Tao-fa hui-yüan 56.10a; for a complete translation of this chapter (nr. 56) in A Corpus of Taoist Ritual see below Chapter II. See F.C. Reiter: „The Name of the Nameless and Thunder Magic“, p. 115 in: P. Andersen and F.C. Reiter eds.: Scriptures, Schools and Forms of Practice in Daoism, A Berlin Symposium, in: AAS 20. TT 1220: 125.1a sq. Chiu-chou she-ling man-lei ta-fa (九州社令蠻雷大法) shows Hsü Sun (許遜) to be the very first spiritual patron saint of the Earth Altar (Thunder) rituals. The phrasing in TT 295 is opaque. It literally says: “...he served the Taoists...as his teacher masters. His Taoist skills [were] the avoidance of cereals and the breathing technics ...” Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) reputedly lived in the T'ang-period, a few centuries after the times of Hsü and Wu. Concerning the Altar of Earth Thunder, see below Chapter II, cf. TT 1220:

A Work and its Shapers
The Most High Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens in Early Medieval China

by
Timothy Charles Swanger

A Dissertation Presented in Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the Degree
Doctor of Philosophy

Approved January 2019 by the Graduate Supervisory Committee

Stephen Bokenkamp, Chair
Robert Ford Campany
Huaiyu Chen
Young Oh
Stephen West

ARIZONA STATE UNIVERSITY

May 2019

ABSTRACT

Religions, following Max Müller, have often been seen by scholars in religious studies as uniform collections of beliefs and practices encoded in stable “sacred books” that direct the conduct of religious actors. These texts were the chief focus of academic students of religion through much of the 20th century, and this approach remains strong in the 21st. However, a growing chorus of dissidents has begun to focus on the lived experience of practitioners and the material objects that structure that experience, and some textual scholars have begun extending this materialist framework to the study of texts. This dissertation is a contribution in that vein from the field of Daoist studies. Now split between two separate texts, the Most High Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens began as a 4th-century collection of apocalyptic predictions and apotropaic devices designed to deliver a select group of Chinese literati to the heavens of Highest Clarity. Later editors during the early medieval period (ca. 220-589 CE) took one of two paths: for their own reasons, they altered the Rectifying Methods to emphasize either the world’s end or its continuation. Detailed study of these alterations and their contexts shows how individuals and groups used and modified the Rectifying Methods in ways that challenge the conventional relationship between religious text and religious actor.

To my mother, my first teacher

“One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever.” – Ecclesiastes 1:4

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Surely by now the myth of the individual author is dead and buried. But for the record: I didn't do this alone. First thanks go to my lovely and supportive family. Robert Swanger, Elaine Goble Dandridge, and Libby Swanger provided a wonderful home for a budding nerd to grow up in. Mom, I'm sorry you didn't make it to the home stretch. I was really looking forward to your keen critical eye and attentive ear as I embarked on this project, but life had other plans. I'd also like to thank my committee. Stephen Bokenkamp, Robert Campany, Huaiyu Chen, Young Oh, and Stephen West have borne my endless questions over the years with patience and good cheer. Professor Campany deserves special thanks, as it was his influence (as well as that of the departed John McRae) that got me started studying the religions of China as an undergraduate. So does Stephen Bokenkamp. His compassion and forbearance made for an excellent mentor, and his strict attention to matters philological and sinological taught me that the smallest of unturned stones can yield fascinating secrets. The Yad Hanadiv Foundation and Tel Aviv University generously funded a portion of my work, and introduced me to some lovely new friends along the way (hi, Noa!). My support network includes professors from my undergraduate and graduate years: Nancy Levene and Pierce Salguero have been of particular help. I have also relied on some very good friends, past and present: Stephanie Bilinsky, David Walsh, Sammit Khandeparkar, JooSil Kim, Seth Clippard, Paul Amato, Jennifer Bussio, Yang Wu, Wenbo Chang, Ye Han, and many others were wonderful classmates and companions through the trials and tribulations of graduate school. My idiot cats have provided endless amusement, annoyance, and distraction; Fluffins (RIP!)

helped me study for comps. But surely the most important person in my life over the course of this project has been Marci Baranski. Without her emotional and financial support, it wouldn't have been possible. More importantly, she has proven an excellent partner, and the perfect person for me to love and grow with over the past six years.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
LIST OF TABLES.....	x
LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS.....	xi
CHAPTER
1 RELIGIOUS STUDIES AND TEXTUALITY.....	1
The Tools at Hand.....	1
Work, Text, Version, Voice, Author.....	18
Writing and the Work of Creation.....	27
The Shangqing Revelations.....	32
The Shangqing Revelations: Material and Social History.....	34
The Shangqing Revelations and the “Rectifying Methods”.....	35
Different Versions, Different Voices.....	38
The “Rectifying Methods” and the Study of Religion(s).....	39
2 THE “RECTIFYING METHODS” AND CHANGE OVER TIME.....	42
Tales Retold.....	42
The Secret Revelation of John.....	42
The Saint who Never Was.....	49
Partial Works, Partial Memories.....	56
A Summary of the “Rectifying Methods”.....	59
Cosmology.....	62
The Creation of Humanity and Nonhuman People.....	67

CHAPTER	Page
The Six Heavens and the Coming Apocalypse.....	69
Hymns and Transmission Ceremony.....	74
Codes for Transmission of the Zhongwen Linglu and Yinyang Linglu.....	76
Instructions for the Use of the Santian Zhengfa and Zhongwen Linglu.....	77
Instructions for the Use of the Zhongshu Zhenlu.....	78
Citations from the “Siji minkge”.....	84
Amulets and Their Transmission.....	86
The Daoist Canon and the History of the “Rectifying Methods”.....	88
Previous scholarship on the “Rectifying Methods”.....	90
Ozaki Masaharu.....	91
Isabelle Robinet.....	93
Kobayashi Masayoshi.....	96
Ōfuchi Ninji.....	99
Wang Haoyue.....	100
Works and their authors.....	106
3 THE “RECTIFYING METHODS” AND THE SHANGQING REVELATIONS. .	108
The Sociohistorical Fabric.....	109
The Shangqing Eschaton and Methods to Escape It.....	117
An Early Example.....	117
The End Has No End.....	118
The Three Heavens and the Six Heavens.....	121

CHAPTER	Page
	The Celestial Lists.....127
	Meditation Exercises.....128
	Protective Spells.....130
	Talismans.....131
	The Shangqing Version.....134
4	PROPHECY AND THE PEN: THE “RECTIFYING METHODS” AND THE RISE OF THE LIU-SONG.....135
	The Sociohistorical Fabric.....135
	The Liu-Song and Political Prophecy.....138
	The Shangqing Version: A Step Forward.....146
5	A LORD OF SPACE AND TIME: THE “SECRET ESSENTIALS” AND THE QUEST FOR POWER.....148
	The Sociohistorical Fabric.....148
	A Buddhist Critique and a Daoist Response.....155
	The Shangqing Version: A Step Forward.....162
6	CONCLUSION: AFTERLIVES.....165
	Versions and Voices.....165
	The Final Days.....166
	The World Continues.....167
	Further Uses of the “Rectifying Methods”.....168
	The “Rectifying Methods” as Material Object.....171

CHAPTER	Page
Different Works, Different Needs, Different Times.....	173
BIBLIOGRAPHY.....	176
APPENDIX
A MENTIONS OF THE WORK OR ASSOCIATED CONCEPTS.....	196
B THE “RECTIFYING METHODS” IN THE ANCIENT LISTS.....	218
C THE WSBY EDITION OF THE “RECTIFYING METHODS”.....	220
Juan 6.....	221
Juan 22.....	225
Juan 30-32.....	226
Juan 43.....	234
Juan 47.....	235
Juan 65.....	235
Appearances in other texts.....	238
Names and terms.....	239
Juan 95.....	247
D THE “RECTIFYING METHODS” IN THE SDZN.....	249
Juan 6.....	250
Juan 8.....	251
Juan 9.....	251
E THE “RECTIFYING METHODS” IN THE XDL.....	260
F AMULETS IN THE RECEIVED “RECTIFYING METHODS”.....	266

APPENDIX	Page
Texts Consulted.....	267
The Amulets.....	270
Conclusion.....	286
G DEITIES AND PLACES IN THE “RECTIFYING METHODS”.....	287

LIST OF TABLES

Table	Page
1. The Heavenly Stems and Earthly Branches	120
2. Sequence of Events in the Apocalyptic Predictions of the Purple Texts , the Pearl Satchel , and Lu Xiujing's Preface	145

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

DDB	Digital Dictionary of Buddhism
ECR	Early Chinese Religion
EDS	Early Daoist Scriptures
EoT	The Encyclopedia of Taoism
Grand Ricci	Grand dictionnaire Ricci de la langue chinoise
HFL	The Hanfenlou 涵芬樓 edition of the Daozang, printed by the eponymous publishing house between 1923-1926.
Handian	The Hanyu Dacidian
j.	juan (“chapter” or “scroll” – the traditional unit of textual division)
R	Robinet, La révélation du Shangqing
T	Taishō shinshū daizōkyō
TC	The Taoist Canon: A Historical Companion to the Daozang
TPGJ	Taiping guangji
WSBY	Wushang biyao
XDL	Xiaodao lun
YJQQ	Yunji qiqian
ZG	Zhen’gao
ZHDZ	Zhonghua daoang

Chapter 1: Religious Studies and Textuality

The Tools at Hand

The centrality of texts in the Daoist religion is beyond dispute. Consider the following example, from the Most High Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens (CT 1203 Taishang santian zhengfa jing 太上三天正法經). Two gods receive a work of scripture from their superior that allows them to control demon soldiers in the service of the gods of the Six Heavens, whose violent rule has heretofore oppressed a suffering humanity. The superior deity ordains them into a hierarchy and commands them to transmit this work to human beings. With the aid of said work, these humans can become powerful beings known as Perfected. With their new status, these fortunate few can use the methods provided by this text to aid their celestial superiors in sweeping away the violent rule of the Six Heavens:

太上與後聖，九玄上相青童君共序三天正法除六天之文，施用寶訣祝說，投祭法度以付二君，使教後學諸為真人者，以制六天收戮群凶。於是帝君，上相青童君奉受真訣稽首而還。

The Most High allowed the Lord of the Golden Porte and the Azure Lad of the Nine Heavens to together lay out the Correct Methods of the Three Heavens for Expelling the Six Heavens, using precious oral instructions, incantations, and explanations. They sacrificed and he ritually ordained them, in order to transmit [the scripture] to the two lords, commanding them to teach those who come late to the study [of the Way] how to become Perfected in order to control the Six Heavens, gathering up and slaying the mass of demons. Thereupon the Lord of the Golden Porte and the Azure Lad received perfected instructions, performed full prostrations, and left.¹

In the ritual recounted above, the text is the focal point. Materially, it is the sole object being transmitted. The ritualized behavior of the three gods is structured around its transmission and receipt. The work structures the social relations within the celestial realm and between deities and humans. All of this presents a problem for scholars of Daoism as members of the larger discipline of religious studies. The discipline as a whole has recently been turning away from texts as the chief object of study.

1 ZHDZ 1.260b.22-c4

One articulation of this stance is the editorial statement found in the first issue of the journal Material Religion (2005-):

The study of religion has largely been pursued as the study of texts—liturgical, theological, poetic, or narrative words and concepts. There is no regretting this practice, since it is clear that many religions in the last three millennia have invested enormous cultural resources in hand and mechanically printed texts, which have acted as authoritative transmissions of received knowledge. But the limits of a textual study of religion have gradually been recognized by many in academe, museum, and elsewhere over the last two or three generations...

In addition to gaps in the textual record where relevant evidence has been misplaced or destroyed (or instances where texts simply did not feature in the religion under study), the editors note that meaning and its interpretation is not confined to the textual sphere, and thus cannot be understood through textual analysis alone:

...[M]aterial things, places, and practices evoke modes of experience that are not equal to the reading of texts. "Meaning" may not be reduced simply to the parsing of words or their conceptual interpretation. Things and practices mean in ways that texts do not. Moreover, words combine with things to create even richer, more embodied forms of experience that must be scrutinized in order to capture the complex sense of religious meaning-making.

The editors give examples of the sorts of material they are interested in:

We understand by "material religion" not only great works of art and temples, but all the things believers do with them. We understand material religion to include pilgrimages, image-guided meditation, the spaces that house shamanistic transport, spirit possessions, divination, or liturgical worship, the objects to which memory and genealogy are keyed, the costumes in which ancestors are invoked, the images that make aesthetic experience a spiritual encounter, the devotional paraphernalia that grandparents and priests give as gifts to the young, the bumper stickers that invoke deities, and the objects that serve as amulets to ward off evil or summon benevolence. All of these objects and their uses constitute examples of lived religion.

Their "meaning" is not contained merely in the object or its imagery, but in how they are used, and reused, forgotten, broken, salvaged, or ensconced in museums.²

Some disciplines suggest themselves immediately for the study of these objects:

geography and place (pilgrimages, spaces that house religious activities); drama and performance (the religious activities people engage in within these spaces, as well as the objects the use and costumes they wear); social memory (memory, genealogy, and associated objects); or media studies (bumper stickers). Absent are the typical tools of the textual scholar: philology, text-criticism, and the like. Consider, too, a more recent (and very influential) programmatic statement for the materialist study of religion by Manuel

A. Vásquez:

The sort of materialism I would like to advance approaches religion as the open-ended product of discursive and nondiscursive practices of embodied individuals, that is, individuals who exist in particular times and places. These individuals are embedded in nature and culture, and drawing from and conditioned by their ecological, biological, psychological, and sociocultural resources, they construct multiple identities and practices, some of which come to be designated, often through contestation, as religious at particular junctures. In other words, a materialist approach is interested in the processes behind the naming and articulation of religion as a relatively stable and patterned reality recognized by both insiders and outsiders.³

Without analyzing this passage in detail, one can note the fields it makes amenable to the study of religion: among others, these are ecology, biology, sociology, psychology, and cognitive science. The disciplinary broad-mindedness shared by Vásquez and the editors of Material Religion is a striking departure from the early days of the field.

Understanding this departure requires a brief foray into those early days.

2 Material Religion 1.1 (March 2005): 6-7.

3 Vásquez, More Than Belief: A Materialist Theory of Religion (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2011), 8. For a discussion of the work as a whole, see the review round table in Method and Theory in the Study of Religion 24, no. 4-5 (2012).

The modern discipline of religious studies is often traced to Friedrich Max Müller (1823-1900), who was the first to use the term “Science of Religion” (Religionswissenschaft) in a series of lectures delivered in 1870. There, he divides his new science into two stages: “[T]he former, which has to deal with the historical forms of religion, is called Comparative Theology; the latter, which has to explain the conditions under which religion, in its highest or lowest form, is possible, is called Theoretic Theology.”⁴ Müller thus divides religious studies into empirical and theoretical modes; the first requires the collection, collation, and classification of data; the second crafts an explanatory theory of religion based on that data. His split would influence the giants of the field, from Mircea Eliade (1907-1986) to J.Z. Smith (1938-2017).⁵ The science of religion should begin with the first stage, since it is not until “all the evidence that can possibly be gained from a comparative study of all the religions of the world has been fully collected, classified, and analyzed” that scholars could begin to formulate a theory of religion corresponding to the second step.

4 Jon R. Stone, ed., The Essential Max Müller: On Language, Mythology, and Religion (New York: Palgrave MacMillan, 2002): 114. Emphasis in original. The quotation is from the first of Müller’s 1870 “Lectures on the Science of Religion.” Stone uses the 1872 text, justifying his choice on p. xv.

5 Eliade’s debt to Müller is evident in his citational practices: the theory of religion he advances in The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion, tr. Willard R. Trask (Orlando: A Harvest Book, 1957) and The Myth of the Eternal Return, tr. Willard R. Trask (Princeton, NJ: Princeton/Bollingen Paperbacks, 2005) are founded on diverse examples. For instance, his theses on sacred space on pp. 12-17 of The Eternal Return are enumerated, then explicated with citations. The chaos/cosmos split on pp. 29-32 of Sacred and Profane is established through reference to the Vedas; to unspecified “Scandinavian colonists;” and to 2 Corinthians 5:17. Smith’s four-step method of comparison reads like a heavily-modified version of Müller’s original: the scholar first situates a given example in its historical context, then describes its reception history; second, they repeat the same two steps with a different exemplum; third, they redescribe the exempla each in light of the other; and finally, they rectify the academic categories in light of which the exempla have been imagined. See “The ‘End’ of Comparison: Redescription and Rectification,” in A Magic Still Dwells: Comparative Religion in the Postmodern Age, ed. Kimberley C. Patton and Benjamin C. Ray (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000), 239.

For Müller, the most important source of this evidence is textual. Though he provides a brief paragraph on the value of missionary accounts of “savage” religions, he is chiefly interested in documentary evidence in the form of “sacred books:”

A study of the original documents on which the principal religions of the world profess to be founded... has enabled some of our best living scholars to distinguish in each religion what is really ancient and what is comparatively modern; what was the doctrine of the founders and their immediate disciples, and what were the afterthoughts and, generally, the later corruptions of later ages... [A]s it is essential that we should know the most ancient forms of every language, before we proceed to any comparisons, is indispensable that we should have a clear conception of the most primitive form of every religion before we proceed to determine its own value, and to compare it with other forms of religious faith.⁶

Note the semantic slippage here: the study of original documents at first is only relevant to “the principal religions of the world,” but by the end of the paragraph that method is useful in the study of “every” religion. The examples of “religion” that follow only confirm the centrality of sacred texts to the study of religion: Islam, Buddhism, and Hinduism are – for Müller, at least – paradigmatic textual religions (115-116). The methods that allow such study involve “critical scholarship,” broadly conceived (“When was [a book] written? Where, and by whom?... Was the whole book written at once, or does it contain portions of an earlier date?”) but also philology. When studying Zoroastrianism, for instance, “we must chiefly, if not entirely, depend on those portions of the Zend-Avesta which are written in the Gatha dialect, a more primitive dialect than that of the rest of the sacred code of the Zoroastrians,” (ibid.). Of course, the most successful

6 Stone, Essential 114-115. His textual focus sets him apart from other early evolutionists like Tylor and Frazer, and (later) Durkheim, who appealed to what might be called an early form of ethnographic evidence in reconstructing “primitive” religion.

analysis of a religious text was his own – that of the Vedas, again performed via philology and text-criticism.⁷

Norman Girardot sees Müller’s study of the Vedas as emblematic of his entire enterprise:

[Müller’s] judgment concerning the authentic sacredness or profound “religiosity” of the Indian “classics...” relates in many ways to an imbricated set of Evangelical Protestant assumptions about history, religion, and the special authority of scripture (sola scriptura – and Müller’s original Pietistic Lutheran roots should be recalled here) and individual moral regeneration. In addition to an obvious anti-Catholic perspective on the general history of religions, priests, and ritual, these mostly unspoken criteria included... an emphasis on reified religious beliefs, doctrines, and moral codes embedded in scriptures and conscience; a stress on a monotheism... unsullied by intermediary spiritual beings; the importance of nonpetitionary prayer and worship; the need for a radical spiritual transformation of human nature and an ongoing moral self-cultivation; and the originary inspiration and authoritative role of individual religious founders, prophets, reformers, and editors.⁸

We have seen some of these notes struck above in Müller’s emphasis on the beliefs of the “founders” of various religions as recorded in their texts; others are evident elsewhere in his work.⁹ Key for us here is his emphasis on sacred texts, to be interpreted as carriers of signification that constitute the center of a given religion. Some scholars continue to uncritically adopt Müller’s approach.¹⁰ The vast majority, however, have begun to see

7 For his introduction to the study of the Vedas, see his “Lecture on the Vedas, or the Sacred Books of the Brahmans” in Stone, Essential 43-67.

8 Girardot, “Max Müller’s Sacred Books and the Nineteenth-Century Production of the Science of Comparative Religions,” History of Religions 41, no. 3 (Feb., 2002): 233.

9 The definition of religion he advanced in 1870 is one he adhered to, with minor modification, throughout his life. Its basic component, evident in the lowest and highest forms of religion, is the human experience of the “Infinite.” Much in the manner of Rudolph Otto, the Infinite is perceived more dimly or more perfectly in varying grades of religion, stretching from “fetish worship” through Roman Catholicism and finally reaching its culmination in Protestant Christianity. For concise statements of these views, see Stone, Essential 113, 170-171, 197, 216.

texts as more than containers for meaning that offer skeleton keys to the nature of religion. Rather, they are now one data point among many others that are included in religious activity.

Parallel to the notion of texts as central to religions is the tendency of religious studies scholars to read religions as texts. Tomoko Masuzawa treats this trend as an extension of the hermeneutic approach in anthropology, which arose out of and in reaction to earlier German and English models of culture. Despite their differences, these models shared the conceit that culture was the province of an intellectual elite nurtured on classic literature. Their resulting spiritual and moral cultivation set them apart from the common folk (and indeed, it was at this time that the distinction between “the masses” and “the classes” began to appear). Though it was embodied in the literature studied by this elite, culture was also the expression of a unitary, primordial national spirit – a “whole way of life” or a “natural, organic folk spirit.” But while the English and German models were unabashedly evaluative, the anthropological model strove to be descriptive and pluralistic: there existed many cultures, with none distinctly “better” than the other. But the new anthropological definition of culture inherited two particularly important elements from its forebears. First, culture was conceived of as a unitary whole that was particular to a given group. Second, This unitary whole can be represented (as in literature for the German and English intellectuals); it can be understood. Therefore, it must be interpreted as a text: “[T]o know a culture is to understand its meaning... to grasp the ‘essential truth’ of a culture requires a hermeneutic science.”¹¹

11 Masuzawa, “Culture” in Critical Terms for Religious Studies, ed. Mark C. Taylor (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1998), 70-78, esp. 74, 77-78. Emphases in original.

Though it was first employed in this definition by Tylor, the “complex whole” version of culture remained influential among professional anthropologists (Masuzawa cites Ruth Benedict, Franz Boas, and Clifford Geertz) down through the mid-twentieth century – with an important modification: what was, for Tylor, “culture” in the singular, became plural.¹² It was then that the hermeneutic approach was borrowed from anthropology by prominent theologians like Paul Tillich and used to describe religions. Inheriting their perspective was Mircea Eliade, who defended hermeneutics as the only method proper to the study of religions:

The hierophanies – i.e., the manifestations of the sacred expressed in symbols, myths, supernatural beings, etc. - are grasped as structures, and constitute a prereflective language that requires a special hermeneutics... By means of a competent hermeneutics [developed, he explains earlier, from the work of earlier historians and phenomenologists of religion], history of religions ceases to be a museum of fossils, ruins, and obsolete mirabilia and becomes what it should have been from the beginning for any investigator: a series of "messages" waiting to be deciphered and understood.¹³

Eliade had earlier allowed that religious matters were “of concern” to members of other disciplines, and even that drawing upon their techniques could prove useful to the historian of religions; later in the same work (pp. 12-36) he elaborates on the contributions and shortcomings of psychologists, sociologists, and theologians in the study of religion. In the preface, however, as in earlier works, he makes the case that the methods of religious studies – what he calls here his “special hermeneutics” – are distinct from the methods of other disciplines.¹⁴ Masuzawa details the enduring influence of the hermeneuticists on the field of religious studies and beyond:

12 For Tylor, “culture” was unequivocally singular: “[A] search of the surviving residue of Tylor’s career has produced only two rather dubious instances of the plural, neither of them in a published work by Tylor.” See George W. Stocking, Jr., Victorian Anthropology (New York: The Free Press, 1987), 302-303. “Culture” had become plural at least by the time of Ruth Benedict. See Benedict, Patterns of Culture (New York: Mentor Books, 1959 [1934]), 17ff.

13 Eliade, The Quest: History and Meaning in Religion (1969; repr., Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984), preface, n.p. Masuzawa cites a slightly longer portion on 81-82.

To be sure, not everyone professionally engaged in religious studies would subscribe to this particular conception of ‘religious hermeneutics.’ More broadly speaking, however, the hermeneutical paradigm has become so insidiously ensconced in the human sciences generally in the course of the twentieth century that it now seems to strike many people as perversely unnatural, if not entirely impossible, to entertain the possibility that “culture” or “religion” could be construed in any way other than as an intricately intrareferential “meaningful whole...” the overwhelming emphasis on meaning as the ultimate constitutive substance of a cultural wholeness has had the effect... of bringing the anthropological notion of culture into closer association with the more literary, aesthetic, and moral concepts of culture discussed earlier.¹⁵

The same, she implies, could be said of religion. In this respect, Geertz and Eliade come in for particular criticism: both were interested in situating the study of religion in the tradition of the interpretive study of culture.

Her criticism of Geertz is particularly ironic because his anthropological approach had seemed to offer an alternative to scholars of religion who had tired of the Eliadean paradigm. Instead of “identify[ing] and catalog[uing] sacred archetypes across different cultures and eras” – that is, instead of constructing Eliade’s series of “messages” – they could rely on Geertz’s famous “thick description” to study various religions in their own context. In the process, religionists adopted his theory of religion as a system of symbols that created and reflected an ethos and worldview. By taking a semiotic approach to religion and culture, however, Geertz perpetuated the focus on unity and hermeneutics that saw religions as separate wholes, with their own essences, that could be read like texts.¹⁶ Vásquez traces Geertzian textualism to a particular current in Durkheimian thought that privileges ideas over matter, and which influenced his successors in the structuralist and post-structuralist tradition. Lévi-Strauss and Derrida fundamentally differ in their approach to meaning, but both are textualists at heart. Their conceptions of meaning, insofar as they have influenced religionists, have led to the same emphasis on religion-as-text that one sees in Geertz. As an alternative, Vásquez suggests scholars refocus their gaze on ritual and practice – an approach that has been present in the field since Durkheim (and even Tylor) but has been neglected by a collective textualist myopia. While texts are critical data to the study of religion, they should not be the only data – and religions should not be analyzed exclusively in textual terms.¹⁷

14 See Eliade, The Sacred and the Profane, 14-16.

15 Masuzawa, “Culture,” 80-82.

16 Vásquez, Belief 222-223; Masuzawa, ibid.

For the materialists above, the problem is not that religions involve texts; it is that scholars see religions as their texts, and extend the textual metaphor to non-textual aspects of religious life. Religious bodies, spaces, and practices are either relegated to secondary status or reframed as texts in need of explication. The text has become a “hungry metaphor” that in the end consumes all other modes of analyzing religion.¹⁸ Approaching a given text not only as a container of signifiers but also as a material object opens new windows on the lives of its users. Vásquez sketches the parameters of textual materiality. He first notes that texts, as they have been approached, are at once objectified activity and carriers of meaning. Overemphasis on their completeness and their value as pure vehicles of signification, however, has obscured their materiality:

17 Belief 231-232. Throughout the book, Vásquez develops a materialist theory of religion that focuses on embodiment, praxis, and place. While extraordinarily promising, the details of his theory need not concern us here.

18 The reference is to Thomas Csordas, “Embodiment and Cultural Phenomenology,” in Perspectives on Embodiment: The Intersections of Nature and Culture, ed. Gail Weiss and Honi Fern Haber (New York: Routledge, 1999): 146.

Texts are always the result of (and we always meet them through) practices of production and consumption. These practices always point to: (1) the habituses of their authors and competing audiences; (2) the selection of materials (e.g., the types of parchment, binding, and ink used); (3) manipulation (miscopying them, generating apologias or polemics around them, and bowdlerizing or even banning them); and (4) appropriation (since texts are not just interpreted but also memorized, chanted, decorated, paraded down the streets, and even worn...). Texts, thus, should not be opposed or even separated from religious practices or artifacts. Instead, texts are the relatively stable albeit open-ended products of practices of “religious mattering,” text-making and text-consuming practices, including those of the religion scholar.¹⁹

We will see that most of these aspects of materiality are relevant for the production of the Rectifying Methods. There is another important aspect he does not discuss in detail, however: the social situation in which texts are generated, modified, and circulated. Karen King shows an astute awareness of this facet of textual production in The Secret Revelation to John (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2006). Her assumptions and the methods she bases on them provide useful tools for the study of the Rectifying Methods.

The fundamental data for students of the Secret Revelation are four extant manuscripts, all of which differ from one another in major and minor ways. Three versions of the Secret Gospel were found in three different codices (II, III, and IV) among a cache of ancient manuscripts discovered near the Egyptian town of Nag Hammadi in 1945. Another, referred to by scholars as BG, was purchased in a Cairo antiquities market and brought to the Egyptian Museum in Berlin. These four different manuscripts suggest people in four different settings thought the text was relevant: an urban school setting; second-century Rome; at various points in Egypt; and outside a Pachomian monastery. The Secret Gospel was probably composed in an urban school setting, most likely in ¹⁹ Vásquez, Belief 255-256.

Alexandria, in the first or second century CE; during that same century, some version made its way to Rome, where it was used for purposes of refutation by the orthodox polemicist Irenaeus; meanwhile, different version(s) circulated in Egypt; and finally three of these were collected and buried by Pachomian monks. The differences in form and content among these versions, as well as their differing uses, reveal a great deal about the social life of the text.

The circumstances behind the discovery of the Nag Hammadi codices have been the subject of dispute for decades. King presents a stripped-down version of the conventional account, and that will serve for present purposes:

In 1945, the most important single discovery for the history of early Christianity was made. A peasant digging for fertilizer in the hills near the village of Nag Hammadi in Egypt uncovered a clay jar containing a collection of fourth-century papyrus books. As it turned out, these books contained a wealth of early Christian writings that had been buried by monks from the local Pachomian monastery in order to save them from the censors of the fifth-century Church.²⁰

The importance of the Nag Hammadi find is unquestioned, but almost every other detail has been criticized. Who found the texts? Why do the accounts of the principal figures in the discovery vary so widely? What were they doing at time of discovery? Who buried the Nag Hammadi codices, and why?

Such questions have direct bearing on the books' nature and origin. Challenging the regnant Pachomian-centered vision of the Nag Hammadi texts, Nicola Denzey Lewis and Justine Ariel Blount argue persuasively that the fertilizer story is unlikely; instead, the individual or group responsible for the discovery had likely looted the tomb of a private citizen who had commissioned the codices to be used as grave goods (a well-attested practice in ancient and late antique Egypt). Grave robbery is a well-attested practice in ancient and modern Egypt, and furnished many of the manuscripts on the antiquities market – including, likely, the Berlin Codex version of the Secret Gospel. If they were indeed looted from a grave, the Nag Hammadi codices would have functioned as displays of the wealth and social power of the tomb’s occupant.²¹ Their status as material objects, then, would have been at least as important as their content.²²

²⁰ King, Secret Revelation 2.

The existing versions of the Secret Gospel suggests second-century Alexandria as a place of composition for several reasons. Its format places it among the esoteric tradition of master-student textual transmission common to an urban school; in this case, Christ transmits his final teaching to his disciple John, and the masters and students who transmitted and received it took their own place in the “school of Christ.” Its author displays extensive familiarity with Jewish literature and hermeneutics, and so they must have composed the text in a setting where such material was available. Alexandria’s community of Greek-speaking Jews provides just such a setting. Indeed, much of the material included with the Secret Gospel in the Nag Hammadi codices would have been exactly the sort collected and transmitted in an urban school. The material the Gospel quotes and parodies shows the author was familiar not only with Jewish theology and hermeneutic techniques but also distinctively Egyptian theriomorphic deities, Platonic cosmology and astrology, and demonology. Alexandria would have been one of the few places where all of these resources would have been accessible. “The cumulative evidence...” says King, “points to most directly to Alexandria. Indeed if the Secret Revelation of John were not written in Alexandria, it would need to have been written in a place just like it.”²³

21 The power of such objects in this regard is illustrated by the story of Arethas of Caesarea, a scholar and politician of the tenth century who paid, on average, 15-20 nomismata per codex – equivalent to half the yearly salary of a civil servant. See The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, ed. Alexander P. Kazhdan (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991), s.v. “Book Trade,” “Codex,” “Arethas of Caesarea.”

22 See Nicola Denzey Lewis and Justine Ariel Blount, “Rethinking the Origins of the Nag Hammadi Codices,” Journal of Biblical Literature 133, no. 2 (2014): 400-415. The debate continues: see Hugo Lundhaug and Lance Jennot, The Monastic Origins of the Nag Hammadi Codices, Studien und Texte zu Antike und Christentum, 97 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2015). Pp. 1-21 answers some of the criticisms advanced in the article.

The popularity of the Secret Gospel is unquestionable; there is, however, no single definitive version. Both of these facts derive from the Secret Gospel’s material circumstances. All four surviving manuscripts were translated from Greek into Coptic – three independently – and show evidence of having been copied before. Indeed, each copy we now possess probably had its own complicated history. Some of this history is hinted at by “variations in the construction of the codices, scribal hands, and dialect,” (18). As mentioned above, three of the copies were found in Nag Hammadi codices; the fourth circulated separately. At the linguistic level the copy of the Secret Revelation found in codex IV shows distinct features characteristic of a southern dialect of Coptic; the same criteria show that the version found in codex II is a northern text (though the texts themselves are otherwise almost identical).²⁴ Meanwhile, the versions found in codex III and in the Cairo marketplace – in addition to differing significantly from one another – are both shorter than the versions in II and IV. Besides orthographical differences and differences in content, each version of the Secret Gospel is also marked by lacunae – portions of the text that have been damaged beyond recognition or completely destroyed between the centuries during the text’s production and their discovery. Some can be filled in with reference to other versions of the text or with educated guesses, but other parts of the text are beyond recovery.²⁵ Textual lacunae, linguistic and orthographic differences, and the complicated histories of the Nag Hammadi codices, combined with the debates surrounding their nature and origin, present significant obstacles to their study. They also hint at another relevant factor: mobility.

²³ King, Secret Revelation 9-17.

²⁴ Funk, “Linguistic Aspects” 127.

Wolf-Peter Funk summarizes the movement of the Nag Hammadi codices:

Quite evidently, at least a few of our “texts”—in some Coptic version and format—did a great deal of traveling along the Nile valley before they arrived in the Nag Hammadi region. During these travels, they were doubtless part of the luggage of certain persons (who may or may not have been interested in their specific contents). They may have changed carriers from time to time, and they were probably taken out of the bag at a number of places—to be read, modified, copied (thus, in a sense, “published”) so as to multiply into several chains of transmission. That is to say, at such stopovers on the way—possibly involving a more extended stay in some places—they can be assumed to have undergone the same kind of treatment that they were evidently given on their arrival in southern Upper Egypt: as a consequence of the personal or professional contacts between their carriers and other persons, indigenous to the region, they were gradually adapted to their new environment. (This adaptation, it seems, was hardly ever accomplished one hundred per cent.) At some stages during the process, there happened to be editors who thought it fit to unite one or two pieces of the imported goods with other interesting material that derived more directly from their home production. Such miscellaneous volumes may have had quite a history of their own before some of the items happened to be chosen for inclusion into the codices we are proud to have.²⁶

Funk’s summary highlights several important aspects of the Nag Hammadi codices’ materiality. As he relates more explicitly elsewhere, they are composite volumes, containing individual manuscripts written in different dialects by different scribes. They are neither doctrinally nor linguistically unified.²⁷ The individual manuscripts contained in each codex would themselves have had their own histories, bound up in the mutual contact between copyists, editors, caravan hands, and interested locals from different regions of Egypt. All of these histories would have played out for each individual manuscript before they were bound up together and (eventually) buried.

25 King, Secret Revelation 25.

26 Funk, “Linguistic Aspects” 146, as quoted in King, Secret Revelation 17.

27 Funk, “Linguistic Aspects” 125.

In detailing the winding journey of the Nag Hammadi texts, King and Funk display awareness of the four aspects of materiality discussed by Vásquez above. The habituses (though Funk does not use the term) of the authors, editors, teachers, and copyists of the Secret Gospel would have been evident in everything from their methods of teaching to the criteria governing the text's selection for use to the act of copying itself. This latter would be implicated in the wider circulation of the manuscripts. Manipulations may reflect simple dialectical differences between scribes, but they may also point to what Vásquez calls "appropriations" of the text: its specific uses in specific settings. In particular, King infers that certain differences in content mark different social fields in which the text operated.

The most important difference in content between the longer version in II/IV and the shorter version in BG/III is the insertion of a hymn to a figure called Pronoia. This hymn, inserted near the end of the text, precipitated a wave of revisions throughout the Secret Gospel that allowed the text to speak to contexts different than the original.²⁸ She notes four effects these changes had on the text as a whole. When compared to the shorter version, the new, longer edition displays:

...[A]n increased interest in rationalizing ritual practice, especially baptism, in terms of the work's mythological framework; a shift in some gender imagery; and an enrichment of intertextual allusions to the Gospel of John. In addition to these, we can note the stronger emphasis on healing by the addition of the extended list of demons...²⁹

28 King details the changes on Secret Revelation 244-257.

29 King, Secret Revelation 257

King associates these new characteristics with new contexts of use:

Altogether these may indicate a closer association of the work with a communal setting where baptism is understood in terms of moral purification and protection from the effects of demons. The ties to the Gospel of John indicate a stable or even increasing association with Christians for whom Johannine traditions were highly valued. And finally, the shifts in gender may point toward a monastic setting... where women were present but their leadership was not allowed and their presence was considered a sexual temptation.

For King, then, changes in the Secret Gospel of John reflect changes in the settings in which the text was used. An initial, shorter version was likely composed in an urban school setting for individual transmission from master to student. An independent hymn was later integrated into this version, precipitating a massive revision of the text to smoothly incorporate the new material. The thematic evidence in this longer version indicates a change in social context from a private esoteric school to a communal monastic setting.

Without question, the most important method King uses to understand these changes, and therefore what they imply about their new settings, is hermeneutic: she compares the semantic content of two different versions of the same text. And the account she favors has been challenged. Both she and her challengers agree, however, that understanding the text's fuller significance to late antique Egypt is only possible by taking into account its status as a material object. It is not solely a repository of meaning. Orthographic differences between different versions of the Secret Gospel reveal the intervention of different scribes as they attempted to refigure the text to suit readers who used different dialects of Coptic. Its monastic audience altered the content to suit their own purposes. The Secret Gospel, like other texts in the Nag Hammadi library, shows evidence of having been copied multiple times. The codices themselves collect manuscripts written on a wide variety of subjects and in a wide variety of dialects, often by different scribes. Taken together, these facets of the history of the Secret Gospel make it clear that understanding the nature of any given text requires taking into account its material and social context – and that, by the same token, analyzing the changes a text undergoes over time can provide insight into the social contexts in which those changes took place. We will see that the Rectifying Methods offers another illustration of this same principle, but first some terminological clarification is in order.

Work, Text, Version, Voice, Author

More than forty years ago, the literary critic Jerome McGann offered a definition of “text” and related concepts that, in modified form, will prove useful in a discussion of the Rectifying Methods. For McGann, the text is more than the words on the page; it is inseparable from the context in which it is read.

...[W]e shall have to distinguish the different faces... which [the text] always turns to us. I do not say the different ‘levels’ of the text because that word is freighted with the concept of the text as a container or transmitter of meaning rather than as a meaningful agent in itself. In this sense one might usefully distinguish ‘the text’ (of the poem as a purely linguistic event) from the ‘version’ (or the immediate and integral physical object through which the ‘text’ is being executed), and make yet a further distinction of ‘text’ and ‘version’ from the ‘work’ (the term to stand for some more global constitution of the poem). There is a ‘work’ called Paradise Lost that supervenes its many texts and its many versions; to William Blake that work was one thing, whereas to William Empson it was something else; and of course to any one of us the work we call Paradise Lost can be, will be, reconstituted yet again.³⁰

In my reading of McGann, the word “text” is almost a verb: it is a version read in a particular situation. He gives the example Byron’s critique of the prince regent (and heir apparent to the throne of England), “Lines to a Lady Weeping.” The poem was published in two different versions – one in 1812, anonymously, and one in 1814 under Byron’s own name. The 1812 version produced a small uproar; the impact of the 1814 version was much greater, due in no small part to Byron’s fame and political status. It occasioned attacks on Byron in the prominent newspapers The Morning Post and The Courier, with the latter being particularly outraged that Byron – as a “heredity counsellor of the King” – would dare admonish the heir apparent.³¹ The “texts” are thus the readings and responses to the 1812 and 1814 versions; the “versions” are the physical documents read during the textual process; and “Lines” is the work independent of the two versions. The boundaries between McGann’s categories are somewhat porous: for him, a constitutive element of the 1814 text is in fact the 1812 version, the reprinting of which under Byron’s name engendered such rancor. “Lines” as a work incorporates these versions and their associated texts, but also transcends them. Of note, too, is that different versions can constitute a given work even when the content of those versions differs. His example is Marianne Moore’s “Poetry.” This work was revised several times over the course of five decades. The third and “final” version consisted of a mere three lines, stripping away much of the content that had been commented on, analyzed, and enjoyed by Moore’s fans for decades. They were, perhaps understandably, upset: the poet Robert Pinsky notes that “Many readers, including numbers of Moore’s fellow poets, consider this one of the most egregious examples ever of terrible revision.” Like Byron’s “Lines,” the third version of “Poetry” caused such a stir only because it was read in light of previous versions to which 31 See “Lord Byron,” in The Courier, February 1, 1814, and “Lord Byron,” in The Morning Post, February 8, 1814. The former is reprinted in Appendix VII, “Attacks upon Lord Byron in the newspapers for February and March, 1814,” in The Works of Lord Byron: A New, Revised, and Enlarged Edition, With Illustrations, vol. II, edited by Rowland E. Prothero (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1898), 463-465.

30 McGann, “Theory of Texts,” review of Bibliography and the Sociology of Texts: The Panizzi Lectures 1985, by D.F. McKenzie. London Review of Books, February 18th, 1988.

Moore's public had grown attached. But despite these differences, McGann considers the earliest and latest versions of "Poetry" to constitute a single work.³²

McGann's three examples of "works" and their constituent "versions" share one significant feature. Whatever their differences in context or content, each "version" of Paradise Lost, "Lines," and "Poetry" has the same title as every other version. This is not true of every work. If we adopt his definitions of "text," "work," and "version," what are we to do with "works" whose titles differ over time? Such works are legion: a glance at the "Acknowledgments" section of many academic books reveals that certain chapters appeared elsewhere in revised form and/or under different titles, yet these are considered (for legal purposes, at least) to be different versions of the same work, and similar enough that they require the copyright holder's permission for reuse in a different setting. I suggest we adopt this flexible definition of "work." This is in part because of convention. In common scholarly usage (at least, when speaking English), "Genesis," in reference to the book of the Hebrew Bible, can refer to the Greek text of the Septuagint; to the Masoretic Text consulted by the translators responsible for the King James Version; to the King James Version itself; or to any of the text's other innumerable translations. With no further specification, it is impossible to know exactly which version is being referred to – yet when discussing, in general terms, the flood in Genesis 6, or the differing accounts of the creation in Genesis 1 and 2, we can all be reasonably sure we refer to the same work.³³ A better reason is that titles can be fluid, especially in ancient works. Many come down to us with no name, their “titles” being the additions of later readers. So, for instance, the Revelation of John found at the end of the New Testament: what we now take as the title was originally intended to describe the work’s contents.³⁴ And yet if we take the various untitled manuscript copies of Revelation, its translations into Greek and Latin, and modern English translations to be utterly separate entities, no scholarly discourse is possible.

32 McGann does not seem to share the assessment of Moore's critics, noting simply that the shorter third version's "power" is only present if one reads it with earlier, longer versions of the same work in mind. The background on "Poetry" is from Robert Pinsky, "Marianne Moore's 'Poetry': Why did she keep revising it?" Slate, June 30th, 2009, http://www.slate.com/articles/arts/poem/2009/06/marianne_moores_poetry.html

The extent of a “work” must be judiciously policed, however. Some titles very similar to that of the modern Rectifying Methods appear only in bibliographic catalogues, with no accompanying version. They are often ambiguous in Chinese, with the result that translation requires choosing between a number of different, sometimes mutually-exclusive, options: should Chu liutian zhi wen santian zhengfa 除六天之文三天正法 – the earliest title under which the present text appears in a bibliographic catalogue – be translated “Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens, the Writ that Expels the Six Heavens,” or “Correct Law of the Three Heavens that Expels the Qi of the Six Heavens?” The text’s early medieval apocalyptic context and the semantic range of the character fa 法 allows for either option. Is some combination of the two preferable? Does this title in fact combine two separate works, so that we are seeing a “Writ for Expelling the Qi of the Six Heavens” and a “Correct Method of the Three Heavens?” I will make a detailed 33 It is worth noting here that chapter divisions in the Old Testament were only introduced in the twelfth century, and – though English editions have followed them – are themselves one of many different divisions across different languages and times. See “Preface,” in Herbert Marks, ed., The English Bible: King James Version: The Old Testament: A Norton Critical Edition (New York: W.W. Norton and Co., 2012), xviii-xix.

34 See David E. Aune, Apocalypticism, Prophecy, and Magic in Early Christianity (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006), 1-2.

(and hopefully persuasive) case for my own interpretation, but that does not change the fact that translation is a scholarly judgment call – as is the inclusion of various titles and versions under the umbrella of the same “work.”

While the contents of a “work” may be ambiguous, the status of “originals” is far more certain, especially in the case of the Rectifying Methods: they don’t exist.

Discussing Derrida’s “Archive Fever,” McGann notes:

...[T]he history of original documents includes their subsequent transformations and even their disappearance... Like the concept of origin itself, original documents are fictions we practice in order to manage their losses and our limits... [T]he ruptures that characterize the documentary record are an ever-present function, when the history of the making of the documents is continually rewritten and thence further revealed/obscured.³⁵

McGann’s concern in A New Republic of Letters (from which the quote is taken) is the transference of information (whether literary, audiovisual, or tactile) from libraries, museums, and other repositories of knowledge to the digital realm. It is thus reasonable to presume McGann intends to claim that the origins of any document (which, given the context, I assume he holds synonymous with his earlier “work”) – even those whose textual history is relatively well-known or easily traceable – is irrecoverable. But the assertion is doubly true for works like the Rectifying Methods whose composition, reception, and transmission is largely invisible to us; indeed, one can say the documentary trail of the Rectifying Methods, like that of many Daoist works, is more rupture than record. Despite these difficulties, reconstructing the social situation of the work at various points in its history can provide insight into the motives for the changes introduced in the work.

35 McGann, A New Republic of Letters: Memory and Scholarship in the Age of Digital Reproduction (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2014), 5.

The result of centuries of shaping by different audiences is a work that speaks with different voices. By “voice,” I mean a single, relatively unified perspective in a given work – a perspective that may come from an individual author, but may also reflect the coincident desires of an editorial team or a series of editors acting separately over time. A voice in this sense is a heuristic device meant to make study and discussion of a work easier; it is a scholarly invention, not an intrinsic feature of a work. So, for Herbert Marks, the Pentateuch is characterized by two voices: “Priestly” and “Lay:”

The former is defined by an abstract, majestic God, a dynamic conception of holiness, a penchant for numbers and lists, and a reliance on schemes such as travel itineraries and genealogies to structure space and time. The Lay writings, by contrast, feature a conditional covenant, a somber assessment of human character, gaps, ambiguities, narrative suspense, and a sophisticated use of folklike legends centering on a personal God at once familiar and uncanny.³⁶

Some features of these two voices are distinguished in the two creation stories of Genesis. Commenting on the Lay version of 2:4-3:24, Marks says:

The first [i.e., the Priestly] account of creation [in 1:1-2:3] was solemn and hieratic, with a transcendent God who created man and woman in his own image and appointed them to rule over an ordered world. The second account is picturesque and evocative, with an immanent God who shapes man out of clay as a potter makes a pot... The author is less concerned to educe a hidden pattern of cosmic order than to account for the reality of human life – contentious, laborious, restless, finite – answering the question “why” with tales that can delight a child or challenge the most sophisticated interpreter.

It is impossible to trace the composition process of the Pentateuch back to individuals; rather, Biblical scholars speak of editorial teams or authors. Marks, for instance, dates the composition of the earliest Priestly strand to the late eighth century BCE based on archaeological and textual evidence (see Marks, “Pentateuch” 3-4). With the Pentateuch, we are fortunate enough to have the coherent final product into which these voices were eventually integrated. The Rectifying Methods did not follow the same path: what may have been first attested to as a unified version that combined apocalyptic and apotropaic themes was pieced apart, supplemented, and redacted by different groups for different reasons. In the process, the role of “author,” “editor,” and “audience” are blended in ways that deserve closer scrutiny.

³⁶ Marks, “The Pentateuch,” in Bible 3.

Xiaofei Tian provides clear examples of how this process worked in the context of medieval China in The Record of a Dusty Table: Tao Yuanming and Manuscript Culture (Seattle: University of Washington, 2005).³⁷ The poet of the title (Tao Yuanming 陶淵明, 365?-427) is one of the most significant poets in Chinese history. In our day he has become synonymous with “Chinese culture” or “Chinese poetry.” In popular conception he is a lofty-minded recluse, intensely loyal to [his government]; a spontaneous, willful, unconventional person who is often portrayed as drinking excessively... a poet who chooses to pursue self-fulfillment through a set of private values rather than through public life, who finds contentment and pleasure in retirement and leisure, who defies material hardship for the sake of adhering to his personal principles, and who writes natural, unaffected, and simple poetry of nature in celebration of such a lifestyle.³⁸

He is the very picture of the pastoral gentleman-poet, untrammelled by convention, whose magnificent work is dashed off in unmediated, spontaneous reaction to the natural world; it is the work’s essential brilliance that ensures its enduring appeal and enshrines its author in the Chinese pantheon of literary greats. Tian shows how this image of the poet, so simple and appealing, is belied by Tao’s own work. Her patient study reveals a picture of Tao that was devoid of loyalist sympathies; wary of nature’s dark side; and possessed of a detached irony about the world and about himself. Tao’s image as an earnest loyalist did not sprout naturally from his poetry; it was the product of centuries of editorial intervention. These editors often lacked Tao's originals, and so had no choice but to mediate between copies that often differed from one another in major and minor ways. One careful editor noted over seven hundred variants in different manuscript versions of Tao's work, ranging from single characters to phrases or even entire lines.³⁹ The work of an editor was far more than simple copyediting: in choosing between different variants, Tao's later admirers were often shaping the poem at a fundamental level.

³⁷ What follows is drawn from her introduction, pp. 3-22.

³⁸ Tian, Tao 12-13.

One of the pressures on their work was their image of Tao; after all, an important criterion in determining the "correct" reading was what an editor thought the author "would" have said. It is here that Tao's enduring image as a gentleman-farmer played an especially important role in the editorial process. Tian gives the famous example of the jian/wang controversy, in which an editor was forced to decide whether jian 見 "to see," or wang 望 "to gaze upon" was the more probable wording in a given poem's original. Jian carries connotations of accident or spontaneity, while wang implies deliberation; because Tao was the epitome of the "spontaneous" poet, the choice was clear. Thus Tao's later "editors" were often much more:

To the degree that they were engaged in the production of manuscript copies by copying, editing, altering, and revising, we are no longer talking about the readers' reception of a stable text, but about the readers' dynamic participation in the very process of creating a text that is essentially protean. In such a paradigm, the author is still important, but the author no longer occupies the stable central position as an all-powerful and controlling presence in relation to his or her work.⁴⁰

Tian thus provides McGann's text/version/work distinction with valuable context. We already have a picture of works as fluid, not static; they are at the mercy of reader-

39 Tian, Tao 14.

40 Tian, Tao 8-9.

editor-authors, who – far from conveying the perfect essence of the original’s author – were subject to contingent pressures in making choices about which reading was “correct.” This is the situation in which the Rectifying Methods found itself. Different audiences inherited different versions of the work, and altered it in different ways. They quoted portions that only sometimes existed in the version they would have inherited; they excerpted material that was of particular interest to them, leaving by the wayside other material that, for the original audience, would have been central; they glossed over or rewrote portions they found inconvenient for their particular purpose(s). Thus, at various times, a work’s “audience” (the person, persons, or group who received the work) was also its “editor” (as they rearranged or deleted material), as well as its “author” (as they created new material ex nihilo that resulted in a different version which suited their own ends).

Reconfiguring McGann, then, I will use “work” to refer to the Rectifying Methods as a supervenient entity that transcends different instantiations (including the earliest version to which we have access). “Text,” for me, is not the sociohistorical context of use but rather the arrangement of signifiers on a given medium. “Version” is the material object that incarnates a given work – the combination of text and medium. Thus, one can possess two versions of a given work in which the text is the same. A facsimile of a manuscript edition of Bach’s “Partita in E Major for Solo Violin” and a typeset version of that same material, for instance, possess the same “text” because they contain the same directions for the player. However, if the editor of the typeset version has also added accents, dynamic markings, bowings, and fingerings – material that is absent from the manuscript version – I would then say that one possessed two different versions of the same work. In the same way, two versions of the Rectifying Methods can be said to possess the same text if they contain the same characters in the same arrangement, or if the differences are no simpler than a misprint or variant character (穀 as a mistake for 穀, or 无 as a variant of 無). In deciding which differences are “major” and which are “minor,” I am of course playing the same role as the editors of Tao Yuanming’s work, and a degree of trust and judgment is involved. My motivation is different: instead of reconstructing an ur-text that conveys the author’s essence, I am interested in distinguishing different versions of the Rectifying Methods and showing how these versions reflected the circumstances of their use. Reconstructing even a few stages of this process requires an introduction to the body of literature among which the Rectifying Methods appeared – but also to notions of writing current among some of its many authors.

Writing and the work of creation

McGann’s “work” may be a useful tool for those of us interested in the travails of early medieval Daoist authors, but it would have been utterly foreign to those authors themselves. Connecting with their own assumptions about how writing worked and what the process of authorship actually entailed is crucial to understanding how the Rectifying Methods was generated and altered.

From earliest times, writing in China was thought to have arisen from imitation of the natural patterns of birds and beasts by human culture heroes. It also had intrinsic power, particularly in the political realm, that was utterly independent of its signification.⁴¹ This understanding was inherited by Daoist authors of the early medieval period, for whom human script was nothing more than “the dead tracks of the noisy and polluted world” 鷺穢死迹 – a pale imitation of perfect celestial archetypes that arose before the primal unity divided to form the realms of gods and humans. This celestial writing was of several sorts that together formed a descending hierarchy – a hierarchy that eventually reached a degraded form used by humans in ordinary life. Immediately above the utilitarian script of daily life were the basest dregs of the celestial prototype. Like other forms of celestial writing, these dregs were incomprehensible by all but a select few humans, however. Indeed, what unified the various forms of celestial script was the fact that ordinary people could not understand them.⁴²

And therein lay their power: the incomprehensibility of celestial script was evidence of its connection to the heavenly authorities. Such writing held power in the hidden realm of spirits, whose denizens could interpret it and were bound to act on its instructions. This was the motive force behind the utility of talismans in particular, which were written in a lower form of celestial script. While they might appear to possess power independent of their signification, this is only superficially true. Talismans held meaning 41 For a brief overview of the origin of writing and its political significance in early China, see Mark Edward Lewis, Writing and Authority in Early China (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1999) 197-202. A more detailed overview of the origins of writing, including its attribution to various culture heroes, can be found in Hsieh Hsu-wei, “Writing From Heaven: Celestial Writing in Six Dynasties Daoism” (PhD diss., Indiana University, 2005): 39-108.

42 Ibid.

for, and conveyed orders to, spirits and demons. They connected the hidden realm of the spirits to the visible world of human beings.⁴³

The same cosmic origin held for scriptures. As we will see, the Rectifying Methods was part of a series of works transmitted by a few different deities to the same person during the same time period. These revelations were often held to predate, or at least be co-eternal with, the cosmos itself. Like writing itself, the works I choose here to call “scripture” (a term I will soon explain) formed out of the same august stuff – qi 氣 – as the rest of the cosmos. Following what was by now common knowledge in Daoist circles, beings or objects formed out of qi were more powerful and worthier of veneration the closer they came to the cosmic muddle (hundun 混沌) that predated the universe as we know it. We learned above that human writing was the last link in a chain of celestial scripts that stretched back to the beginning of the universe. Just as it was farthest from the writing that arose along with the cosmos, so it was the most debased. The same holds true of scripture. (This explains the insistence, commonly encountered in Daoist works, that said works predate other “lesser” scriptures – whether Daoist or no – and are thus worthier of veneration.) The term I choose to render as “scripture” in English is jing 經. Jing is an old word with a long history that merits only a brief sketch here.⁴⁴ First attested 43 See Stephen Bokenkamp, “Word as Relic in Medieval Daoism,” in Medieval and Early Modern Devotional Objects in Global Perspective: Translations of the Sacred, edited by Elizabeth Ann Robertson and Jennifer Jahner (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2010): 21-35. He takes this vision of celestial script from the Declarations of the Perfected (Zhen'gao 真誥, HY 1010/CT 1016 1.8a-10, which he summarizes on pp. 24-27. Hsieh provides a translation and fuller discussion on pp. 250-99 of “Writing from Heaven.”

44 Any competent historical dictionary will provide an overview. See, for instance, Handian or Grand Ricci, s.v. “經.” To the surprise of no specialist, Tetsugi Morohashi’s 諸橋轍次 Dai Kan-Wa Jiten 大漢和辞典 (Tokyo: Taishukan, 1968) devotes nearly two pages to the character. See 8:9207-08.

in bronze inscriptions of the earliest recorded Chinese dynasty, the character there meant “to govern.” A few centuries later, the term had been appended to the titles a variety of works – everything from poetry to political philosophy and ritual manuals. A jing was usually credited to an august sage like Confucius, or to his circle of immediate disciples. The typical English translation in this period is “classic” or “canon,” implying a relatively stable work to which one turned to find the rules and norms (another meaning of jing) that governed the world. These were accompanied by zhuan 傳 “transmissions, traditions” or shuo 說 “explanations.” Such accompaniment was necessary because the canons themselves were abstruse, requiring the elucidation of qualified teachers who understood the intent of their composers. Indeed, it is doubtful if any work of widespread reputation was ever transmitted without the oral commentary of a master versed in its tradition, who would have himself learned at the feet of an earlier master.⁴⁵

We find many of the same principles operative with the Rectifying Methods, but also important differences. The body of works with which it was transmitted (known as the Shangqing 上清 or “Highest Clarity” revelations), like its forebears, distinguished between the work itself (a jing) and the necessary accompaniment. Jing here were more than the work of human hands, however. As described above, they formed at the same time and out of the same material as the earliest elements of the cosmos. They were coequal with – and often superior to – the highest gods. Written in celestial script accessible only to these deities, the Shangqing revelations were, at divine direction, passed down through the hierarchy of deities until they reached qualified mortals. Even then they were written in script accessible only to a few, and required transcription into characters comprehensible by the rest. Their function was often salvific. Appearing during a chaotic age beset by war, disease, and famine, jing promised their bearers relief from the cataclysm and ascent to the heavens. This was frequently accomplished via agency of talismans (fu 符). The talismans that accompanied the jing – and which ultimately formed their core – were, however, written in the lowest form of celestial script, and conveyed messages to the spirits and demons who were of immediate concern to their bearers. Such talismans were only useful with the appropriate instructions for their use. These were known (inter alia) as fa 法 “methods,” jue 訣 (or koujue 口訣) “oral instructions.” In one sense, the jing served as a container for the talismans and their necessary adjuncts. I choose the term “scripture” to translate jing because of these celestial origins. The important difference between scripture in its common English usage is that it is not (as is attested in the Oxford English Dictionary) mere “sacred writings – at least, not as commonly conceived. Jing in their true form are not words on paper; they are the highest psychophysical stuff that exists.

45 See Lewis, Writing and Authority 299-302. Michael Nylan’s The Five ‘Confucian’ Classics (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 2001), 10-12 provides similar background.

The term jing, in our case, does not have the same stable usage one finds with the products of sagely effort discussed above. While jing were clearly distinguished from zhuan (which, as above, were traditions surrounding the work itself compiled by eminent masters), the accompanying works (fa, jue, etc.) were often of divine origin as well, delivered by or expounded by the same gods who conveyed the jing to mortal hands. Further, jing was synonymous with a variety of words that are semantically distinct in common usage: shu 書 “book,” dao 道 “way” (here akin to “method”), wen 文 “writ,” or zhang 章 “strophe,” all clearly distinguished in everyday speech or writing, are synonymous in the titles of Shangqing works. They formed at the same time as the highest heavens, and were transmitted down to humankind at the end of a world-age to save a fortunate few. It is to the specific context of the Shangqing revelations that we now turn.⁴⁶

The Shangqing revelations

The body of works later known as the Shangqing 上清 (“Highest Clarity”) revelations were transmitted in thirty-four scrolls (juan 卷) to the spirit medium Yang Xi 楊羲 (330-86) between 364 and 370. When he received his revelations, Yang was in the service of the Xu 許 family of Jurong 句容 county (near modern Nanjing). His chief patrons were Xu Mi 謚 (303-73), a minor official in the service of a northern lord, and his son Xu Hui 翽 (341-ca. 370). Among Yang’s missives from the other world were the disparate fragments of daily revelations later collected by Tao Hongjing 陶弘景 (456-536) in his Declarations of the Perfected (Zhen’gao 真誥, CT 1016). This is our major source for information on the history and transmission of the Shangqing revelations, as well as their original social setting. The revelators were a class of more-than-human beings known as “Perfected” (zhenren 真人). Some, like Yang Xi’s chief instructor Wei Huacun 魏華存 (251-334), had once been human; others have no discernible human past. The term zhen implies that these beings, whether once human or no, had subjected themselves to a regime of self-cultivation that led to the realization of their full potential. The exact regime varies according to the work consulted, but generally includes specific dietary practices, meditation and visualization exercises, and the imbibing of alchemical elixirs. Upon ascending to this status, they received a post in the celestial bureaucracy; Wei Huacun, in life a clergywoman of the Celestial Masters (Tianshi 天師) sect, in death became known as the Lady of the Southern Marchmount (Nanyue furen 南嶽夫人). Her title was honorary, but many Perfected had real responsibilities: supervising subordinate celestial beings, guarding important texts, surveiling the conduct of mortals, and correcting celestial records were common assignments.

⁴⁶ The preceding is a selective summary of Robinet 1: 107-122.

Many of the revelations as transmitted to the Xu family have been lost, and what remains does not represent a unified body of work. The Declarations, our most important source, contains everything from visions and hymns, to otherworldly geography, to questions put to the Perfected by the Xus, their associates, or by Yang himself. The collator of the text was the 6th-century scholar, alchemist, and calligrapher Tao Hongjing, who built on the work of Xu Mi's grandson, Xu Huangmin 黃民 (361-429) and the noted scholar Gu Huan 顧歡 (420 or 428-483 or 491). Tao assembled this mass of disparate material from the private collections of notable families scattered throughout the southeast. He tried (sometimes in vain) to impose order on the variegated mass, completing his work probably in 499. Though his effort was the most extensive among all the collators, by his own admission he failed to collect all of the extant materials. One source of Tao's troubles was the fact that the Shangqing manuscripts had been dispersed soon after their composition – if indeed they had ever been intended as a unified work. Huangmin began to collect “scriptures, talismans, and secret registers” 經符祕錄 copied by his father and grandfather when he was seventeen, before fleeing Jurong (then beset by the troubles of the Sun En 孫恩 rebellion) for the safer county of Shan 剡縣 in 404. This indicates that either the works had been widely diffused during that time, or they had remained with the families to which they were addressed. Either possibility indicates that many (if not all) of the parties involved in the early revelations considered possession of individual works more important than preserving the early material as a unified whole. Tao's travail confirms that this conception of the Shangqing revelations still held some two centuries later. His efforts at collection essentially replicate Huangmin's visits to various notable families, but on a larger scale: instead of restricting his visits to the notables of Jurong, he was required to travel throughout the southeast in order to meet with a much wider circle as he followed the manuscripts' winding trail. Tao is not reassembling a coherent body of work that has been scattered by the winds of fate; he is most likely assembling such a body for the first time out of disparate materials that may never have been intended for a unified audience.

The Shangqing revelations: material and social history

An ancestor of Xu Mi had led the family south in 185, fleeing deadly intrigue at the court of the Han 漢 dynasty (202 BCE-220 CE). By the time of Mi and Hui, the Xus were related by marriage to a number of other prominent southern families.⁴⁷ These families and their associates, along with the Xus themselves, were the primary recipients of the dispatches from the other world. Analyses of dynastic records by Michel Strickmann and Dušana Dušanka Miščević show that the recipients of the Shangqing revelations – both the families to whom they had originally been addressed and those that had inherited them after the elder Xus' passing – had once held important posts, but had since lost political power to northern nobility fleeing the destruction of the capital. The social circumstances surrounding the revelations' composition and subsequent popularity thus suggest that one reason for the continued success of Yang Xi's work was the desire of these southern families to recapture in the spiritual realm power that had been denied them on earth. While this thesis dates back to Michel Strickmann's work in the 1970s, I suggest in chapter three that Strickmann is overconfident in attributing the entirety of the revelations to this single cause.

⁴⁷ See ZG20.6ff and commentary.

The Shangqing revelations and the Rectifying Methods

The Rectifying Methods, like the rest of the Shangqing revelations, was originally intended for limited circulation among a select circle of southern aristocrats. These men and their families had been shut out of the halls of power by a recent wave of northern emigres. They took refuge in the new knowledge that Yang Xi imparted to them. The Shangqing revelations included detailed descriptions of the celestial and cthonic realms. Their geography, inhabitants, and bureaucracy; the mechanisms through which their denizens could affect the world of the living; and the postmortem fates of local notables were all revealed. Also revealed was the imminent end of the world, the signs that announced it in the celestial and political realms, methods for escaping it, and techniques that conveyed power over the malicious spirits who flourished in the latter days. The first version of the Rectifying Methods to which we have access concentrated specifically on this sort of information, imparting to its readers privileged knowledge of the end times and methods to escape it that set them above their earthly rulers. Access to this version is impossible, however. The earliest surviving citations, found in encyclopedias and Buddhist polemics, depict a work that had already undergone considerable revision. Nonetheless, these citations, combined with other Shangqing works, can tell us what Yang Xi's version of the Rectifying Methods probably looked like. It was, more than likely, a collection of apocalyptic predictions and apotropaic devices, the latter meant to protect the bearer from the malevolent spirits that multiplied at the end of days as well as to guarantee ascent to one of the Shangqing heavens.

The revisions to the Rectifying Methods highlight which aspects of the work attracted the attention of later editors. Foremost among these was the political. When the end predicted in the original Shangqing revelations did not arrive as expected, the immediate response of the Rectifying Methods' editors was to delay it. They did so by altering the signs in the celestial and political realms that announced its advent. The result was a Rectifying Methods that legitimated the rise of Liu Yu 劉裕 (363-422), a general who founded his own dynasty. This version of the work depicted Liu's rise as one of many signals that the world was about to end. This immediacy suggests an author or authors essentially committed to the same trajectory as the original Rectifying Methods, but who revised it in light of changing political circumstances. Despite a lack of critical context, there is sufficient evidence to support this hypothesis (though it must remain only that).

Later compositional stages rest on firmer ground. With a few small changes, the same predictions inserted in the second revision could be used to glorify Liu Yu. This was the aim of a third editor, who either altered the Rectifying Methods or appealed to a heretofore unseen version in order to endear himself and the new textual lineage he championed to a later Liu emperor. Similar concerns shaped the final edition of the text to emerge during the Northern and Southern Dynasties. One hundred and fifty years later, a new king had taken control of north China and – thanks in part to the largest army in recent memory – was on the cusp of reunifying the entire realm. Unity required more than military force, however. Since ancient times, rulers had crafted comprehensive worlds in the written realm that mirrored the coherence they sought to impose on the fractured empire. The production of such works was key to their own legitimation. The Rectifying Methods was redeployed as part of this ideological project. Its new editors crafted a calendrical system that illustrated their patron’s mastery of time and space and inserted it into their own version of the work.

Meanwhile, the editors of two separate works read some version or versions of the Rectifying Methods with entirely different purposes in mind. Malevolent spirits were a matter of everyday concern in early medieval China. They were of special danger to those who sought longevity through the alchemical arts. The potions and pills these individuals consumed required rare plants and minerals found in remote mountain forests. Such places were haunted by spirits of greater or lesser power, and those who traveled there required techniques to guard against these beings. Two such works were useful in this endeavor. The Scripture of the Forty-four Methods on Yellow Silk contains an incantation for guarding oneself against the spirits dwelling in remote places that is quoted from some early version of the Rectifying Methods. The Precious Writs and True Formulas on [Prescribed] Lengths of Silk, Determining the Rank of Those who Seek Immortality contains amulets extracted from the Rectifying Methods that also provide spirit guards. Internal evidence places both works in a structured ordination hierarchy. This is particularly true of the Precious Writs; while the Forty-four Methods is transmitted from master to disciple, the Precious Writs involves itself in a multi-tiered hierarchy, with members of each grade receiving more of the amulets it contains. As in the received Rectifying Methods, these amulets promise spirit guards and ascent to the heavens, but the context is different. This difference is particularly evident at two points. The amulets in the received Rectifying Methods have varied and complex transmission histories that often involve salvific deities who appear when the end is nigh. The Precious Writs strips these amulets of their association with salvific deities; instead, the amulets are said to have originated with the Queen Mother of the West, famous primarily for her transmission of longevity techniques. Gone, too, is the concern with the cycles of time or the end of the world. This is evident not just in what is absent – the portions of the received work (or its variants) concerned with the apocalypse – but what is there. A well-graded hierarchy presumes not the end of the world, but its continuation. We thus see the Rectifying Methods appealed to for divergent purposes in the Forty-four Methods and the Precious Writs. While both share an emphasis on spirit guardians, the first is concerned almost exclusively with spirit guards and apotropaic methods, while the second uses spirit guards to emphasize the differences in rank among Daoist adepts.

Different versions, different voices

Much like the Secret Gospel of John, the Rectifying Methods took different forms according to the needs of its audiences. While it originated as a collection of apocalyptic predictions and methods to escape the eschaton targeted at a small group of southern elites shut out of political power, it was quickly repurposed. The result brought out two different voices in the work. The first can broadly be called “apocalyptic.” It continued the eschatological orientation of the original version, inserting new signs of the end times while preserving the original version’s methods for escaping the eschaton, and also integrating it into the new Lingbao textual lineage in ways that will be discussed later. The second voice could be called “continuous.” This voice can be seen in two new versions of the work. The first featured a quotation of the text by a Lingbao-affiliated author who sought to endear his new lineage to an ascendant ruler, while the third required the interpolation of new cosmological material to argue with Buddhist critics of Daoism and provide ideological support for the unification of the realm. At the same time, the Rectifying Methods was being excerpted by editors who also emphasized the “continuous” voice. This voice is audible in the Precious Writs and the Forty-four Prescriptions. Though they have different orientations – one a collection of methods for transmission from master to disciple, the other a graded hierarchy of amulets intended for Daoists of different ranks – what unites them is their assumption of a continuing cosmos inhabited by people who were not under immediate threat of extinction. The guiding thread behind the changes in form and content of the Rectifying Methods during the early medieval period (ca. 220-589 CE) is the interests of the people who used it.

The “Rectifying Methods” and the study of religion(s)

In light of the extensive critique launched by materialist scholars of religion against a focus on texts, one might ask: what do texts still have to offer the study of religion? Such a question misrepresents the materialist position. As articulated by Vásquez, the point is not that texts have nothing to teach us: it is that they must be seen as more than vehicles of meaning. Although they perform that function, it is only one of many. In particular, I point to the third and fourth elements of his definition of “text:” manipulation and appropriation. These suggest two features exhibited by the Rectifying Methods during its long life. It has been manipulated – commentated upon, added to, subtracted from, deliberately misread – for specific purposes across the centuries. It (or at least elements of it) are treated as material objects: they are laid out, worn, venerated, transmitted, or buried. As will be explored later, they even function like keys that unlock doors, symbols that confer status, or tokens that secure passage. All of these aspects are foreign to Müller’s vision of “the text” in two ways. First, the Rectifying Methods possesses a kind of materiality that cannot be reduced to words on a page; it plays an active role in the lives of those who are interested in it. Second, it does not function as the beating heart of a religion. That place is taken, properly, by human beings. Finally – with the addition of McGann’s notion of the “work” – scholars are looking not for pure originals that can be “corrupted,” but instead unearthing how and why readers changed works over time.

I am reminded of a joke I once heard about the “medical gaze” – the sort of dispassionate attention applied to patients by doctors during the process of diagnosis. The doctor does not treat a patient exhibiting symptoms of a disease; the doctor treats a disease whose primary symptom is the patient. Not very funny, perhaps (especially for the patient), but apt. For too long, the study of religion has treated texts as its object, with religions as lived by people as ancillary. By focusing on the hows and whys of the Rectifying Methods' changes over time, I join a chorus of others who hope to redirect the scholarly gaze.

Chapter 2: The “Rectifying Methods” and Change Over Time

Tales retold

The Secret Revelation of John

The Secret Revelation of John offers a radical departure from the Christian and Jewish theologies that have come to be accepted as conventional. It draws on the common cultural repertoire of its day and refashions the material to protest a late antique world order it sees as fundamentally unjust. Summarizing the work allows us to highlight how its editors reworked existing material for their own ends. In the Revelation, rather than a benevolent creator who enforces a fundamentally just order, the God of the Hebrew Bible is a blind, arrogant tyrant – like the Roman rulers who oppressed the authors of the Secret Gospel. While the cosmos is divided into divine model and imperfect execution along the Platonic model, attempting to escape our imperfect circumstances and unite with the divine via conventional Platonic philosophy will only result in venturing further astray. This is because the world in which humans live is not, as the period’s conventional wisdom would have it, fundamentally good; rather, it is the product of deception and malice on the part of flawed gods who pretend to omnipotence.

As the name implies, the Secret Revelation is an oral communication from Christ to his disciple John, who was crippled with doubt after being mocked by a Pharisee. Breaking through the veil between the divine and imperfect realms, Christ comforts John and reveals to him the true nature of the universe. Christ explains that the universe originates with a single perfect, utterly transcendent being: God the Father. From God emanated a multitude of lesser divinities, the first of whom was Pronoia-Barbelo, the Mother. From her came forth the Son, the divine Christ. However, she did not birth Christ; he was “self-generated” (“Autogenes”). Christ brought forth four great Lights, each with three pairs of eternal deities known as Aeons. Each pair had one female and one male component; the very last Aeon to appear was the female of the final triad. Her name is Sophia, which means “wisdom.” Sophia desired to produce an image of herself, but did not seek the permission of her male partner or the Father. She acted out of good will, but – in failing to understand the necessity of male consent and participation – also out of ignorance. The result is an ignorant and malevolent being, a fiery-eyed, lion-faced serpent called Yaldabaoth. This is the God of Genesis, known in the Secret Revelation as “the Chief Ruler.” He is born without the power to create; his first act is to steal some of his mother’s creative power in order to fashion seven subsidiary beings and a host of angels and archangels with twisted, animal-like forms. Using the same creative power, he shapes the lower world, modeling it on the divine realm. But since he himself is ignorant and malicious, the world he fashions can only be similarly flawed.

Yaldabaoth then boasts to his minions, telling its creations, “For my part, I am a jealous god. And there is no other god apart from me.” At this point, Sophia becomes aware that her brightness has diminished, and that Yaldabaoth had stolen it. She realizes her error and repents, and Christ attempts to comfort her and to instruct Yaldabaoth and his minions. Christ corrects Yaldabaoth by creating a perfect first human, informing the monster that “The Human exists, and the Child of the Human.” The Human’s image appears as a reflection on the waters of the earth. Yaldabaoth and the world rulers he created attempt to fashion a being like it. However, because they are flawed, so is their creation: it is only an image, and has no life of its own. Like God in Genesis 2:7, they attempt to enliven it by blowing into its mouth, but are unable to. Sophia wishes to retrieve the power her child had stolen from her, and so Christ and the four Lights surreptitiously inform Yaldabaoth that the only way to enliven his creation is to blow that power into it. He does so, removing the power from himself and gifting it to Adam. Realizing their creation is now superior to them thanks to this infusion of power, the world rulers immediately imprison his light in a fleshly body that is subject to the mortal constraints of passion, suffering, and death. These new passions make Adam vulnerable to desire for food, beauty, and pleasure, and so to further control him they imprison him in Eden (where all these are to be had in abundance). But the benevolent gods have implanted in Adam a helper spirit, Epinoia, who teaches him about his true nature. Eve comes about as a botched attempt by the evil rulers to remove this spirit. Instead of removing Epinoia, however, they remove a portion of Sophia's power, placing it in Eve; Epinoia herself removes to the Tree of Knowledge, from whence she instructs Adam and Eve of their true nature. Upon discovering this, Yaldabaoth exiles Adam and Eve from the Garden and curses Eve to be forever subordinate to her partner. He then implants in humans the desire for base sexual reproduction to encourage the creation of more beings for the world rulers to can control. However, the resulting generation were still wiser than their rulers, and so the Chief Ruler plots with his underlings to further cement his control:

He made a plan with his powers. They begot Fate and bound the gods of heaven and angels and demons and human beings with measures and seasons and times in order to keep them all in its fetter – for it was lord over them all.⁴⁸

48 Quoted in King, Revelation 108.

The created world is thus an imperfect model of the divine realm subject to the rule of flawed and malevolent beings who seek to enslave humanity. However, all is not lost.

King summarizes humanity's situation thus:

...[I]n the end all humanity will be saved and brought into the eternal light. After a period of instruction and purification, each soul will ascend up to the Divine Realm, taking its rightful place in the Aeons of the Great Lights.

The narrative of the Revelation takes up and reworks several common themes in the Ancient Near East. In what follows, I have chosen to highlight two: the Platonic conception of the universe as reflected in the Timaeus and the creation of humankind taken from Genesis.⁴⁹

Plato's cosmology was some of the most influential in the ancient world. Its classic expression is in the dialogue Timaeus, wherein a set of friends (including the Timaeus who lends his name to the title) fête Socrates with a "feast of discourse" in celebration of the festival of Athena. According to King, it rests on three fundamental pillars: Being, becoming, and the Ideas. The realm of Being is eternal and unchanging, a stable pattern for the world of becoming. It is the abode of the Demiurge, the creator God who is himself so perfect that he is unknowable by human senses and indescribable by human language. Belonging to this realm are Ideas, the stable and certain basis for all true knowledge. Distinct from, but connected to, the realm of Being is the world of becoming. The mundane world belongs to the realm of becoming. Crafted in imperfect imitation of the world of Being on the basis of the Ideas, the world of becoming can be seen and felt, perceived via the senses and composed of the four material elements.

49 The foregoing summary is based chiefly on King, Revelation 3-5, with supplements from pp. 89-108 and Bentley Layton, The Gnostic Scriptures: Ancient Wisdom for the New Age. A New Translation with Annotations and Introductions, (New York: Doubleday, 1995): 28-39.

Because God is ultimately good, he tried his best to fashion a world that was peaceful, orderly, beautiful, and intelligent. Included in this goodness is hierarchy: the subordination of matter to spirit, the body to the soul, and created to creator. The stars and planets were created as a “moving image of eternity” to mark time and govern human destiny.⁵⁰

Later thinkers found several problems with Plato’s thought. One is the problem of evil. If God is benevolent and just, and everything on earth a copy of some more eternal, better form in the Divine Realm, what explains human suffering and death? What possible model for things so terrible could be found in a fundamentally perfect realm, and why would God inflict them upon us? Plato provides an answer in the Timaeus by introducing a third principle, the “receptacle.” Conceived of as female, her form changes according to the Idea whose copy she is creating. Plato uses the metaphor of the family: the receptacle is the Mother; the source of all being the Father; and the objects that are created are the Offspring. Imperfections are inevitably introduced during the process of copying (thus resulting in evil), but the process of mimesis by which God creates the perceived world ensures an essential continuity between the imperfect copy and the perfect original.⁵¹

Plato also accounts for the creation of humankind. Timaeus explains that the Demiurge did not create us himself, but delegated our crafting to his offspring, “the younger gods.” Imitating him, they fashioned around the immortal soul (itself a gift from God) a fleshly frame to be its vehicle, and constructed as well another soul within that same body. This latter soul was mortal, subject to all the passions we associate with that state. To each immortal soul was assigned a star, from whence it descended into the human body. The ultimate task of human beings is to cultivate themselves by conquering the passions via reason so they can return to their original star. The younger gods, in addition to performing the lion's share of the labor in creating humankind, are also tasked with guiding humans along the proper path during this cultivation process. Human institutions can help, however. Because people are fundamentally good, they act unjustly only through ignorance and poor government; education and good government are the appropriate remedies. Wise men, being masters of their own passions already, are best suited to the task of governance.⁵²

50 See King, Revelation 191-194.

51 King, Revelation 196, 198.

The Secret Revelation as summarized above reads almost like a parody of the Timaeus. Rather than a benevolent and perfect deity creating a fundamentally good world, an abomination born of ignorance fashions the human world as a prison. Its violence and suffering are not accidents, but come about as a direct result of the flawed and malevolent nature of its creators. The lower gods are not benevolent guides, but jailers. It follows logically that their agents on earth are similarly malevolent – an implication that I will explore later. For the moment, it suffices to note that Plato is not the only target of the Revelation's ire. As any reader familiar with Genesis will note, that book too comes in for intense criticism. Rather than the refined and distant deity of the Priestly editors, the God of Genesis is a cruel tyrant, ignorant and blind to his own imperfection. It is only with the hidden aid of his betters that he is able to breathe life into Adam. The world order he creates is fundamentally unjust. Even the heavens have malicious intent, forming part of the vicious cabal that rules over a suffering humankind. Our way out lies not in reasoned contemplation of the nature of the world in the mode of Plato, but in fundamentally breaking with it via the knowledge revealed by Christ. But the ironic turns in the Secret Revelation are premised on some of the same fundamental points as its sources. The universe (if not the human world) was created by benevolent deities; hierarchy is not itself unjust; humans possess the capacity to better themselves within this hierarchy. The authors of John do not want to destroy order as a whole; only the particular manifestation that confronts them.

⁵² King, Revelation 208-209, 211, 214.

In King's reading, the fundamental theme of the Secret Revelation is hope. Evil is a product of unjust power relations in the lower world, which are parodies of the truly good order that exists in the Divine Realm. Yaldabaoth and the world rulers are stand-ins for corrupt Roman officials and tyrannical emperors. The work is thus coded resistance to imperial rule:

The critique operates by sharply contrasting the ideal realm of the divine with the mundane world. The portrait of the transcendent Deity represents the utopian commitments of the Secret Revelation of John, while Yaldabaoth and his minions exemplify everything that is wrong. The breach between them marks the nearly unbridgeable gap between the imagination of how things were supposed to be and how they were experienced. Christ repeatedly represents evil as hierarchy overturned, both in the deadly sway of the passions over the soul and in the inverted governance of the cosmos whose rulers work to deceive and entrap humanity. In this mythic economy, the inferior wrongly attempt to rule the superior. They rule not for the good of the governed but to satisfy their own arrogance and lust for dominance. Their repeated resort to deception and violence to maintain their illusory power merely underscores the illegitimacy of their right to rule. This portrayal leads ineluctably into a foundational critique of power relations in the world.⁵³

The authors of the Revelation were engaged in rhetorical battle against a structure of power wherein rulers styled themselves gods and the political order was sanctioned by its imitation of a divine model. Plato's particular utopianism may have failed with the demise of the Greek city-states, but his institutional framework remained influential. Quoting the philosopher Diotogenes, King summarizes the analogy between god and ruler:

53 King, Revelation 158.

Now the king bears the same relation to the state as God to the world; and the state is to the world as the king is to God. For the state, made as it is by a harmonizing together of many different elements, is an imitation of the order and harmony of the world, while the king who has an absolute rulership... has been transformed into a god among men.⁵⁴

In this ideal framework, the rule of the king was, of course, wise and benevolent. Such sentiment often grated with reality. The authors of the Revelation critiqued this reality by reworking the most important cultural resources of their day.

The saint who never was

A final example sounds a cautionary note. The circumstances of a work's change over time often suggest deliberate shaping by actors with their own interests, but the degree of intentionality or unity of purpose we can reasonably posit as lurking behind these changes can be stronger or weaker. Hypothesizing about authorial intent is a tricky business even when we have all the facts of composition; this is even more so when the course of a work's change and the individuals or groups responsible for it are largely invisible to us. A few examples from the case of Salar Masud illustrate this difficulty.

Legend has it that Salar Masud, also known as Ghazi Miyan, was the nephew of Sultan Mahmud (r. 998-1030) of Ghazni (in present-day Afghanistan), who invaded north India no less than seventeen times. I say "legend" because a great body of stories has accrued around the character of Salar Masud, despite the fact that he is totally unattested in contemporary chronicles. A composite version of these stories, corresponding to a greater or lesser degree with any individual telling, is told by Shahid Amin in Conquest and Community: The Afterlife of Warrior Saint Ghazi Miyan (Hyderabad: Orient Blackswan, 2015). Masud was born to the sultan's sister in 1009 in the town of Ajmer (in present-day Rajasthan, western India). As a young man, he accompanies his father (Sultan Mahmud's chief general) on campaign in northern India before heading to Ghazni. His stay there is brief; friction with the sultan's jealous wazir forces Mahmud to send his beloved nephew on what is supposed to be a brief exile. Masud turns this into an opportunity for conquest: riding a magnificent gray mare and accompanied by an army of adoring followers, he sets out to extend his uncle's realm in northern India. Initially successful, he establishes his headquarters at Satrikh and sends his generals to conquer the surrounding countryside, personally setting up a forward base at Bahraich, the northern frontier.⁵⁵ But tragedy strikes: on the day of his wedding, he receives word that the cattle following his army are being driven off by a tyrannous Hindu lord who had slaughtered the Ghazi's cowherds. Enraged, Ghazi Miyan leads his army forth to vengeance. Struck down by an arrow, Masud is carried by his followers to his garden in Bahraich, where he dies beneath his favorite mahua tree. The year was 1034. Though most of his troops rush to martyrdom upon the death of their commander, some few survive to see to Masud is properly buried and to erect a shrine over his tomb.⁵⁶

⁵⁴ King, Revelation 160.

55 Both sites are in present-day Uttar Pradesh; see Amin, Conquest 153. "Ghazi" is an honorific granted to warriors who die in combat against non-Muslims, and so is sometimes preceded by the definite article.

56 This account is taken primarily from Amin, Conquest xv, with supplements from elsewhere in the book. His journey to Ghazni is taken from p. 27; Satrikh and Bahraich from 31; his love of the mahua from 34-35; the mare from 91-92; his followers' fates from 38-39. All information is from the first

Though Ghazi Miyan dies in the early eleventh century, he first enters the historical record over two hundred years later. In 1290, a letter by a Delhi-based poet mentions “the fragrant tomb of... [the martyred commander]’ at Bahraich spreading the perfume of ‘odorous wood’ throughout... present-day eastern Uttar Pradesh,” seeming to hint at Masud’s established presence in local memory. Whether the letter reflects widespread esteem or the predilections of a particular poet, Ghazi Miyan’s subsequent fame is undeniable. His tomb receives visits from two successive sultans (in 1341 and 1372); a ruler of modern Bengal made an armed foray there in 1353, reportedly seeking a cure for vitiligo; he appeared to an ill soldier in the 16th century; and in the same century a boisterous crowd of pilgrims on the way to his shrine piqued the interest of the famous emperor Akbar, who accompanied them incognito for a time and made a land grant for the upkeep of Masud’s shrine. The grant was reaffirmed by royal decree in 1765, and two separate accounts of the Ghazi’s fair appeared in the 1810s. British colonial administrators and native ethnographers both evinced interest in Masud and the stories and festivals surrounding him. Finally, his story or his shrine has aroused the ire of – at various times – orthodox Muslims, sectarian Hindus, Christian missionaries, and the colonial government.⁵⁷ hagiography of Masud, the Mirat-i-Masudi, compiled by Abdur Rahman Chisti (d. 1683) in the 1620s. The sole exception is his wedding, which was probably grafted onto the account in the Mirat at a later date: see Amin, Conquest 67-69.

57 For the letter and the sultans’ visits to the tomb, see Amin, Conquest 10. The date of the second visit, that of Ferozshah, is taken from Anna Suworova, Muslims Saints of India: The Eleventh to Fifteenth Centuries, (New York: RoutledgeCurzon, 2004): 156. Amin, Conquest 10 also discusses the armed foray (and the rapid response by Ferozshah) on the same page. The soldier’s story appears on pp. 10-13; Akbar’s encounter on 13 and Suworova, Saints 156; the land grant and its reinforcement on 13-14; and the two ethnographic accounts on the same pages. The Mirat-i-Masudi has been translated several times. Two British translations appeared during the Victorian era (see Amin, Conquest 256 n. 4 and the bibliography. Amin quotes Abdur Rachman chastising orthodox scholars on 67. Hindu critics appear much later, beginning with a series of pamphlets meant to discourage veneration of the Ghazi among

If we consider the stories surrounding Ghazi Miyan to be a “work” in McGann’s sense, two examples from its long history illustrate the promise and problems of an interest-focused approach. The first chronicle of Masud’s life, the Mirat-i-Masudi, was written in the 1620s by the Chishtiya Sufi Abdur Rahman. Leader of the Rudauli (in modern Uttar Pradesh) branch of the Chishti Sufis, Abdur Rahman’s Mirat explicitly connects the success of Islam in Upper India to his own order. The famous saint Muinuddin Chishti received a command from the Prophet himself to travel to Ajmer, drive out the local deities and their earthly servitors, and establish Ghazi Miyan’s birthplace as a sacred site for Islam. It was Muinuddin’s holy power and sage advice, provided to two successive Muslim rulers from his base in Ajmer, that allowed the establishment of a stable Islamic state in northern India. At the same time Abdur Rahman was writing, the Naqshbandia Sufi school had great influence at the Mughal court; Amin concurs with another medievalist that the Mirat-i-Masudi was part of an effort to counter this influence by linking significant Muslim heroes of the past to the Chishtiya patriarch Muinuddin. Because Salar Masud had already been a figure of local legend for centuries by the time Abdur Rahman wrote, this hypothesis is certainly plausible. The author of the Mirat would then have been collecting and transmitting extant material while rearranging it in a way that suited his own interests. The Mirat itself supports the hypothesis, at least in part: Abdur Rahman claims to rely on consultation with spiritual advisers, but also on “Hindi histories” and an eyewitness account recorded by one Mulla Mahmud Ghaznavi lower-caste women; see 171-173. These pamphlets were published by the revivalist movement Arya Samaj, to be further discussed below. For British colonial management of the Bahraich shrine and missionary comments upon it, see Amin, Conquest 138-148.

(an account that is suspiciously absent from contemporary chronicles).⁵⁸ A neat case seems to be laid out, then: the legend of the Ghazi, in significant part, consisted of material that was edited or outright fabricated by Abdur Rahman to elevate the Chishti Sufi school.

And yet Amin himself resists relying on this interpretation too heavily:

Even if we could establish the motivation for Abdur Rahman... for writing his Life of Masud at the time when he did... an excess of meaning would still remain. [T]he more important issue is the assent of a diverse population to a common construction of a long and conflictual past.⁵⁹

As he notes later on the same page, Ghazi Miyan is not the exclusive property of Chishtiya Muslims, nor of even Muslims at all: he is overwhelmingly popular among both Muslims and Hindus across Uttar Pradesh. His appeal is reflected (no doubt in a process of mutual reinforcement) in both contemporary practice and stories about him – some of which are not accounted for in the Mirat-i-Masud. Abdur Rahman, for instance, does not touch upon the Ghazi's marriage. In the late twentieth century, Amin recorded a tradition local to Rudauli that Salar Masud married one Zohra Bibi, a noble girl raised by low-caste Teli. While thirsty, he comes upon Zohra by a well, but – being blind – she is unable to draw water for him. He prays to Allah to restore her eyesight, and the boon is granted. In a reversal of roles, she pursues him for marriage; the Ghazi's mother summons a Brahman (not a Muslim officiant) to set an auspicious date for the wedding, but the Brahman informs her that the wedding will not be successful: it will proceed as far as the anointing of the groom, but no further. Zohra Bibi's connection to the Teli perhaps explains the Ghazi's enduring popularity with the Teli and their own connection with the Dafali, the caste of Muslim balladeers who sing stories of the Ghazi during his festival season. It is also a point of significant divergence with the Mirat, where the high-born Zohra traces her lineage to the Prophet himself and has nothing to do with the Teli.

⁵⁸ See Amin, Conquest 40, 19-22.

⁵⁹ Amin, Conquest 186.

Popular ballads similarly stress the role of cowherds in the Ghazi's martyrdom, something that receives little attention in Abdur Rahman's telling. Amin notes that the fight against cattle rustlers is a common theme in many Ghazi Miyan ballads, and that such a theme brings these ballads into contact with North Indian folk epics, many of which feature cow-protectors as the central heroes. In ballads of the Ahir cow-herding caste recorded in the late 19th century, the Ghazi rides to avenge the deaths of Ahir cowherds at the hands of a local Hindu tyrant. In dying for cows and cowherds, Ghazi appears like the hero of the founding epic of the Ahir caste, the Lorikayan. The fact that in the Lorikayan Turkic Muslims are occasionally the target of noble military campaigns in defense of cattle, and that Muslims are typically depicted as barbarous eaters of beef with no regard for Hindu sensibilities, does nothing to diminish Ahir esteem for the Ghazi.⁶⁰

We thus see hints at the reasons behind the "excess of meaning" that endears Ghazi Miyan not just to Muslims, but Hindus as well. The assimilation of the Ghazi legend to local tales, and the insertion of local peoples into the same legend, ensure an appeal that crosses religious lines. Another reason is perhaps easier to account for. In his capacity as a wonder-worker, he does not distinguish between Hindu and Muslim. Both beseech him for sons, to cure blindness, and to cure leprosy.⁶¹ His interreligious appeal has in turn resulted in new twists on the Ghazi legend by Hindu and Muslim partisans eager to disabuse their co-religionists of foolish notions about Salar Masud. The Hindu revivalist movement Arya Samaj published a series of pamphlets in the 1920s that sought to free naïve Ahir and Teli from the sway of this Muslim conqueror, abetted by the machinations of the duplicitous Dafali. They can still be found outside the shrine today. Their propaganda was countered by rhetorical fusillades from Muslim partisans as well as softer counterarguments by the shrine-keepers themselves, who minimize aspects of the Ghazi's life story (such as his penchant for iconoclasm) that would resonate negatively with a Hindu audience.⁶² Because of the Ghazi legend's long, complex, and often uncertain history, asserting self-interest on the part of individuals or groups as the sole force behind change over time would be asking a hypothesis to do too much work. Rather, parallels between other local legends, coupled with pragmatic interest on the part of a diverse group of devotees, probably lies at the root of Salar Masud's continuing popularity. Given the many gaps in the Rectifying Methods' textual history, and the many anonymous individuals and groups responsible for its shaping, students of the work can draw valuable lessons from Amin's study of Ghazi Miyan.

⁶⁰ Amin, Conquest 67-69, 122-125, 80-90.

⁶¹ Amin, Conquest 59ff, 138.

62 Amin, Conquest 163-176.

Partial works, partial memories

The scholars above make a convincing case that the works they study were altered for specific polemical reasons. But academics should not think themselves above one variety of the same criticism. No given version of a work – not even one that attempts to incorporate and thereby replace all others – can claim to represent the work as a whole.

Turning again to McGann:

[The crafting of a critical edition] is a process by which the entire sociohistory of the work – from its originary moments of production through all its subsequent reproductive adventures – is postulated as the ultimate goal of critical self-consciousness. That the goal is in fact an unreachable one is clear. A practical move towards its attainment is essential to the critical enterprise, however. Such a move appears as some particular version of a work... Because [the critical edition] also emphasizes, in itself, the constructed and agented character of a text, it has the additional advantage of opening itself to critical reading, and thence of breaking down that spell of self-transparency which hovers over all the texts we read.⁶³

In self-consciously attempting to account for all variations among different versions of a work, the author of a critical edition makes explicit their own editorial decisions and thus reveals the contingent nature of both the critical edition and the versions on which it relies. The result highlights certain aspects of the work and obscures others. This is not necessarily a bad thing. Speaking of two different versions of Shakespeare's Sonnets – a variorum edition and a critical edition – McGann notes that, despite their shared ambition to account for every detail of the Sonnets' textual history, "their respective virtues are as much a function of their limits as of their particular strengths, both of which they execute as corresponding sets of presences and absences." Such deliberate shaping – conscious or unconscious – is a feature of any work, and of any attempt to preserve or remember.

63 McGann, "Theory of Texts." Emphasis in original.

The means by which this partiality is enacted is often physical as much as it is rhetorical. The museum that currently occupies Alcatraz Island is run by the National Parks Service, and focuses on Alcatraz's time as a prison. Alcatraz was also much more, however. From 1969 to 1971, the island was occupied by Native Americans claiming the former prison – recently declared surplus land by the Department of the Interior – under the Sioux Treaty of 1868. This nineteen-month occupation was the single most important driving force behind sweeping changes in the treatment of Native Americans by the federal government. However, the museum chooses to emphasize the site's time as a prison. Visitors to the museum engage with Alcatraz chiefly via touch, sight, and hearing. Visitors can tour the prison grounds, but the sites available to them are selective: they can visit the former Post Exchange and the warden's residence, for instance, but many of the areas that were most important during the Occupation are off limits. One of the dominant experiences is an award-winning guided audio tour of the cellhouse, where a former corrections officer and former prisoners narrate their experiences in Alcatraz in a recording keyed to various locations in the prison. As they listen, visitors enter the cells inhabited by prisoners, walk the same halls patrolled by jailers, and touch the bars, railings, beds, and other objects that formed daily life in the prison. In guiding its listeners, however, the audio tour almost completely neglects the island's time as a site of protest. Instead, it provides visitors with memories that emphasize their separation, as law-abiding citizens, from the criminal inhabitants of Alcatraz during its time as a prison. This simple binary forges a picture of the American government as the champion of justice that locks away dangerous elements for the good of society, while simultaneously forgetting its more unpleasant history as an oppressor of native peoples. This particular collective memory – whether intended or not – is a product of the senses.⁶⁴

The somatic component in each of the works discussed above should not be overlooked. They may not be “collective memories” as commonly discussed in memory studies (see, e.g., Places of Public Memory 1-54 and references), but they are nonetheless rhetorically-inflected accounts of the past that are inseparable from physical practice. Though the Secret Gospel relies on the written word to reshape its source material, the versions we have bear traces of their context of use – whether in minor dialectical variants or significant differences in content. Further, the content of a given version sometimes provides suggestions about its contexts of use: the list of demons in the longer versions of the Revelation would likely have been used in healing magic, while the school setting in which the Revelation was originally composed featured close contact between a master and a group of students, including ritualized activities like prayer, the singing of hymns, and other sorts of close fellowship; it was via these means that a student in an Alexandrian school would have seen themselves as belonging to a tradition.⁶⁵ The primary mode through which supplicants of the Ghazi engage with his story (at least, as detailed by Amin) is not silent reading but physical performance: songs are sung, coins are thrown, vast distances traveled, prayers uttered, a tomb entered and exited.⁶⁶ Similarly, we saw in the last chapter that the use of amulets in the Scripture of the Three Heavens is predicated on a ceremony of conferral that is structured by ritualized movement; certain of the amulets themselves, as we will see later, only acquire their power through journeying, chanting, and burial. Not every version of the Scripture will place the same level of importance on movement (this is especially true of its more ideologically-inflected revisions), but where it is present physicality should not be ignored.

64 See Cynthia Duquette Smith and Theresa Bergman, “You Were on Indian Land: Alcatraz Island as Recalcitrant Memory Space,” in Places of Public Memory: The Rhetoric of Museums and Memorials, ed. Greg Dickson, Carole Blair, and Brian L. Ott (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2010): 160-188. 160-166 provide background on the Occupation; 176-182 discuss the audio tour. See also a retrospective interview with five of the original Native participants: “Voices from Alcatraz Island,” Indian Country Today, September 2, 2017, <https://newsmaven.io/indiancountrytoday/archive/voices-from-alcatraz-island-rhwnDtlNwES8WRChgoRsuw/>

65 See King, Revelation 11-12 on the Alexandrian school setting; on healing, see 110-114.

A Summary of the “Rectifying Methods”

The received version of the Rectifying Methods is divided into two parts. The first is a motley collection of amulets, hymns, rituals, predictions, and cosmological speculation called The Most High Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens (CT 1203 Taishang santian zhengfa jing 太上三天正法經). The second is a collection of amulets called The Wonderful Registers of the Great Scripture of the Universe (CT 1395 Shangqing dadong jiuwei badao dajing miaolu 上清大洞九微八道大經妙錄). In what follows, Rectifying Methods or Methods will refer to the composite work, while I will refer to its constituent parts as the Zhengfa jing (for CT 1203) and the Jiuwei badao (for CT 1395). (When I refer to “the beginning of the Rectifying Methods” or “the beginning of the Methods,” I am referring to the beginning of the Zhengfa jing, which is the found before the Jiuwei badao in the canon.)

Like other Daoist works of the Northern and Southern Dynasties period, the Rectifying Methods attempts to explain the current age of disorder while providing methods to save the reader from its dangers. The Zhengfa jing opens with a history of the cosmos from its earliest beginnings to the tribulations attendant on the fall of the Han 漢, China's first stable dynasty (206 BCE-220 CE). It explains these trials as part of the violent rule of Six Heavens, which employ spirits and demons to cleanse the world of evildoers. While they had legitimate command of worldly affairs for many centuries, their period of control has now expired; the lords of the celestial bureaucracy have transferred legitimate rule to the benevolent Three Heavens. The Zhengfa jing promises that the methods it provides – amulets, an incantation, and an internal meditation exercise – will save the reader from malevolent agents of the Six Heavens and allow ascent to the Three. Accordingly, the work provides a transmission ritual for these methods, lists the powers that accrue to the bearer of the amulets, and warns of various prohibitions that accompany these powerful tools. The work closes with a list of goods the recipient of the techniques must provide to his or her master. The Jiuwei badao opens with a slightly different list of material requirements, followed by a list of the amulets to be transmitted that largely accords with that found in the Zhengfa jing. The text (that is, the arrangement of signifiers on the page of the received work called the Jiuwei badao) also includes detailed instructions for copying some of these amulets, as well as list of their powers and transmission histories, before closing with a transmission ritual that almost certainly postdates the text itself.

⁶⁶ See particularly Amin, Conquest 124-145.

The structure of the two works is not nearly as smooth as the above summary indicates, however. Internal inconsistencies reveal a compositional process that took place over time. While the dating of any individual layer is problematic, themes and characters within these layers link each to discrete currents in Daoist thought that presuppose different conceptions of the universe and the beings – normal and supernormal – that populate it.⁶⁷ The difficulties begin with the title. Within the work, the phrase “Santian zhengfa” refers to methods associated with the Three Heavens that allow the bearer at once to escape the violence of the Six and to chastise the Six Heavens, rectifying the cosmic order by replacing them with the Three. These usages align it with one notion of the phrase found elsewhere in the Daoist canon, while sharply contrasting it with a different contemporary notion of the phrase. This second sees the “Santian zhengfa” as the “law” or “norms” instituted by the newly-ascendant Three, rather than methods to weather the travails of the Six or to punish them. The crux of the difference is the translation of the character 法 (pronounced fa, with the third tone, in modern standard Chinese): depending on the context, fa can be translated as either “law” or “method” in the written language of dynastic China. (The two different meanings are evident in modern standard Chinese fangfa 方法 “method” and falü 法律 “regulation.”) Unfortunately, the context here is ambiguous. Certain terms at the beginning of the Zhengfa jing associate it decisively with the “law” approach, but the bulk of the Zhengfa jing and the entirety of the Jiuwei badao is concerned with “methods” to control spirits and ascend to the heavens. Accordingly, I have chosen to use the term “method” to translate fa as it occurs in the title of the work, associating it more closely with the first current of thought in the canon.

67 While we can associate a given layer with one of these currents – for instance, Lingbao 靈寶 or Celestial Masters 天師 – it is impossible to thereby infer that each section was authored by a different hypothetical individual who subscribed to the cosmological vision associated with that corpus.

The Rectifying Methods is littered with such ambiguities. A more detailed summary will not resolve them, but it will better acquaint the reader with the work. The divisions that follow are of my own devising; the pagination that follows refers to the Zhonghua daoang version. (On the ZHDZ, see “Primary Sources” in the bibliography). I translate the names of deities and places without comment here, providing more detailed introductions where necessary throughout the rest of the dissertation. The summary that follows concerns the Zhengfa jing almost exclusively. The Jiuwei badao consists almost entirely of amulets, and so I will not review it here; for a discussion see Appendix F. For the names and places that feature in the following, see Appendix G.

Cosmology [1.259a.1-259c.6]

The Zhengfa jing begins with a cosmogenesis and the creation of beings that rule the universe. It descends through various grades of deities and supernormal beings before arriving at the creation of the world and the humans who inhabit it. The Azure Lad plays an important role here: the text records him as its compiler under his title “Clear-and-Void King of the Xiaoyou Cavern-Heaven,” (Qingxu xiaoyoutian wang 清虛小有天王), and he also provides a commentary under the title “Lord Azure Lad” (Qingtong jun 青童君). The relationship between the main text and the commentary is unclear. The latter supplies key details that fundamentally alter the nature of the Zhengfa jing, but whether those portions attributed to the Lord Azure Lad were originally conceived of as commentary is an open question: as we shall see later, it seems to integrate material from different versions of the Zhengfa jing. This being the case, I will be cautious to differentiate text and commentary in what follows.

The main text relates that the Perfected King of the Nine Heavens (Jiutian zhenwang 九天真王) and the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement (Yuanshi tianwang 元始天王) formed in the primordial muddle “before the Inaugural Qi” (shi qi zhi xian 始炁之先), placing their formation within an altered version of the Celestial Masters’ cosmology.⁶⁸ After seven thousand kalpas, the “primal light” (xuan jing 玄景) divided into the Nine Qi, which were muddled together like turbid waters. The more refined qi rose and clarified, while the less refined qi sank and spread out as a distinct layer. At this point, the Perfected King and the Heavenly King formed as the Nine Qi coagulated into the Nine Heavens. The Azure Lad explains that these heavenly lords formed out of the clarifying qi during this process.⁶⁹ Our text discusses three heavens in detail: Clear Tenuity (Qingwei 清微), Yuyu 禹餘, and Grand Crimson (Dachi 大赤), names that resonate with Celestial Master cosmology.⁷⁰ The Azure Lad’s commentary explains that these heavens are hypostases of the clear qi, which itself had divided into 68 The typical order of the Three Qi, as reflected in the Commands and Admonitions of the Families of the Great Dao (Dadao jia lingjie 大道家令戒, found on pp. 12a-19b of CT 789 Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie ke jing 正一法文天師教戒科經) and CT 1205 Santian neijie jing 三天內解經 is Mystic (xuan 玄), Primal (yuan 元), and Inaugural (shi 始). See Bokenkamp, EDS 159-160, 188-192. The commentary to our text inverts this order. This would place the deities’ formation sometime before the earliest qi emerged.

69 The term xuan jing does not seem to have special significance in Daoist works, based on its absence from the Daojiao dacidian and Zhonghua daojiao dacidian. Accordingly, I have translated it in its conventional sense. The identity of the Zhengfa jing’s Nine Qi and their corresponding Nine Heavens is unclear to me. In the 5th-century Lingbao work CT 318 Ziran jiutian shengshen zhangjing 自然九天生神章經, the Three Qi of the Celestial Masters each divides itself into three qi, thus forming nine qi. See the quotation from in Daojiao Dacidian, s.v. “九天.” However, since our work does not follow the typical Celestial Masters cosmology, it seems inappropriate to equate its Nine Qi or Nine Heavens with those of CT 318.

70 See R: 419. These are the highest three of the nine heavens listed in CT 1345 Dongzhen taishang daojun yuandan shangjing 洞真太上道君元[=玄]丹經, a later Shangqing work that combines Shangqing and Celestial Masters elements; it is the latter to which these three heavens belong. Because the Yuandan shangjing cites the Suling jing extensively, it must postdate the Shangqing revelations; see R 2:287.

three different layers: Clear Tenuity emerged as the Inaugural Qi (Shi qi 始氣) stilled; Yuyu formed when the Primal Qi (Yuan qi 元氣) stilled; and Grand Crimson formed as the Dark Qi (Xuan qi 玄氣) stilled.⁷¹

Several gods emerge in sequence after this process is complete. First is the “Thearch of the Nine Perfected” (Jiuzhen zhi di 九真之帝). The Nine Perfected play a critical role in the Shangqing corpus as residents of realms within the human body and corresponding cosmic domains. These realms are the Three Primes (San yuan 三元). In the Zhengfa jing, however, the Nine Perfected live in the Three Heavens mentioned above: three in Clear Tenuity, three in Yuyu, and three in Grand Crimson. Next to emerge are the Three Prime Dames (San yuan jun 三元君), a trio of female deities typically referred to as the Three Prime Dames of Simplicity (San suyuan jun 三素元君). The main text of the Zhengfa jing records them spontaneously giving birth to three children, who establish mansions and spirit guards in the Shangqing heavens – perhaps equated here with Clear Tenuity, Yuyu, and Grand Crimson, though these are not the typical Three Clarities of the Shangqing textual corpus.

The commentary goes into more detail about these august deities and their progeny. The Prime Dame of White Simplicity (Baisu yuanjun 白素元君) gives birth to the Lord White Prime of the Right (You baiyuan jun 右白元君); the Prime Dame of Yellow Simplicity (Huangsu yuanjun 黃素元君) births the Yellow Old Lord of the Center (Huang zhongyang jun 黃老中央君); and the Prime Dame of Purple Simplicity (Zisu yuanjun 紫素元君) births the Matchless Lord of the Left (Zuo wuying jun 左無英君). For the moment, it suffices to emphasize that in the Zhengfa jing the Three Prime Dames serve to blur the distinction between body and cosmos in a manner that is typical of the Shangqing corpus: in addition to their celestial roles, these goddesses preside over the upper, middle, and lower sections of the adept's body, while their offspring have charge of various organs.⁷²

71 ZHDZ 1:259a.1-b.5-6.

The next deity is not born, but rather enfeoffed. After the Prime Dames come into being, we read that the “Three Ways flourished, and named [as] their lord the Most High Lord of the Great Dao” (Sandao xingjiang, juhao wei Taishang dadao jun 三道興隆舉號為太上大道君). The exact identity of these Three Ways is not clear, but the term here probably refers to the sun, moon, and stars. In depicting them all as choosing the Most High Lord of the Great Dao as their leader, the Zhengfa jing situates itself above them.⁷³ In other Daoist texts of the Northern and Southern Dynasties period, the Most High Lord 72 ZHDZ 1:259.6-14. See Robinet, Taoist Meditation 100-103.

73 Another possible referent for the term “Three Ways” consists of three cults found in a Tang work, CT 375 Taishang dongxuan lingbao tianzun shuo jiku jing 太上洞玄靈寶天尊說濟苦經: the Great Limitless Way (Wuji dadao): the Unexcelled Way of Orthodox Perfection (Wushang zhengzhen dao 無上正真道), and the Great Way of the Clear Covenant of Spontaneous Action [of the] Era of Great Peace (Wuwei taiping qingyue dadao 無為太平清約大道). John Lagerway infers that these Three Ways are the same as the Three Ways discussed in Inner Explanations 1.3a: the Way of Spontaneous Action (Wuwei dadao 無為大道), the Way of the Buddha (Fodao 佛道), and the Way of the Clear Covenant (Qingyue dadao 清約大道). The dissimilarity between the titles of these three ways of the Inner Explanations and those in CT 375 makes this seem unlikely to me. Further complicating matters is that the Inner Explanations contains what appears to be a different set of Three Ways. It speaks favorably of the Way of the Five Pecks of Rice (Wudoumi dao 五斗米道, i.e., the Celestial Masters), contrasting it with two deviant alternatives, the Way of Spontaneous Action of Banners and Flowers (Wuwei fanhua zhi dao 無為幡華之道), which it equates with Buddhism, and the Way of Pure Water (Qingshui zhi dao 清水之道) (7a). Given the context, identifying the Wudoumi dao as the Wuwei dadao of 1.3a makes sense, as does equating Buddhism with the Way of Banners and Flowers. Bokenkamp (EDS 197, 219 and notes) distinguishes the final items in each list provided by the Inner Explanations, but it is possible that either could be the Way of the Clear Contract referred to in CT 375. Whether any of these ways correspond to the Three Ways of the Zhengfa jing is unclear. See Daojiao dacidian, s.v. “三道.”

of the Great Dao transmits scriptures, crafts methods, or responds to important requests.⁷⁴

In our work, he assumes rulership of the Nine Heavens from the Perfected King of the Nine Heavens and creates the world as we know it: he establishes the Eight Directions and appoints three sets of Eight Emperors to oversee them. (Incidentally, these twenty-four emperors, alongside the Most High Lord himself, consider the adept's petition to enter the domain of the Azure Lad in CT 1315.) In the commentary, the Azure Lad contrasts this process of appointment with the wrong view (presumably included in a competing work) that the Heaven of Commencement had a ruler from the very beginning. He also comments on the qualifications of the Eight Emperors: they received their appointments because they were “heritors of spontaneity” (ziran zhi yin 自然之胤); later human beings (“those later joining the study” hou xue 後學) merely “modeled themselves” (fa 法) on spontaneity, and so could not achieve this position. The main text continues by relating how the Eight Emperors drew on spontaneity to craft precious works in order to aid later students. The specific identity of these works is uncertain, but they were secreted away in the Palace of Jade Clarity. It was at this time that the Yellow Emperor – the mythic prototype of the wise ruler – ascended to the throne. Thus humanity entered the time of the Three Dynasties, and history as we know it began.

74 He originated the techniques for rectifying the Three Heavens that form the substance of the Forty-four Prescriptions on Yellow Silk (an important work discussed below), while in the Purple Book of the Celestial Emperor of Qingyao (CT 1315 Dongzhen Shangqing qingyao zishu jingen zhongjing 洞真上清青要紫書金根衆經), he helps adepts gain entrance to the abode of the Azure Lad. See Robinet 1:127, CT 1338 17a; Huangsu 1a, 21a; CT 1315 2.1b.

The creation of humanity and nonhuman people [1.259b.24-259c.6]

The Azure Lad's commentary plays a critical role in the section of the Zhengfa jing concerning the creation of humanity and China's nonhuman neighbors. His conception of these two groups follows the traditional division into humans (ren 人) and nonhuman barbarians (usually referred to – though not directly in this work – as hu 胡). While the main text credits the Yellow Emperor with the creation of humankind, its description is limited to a scant eight characters: we read only that early people (min 民) were “coarse and rough, clothing and capping themselves with the five colors.”⁷⁵ There is no explicit ren/hu distinction, and the reader is left with the impression that the text is speaking only of human beings.⁷⁶ The Lord Azure Lad is more forthcoming, however – both about the origins of humanity and its distinction from nonhuman groups. He explains that the Yellow Emperor molded clay into statues of human beings. He placed some in the Central Plain – that is, what would become China – and in the wastes to the north, south, east, and west. Over a period of three hundred years, these statues took on the five colors and acquired the power of vocal communication. Those in the center could speak, while those on the periphery howled like birds and beasts. The statues of the Central Plain “modeled themselves on Spontaneity” (fa ziran 法自然), and because of this they received the qi of the Upper Perfected and became human. By contrast, the four sets of statues that populate the wastes surrounding the central plain became the four different tribes of barbarians that are the traditional enemies of the inhabitants of the Central Plain.

75 蠢以元炁五色衣冠.

76 While the character 民, when taken as “human,” implies a distinction from non-humans, this meaning is only one of several possible interpretations; whether the author meant to stress that distinction here is unclear.

The civilized Chinese have mortal lifespans, but they also have the opportunity to live forever: if they have proper moral character and model themselves on the Perfected, they will be named transcendents; those who do not will “die and return to the earth” (si guitu 死歸土).

The importance of Spontaneity (ziran 自然) in the creation of both gods and people provides one argument for the continuity of the Zhengfa jing and its commentary. The main text traces the inheritance of Spontaneity throughout creation. It predated the earliest and most august gods, who merely “inherited” it or “were endowed” (bing 禀) with it. In fact, it is only because they were endowed with Spontaneity that they acquired the title “Lords of the Nine Heavens.”⁷⁷ The term ziran next appears in the description of the Eight Emperors. In the main text, these beings were enthroned by the Most High Lord of the Great Dao. The Azure Lad’s commentary explains that they acquired their titles for the exact same reason as the Lords of the Nine Heavens.⁷⁸ Their connection to Spontaneity is what qualifies them for the post to which they are appointed. Finally, one of the only differences between the humans of the Central Plains and their nonhuman neighbors is that – as the commentary explains – the former “model themselves on Spontaneity” and so receive a special sort of qi: that of the “Upper Perfected” (Shang zhen 上真). Because of this endowment, they possess the potential to join the ranks of the “Upper Transcendents” (Shang xian 上仙) – that is, to become a sort of being that is greater than human.⁷⁹ Realizing this potential requires following the example set by the Upper Perfected; those who do not will die and return to the earth.⁸⁰ This special qi that grants them this opportunity is only bestowed upon them because of their connection to Spontaneity. Spontaneity thus links human beings to the gods and the earliest beginnings of the universe, allowing them to transcend the bounds of their own mortality.

77 ZHDZ 1.259a.1-g: 九天眞王，元始天王，禀自然之胤，置於九天之號.

78 八帝者，皆受自然之胤，得爲帝號.

The Six Heavens and the coming apocalypse [1.259c.7-260a.8]

Not everyone chooses to avail themselves of this opportunity, and so the gods are forced to take drastic measures. The main text tells of how they dispatch “ghost soldiers” (gui bin 鬼兵) to weed these individuals out. Once again, the Azure Lad has more to say. His commentary divides humankind into two groups: those who “do not accord with Spontaneity” (bu bing ziran 不稟自然) and those “whose conduct is good” (shan xing 善行). These latter “diligently contemplate the prolongation of life [and] do not transgress the [rules of] the Three Offices [of Heaven, Earth, and Water].”⁸¹ In a process consistent with Celestial Master cosmology, they are thus selected as “seed people” (zhongmin 種民) who will survive the coming cataclysms and repopulate the world; here, they receive 79 The most complete study of transcendents is Campany’s Making Transcendents: Ascetics and Social Memory in Early Medieval China (Honolulu: University of Hawai’i Press, 2009). Pages 39-87 delineate the powers of a transcendent and situate it among the other sorts of supernatural beings that populate the textual canon of early medieval China.

80 若有骨炁係真，便為不死得補上仙。有不純之行，死歸土也。I translate 有骨炁 in the more abstract sense of “having moral character,” contrasting it with “impure conduct” that results in death. One could also translate it literally as “having [the proper] qi in one’s bones.” This would add the requirement that one not only behave morally, but also possess the appropriate destiny.

81 善行精勤，思念長生，不犯三官。The Three Offices form an integral part of the cosmology of the early Celestial Masters; according to Master Redpine’s Almanac of Petitions (CT 615 Chisongzi zhangli 赤松子章歷), a compilation of Celestial Master petitions that contains early documents, they choose the “seed people” discussed in this paragraph. See EoT, s.v. “Sanguan,” “Chisongzi zhangli.”

undefined “Perfected Scriptures.” The ill conduct of the former, however, incurs the wrath of the heavens and disrupts the natural course of the planets.⁸² The main text continues by explaining that – though the violent Six Heavens are currently dominant – time moves in cycles of good fortune and apocalyptic disaster. The former are called “Yang nine,” while the latter are called “hundred-six.”⁸³ Given the turmoil that led to the formation of the Zhengfa jing, the reader is presumably in the midst of a hundred-six, which the text assures them will end in the next renchen 壬辰 or guisi 癸巳 year (the 29th and 30th years of the sexagesimal cycle; see Table 2). Given the uncertainty surrounding the exact date of the text’s composition, it is difficult to determine the exact years it refers to here. The Azure Lad’s commentary provides some help, but is opaque in its own ways.

82 The concept of a correlation between human behavior and the course of the heavens is often credited to Han scholar Dong Zhongshu 董仲舒 (c. 195-105 BCE), who probably formalized existing ideas. Dong’s work became part of the habitus of political thought at both popular and elite levels, and its influence persisted throughout dynastic China. The behavior of the emperor engendered positive or negative responses from Heaven in the form of omens: a peaceful populace, plentiful harvest, and auspicious planetary alignment were signs of Heaven’s approval, while such disasters as famines, fires, and rebellion indicated Heaven’s approbation. For more on Dong’s thought, see Sarah Queen, From Chronicle to Canon: The Hermeneutics of the Spring and Autumn, according to Tung Chung-shu (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1996): 206-226. Stephan Peter Bumbacher, Empowered Writing: Exorcistic and Apotropaic Rituals in Medieval China (St. Petersburg, FL: Three Pines Press, 2012): 33-56 provides a more general introduction to the linkage between heavenly approval conveyed in these terms and political authority.

83 According to Stephen Bokenkamp, this appears to be a very free modification of Liu Xin’s 劉歆 (d. 23 CE) Triple Dispensation Calendar (Santong li 三統歷), according to which 106 normal years – a bailiu 白六 (“one hundred six”) were followed by nine years of drought called a “Yang nine” (Yang jiu 陽九). The phrase “Yangjiu bailiu” became synonymous with the disasters that augured the apocalypse in later, especially Daoist, works – though here it is only the hundred-six that are years of disaster. See Stephen Bokenkamp, “Time After Time: Daoist Apocalyptic History and the Founding of the T’ang Dynasty,” Asia Major, 3rd Series 7, no. 1 (1994): 63-64. This section of the work (259c.12-14) also includes the phrase 三道虧盈，廻運而生. I am unsure what the “three daos” are here, only that their rise and fall is connected to cosmic cycles; since I deal with these already, I omit this portion of the text in my analysis.

He begins by dividing Yang nines and hundred-sixes into great and small, both of impossible length. A Great Yang Nine and a Great Hundred-Six are each 9,900 years, while their Small variants each last 3,300 years.⁸⁴ By the time of the Zhou 周 Dynasty (ca. 1100-256 BCE), the Six Heavens had already been dominant for three Great Yang Nine, but had still failed to fully exterminate evil people. Seeing this, the Sage Lord of the Latter Age asks the Most High Lord of the Great Dao whether the time was ripe to effect the separation of good and evil by different means. The Most High explains that the time had not arrived; rather, they are in the middle of the era of Grand Perfection (Taizhen 太真), with six more Great Yang Nine and Hundred-Sixes yet to elapse before government returned to the Three Heavens.⁸⁵ The calculated time begins with the rule of the legendary sage-ruler Yao, and ends either at the end of a dinghai 丁亥 year (the 27th in the sexagesimal cycle), or in a renchen year – a slight difference from the main text.⁸⁶ Regardless of the exact year of the coming apocalypse, the instruments with which the gods enact it remain the same.

The main text continues by specifying the means by which the Six Heavens will be subdued and the Three Heavens installed. The Perfected King of the Nine Heavens transmits two amulets to the Most High Lord of the Great Dao. Their names are difficult to translate, particularly because they seem totally unconnected to the powers the amulets provide. The first is the Writ of Three Winding Perfected Prescriptions of the Numinous 84 See R 1: 138ff.

85 I am unsure what period of time this refers to. The term taizhen is usually found as an epithet for a deity (e.g., CT 446 Shangqing zhongjing zhuzhenshengbi 上清衆經諸真聖祕 4.9a), or as a place (WSBY 56.1a).

86 計期盡承唐之年，金氏御世，丁亥之末，壬辰之歲。

Capital of the Heaven of Grand Tenuity (Taiwei lingdu wanzhuan sanfangwen 太微靈都 婉轉真三方文, hereafter Lingdu wanzhuan), and the second is the Perfected Registers of the Massed Books (Zhongshu zhenlu 衆書真錄, hereafter Zhongshu zhenlu). These are known as the Methods of the Three Heavens for Controlling the Six Heavens (Zhi liutian santian zhi fa 制六天三天之法). The Azure Lad's commentary specifies, for the first time, that these are the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens (Santian zhengfa 三天 正法) and provides a more detailed transmission history. The amulets' ultimate origin is unrevealed; the Azure Lad states only that they predate the Perfected King of the Nine Heavens and the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement, to whom they were bequeathed when the two lords first formed out of the primordial qi. The Perfected King and the Heavenly King anticipated the need to restrain the rule of the Six Heavens, and so the two lords transmitted the Lingdu wanzhuan and the Zhongshu zhenlu to the Most High Lord of the Great Dao when the Six Heavens' dispensation began. As this dispensation progressed, the amulets' line of transmission extended down to human beings: when the Yellow Emperor ascended to the throne, the Most High transmitted them to human beings. Those fortunate enough to receive them all achieved transcendence by the grace of the Lord Emperor (Dijun 帝君), the Kingly Lord of the Western Regions (Xicheng wangjun 西城王君), and the Azure Lad himself.⁸⁷ This is the 87 Dijun is the supreme deity of the Dadong zhenjing. He is associated both with attaining transcendence and the records of transcendence themselves. Isabelle Robinet discusses this in Julian F. Pas and Norman Girardot, trans., Taoist Meditation: The Maoshan Tradition of Great Purity (Albany: SUNY Press, 1993): 107-8, 137. See also the "Method of the Nine Perfected" in the Jiuzhen zhongjing (ZHDZ 1.222-225), in which the Lord Emperor plays a critical role. The Kingly Lord of the Western Regions is a Perfected being in the Zhen 'Gao (14.8b) who dwells in Hengshan 衡山. This has sometimes, but not always, been considered the southern marchmount (Nanyue 南嶽), the latter's exact identity has been the subject of debate among scholars Chinese and Western for two millennia. See James Robson, Power of Place: The Religious Landscape of the Southern Sacred Peak (Nanyue 南嶽) in Medieval China (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2009): 57-89.

last of the Azure Lad's commentary in the Zhengfa jing, but the list of amulets used to control the Six Heavens continues with one more.

The final amulet fits awkwardly with its two companions. The text calls it the Three Heavens' Numinous Registers [of Yin and Yang] of the Grand Perfected [One] from the Mystic Capital of the Nine Heavens (Santian jiuwei xuandu taizhen yinyang linglu 三天九微玄都太真[陰陽]靈錄, hereafter Yinyang linglu).⁸⁸ This amulet has a different transmission history than the Lingdu wanzhuan and the Zhongshu zhenlu, and unlike the other two it receives an elaborate description: the text specifies that it is made out of jade and gold and hidden in away in the Numinous Capital, where it is venerated like a scripture by various deities. (The Numinous Capital is the chief city of Grand Tenuity, a constellation near Polaris.)⁸⁹ Notably absent is any association of the Yinyang linglu with the Six Heavens: where the other two amulets restrain them so the Three Heavens can be established, the only link to this process that the Yinyang linglu can claim lies in its association with the Three Heavens. It should be grouped together with the other two amulets only by virtue of their mutual proximity. The main text explicitly presents the Lingdu wanzhuan and the Zhongshu zhenlu as methods of the Three Heavens for controlling the Six, then immediately proceeds to describe a third amulet that is both associated with the Three Heavens and lacks a function that is clearly separate from the other two. Given these facts, it is likely that the author of the Zhengfa jing – or 88 I have inserted 陰陽 based on their presence in the amulets' title both later in the Zhengfa jing and the Jiuwei badao.

89 Its identity varies, however: in WSBY 32.17a it is the capital of Grand Tenuity, just as it is here, but it can also be a palace in the Jade Capital (Yujing 玉京) of the Xuyan 須延 Heaven (the third of the Nine Heavens) according to WSBY 23.3a, or a palace in Shangshang Heaven according to WSBY 21.1a. Grand Tenuity can also be a palace in the Shangqing heavens.

more probably some later editor – numbered the Yinyang linglu with the two preceding amulets as devices to restrain the Six Heavens, but felt a more lavish description of its surroundings was necessary.

Hymns and transmission ceremony [1.260a.8-c.4]

At this point, the voice of the Lord Azure Lad recedes from the Zhengfa jing. His silence on the matter of the Yinyang linglu, coupled with the extravagant description of the amulet's heavenly abode and its inhabitants, prefigures what follows. Three times each month, the Azure Lad and the Imperial Lord of the Golden Porte pay a visit to their immediate superiors. With a retinue of a thousand Perfected beings, they ride a cloudy chariot of flowing light the color of dawn to visit the Perfected Father and the Most High. Together with the Most High they proceed to the Jade Hall of the Jade Palace in the Jade Court of the Heaven of Jade Clarity, where – amid a banquet served by ten thousand million myriads of female Perfected and guarded by giant dragonlings – they proceed to chant hymns that summarize the text up to this point. The Most High recounts the history of the cosmos from its formation down to the present end of the Great Kalpa; the Lord of the Golden Porte describes their journey to the Jade Palace and the coming apocalypse: the violent Six Heavens and their disasters will be completely obliterated, legitimate government will be taken up by the Three Heavens, and select human beings will be vouchsafed certain texts – here called the Stanzas of the Grand Perfected (Taizhen zhang 太真章) – that will allow them to escape the cataclysms, avoid unpleasant rebirths, and ascend to the Shangqing heavens. When the hymns are concluded, the Most High transmits the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens for Expelling the Six Heavens

(Santian zhengfa chu liutian zhi wen 三天正法除六天之文) in a ceremony that is at once elaborate and hastily summarized:

太上與後聖，九玄上相青童君共序三天正法除六天之文，施用寶訣祝說，投祭法度以付二君，使教後學諸爲真人者，以制六天收戮群凶。於是帝君，上相青童君奉受真訣稽首而還。

Thereupon the Most High allowed the Lord of the Golden Porte, and the Azure Lad of the Nine Heavens to together lay out the Correct Methods of the Three Heavens for Expelling the Six Heavens, using precious oral instructions, incantations, and explanations. They sacrificed and he ritually ordained them, in order to transmit [the scripture] to the two lords, commanding them to teach students of the latter age how to become Perfected in order to control the Six Heavens, gathering up and slaying the mass of deviances. Thereupon the Lord of the Golden Porte and the Azure Lad received perfected instructions, performed full prostrations, and left.

We first saw this passage in the introduction. Its overall significance is clear: modeling practices expected of human beings who interact with the Methods of the Three Heavens, the Azure Lad and the Lord of the Golden Porte preform the proper sacrifices, and in return they receive the Methods along with the oral instructions (jue 訣) required to understand them. The Most High directs the two deities to transmit these tools to human adepts in order to enlist them into the ranks of the Perfected; these human servants will aid the Three Heavens in sweeping away the violent remnants of the Six. The ritual contains the elements of a conventional transmission. The deities are ordained by a superior; they “lay out” (and presumably copy) the Methods of the Three Heavens and accompanying textual paraphernalia; and their superior commands them to continue the line of transmission.

Codes for transmission of Zhongwen linglu and Yinyang linglu [260c.5-261a.14]

If we take the text as continuous – a contentious proposition – then the Most High and the Lord of the Golden Porte received three amulets that comprise the Methods for Expelling the Six Heavens: the Lingdu wanzhuan, the Zhongshu zhenlu, and the Yinyang linglu. The Zhengfa jing continues by outlining the ritual that structures the transmission of these amulets from master to disciple in the human realm. At the beginning of the process, the student faces east. Next, master and disciple face north; the master swears an unspecified oath, then commences the transmission process. When this is finished, the student faces eastward once again, bows, and performs an incantation in which they ascend to the heavens and formally request that the Perfected King of the Nine Heavens, the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement, and the Most High bestow upon them the Methods for Expelling the Six Heavens. The purpose of these amulets, according to the petition, is to allow their bearer to command the evil spirits of the Six Heavens and ascend to personally greet the Lord of the Golden Porte. It is important to note here that the amulets the student receives are not identical to those received by the Lord of the Golden Porte and the Azure Lad: where latter receive the Lingdu wanzhuan, the Zhongshu zhenlu, and the Yinyang linglu, the former receives the Yinyang linglu and the Gathered Writs (Zhongwen 眾文). According to the Jiuwei badao, the Zhongwen – there known as the Most High (taishang 太上) Zhongwen lu – is actually a group of amulets that itself includes the Yinyang linglu. Because the latter is specifically listed as separate from the Zhongwen here, the redactors of the Zhengfa jing and the Jiuwei badao must be referring to separate lists. Such inconsistencies are a hallmark of the received text.

Instructions for use of the Santian zhengfa and Zhongwen linglu [260c.20-261a14]

Putting them aside for the present, what follows in the Zhengfa jing are instructions for the use of certain amulets: the Santian zhengfa and the Zhongwen lu (here known as the Zhongwen linglu 眾文靈錄). Again, the presence of an unspecified “Correct Methods of the Three Heavens” sounds a note of uncertainty: because different authors included different amulets in this group, we cannot be sure precisely which are intended here. Whichever they may be, the instructions for their use are as follows. Proper care requires daily veneration with incense and prostrations, culminating in a more complex ritual to be performed every nine years. Here, for the first time, we glimpse the process by which the amulets become efficacious. During the ninth year, on the taisui 太歲 day corresponding to the adept’s natal day, they are to write out the amulets in a prescribed fashion and bury them at a prescribed depth in the soil of the appropriate marchmounts.⁹⁰ The act of burial is what gives the adept control over the spirits; this is reinforced by an incantation performed at the site that restates that control, as well as asserting that heavenly figures have recorded the adept’s name in records of transcendence controlled by the Azure Lad. After three nine-year periods, the Most High will dispatch spirit-servants to welcome the practitioner to the Palace of Shangqing.

90 A person’s “natal days” (benming ri 本命日) are determined with reference to the sexagesimal cycle by which time was demarcated at the levels of day, month, and year. They occur when both the celestial stem (gan 干) and earthly branch (zhi 支) of a given day match that on which the person was born. The taisui hemerological system divides the calendar according to the five agents. Each agent is correlated with a particular stem and direction: wood with jia 甲 and the east; fire with bing 丙 and the south; earth with wu 戊 and the center; metal with geng 庚 and the west, and water with ren 壬 and the north. The stems are each combined with the branch zi 子 to form five sets of twelve days, during which the deity Taisui 太歲 and his retinue travel in the direction and to the marchmount associated with each element. On jiazi days they travel east to the eastern marchmount; bingzi days to the southern marchmount; gengzi days to the western marchmount, renzi days to the northern marchmount, and wuzi days to the central marchmount. The ritual associates benming days with taisui days in a manner that is unclear to me; the end result is that one performs the ritual every nine years, or three times per cycle of twenty-seven years. See ZHDZ 1.261a.1-14: 九年每以本命之日或太歲之日，以白素朱書文一通，詣所屬嶽，封埋之以制五嶽萬精之炁……如此二十七年合三埋之。See Zhonghua daojiao dacidian, s.v. “太歲已下神煞出遊日.” Many thanks to Professor Donald Harper for his help on this passage and for pointing me to the relevant dictionary entry.

Instructions for the use of the Zhongshu zhenlu [261a.15-261b.13]

The Zhengfa jing next details a burial ritual meant to accompany an amulet it has not yet introduced: the Perfected Writs of the Spirits of the Eight Directions [Gathered from] the Massed Texts (Zhongshu baling zhenlu 眾書八靈真籙). This amulet is known by the abbreviated title Zhongshu zhenlu later in the Zhengfa jing as well as the Jiuwei badao, and that is how I will refer to it hereafter. Despite the abrupt introduction, this section's structure and content link it to the ritual performed with the Santian zhengfa and Zhongwen linglu. As before, it must be performed on one's natal day or Taisui day every nine years for 27 years. The adept petitions the gods for the power to control spirits and is granted the Zhongshu baling zhenlu and spirit guards by the Most High after demonstrating his or her sincerity. However, A few factors distinguish it from the burial ritual that accompanies the previous amulets. First is a sacrifice of material goods that accompanies the petition. On the night of the prescribed day, the adept sets up five long, low tables, one in each of the five directions, and adorns them with incense and candles. Next, he or she lays out patterned silks and "invites" (qing 請) the talismans and accompanying text, setting them on (presumably) the central desk along with a plate of fruit and jujubes. Along with the petition, the adept presents these offerings to a group of deities and spirits: the High August of the Nine Tenuities and Eight Ways, the Thearchs of the Nine Heavens, the Yellow Woman of Glorious Mystery, the Officers of the Nine Numens, and the Supervisors of the Emissaries of the Transcendents.⁹¹ After three such sacrifices, the Most High responds by dispatching the Lord of the Golden Porte to bestow a title and spirit guards on the petitioner. A postface details the Most High's exact commands to the Lord: he is to seek out those who diligently practice the above methods – here referred to as “Upper Perfected” – and bestow the Zhongshu zhenlu upon them in order to “assist the ruler in governing according to the rule of the Three Heavens, destroying and expelling the inauspicious and evil.”⁹² In order to assume this role, the adept must fulfill three conditions: first, they must receive the earthly portion of the amulet in a transmission ceremony conducted according to certain rules; second, they must demonstrate their sincerity to the gods by the consistent performance of certain rituals. At this point they receive the heavenly half of the tally, and this prepares them for the third step: use of the talisman itself to fulfill the obligations of an Upper Perfected.

91 In the Huangting neijing jing, the Nine Tenuities are nine palaces located in various parts of the body. According to the commentary of Liangqiu zi 梁丘子 (Bai Lizhong 白履忠, fl. 722-29), "The jing 精 [i.e., refined qi] there is subtle (wei 微); thus they are called 'the Nine Tenuities.'" 精微故曰九微 See YJQQ 11.43b-44a. See also EoT, s.v. "Huangting jing." See also Patrick Carré, Le Livre de la Cour Jaune: Classique taoïste des IV-Ve siècles (Paris: Éditions du Seuil, 1999) 58, 141-42. See also Daojiao

dacidian, s.v. “九微,” though this entry does not take into account the full scope of the reference in the Huangting neijing jing. The Eight Ways (badao 八道) are the eight directions. I am unclear on the identity of the High August of the Nine Tenuities and Eight Ways (Jiuwei badao shanghuang 九微八道上皇); this may be a reference to a deity named in the Duren jing (27.7a) as the “August Elder, Venerable Spirit of the Nine Tenuities and Eight Ways” (Jiuwei badao huanglao zunshen 九微八道皇老尊神), but if so that sheds no light on his identity; the Duren jing gives no further information on the deity. The only other reference I could find to the Nine-Flowered Thearch 九華帝君 is in a Ming work, CT 1220 Daofa huiyuan 道法會元 in a talisman at 16.8a and repeated at 23.17b. The compiler gives no further information on this deity. Thus, this is probably an error for 九帝, mentioned at Jiuwei badao 6. If this is correct, then the other deity mentioned would be Huaxuan Huangnu 華玄黃女, otherwise unknown. It could be an epithet for the Mysterious Woman (xuan nu 玄女), who bequeathed several different methods to the Yellow Emperor – but this is no more than a guess. See Handian, Daojiao Dacidian, and Grand Ricci, s.v. “玄女.” According to Taiqing yuce 255b, the Nine Numens (Jiu ling 九靈) are Tiansheng 天生, Wuying, 無英, Xuanzhu 玄珠, Zhenzhong 正中, Zidan 子丹, Huihui 回回, Danyuan 丹元, Taiyuan 太淵, and Lingtong 靈童. These are bodily deities according to CT 64 Jiutian yingyuan leisheng puhua tianzun yushu baijing jizhu 九天應元雷聲普化天尊玉樞寶經集註 (which the Taiqing yuce is probably quoting), but many are also names of ingredients used in laboratory alchemy. See, e.g., Daojiao dacidian, s.v. “天生,” “玄珠.” Because the Taiqing yuce and CT 64 are both much later than the Santian zhengfa, here the Nine Numens probably refer to the Nine Heavens, with the guan 官 being unspecified officers. See Handian, s.v. “九靈,” TC, s.v. “Jiutian yingyuan leisheng puhua tianzun yushu baijing jizhu.” The Supervisors of the Emissaries of the Transcendents (Jianzhen shi 監真使) aid the adept in adding his or her name to the records of transcendence in the Qisheng xuanji (see, e.g., 7a-10b in that work).

92 輔正三天，滅除凶惡。

Employing the Zhongshu zhenlu requires the adept to perform a visualization exercise followed by an incantation. The Most High explicitly presents these actions as “accept[ing] the responsibility on behalf of the Three Heavens of aiding the lords of the realm in expelling calamities, causing the brightness of the correct Way to be disseminated, and the Six Heavens to be annihilated.”⁹³ After preparatory purifications, the adept burns incense and writes out the text and its accompanying talismans. The text mentioned here is not specified, but likely consists of instructions for the talisman’s use. This would place it in the genre of jue 訣; these were originally oral instructions delivered from master to student during a transmission ceremony that allowed the latter to properly understand and employ the text being transmitted, and without which it would be useless. (Above, we see the Most High employing jue that governed the transmission of the Santian zhengfa chu liutian zhi wen, as well as imparting jue required for their use to the Azure Lad and the Lord of the Golden Porte.) Eventually, such instructions formed an independent genre, and the word jue features in the titles of several subsidiary works meant to aid in the interpretation of more important texts.⁹⁴ In this case, the jue may have been this text itself, or the portion of it that explains the use of the Zhongshu zhenlu. Be that as it may, once the writing process is complete, the adept performs the following visualization:

93 太上告後聖君曰：凡受三天正法，當爲三天立效，佐時除凶使正道，演明六天殄滅也。

94 See, for instance, CT 1324 Dongzhen taishan basu zhenjing dengtan fuzha miaojue 洞真太上八素真經登壇符札妙訣, which details the construction of an altar for use in a ritual meant to accompany CT 426 Taishang basu zhenjing 洞真太上八素真經. 1a details the necessity of the jue to the proper use of the Basu zhenjing. Importantly, CT 1324 in this case probably constitutes a later reinterpretation of the work it is supposedly meant to accompany. See TC, s.v. “Dongzhen taishan basu zhenjing dengtan fuzha miaojue,” R 2: 432.

身正在中央，平坐北向，叩左齒三十六通，瞑目內思已身吐炁，炁化為火，光精流竟，天鬱冥焚，燒四方天下山林草木土地靈司。人民悉令蕩盡。竟天冥然無復。子遺洞達無涯，火炁都消，清炁鬱勃。上則無天，下則無地，率天以下莫不歸宗於虛無金門，玉闕，瓊宮，紫殿，羅列及已身俱在空虛之中清炁之內。

With your own body upright in the center [of the oratory], sit peacefully and face north, clack your left teeth thirty-six times, close your eyes, and envision your body emitting qi. The qi transforms into fiery light and flows brilliantly throughout all the dark quiet of the heavens, burning up all the plant life, all the local gods, all the Numinous Directors.⁹⁵ As for the people, they will all be eliminated completely. Up to the darkness of Heaven, there will be no remainder. Penetrating without margin or boundary, the fiery qi will all disappear, and pure qi will flourish. Above, there is no heaven; below, there is no earth. From heaven on down, nothing will not return to its ancestor in nothingness [passing through] the Golden Gate, Jade Porte, and Jade Palace, spreading out in the Purple Hall, together with “my” body, in the midst of vacuous emptiness, in pure qi.⁹⁶

The adept thus visualizes fire from his or her body progressively destroying the entire universe and returning it to a state of primordial purity. The incantation that follows

95 I am uncertain what function the Numinous Directors perform here. They appears as a spirit that can command numinous beasts in interlinear commentary to Dengzhen Yinjue 2.10b; as a spirit one can offend in the Siji mingke 1.16; as a spirit of the Water Bureau 水府 (TPGJ 232.6b-7a; as a spirit that can save one from destruction at 15.4 of Du Guangting's CT 616 Guangcheng ji 廣成集, and again as a spirit of the water bureau in CT 489 Jinlu jietan yi 金錄解壇儀 (ZHDZ 43.31).

96 The Golden Gate, Jade Porte, Jade Palace, and Purple Hall are all locations in the heavens according to works contemporaneous to portions of the Zhengfa jing as well as others that predate and postdate it – though some are also locations in the human body. A citation in WSBY 4.5a lists a Golden Gate Palace as the abode of the White Emperor; the color white being associated with the West since ancient times, this would place the Golden Gate in the western regions of the heavens. See Handian, s.v. “白帝.” The Golden Gate is also associated with the West in Duren jing 35.7b, which places it above the “Western Pass” (Xi guan 西關), and is located in the Northwest according to the much later CT 5 Taishang wuji zongzhen Wenchang dadong xianjing 太上無極總真文昌大洞仙經. According to WSBY 1.4a-b, the moon is located above the Golden Gate during the fourth of the twenty-four solar terms. 1.1b has the sun absorbing refined souls of the dead in the Golden Gate during Lichun 立春, the first of the twenty-four solar terms. The Jade Porte is located in the constellation Grand Tenuity (Taiwei 太微), according to CT 5 Maoshan zhi 茅山志 (14th century) 10.2a as well as 3.24 of the much earlier CT 421 Dengzhen yinjue 登真隱訣 (ca. 492-514). The Jade Palace is found in Grand Tenuity according to CT 1334 Dongzhen taishang shenhu yinwen 洞真太上神虎陰文 (ca. 317-420) 1a. Grand Tenuity is located in the South, bridging Virgo and Leo. See Edward Schafer, Pacing the Void: T'ang Approaches to the Stars (Warren, CT: Floating World Editions, 2005), 52. The phrase “Purple Hall” may be a reference to the “Purple Hall of Golden Splendor (Jinhui zidian 金輝紫殿), the residence of the Lord of the Golden Porte according to WSBY 14.9a.

summarizes the destruction, then reconstitutes the universe according to the plan of the Three Heavens:

天陽地激，三五及靈
流光極崖，竟天鬱冥
自下無外，悉還無形
六天群祆，靡有不平
太一促運，真道當行
九天有命，收攝賈生
周天徧地，莫有所停
聖皇顯蓋，控駕紫庭
推校十方，列奏玉清

By Heavenly Yang, Earth is stimulated.

The Three-and-Five exert their numinous power.⁹⁷

Flowing light [reaches] the border, [moving] throughout all the flourishing darkness of the heavens.

Below me is the all-embracing [nothingness]; everything has returned to formlessness.

Of the massed deviances of the Six Heavens, none are not pacified.

The Grand Monad pushes forward the revolution [of the heavens], and the true Way is put into practice.⁹⁸

97 The phrase “Three-and-Five” has many possible referents. Given the context, the cosmology of CT 999 Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契 fits best here. According to one interpretation of that work, the “Three-and-Five” refers to the Five Elements, which merge in order to generate the myriad phenomena. See Zhonghua daojiao dacidian, s.v. “三五;” EoT, s.v. “Zhouyi cantong qi.” A reference to the “Three-and-Five” together with yin and yang in a cosmological context can be found in Zhouyi cantong qi 2.28b-29a.

98 On the Grand Monad, see Appendix C, j. 65.

The Nine Heavens have the mandate; they control the living beings of the world⁹⁹

Throughout all the heavens and all the earth, nothing stops them.

The Sage-August displays his chariot cover, steering [his carriage] to the Purple Court.¹⁰⁰

Reflecting and examining [everything in] the Ten Directions, he enumerates [them] in a memorial to the [emperor dwelling in] Jade Clarity.¹⁰¹

Acting as an agent of the Three Heavens, the adept visualizes their body emanating fiery qi that destroys the universe. When the Grand Monad passes control from the Six Heavens to the Three, the world is reconstituted according to the plan of the Three Heavens. The Sage-August then goes on a tour of inspection, returning to the Purple Court and preparing a memorial to the emperor dwelling in Jade Clarity – himself too important to enter the mortal realm – that informs him of the goings-on in the reformed world.

Worthy of note is that incantation – known in the Zhengfa jing as the Incantation of the Nine Heavens – is discussed in much the same way as the Zhongshu zhenlu, which is not an incantation but an amulet. We learn that the Most High bestowed it upon the 99 Read 界 for 賈. Given the reference to the Nine Heavens at the beginning of the Zhengfa jing, the incantation as it appears here probably intends to stress the Three Heavens' dominance over their lesser counterparts; because the Three are masters of the Nine, when the Nine Heavens have the mandate, it is the Three that direct them.

100 The Sage-August (Sheng huang 聖皇) is an epithet for the earthly emperor. His identity here is unclear, but given his position below that of the emperor of Jade Clarity, he cannot play a role of similar importance here. The term probably refers either to the Lord of the Golden Porte or one of the many subsidiary emperors already discussed in the Zhengfa jing. Given that he returns to the Purple Court – a palace in the Big Dipper – this may be the Emperor of the North. Elsewhere, the Purple Court is associated with the East; see the Dance Song of White Ramie (Baizhu wuge shi 白紵舞歌詩), in Song Shu 22.24b-26a.

101 The “Emperor dwelling in Jade Clarity” is the Celestial Worthy of Original Commencement (Yuanshi tianzun 元始天尊) according to Tao Hongjing's Zhenling weiye tu. This itself is evidence of later modification of that work, as the Celestial Worthy is the primary deity of the Lingbao pantheon. See EoT, s.v. “Zhenling weiye tu.”

Sage Lord of the Golden Porte for the purpose of commanding the Six Heavens and the spirits under their control; that its earthly bearers are responsible for assisting in this process; and that they will be numbered among the Perfected and transcendents as reward for their diligence. The postface to the burial ritual for the Zhongshu zhenlu gives the same transmission history and purpose for the amulets, as well as the same responsibilities and rewards to their human wielders.

Citations from the Siji minkge [262a.1 – 262b.9]

After the Incantation of the Nine Heavens, the Zhengfa jing abruptly transitions to a concern with ritual purity applied to an unspecified set of amulets called the “Santian zhengfa” and the “True Writs (Zhenwen 真文).” Purity is maintained by upholding five prohibitions related to the amulets. The text leaves little hint as to what the original author of this section might have originally placed in this group, but the separation between the True Writs and the Santian zhengfa is evident: each prohibition begins with either “All those who receive the Santian zhengfa,” or “All those who receive the Santian zhengfa and wear the True Writs.”¹⁰² There are many possible referents for the term “True Writs;” within the Zhengfa jing and the Jiuwei badao alone, there are three amulets whose names contain the phrase, and this fails to consider another incredibly popular text of the period that circulated separately.¹⁰³ Whatever the exact identity of the True Writs, they are subject to the same prohibitions that apply to the Santian zhengfa.

102 凡受三天正法; 凡受三天正法佩帶真文

103 I refer here to the Perfected Script in Five Tablets (Wupian zhenwen 五篇真文), preserved in the Daoist canon as CT 22 Yuanshi Wulao hishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing 元始五老赤書玉篇真文天書經). See TC, s.v. “Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing,” “Taishang donxuan lingbao chishu yujue miaoqing.”

The Zhengfa jing details both these prohibitions and the penalties that accrue to those who fail. The text claims the penalties and prohibitions are extracted from the Bright Statutes of the Four Poles (Siji mingke 四極明科), which has come down to us as CT 184 Taizhen Yudi siji mingke jing 太真玉帝四極明科經, The Bright Statutes of the Four Poles of the Jade Emperor of Grand Perfection. CT 184 does indeed contain these five prohibitions, but they differ in important ways from their equivalents in the Zhengfa jing (differences whose discussion must be put off for the moment). The first of the five concerns cleanliness: those who wear the Santian zhengfa must keep their bodies and clothes clean. The second prohibition requires the wearer to avoid the impurities surrounding death and funerals, refraining even from paying their condolences during the funeral itself.¹⁰⁴ The third prohibition concerns dress: when asleep or when performing a certain internal meditation exercise, one must take care not to reveal the head or body. The fourth concerns association: fraternizing with unspecified “experts in Yin ways” (Yin jia 陰家) and “persons whose outward qi is not the same” (外氣不同之人) will be penalized by otherworldly authorities. The final prohibition is a general injunction not to transgress unspecified precepts – presumably those enumerated above, as well as others in a book of statutes (some version of the Siji mingke?) the editor of the Zhengfa jing expected adepts to have at hand. The penalties for transgressing each prohibition are similar. At the least, the practitioner will have lose their rank among the Perfected; other ill effects include desertion by spirit guards, attack by malevolent entities, reduction in lifespan, and judicial torture by infernal officials. This emphasis on pain and punishment is counterbalanced in the next section by promises of the benefits that will accrue to those who keep the prohibitions.

104 Customs surrounding death and burial in early medieval China were elaborate. See, e.g., Wendy Swartz et al., eds., Early Medieval China: A Sourcebook (New York: Columbia University Press, 2014), 70-71, 119-120

Amulets and their transmission [262b.10 – 263a.2]

What follows in the Zhengfa jing is a list of spirit guards (and occasionally powers) that accompany various amulets. The general format of each entry follows the first:

得佩蓬萊高上真書者，給玉童十二人侍衛佩者身。

I will give those who receive and wear the Exalted Perfected Book of Penglai¹⁰⁵ twelve jade lads to guard them.

The list comprises eleven amulets in total. Two – the Zhongshu zhenlu and the Lingdu wanzhuan – we have seen before. However, the others have not been introduced, and one amulet that receives extensive discussion in earlier portions of the text – the Yinyang linglu – is missing. Compounding the confusion, the majority of these amulets also appear in the Jiuwei badao, but some do not; meanwhile, other amulets listed in the Jiuwei badao do not appear here. I discuss each amulet in detail in Appendix F. For now I note that one amulet in particular receives special attention. This is the Zhongshu zhenlu, known here as the Zhenshu zhonglu. 265c.5-11 reads:

太上告後聖君曰：諸有骨分，名書東華錄字，上清得佩真書衆籙，即給玉童玉女侍衛已身，記功明善，糾禁漏泄。佩者不得妄傳，傳非其人，不依年限。輕泄寶文，身被風刀之考，沒命鬼官殃及七玄祖父運蒙山之石塞，九源之河深，慎奉行。

The Most High told the Lord of the Golden Porte: All those who have lot [lodged] in their bones, whose names are inscribed in the [Records of] Eastern Florescence, recorded in the lists of Shangqing, who wear the Zhenshu zhonglu, are given jade lads and jade maidens to guard them and record their merits and shine a light on their good deeds, and who watch over them and prohibit them from divulging [the talisman improperly]. Those who wear the talisman must not heedlessly transmit them. If it is transmitted to an inappropriate person, [the bearer] will not live out their allotted years. If one rashly divulges the precious writ, their body will suffer the trial of wind and swords. When they die, they [will become] ghost-officials and disaster will extend to seven generations of their descendants, and their progenitors will be assigned to move the rocks of Mt. Meng and stop up the rivers of the Nine Springs.¹⁰⁶ Diligently practice this!

¹⁰⁵ Penglai is a legendary mountain and abode of transcendents in the Eastern Sea.

Breaking from the common formula, the entry on the Zhenshu zhonglu records not only that the bearer of the amulet receives spirit guards, but notes the prerequisites for its transmission; reminds the reader that spiritual attendants monitor the adept's behavior in addition to guarding them (something that is only implied in the other entries); and provides injunctions against improper transmission. Much of this information would have been common knowledge for a contemporary reader, and in any case is stated elsewhere in the Zhengfa jing: we know from the Most High's speech to the Azure Lad (in 251b.14-21) that those who receive the Zhongshu zhenlu must have the proper fate lodged in their bones, and the earlier citation of the Siji mingke (252b.5-9) reminds the reader that spirit guards report on the conduct of those they protect. Finally, the Zhengfa jing closes in the next section with rules for its proper transmission and warnings of the punishments that befall those who fail to follow them. This format is typical – indeed, the Jiuwei badao is structured in this way – and so there should be no need to introduce an injunction that focuses only on one amulet so close to a postface that encompasses the entire text and every amulet therein. As we have seen, such strange stylistic choices permeate the Zhengfa jing, and so – odd as they may be – it should be no surprise to find more of them.

106 A similar admonition against reckless transmission occurs in YJQQ 4.18b: 若不依科而傳，罪延七祖，父母充責鬼官，運蒙山之石，填積夜之河，萬劫還生非人之道，已身被風刀之考。 “If you do not follow the regulations and yet transmit [the text], the fault will extend to seven generations of your ancestors. Your father and mother will fill the duty of the ghost-officials, moving the rocks of Mt. Meng to block the rivers of night; after ten thousand kalpas they will return to life in a path of nonhumans.” The Nine Springs are the waters of the netherworld.

The Daoist Canon and the history of the “Rectifying Methods”

There is little scholarship on the Rectifying Methods. What there is mostly focuses on the work’s origin and evolution, with the “final version” assumed to be that found in the Daoist Canon. Begun during the reign of the Yongle 永樂 Emperor (r. 1403-24) and finally published in 1445, the Daoist canon of the Ming 明 Dynasty (1368-1644) is the main source for all Daoist studies scholarship.¹⁰⁷ The assumption that the version included there marks the definitive end of the text’s use and development cuts off a few interesting avenues of inquiry. First, by adopting the standpoint of the editors of the Daoist Canon, scholars silently accept the political circumstances surrounding its compilation. While this hermeneutic simplifies study, it comes at a great cost. Canons, it need not be said, do not occur naturally. They are the end points (and often not even that) of a great degree of struggle. Official recognition (whether by a local community, a larger ecclesiastical body, or an imperial government) is a highly sought-after commodity, and so different actors (whether factions or individuals) have a great deal at stake in getting their own particular versions or interpretations of works accepted as “authoritative.” We have already seen an example of the fallout from this process: a prominent theory concerning the origin of the Nag Hammadi codices holds that they were buried to escape censure at the hands of representatives of newly-forming orthodoxy, who had decided such books were not fit for inclusion in the emerging New Testament canon.¹⁰⁸ Similarly,

¹⁰⁷ It is also the heart of modern editions of the Canon. These supplement, expand and improve upon it while introducing additional errors. For an introduction to editions of the Daoist Canon, see EoT, s.v. “Daozang and subsidiary compilations.”

¹⁰⁸ To take only one example of canon formation, the canonization of the “orthodox” New Testament has been the focus of much debate in Biblical studies. The first list that corresponds to today’s most widely-accepted 27 books appears in 367 CE. See Bart Ehrman, After the New Testament: A Reader in Early Christianity (New York: Oxford University Press, 1999). This was the Festal Letter of Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria. It was only one of many ancient lists, and was ignored or disputed the arrangement of the modern Daoist canon is a relic of the imperial politics surrounding the compilation of a predecessor to the Ming canon first printed in 1190. The work that claims pride of place there is at once a paean to the then-reigning emperor and a tool to ward off a northern invasion.¹⁰⁹ Twelfth century Chinese politics or fourth century debates among sectarian Christians may have lost all relevance in current times, but such contingencies have left their marks on the materials we study. Our materials may present themselves as pure and homogeneous, but that does not mean scholars have to take them at their word.

A second problem with taking the Ming canon's version of the Rectifying Methods as the final word on the matter is that this is simply not the case. Although my analysis stops at the end of the early medieval period (that is, ca. 589 CE), a few examples contemporary and subsequent to the Daoist canon's compilation in 1445 suffice to show that non-canonical versions of the text remained of interest. A quotation from one such version is found in the Secret Essentials of the Most High (Wushang biyao 無上祕要), a sixth-century compendium of Daoist literature. If the Ming version of the Most High Scripture had been universally considered definitive, one would expect subsequent quotations of the version found in the Secret Essentials to be marked as spurious because they contain material not found in the Ming text. This is not the case, however. Two Ming by some Christian communities. The exact composition of the New Testament is disputed among different Christian denominations today. For a concise explanation of the New Testament's formation and its relationship to the Hebrew Bible, see Bruce M. Metzger, The Canon of the New Testament: Its Origin, Development, and Significance (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1987), 1-7. A more recent discussion is Edmon L. Gallagher and John D. Meade, The Biblical Canon Lists from Early Christianity: Texts and Analysis (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2017). See also the review in Reading Religion at <http://readingreligion.org/books/biblical-canon-lists-early-christianity>.

109 See Michel Strickmann, "The Longest Taoist Scripture," in History of Religions 17, no. 3/4 (1978): 350-351.

works, the Book of Ancient Subtleties and the Record of Mount Tianzhong (comp. 1550) cite the Secret Essentials version of the Rectifying Methods without any indication they doubted its authenticity. The version in the Ming canon thus emerges as one among many. Despite its official status, contemporary and subsequent authors felt free to ignore it. The studies consulted below should be read with this caveat in mind.

Previous scholarship on the “Rectifying Methods”

Detailed discussions of the work are rare, though numerous notes exist scattered throughout other scholarship.¹¹⁰ I was unable to find any reference to the Rectifying Methods in the first major study of the Daoist Canon, Chen Guofu’s 陈国符 mammoth Origins and Evolution of the Daoist Canon (Daozang yuanliu kao 道藏源流考).¹¹¹

Below, I will restrict myself to works that discuss the Rectifying Methods at length. What follows contains a welter of intertextual references. Because matters of detailed dating are primarily of interest to specialists, I will introduce the works that follow without comment, employing standard sinological conventions. More detailed introductions to important texts referenced here will appear in following chapters and the appendices.

Nonspecialists should feel free to consult my summary at the end. Note that my Japanese 110 See, for instance, Wang Zongyu, “Daojiao zhi ‘liutian’ zhi shuo” [The theory of the “Six Heavens” in Daoism], Daojiao wenhua yanjiu 16 (1996): 33 n. 2. Wang’s article is concerned overall with the theory of the Six Heavens. While the Rectifying Methods deals with this concept at length, Wang refers to the work itself only in passing. Similarly, Ren Jiyu, ed., Daozang tiyao [A Summary of the Daoist Canon] (Beijing: Zhongguo shehui kexue chubanshe, 1991) aims to provide short summaries of every work in the Ming canon. Its entry on the Rectifying Methods (on p. 949) only devotes a few sentences to the work’s textual history.

111 Beijing: Zhonghua shuju, 1963.

is limited to reading proficiency with heavy reference to a dictionary. This makes extended engagement with Japanese scholarship difficult.

Ozaki Masaharu

The first detailed study of the Rectifying Methods is an article by Ozaki Masaharu 尾崎正治 published in 1973. Ozaki compares the received Zhengfa jing with citations found in six different sources: Laughing at the Dao (Xiaodao lun 笑道論, preserved in T 3102 Guang Hongming ji 廣弘明集); the Pearl Satchel of the Three Caverns (CT 1139 Sandong zhunang 三洞珠囊); the True Appearances of the Categories [Pertaining to] the Dao of the Highest Purity (CT 1132 Shangqing dao leishi xiang 上清道類事相); the Seven Lots from the Bookbag of the Clouds (CT 1032 Yunji qiqian 雲笈七籤); the Taiping Yulan, and the Veritable Facts Concerning the True Lord Investigator of the Taiping Xingguo Temple on Mount Lu (CT 1286 Lushan Taiping xingguo gong Caifang zhenjun shishi 廬山太平興國宮採訪真君事實), as well as citations of other works within the canonical Zhengfa jing. The most important of these is the Bright Statutes of the Four Poles (Siji mingke 四極明科), which has come down to us as The Bright Statues of the Four Poles of the Jade Emperor of Grand Perfection (CT 184 Taizhen Yudi siji mingke jing 太真玉帝四極明科經). Dividing the present Zhengfa jing into two parts, the author concludes that the germ of the text is the first half of the present Taishang santian zhengfa jing (running to page 5 of the Hanfenlou 涵芬樓 edition). This, she claims, is cited in the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu 上清大洞真經目 under the title

Shangqing chu liutian wen santian zhengfa 上清除六天文三天正法.¹¹² The very end of the received text, which Ozaki calls the Liutian wen santian shangzhen zhengfa 六天文三天上真正法, was a supplement added between the Liu-Song 劉宋 (420-479) and the Southern Qi 南齊 (479-502). Further additions were made through the Sui 隋 (581-618) and the Tang 唐 (618-907).¹¹³

Ozaki's conclusion is sound in its outline but implausible in its details. As noted by Robinet (see below), the analysis is incomplete. The author considers only the present Zhengfa jing (CT 1203), but not the collection of amulets that probably formed an integral part of the original work (CT 1395, discussed in Appendix F; I refer to it in this chapter as the Jiuwei badao). As will be shown below, other students of the Rectifying Methods are unified in asserting that CT 1203 and CT 1395 originally constituted a single work. Further, I find persuasive Robinet's argument for the later dating of what, for Ozaki, forms the germ of the original text. Finally, I am persuaded by Robinet's conclusions on the general course of development of Shangqing texts (on both, see below).

Isabelle Robinet

Isabelle Robinet made a brief but thorough study of the Rectifying Methods as part of her effort to reconstruct the original Shangqing corpus as revealed to Yang Xi.¹¹⁴ She presents the following information on the work: its title and a summary that situates it in the context of contemporary Daoism; mentions throughout the Daoist canon of the work under various titles; citations of the work (again, under various titles) within and without the canon; comments on the authenticity of different parts of the work; a more detailed summary of the work that provides some justification for her conclusions regarding the dates of the different parts; and some concluding remarks. Based on this data, she concludes that the present Rectifying Methods (comprising both CT 1203 and CT 1395; cf. Ozaki, above) is a skilled imitation of earlier Shangqing works that postdates slightly the original revelations. She dates CT 1395 to the late fourth or early fifth century, and CT 1203 to the seventh century (at the earliest); she thus adopts roughly the same periodization as Ozaki after a much more detailed investigation. She is hesitant, however, to include the work among the original Shangqing revelations despite its inclusion in the list of Zhen'gao 5.2.

112 The Dadong zhenjing mu is preserved in CT 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 洞玄靈寶三洞奉道科戒營始. See TC, s.v. "Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi."

113 Ozaki Masaharu, "Taijō santen seihō kyō seiritsu kō," Tōhō shūkyō 43 (1974): 13-29

114 Robinet, La révélation du Shangqing dans l'histoire du Taoïsme. 2 vols. Paris: École Française d'Extrême-Orient, 1984. See 2: 87-91 on the Rectifying Methods. She summarizes her findings in TC, s.v. "Taishang santian zhengfa jing" and "Shangqing dadong jiuwei badao dajing miaolu." See TC 1: 587-588, 602, especially for her dating of CT 1203 and CT 1395.

For Robinet, some of the most concrete evidence for the Rectifying Methods' later date include three features of the present work. The first is the quotation from the Sijimingke, which postdates the original revelations. The second feature concerns two figures in the work: a higher deity called the Most High Lord of the Dao (Taishang Daojun 太上道君; that is, the deified Laozi), and a pupil called the Lord of the Golden Porte. In several discrete segments of the work, the Most High Lord imparts specific knowledge to the Lord of the Golden Porte. This is a common trope throughout the Shangqing corpus, but Robinet takes it as unique to works that postdate the original revelations. Finally, the present version of the Rectifying Methods makes reference to three particular qi: "Mystic"

(xuan 玄), “Primal,” (yuan 元) and “Inaugural” (she 始), each corresponding to a different stage in the progressive unfolding of the cosmos. These three qi are ubiquitous in texts belonging to the earlier Way of the Celestial Masters (Tianshi dao 天師道), but do not appear in members of the original Shangqing revelations. Another of Robinet’s criteria is formal: the choppieness and brevity of the current Rectifying Methods do not seem to indicate a complete work. Further, many of the citations of a Rectifying Methods found elsewhere in the Daoist canon (and without) conform to the style and tone of the received Methods, but are not included there. This suggests, for her, that at some point they were extracted from the text.

However, she notes that several features of the Rectifying Methods do in fact argue for its inclusion among early (if not the earliest) Shangqing texts. One is the agreement between citations in the WSBY and the received version of the Jiuwei badao. Another is the verses on page 4a-b (of the Hanfenlou edition), which fits the style of other Shangqing poems. She thus posits two major versions of the Most High Scripture. The first, preserved in citations from the YJQQ, WSBY, and SDZN, is most likely a significant portion of the work as revealed to Yang Xi. What we have in the received Jiuwei badao and Zhengfa jing are the remains of this work, mixed with a good deal of material inserted later by authors sympathetic to the Celestial Masters. The original work was probably a collection of apocalyptic predictions along with charms and talismans that helped one avoid the unpleasant fates met by so many during the chaos of the Northern and Southern Dynasties periods.

Robinet is well-respected as one of the twentieth century's finest scholars of Daoism, and her work here shows why. Close examination of the material she has collected, supplemented by the use of searchable databases, confirms her suspicions. The Rectifying Methods in its original form was probably a collection of talismans, charms, and apocalyptic predictions that was later pieced out for various purposes. What the databases tell us cements the relationship between the Rectifying Methods (as preserved in the Zhengfa jing and Jiuwei badao) and the early Shangqing corpus. The amulets in the Jiuwei badao and the Zhengfa jing link the Most High Scripture very closely with two other members of the original Shangqing corpus. While she notes where these amulets occur in specific quotations of the Rectifying Methods, searching for these amulets outside the confines of any title similar to that of the Zhengfa jing confirms this link (see Appendix F). Further, one of the few citations of the Zhengfa jing she missed fits strongly with the original Shangqing corpus in exactly the ways she adduces. Finally, I am less reticent than she to include some version of the Most High Scripture to the early Shangqing revelations based on a similar title in Zhen'gao 5.2.

Kobayashi Masayoshi

The first lengthy study of the Rectifying Methods appears in Kobayashi Masayoshi's 小林正美 Research into the History of Six Dynasties Daoism.¹¹⁵ He is concerned chiefly with the “original form” of the work, which he includes among the original Shangqing revelations based on its inclusion in Zhen'gao 5.2. His reasoning relies on a detailed parsing of the different names of the work as they occur in different sources: the Zhen'gao, the Dadong zhenjing mu, the WSBY, the SDZN, the YJQQ, the XDL, and the Preface to the Lingbao Scriptures (Lingbao jingmu xu 靈寶經目序, preserved in YJQQ 4.4a-6a). He confidently dates the work to between 364 and 371 (the period of the Shangqing revelations) based on the presence of a 《除六天之文三天正法》 at ZG 5.2. However, the evidence within that passage strongly suggests that Yang Xi did not himself compose the scripture; rather, he took up and modified a work that already existed. This is so for two reasons. First, the relevant section of ZG 5.2 marks the 《除六天之文三天正法》 as “within the world” 在世, indicating that it was already in existence. Second, that section concludes by noting that the work is a jing. This likely indicates that the work had acquired a large body of supplementary material (koujue, fa, etc.) by the time Yang inherited it.

¹¹⁵ Rikuchō Dōkyōshi kenkyū 六朝道教史研究, Tokyo: Sōbunsha, 1990. It later appeared in Chinese as Liuchao daojiao shi yanjiu 六朝道教史研究, trans. Li Qing 李庆 (Chengdu: Sichuan renmin chubanshe 人民, 2001). The paragraphs that follow refer to pp. 412-418 of Li's translation.

Kobayashi runs into more trouble when he equates the 《除六天之文三天正法》 of ZG 5.2 with a certain 《上清太上三天正法除六天文錄》 preserved in the Dadong zhenjing mu (412-413). As Robinet notes, the Zhenjing mu also contains works that are posterior to the Shangqing revelations, indicating that work was revised over time. This means it should be used with caution when judging the authenticity of a Shangqing work that claims to be early. He also omits the fact that no work by a similar name is mentioned in any of the ancient bibliographies of Shangqing texts except the Basu jing (see Appendix B). While this does not necessarily mean some form of the Rectifying Methods was not early (as I will show below), it still deserves consideration.

Kobayashi also assumes that several works listed under different titles in the WSBY are in fact the same work. In many circumstances, this is a perfectly acceptable inference: different works are referred to by the same author by different titles (sometimes within the same work). But the WSBY must be used with care in this regard. As Stephen Bokenkamp has shown, it was altered by its editors (and perhaps subsequently), and so the quotations it contains do not necessarily reflect the versions the authors held in their hands.¹¹⁶ This does not diminish its value as a resource – only its reliability as a window onto the specific versions of the works it quotes that were available to its editors.

Kobayashi next claims that a passage from the 《上清三天正法經》 quoted in YJQQ 2.4 is the same as a passage from SDZN 9, which quotes a text by the same title. This is substantially true, though there are several minor differences between the text of the two entries (e.g., character variants, changes in word order, insertions and deletions). However, another passage in the YJQQ suggests the editors of the two compilations were not consulting the same version. YJQQ 21.1a quotes a 《三天正法經》, but the passage resembles neither the citation from YJQQ 2 nor SDZN 9. The latter two concern the cycles of time; YJQQ 21.1a concerns the formation of the gods. It reads like much shorter version of the beginning of the received Zhengfa jing – one that mixes the main text with the Azure Lad's commentary and excises his explanation of how the Three Heavens formed. These differences, combined with the many minor variations between YJQQ 2 and SDZN 9, raise the possibility that the YJQQ's editors were consulting a different version of the text. But that is a question for another time. Of more pressing import is Kobayashi's claim, made in the same paragraph, that WSBY 6 and SDZN 9 are the same. This is simply untrue; I discuss the differences extensively below.

¹¹⁶ Bokenkamp, "Research Note: Buddhism in the Writings of Tao Hongjing," Daoism: Religion, History, and Society 6 (2014): 267.

Kobayashi next claims that the text of YJQQ 21 and the opening of the received Zhengfa jing “are basically the same (基本是同樣文字). This, again, is untrue. He compounds the problem by asserting that 《三天正法經》 is simply an abbreviated form of 《上清三天正法經》, and because of this, the present Zhengfa jing must have contained material from the 《上清三天正法經》. He adduces as proof the fact that YJQQ 22b, 《釋除六天玉文三天正法》 and the received Zhengfa jing are the same. This, too, is incorrect. One assumes, then, that by his reasoning the editors of the YJQQ, WSBY, and SDZN were consulting the same version – and that he believes he has shown there is significant similarity between this version and the received Zhengfa jing. Some of these conclusions hold, but many are suspect.

The portion of Research devoted to the Rectifying Methods continues in this vein. Kobayashi's extensive acquaintance with the Daoist canon allows him to marshal a wide variety of sources to support his claims. Unfortunately, he sometimes reads these sources in too little detail. Moreover, he shows a willingness to assume that two works with a similar title must be the same or share similar contents. While this is true in many circumstances, the principle must be applied with caution; appealing to it too frequently can result in significant details going unnoticed.

Ōfuchi Ninji

Ōfuchi Ninji 大淵忍爾 devotes a few short pages of his Religious Taoism and its Scriptures to the Zhengfa jing.¹¹⁷ Based on its presence in Zhen'gao 5.2 and its numerous citations in early Daoist texts (especially the WSBY), he feels strongly that it formed part of the early Shangqing corpus. Based on citations of a 《三天正法經》 in the WSBY and other texts, there must have been a different, lost edition. It is extremely doubtful that these two editions – the lost edition and the present Zhengfa jing – were the same work; rather, the citations in the Daozang edition of the WSBY and other works seem to belong to a commentary meant to accompany the older edition of the Zhengfa jing. The received Zhengfa jing came together after the time of Wang Lingqi, probably during the century before the compilation of the five-juan edition of the Siji mingke. The version of the Zhengfa jing in which the citation of the Siji mingke appears probably came to be during or after the compilation of the five-juan edition of the Siji mingke, being added to the work by people who venerated the Zhengfa jing.

Ōfuchi's work leaves several questions unanswered. First, what is the relationship between the Zhengfa jing and the Jiuwei badao? Though he discusses some amulets that feature in both texts (see p. 423), he does not devote any attention to the Jiuwei badao itself. Given the extensive intertextual links between the two, it is surely the case that the two works shared a common or at least related course of development. The information he marshals strongly suggests an early date for the Zhengfa jing itself – what, then, of the Jiuwei badao?

117 道教とその經典. Tokyo: Sōbunsha, 1997. Pp. 419-425 concern the Rectifying Methods.

Wang Haoyue

The most recent work on the Rectifying Methods has been done by Wang Haoyue 王皓月.¹¹⁸ He comes to the conclusion, again based on Zhen'gao 5.2, that some work called the 《除六天之文三天正法》 formed part of the original Shangqing revelations. For Wang, this did not constitute a jing proper; it was only over time it became different versions of the 《三天正法經》 referred to so many times throughout the canon. The original 《除六天之文三天正法》 was in fact written by Xu Mi, who controlled Yang Xi; this is the 《上清三天正法》 of YJQQ 4.2, which records a Xu son receiving the work from Yang Xi.¹¹⁹ By the time it became a jing, it had become collection of apocalyptic predictions and apotropaic amulets; the amulets were relatively stable, but the content of the predictions varied over time according to the needs of the work's authors. The changes eventually resulted in three different versions of the Rectifying Methods (71-72, 74).

The first and earliest is the 《洞真三天正法經》 referred to in WSBY. This can be reconstructed via quotations in WSBY 6, 22, 31, 32, 43, and 65 as well as a later fragment called the 《三天正法除六天玉文》 (hereafter Jade Writ), which is similar in content to WSBY. This version is marked as earliest by its use of the phrase “The Dao said...” (Dao yue 道曰), because the earliest form of the text had the Azure Lad recording the Most High Lord of the Dao teaching the Lord of the Golden Porte – that is, Wang equates “The Dao said...” with the present Zhengfa jing's “The Most High Lord of the 118 See “Santian zhengfa jing de chengshu he yanbian,” Shijie zongjiao wenhua (August 2013): 71-77.

119 Wang considers the 《曲素鳳文》 a separate text.

Dao told the Lord of the Golden Porte...” The first half of the 《洞真三天正法經》 concerned the revolutions of the kalpas, with the second half comprising the talismans recorded in the Jiuwei badao. This version is closest to the 《除六天之文三天正法》 revealed to Yang Xi.

The second version is the 《上清三天正法經》. This was a revised version of the Rectifying Methods rewritten by Celestial Master Daoists some time before Lu Xiuqing composed the Preface to the Lingbao Scriptures, and it is preserved in citations in SDZN 9 and one section in YJQQ 2. In this version, to the “turnings of the kalpas” portion of the original text was added predictions that augured the rise of Liu Yu. These predictions were rewritten versions of predictions that appeared in the original, which concerned the advent of the Lord of the Golden Porte; instead, they became about Liu Yu, who (the work now foretold) would pacify the disorders plaguing the realm. This forms part of a set with the Inner Explanations of the Three Heavens (on which, see Bokenkamp’s entry in EDS). The two works partook of a common eschatology whereby the Six Heavens replaced the Three, and along with the appearance of the Lingbao scriptures, they were supposed to confirm that Liu Yu had the mandate as part of this process. This version was chopped up after the Liu-Song fell, with the Dajing miaolu becoming a separate, self-contained work.

The third version is the received Rectifying Methods. The editors of this text removed portions of the first version where the Dao spoke, instead claiming the Azure Lad compiled the text, with a separate deity known as the Upper Minister, Lord Azure Lad (Shangxiang qingtong jun 上相青童君) writing a preface. This version integrates content from Siji mingke and gives instructions on how to use the Correct Methods of the Three Heavens. It de-emphasizes the content on the turning of the kalpas and removes content on Liu Yu. Because this final version of the work contains info on how to use the talismans found in the in Dajing miaolu as well as information on why these amulets are efficacious, it was reinterpreted as oral instructions (jue) meant to accompany that text.

With the exception of Robinet, Wang provides the most detailed analysis of the Rectifying Methods. He engages both the Zhengfa jing and the Jiuwei badao, as well as tracing allusions to individual amulets elsewhere in the Daoist canon. Further, he goes beyond Robinet in places: where Robinet merely notes that extant citations of a Santian zhengfa jing do not match the received version, Wang explores these differences and their implications for the evolution of the work. By de-centering the received version, his approach allows for more insight into changes in the work over time; paradoxically, this helps us better understand the Rectifying Methods as we have it today. However, a lack of attention to detail, combined with some faulty assumptions and insufficiently supported inferences, makes some of his methods suspect. His attribution of the earliest version of the Most High Scripture to Xu Mi is unwarranted. While there is no question that – given the power differential between them – Yang’s revelations would have been tailored somewhat to Xu’s needs, existing evidence shows that the relationship between the two was much more complex than Wang realizes. Stephen Bokenkamp, in Ancestors and Anxiety, details a give-and-take between Yang’s spiritual informants and the Xu clan that fits ill with Wang’s absolute domination of Yang by Xu Mi.¹²⁰ Wang’s picture of the initial stages of the Rectifying Methods’ evolution is also questionable. While he astutely uses ¹²⁰ See Bokenkamp, Ancestors 135-136.

ZG 5 to date an early form of the Rectifying Methods, he overlooks an important part of it. The list of works contained in ZG 5.2 (which provides the earliest evidence of the Most High Scripture) concludes by noting that every text in the list has already become a jing; thus, it cannot be the case that the work revealed to Yang Xi was merely a method (fa) that only later became a jing.

There are also problems with the formal changes in his postulated Rectifying Methods. While he is no doubt correct that it contained both apocalyptic predictions and apotropaic amulets, and that the predictions changed over time, it is not the case that the amulets remained stable. He notes that some of the amulets in the Jiuwei badao also appear elsewhere in quotations from the Most High Scripture that also include amulets absent from the present version. He attributes these quotations to a lost version of the work that had little influence; however, he fails to note that the powers therein often differ from those the amulets possess in the received Jiuwei badao. Further, even the received Zhengfa jing and Jiuwei badao are inconsistent in the powers they attribute to the amulets: the Zhengfa jing has them almost exclusively providing spirit guards, while the Jiuwei badao also lists other powers as well as different numbers of spirit guards. Finally, the same amulets often appear in works that do not cite the Rectifying Methods, where they have different powers and different transmission histories. Clearly the amulets possessed a life of their own before they were incorporated into the Rectifying Methods, and were afterwards excerpted from different versions that work by authors who had their own interests.

Finally, each of his postulated versions of the Rectifying Methods has various problems. He assumes his first version (the 《洞真三天正法經》) is closest to the work cited in ZG 5.2 because it contains the phrase “The Dao said...” which he maintains is a different form of the formula “The Most High Lord of the Dao instructed the Lord of the Golden Porte.” There are two issues here. First, he cites no evidence to support the link between the two. Second, Robinet has claimed, after extensive study, that the formula he invokes is in fact never used in early Shangqing works. While she may of course be incorrect, work of her caliber deserves engagement. He claims his second version was a form of the Rectifying Methods revised by Celestial Master Daoists and taken up by Lu Xiuqing, but cites no evidence to indicate the version cited by Lu Xiuqing was anything but Lu’s own creation. It is much simpler to assume (as Stephen Bokenkamp has already postulated) that Lu is simply selectively quoting the version of the Most High Scripture recorded in the SDZN, or even that Lu is consulting a different version entirely. While Wang’s hypothesis is of course possible, in the absence of evidence Occam’s Razor suggests otherwise.

That being said, his overall conclusions are sound. The version Lu presented to the throne in 437 was probably a revision of the earlier work; it almost certainly was meant to harmonize with the Inner Explanations; and astute later editors would have certainly removed the references to Liu Yu. Further, the Dajing miaolu and the Zhengfa jing were eventually split up; there is no reason to suppose it could not have happened in the way Wang claims. His third version is plausible, but only in part. If the present Zhengfa jing was intended as oral instructions for the Dajing miaolu, why do the two provide different powers for the amulets? Why does the Zhengfa jing provide explicit instructions only for a few of the amulets mentioned in the Dajing miaolu? And why do so many amulets in the Dajing miaolu receive no mention in the Zhengfa jing? Clearly if the Zhengfa jing is meant to aid the practitioner in the use of the Dajing miaolu, the two works have undergone modification.

I will advance my own vision for the development of the Rectifying Methods in the following chapters. Briefly: Some work with a title similar to that of the Rectifying Methods existed at the time of Yang Xi and had already acquired a body of supplementary material large enough that it was called a jing. We know this because Tao Hongjing possessed an autograph version of Zhen'gao 5 that attests to both facts. But that is all we can know about the work: anything beyond the barest contours is beyond our knowledge. We can, however, reconstruct the Shangqing version of the Rectifying Methods that, like Wang's reconstruction, provides a useful starting point for later reworkings. Based on extant quotations in the XDL, WSBY, and SDZN, and our general knowledge of Shangqing eschatology, I hypothesize that the 《除六天之文三天正法》 as transmitted to Yang Xi was a collection of apocalyptic predictions, hymns, and apotropaic amulets and chants. The work's purpose was to foretell the end times and help adepts escape the eschaton by requiring spirits to inscribe their name in certain celestial records. This version was reworked several times. The first revision kept the talismans and methods but sharpened the urgency of the original's apocalyptic predictions by inserting direct references to Liu Yu. This is similar to Lu Xiuqing's version, and forms part of what we find in today's SDZN. It was also the version available to Wang Xuanhe (the editor of the SDZN) and the editors of the WSBY. The WSBY's editors inserted an elaborate method of marking cosmic time (reflected in WSBY 6) to support their patron's attempt to provide an ideological foundation for a reunited China. Those same concerns dictated they remove references to Liu Yu, whose time had long passed. However, the version that referred to Liu Yu still existed. Wang Xuanhe synthesized both versions of the work when he compiled the SDZN.

Works and their authors

The Rectifying Methods shares something very important with the Secret Revelation to John and the story of Ghazi Miyan. Each of the three works has been altered over time by different readers to suit their own purposes. The authors of first version of the Secret Revelation – the one, as discussed in the last chapter, that circulated in the Alexandrian school setting – drew on prestigious existing material (Platonic philosophy and Genesis) but reworked it for their own ends. The Platonic cosmos, the God of the Hebrew Bible, and the Roman rulers who called themselves representatives of the gods were recast as twisted parodies in protest of the unjust world in which the Secret Gospel's authors found themselves. The same process is evident in the very first account of Ghazi Miyan's life. In composing the Mirat-i-Masudi, Abdur Rahman would have been drawing upon material that had been in circulation for at least four centuries before his time. He inserted a famous member of his own Sufi order into the tale in order to boost the authority of his order at a time when it was losing ground to the rival Naqsbandiya. Finally, previous scholarship on the Rectifying Methods depicts a work that changed over time in the hands of various authors and editors. It began its life in the late fourth century as a collection of apocalyptic predictions, apotropaic amulets, chants, and talismans. Later readers saw many potential uses in the work. They chose to emphasize certain elements, downplay others, and excise, misread, or add material at their discretion. This process was carried out over several centuries and resulted in a collection of fragments that relate to each other in confusing and even contradictory ways. What I show in the following chapters is the very oddness of these fragments, rather than representing an insurmountable barrier to inquiry, can help us understand more about the social circumstances under which they emerged. We may never be able to reconstruct an “original” Rectifying Methods with certainty. What we have left can teach us, however, about who used the remains we have left, and why.

Chapter 3: The “Rectifying Methods” and the Shangqing Revelations

In order to understand what the Rectifying Methods has to tell us about how religious works are taken up and altered, we need to know something of the context in which that alteration took place. This requires attention to the material and social conditions that circumscribe the authors of any given work, as well as awareness of the fact that the work they generate is in part a response to these conditions. But the process of composition cannot be reduced to historical factors alone. The work (or works) themselves have a great deal to tell us. In this case, we are dealing with an author – Yang Xi – who generated a number of works that share a certain regularity in their assumptions about (inter alia) the nature of the cosmos, the composition of human beings, our potential fates after death, and practices we might undertake during our time on earth to ensure that said fate is as pleasant as possible.

This regularity, and Yang Xi’s responsibility for it, should not be overstated. The complicated redactional history of the works revealed to Yang Xi involved additions, deletions, “corrections,” forgeries, members of uncertain provenance, and the outright loss of material by many different individuals over the centuries. Indeed, it is only appropriate to speak of the Shangqing corpus as a body of work, rather than a collection of disparate material that with similar assumptions but different occasions of composition, once Tao Hongjing gathers the material together for what is in fact the first time. The many lacunae in his final product, as well as his own editorial interventions, sound cautionary notes to those of us interested in analyzing it.

Even when one approaches Yang's creative output with appropriate prudence, it stretches credulity to think that the regularities therein are all later fabrications or the result of random chance. There is no doubt that the author wrote with coherent assumptions in mind. For scholars interested in reconstructing any of the many missing members of the Shangqing corpus, knowledge of these assumptions – of the regularity that infuses Yang's corpus – provides an appropriate starting point when considered in connection with the considerations of time, place, and audience. That is to say, of its context.

The sociohistorical fabric

The first stable Chinese dynasty officially ended in 220 CE, but it had lost all de facto power decades before. The territory that formerly belonged to the Han 漢 (202 BCE-220 CE) house became divided between the states of Wei 魏, Shu 蜀, and Wu 吳. These were the celebrated “Three Kingdoms,” each of which sought to reunify China and recapture the lost glory of the Han. The dominant Wei were overthrown by their generals in the Sima 司馬 clan in 265, who established the Jin 晉. Jin history is conventionally divided into two periods: Western and Eastern. The initial period of Jin rule is known as the Western Jin 西晉 (265-316). It was dealt a serious blow in 311 when the Jin capital, the ancient city of Luoyang 洛陽, was sacked by the confederation of northern nomadic tribes known as the Xiongnu 匈奴. The court fled east to the other traditional capital of the Central Plain: the city of Chang'an 長安 (modern Xi'an 西安). But in 317, Chang'an, too, fell. The court and many of the most powerful gentry families were driven south along with their slaves and retainers, where they established a new capital at the most significant city in the region: Jiankang 健康 (modern Nanjing 南京). Thus began the Eastern Jin 東晉 (317-420). From then on, China became divided into a series of petty kingdoms centered around the river valleys of the Yellow and Yangzi Rivers. Local kings (including the Simas) had to defend themselves against their competitors in the same valley; meanwhile, invasion by their neighbors to the north or south was a constant threat. This was particularly true for the non-Chinese northern dynasties, who were attacked every now and again by southern generals seeking the glory that would accrue to anyone who managed to successfully reconquer the old capitals of Chang'an and Luoyang.¹²¹

The flight of the northern families produced a fundamental restructuring of power relations in the south. Southern elite families had grown wealthy under the Wu and, with the disintegration of Han power, had long been accustomed to governing their own affairs. Their economic base had remained largely unharmed by the upheavals of the Three Kingdoms period, and they maintained armies large enough to deal with the occasional peasant rebellion or would-be warlord. Earning their allegiance (or at least mitigating the military threat they posed) was among the most urgent concerns of Sima

121 An excellent and accessible English-language overview of the Northern and Southern Dynasties period is Mark Edward Lewis, China Between Empires (Cambridge, MA and London: the Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 2009). He provides an account of the Three Kingdoms period on pp. 28-37. The Cambridge History of China volumes on the Northern and Southern Dynasties period are still unpublished, but another excellent English-language introduction is Albert Dien's introduction in Dien, ed., State and Society in Early Medieval China (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1990): 1-29. While Dien has argued against "earlier views of the [Northern and Southern Dynasties] as a period characterized by powerful aristocratic clans..." (28), Lewis demonstrates that significant opposition to such a view still exists. Endymion Wilkinson, Chinese History: A New Manual, Revised and Enlarged, 5th ed. (digital) (Harvard University Asia Center, 2018) pp. 728-735 includes an extensive bibliography of primary and secondary sources; many of these are mentioned in the main text of this dissertation, while others appear in the bibliography.

Rui 睿 (r. 317-322) and his cohort when they re-established the Jin court in Jiankang. He was initially unsuccessful in this effort, and after one month at the new capital he had yet to establish relations with the local notables. Grasping the urgency of the situation, one of his retainers persuaded Rui to personally visit local headmen and court their approval. Even after this effort proved successful, some southern families continued to agitate for independence. The two strongest were the Zhou 周, who had a long history of military conquests in the area, and the Shen 沈, who were of similar power. The Zhou in particular proved a thorn in the side of the Eastern Jin, leading several revolts in the early years of the dynasty's presence in Jiankang; it was only by pitting the Zhou and Shen families against each other that the emperor's strategists were able to ensure relative safety.¹²²

The Xu family was notably absent from the great clans who jockeyed for power during the period. Though they were of long standing (having migrated southward in 185 CE), and of former note (a Xu had held the prestigious post of Grand Chancellor-in-chief ([da]chengxiang [大]丞相) under the Wu), by the Eastern Jin the family had faded into obscurity.¹²³ The Shangqing revelations – the Rectifying Methods among them – were produced on the Xus' behalf and circulated among families at more or less the same 122 Wang Zhongluo 王仲榮, Wei jin nanbeichao shi (Shanghai: Shanghai renmin chubanshe, 2003), 296-309, provides a fascinating account of the stormy relations between northern émigré families and the established southern gentry in the early part of the dynasty. This includes the military adventures of Zhou Pei which preceded the arrival of Sima Rui. Unfortunately, Wang's account of social relations between northern and southern gentry ends before the time of Yang and the Xus; he shifts instead to Huan Wen's 桓溫 three invasions of the North.

123 ZG 20.4b-5b chronicles the Xus move to Pingyu 平輿 county (now located in modern Henan, then in Runan Commandery 汝南郡) and Jurong 句容 county (near modern Nanjing), with which they are more commonly associated. Dušana Dušanka Mišćević, "Oligarchy or Social Mobility? A Study of the Great Clans in Early Medieval China," (PhD diss., Columbia University, 1992), 81, 619-20 provides an account of the Pingyu Xus. Tan Qixiang, ed., Zhongguo lishi ditu ji [The historical atlas of China] (Beijing: Zhongguo ditu chubanshe, 1996), 3:7-8 provides the location of Pingyu; for Jurong, see 3:26-27.

socioeconomic level. This included ancestors of Tao Hongjing as well as the Ge 葛 family, all related to the Xus by marriage. While portions were directed to families of higher status, the majority of the individuals involved in the transmission and preservation of the Xus' manuscript legacy hailed from lesser-known clans. The research of Michel Strickmann and Stephen Bokenkamp has shed light on the middling status of these families. Both scholars have translated juan 19 and 20 of the Zhen 'gao. Called “Account of the Perfected Scriptures from Beginning to End” (Zhenjing shimo 真經始末), Tao Hongjing's postface to the Zhen 'gao follows the revelation and diffusion of Yang Xi's manuscripts from their beginning “in the second year (364) of the Xingning 興寧 reign period (363-365) of Emperor Ai 哀 of Jin” (r. 362-365) down to his own day.

Tao notes the official positions and genealogies of several principals in the process. Some, like Yang and the Xus, are lower-level functionaries from southern families in the service of high lords of northern descent. Many are unknown outside Tao's postface; others are the sons of renowned chess masters, relatives of noted hermits, and the like – an altogether undistinguished lot. But humble though their ancestry might be, they themselves would find a more august destiny. Strickmann comes to the following conclusion:

...[C]areful collation of the biographies of these men and their relations in the dynastic histories reveals they were all members of the old-established clans of the Southeast... It was they who became the élite of the movement that had been inaugurated by the revealed message to members of their own class, and thereby they came to occupy a prestigious spiritual status under secular rulers and officials of Daoist faith and northern origin, as their conspicuous inclusion in standard history amply demonstrates. What they had lost on the plane of mundane administration, then, was fully offset by their monopoly of other-worldly channels. In them, the “Southern scholars” (nanshi 南士) had eloquent spokesmen for their cause, and an expanding Daoist society gained its most gifted intermediaries with the sources of worldly power and prestige.¹²⁴

According to this thesis, the earliest fragments of the Rectifying Methods are part of the effort by the southern gentry class to assert control in the spiritual realm that had been denied them in the material realm. With their political autonomy usurped by northern interlopers, they fashioned for themselves places in a new cosmic hierarchy as consolation. Whether Yang Xi was himself a member of that class is irrelevant; as a client he would have written to his audience, and that audience – at least, according to Strickmann – was looking for heavenly fulfillment of their earthly desire for power.

Yang Xi's eschatology and his map of the otherworldly bureaucracy provide the most convincing evidence for this point. One sign of the end times (in a work I will discuss more fully below) was the ascension of a certain king; who precisely Yang was referring to is difficult to tell based on existing evidence, but the role of the king in Yang's prophecy is clear: his rise to power presages the eschaton. The king's role here places Yang's prophecy in the tradition of imperial legitimation, which is two-sided. Ever since the Han, the rise of a king who would put an end to an age of disorder and preside over a peaceful realm had been foretold via the interpretation of celestial portents and the discovery of auspicious signs (often physical objects) on Earth. Once this mode of prophecy was established, it was appealed to in this way by successive rulers, including the founding emperors of the Sui 隋 (581-618) and Tang 唐 (618-907). This latter, Li Yuan 李淵 (566-635), took full advantage of his surname in order to identify with Li Hong 李弘, also known as the Lord of the Golden Porte 金闕帝君. This is none other than messianic avatar of the deified Laozi (also surnamed Li according to legend) who would usher in an age of Great Peace 太平. The same rhetoric was often adopted by the leaders of various popular rebellions, who took the surname Li for the same reason. Li-led messianic rebellions began during the Han, crescendoed in the Northern and Southern Dynasties period, and sporadically reoccurred until 1112, when the final Lord Li was captured and executed.¹²⁵

¹²⁴ Strickmann, "Mao-Shan" 35.

Because he does not advocate rebellion – merely situating the king’s rise among the signs of the end times – Yang does not belong to this millenarian tradition. Nonetheless, the thrust of his work is apocalyptic. Coupled with the coming end of the world is the assurance that certain people will survive it through various means. One might, for instance, practice various meditation methods found throughout the Shangqing corpus. Upon completing the prescribed regimen, the practitioner would ascend to more-than-human status and attain a post in the celestial bureaucracy, which Yang sketched out with care. The question of audience arises here: who in the realm of the living (or dead) was meant to receive these posts? We know that Yang himself was destined for one, as were his patrons. But considering only the immediate circle of the initial revelations does not do the works justice. We know from Tao’s postface that Yang’s methods were transmitted and practiced by members of wealthy southern families for generations after the death of their principal recipients. We also know that these southern families had been effectively shut out of the halls of power by northern émigrés. It is thus no stretch to infer that the detailed structure of the other world present in Yang Xi's texts, coupled with the imminent end of this one, would appeal to such a class.

¹²⁵ See Encyclopedia of Taoism, s.v. “Li Hong.” The classic study is Anna Seidel, “The Image of the Perfect Ruler in Early Taoist Messianism: Lao-Tzu and Li Hung,” History of Religions 9.2-3 (1969-1970): 216-247.

The problem for Strickmann's hypothesis is that Yang's revelations cannot be reduced to eschatology and bureaucracy alone. He reads the Shangqing corpus as a sort of "protest literature." Such literature is written by an oppressed minority in response to a real or perceived crisis. Strickmann's explanation of the Shangqing revelations' origin fits this definition well (though of course "oppression" can only be a relative term in the case of families possessed of wealth, land, slaves, and abundant cultural capital). This interpretation of apocalyptic literature silently follows Karl Marx's theory of religion, expressed trenchantly in his "Introduction to the Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right:"

Man is the world of man, the state, society. This state, this society, produce religion, an inverted world-consciousness, because they are an inverted world... Religious distress is at the same time the expression of real distress and also the protest against real distress. Religion is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the heart of a heartless world, just as it is the spirit of spiritless conditions. It is the opium of the people."¹²⁶

John Raines points out that this theory grew out of Marx's own experiences with religion in Germany and England, and acknowledges the many instances (from the cotton fields of the Old South to the Civil Rights Movement of the 1960s to the liberation theologies of South America) where religion has worked not to reinforce existing power structures, but to disrupt them.¹²⁷ He also situates Marx in dialogue with Hegelian idealism, which ¹²⁶ From John Raines, ed., Marx on Religion (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2002), 171.

Emphasis in original. Marx is often misunderstood here as claiming religion is an anesthetic forced upon people by their rulers in order to keep them docile; in fact, Marx is claiming that people produce religion in order to soothe themselves amidst unsatisfactory material conditions. Raines notes this.

¹²⁷ Raines, Marx 5-6, 8-10. Raines's understanding of religion as expressed here and in surrounding pages would certainly benefit from complexification, but his essential point, in my opinion, stands.

(at least in relation to German Protestant Christianity) sprung from the same soil. Cognate to Raines's remarks on religion and power outside this realm, then, we can add that Marx (through no fault of his own) is ill-equipped to deal with the complexities of the Shangqing revelations. The revelations themselves attest to this fact. They were about far more than earthly power; they were also meant to address earthly problems.

This comes across clearly in the case of Tao Kedou 陶科斗 (?-sometime between 363 and 365), wife of Xu Mi. Shortly after her death, Xu and other members of his family began suffering from illness and nightmares. They turned to Yang Xi for an explanation. His spiritual informants revealed that Tao herself was implicated in his patrons' troubles. An ancestor of the Xus had, in 317 or 318, unjustly killed two men. After their deaths, the victims had lodged a complaint with the magistrates of the underworld, who decided it was appropriate to punish Tao – a member by marriage of the Xu family – with imprisonment in her tomb, where she was “perpetually thirsty but unable to drink; hungry, but unable to eat.” To escape her plight, Tao's ghost looked for someone in the Xu family to take her place. Yang's celestial informants explained that the problem could be solved via offerings to the appropriate chthonic authorities. Though the record of events as preserved in the Zhen'gao is incomplete, all parties involved apparently reached a satisfactory settlement: the ill family members recovered, and Tao Kedou was released from her tomb.¹²⁸

Without adducing this episode as evidence supporting one theory of religion or another, it suffices to note that the Xu family drama is not protest literature, and therefore contravenes Strickmann's hypothesis. Just because this hypothesis does not suffice to explain the Shangqing revelations in their entirety – work that Strickmann himself would probably not presume it capable of – does not mean it can shed no light on the probable social context of the initial revelations, and thus of the Rectifying Methods. It presents exactly the kind of specialized knowledge that would allow its recipients an edge over the northern interlopers who had usurped political power.

¹²⁸ This account is taken from Bokenkamp, Ancestors and Anxiety (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2007, 130-138, and Peter Knickerson, “The Great Petition for Sepulchral Complaints,” in Bokenkamp, EDS 236-237. The quotation is from Bokenkamp, Ancestors 131.

The Shangqing eschaton and methods to escape it

An Early Example

The Shangqing revelations were transmitted by Yang Xi to his patrons in the Xu family between 364 and 370. They included a concrete vision of the end of the world and a plethora of methods to escape it. For Yang, the eschaton will be marked by political chaos and natural disasters that claim the lives of the wicked while sparing practitioners of Shangqing techniques. These disasters are followed by the descent to earth of the Lord of the Golden Porte, who inaugurates the Age of Great Peace (Taiping 太平). The classic account of the Shangqing eschaton occurs in the Purple Texts:

夫唯二氣離合，理物有期，三道虧盈，出處因運期之至也，因而適之運有來矣，就而撫之。唐承之年積數有四十六丁亥之間，前後在中，中間鳥獸之世，國祚啓竭，東西稱霸，以扶弱主，主有縱橫九一之名，逮號光迹昌元。其後甲申之歲已前已後，種善人，除殘民，疫水交其上，兵火繞其下，惡惡並滅，凶凶皆沒，好道陸隱，善人登山，流濁奔蕩，御之鯨淵，都分別也。到壬辰之年，三月六日，聖君來下光臨於兆民矣……

Now, the two qi both separate and join. According to the principles, all things have their appointed times. The three paths have times of growth and of depletion. Emergence and withdrawal are in complete accord with the fated cycles. When he thus approaches, the end of the cycle draws near. It was during the years of [the sage-king Yao] that the Sage Lord last came to set the cycle in motion. According to the calculations the end should fall within the space of forty-six dinghai years.

Sooner or later, within this space of time, it will be an age of birds and beasts, when the kingdom's blessings begin to evaporate. To the east and west there will be those who declare themselves hegemon to support a weak ruler. That ruler will have the given name, vertical and horizontal, "nine" and "one." He will be bestowed the style name "Light Traces, Flourishing Prime." Later, both before and after the jiashen year of his rule, the good will be planted as seed people and the remaining mortals will be eradicated. Pestilence and flood will wash over them; weapons and fire will circle below them. All the evil will be eradicated at once; all the violent will be destroyed. Those who delight in the Dao will hide away in the land; the good people will ascend mountains. The flowing filth will be shaken off, driven into the vast abyss. In this way all the mortals will be divided, the good from the evil. Coming to the sixth day of the third month in the renchen year, the Sage Lord will descend and appear to mortals in all his glory...

The eschatology described above is characteristic of the entire Shangqing corpus, and is in fact the most detailed exposition therein. As Bokenkamp notes (EDS 345), Yang Xi likely had a specific ruler in mind with this description, to whom he was referring in coded language (i.e., by dividing his name into vertical and horizontal strokes). This passage is also the locus classicus for a very popular timeframe for the apocalypse: it will begin sometime around a jiashen year (the 21st year of the sexigesimal cycle), and end in the next renchen year (the 29th year).¹²⁹ In a note that was sometimes dropped from later works, the Purple Texts claim the whole drama will take place during the sixty-year period between the 45th and 46th dinghai years after the rule of the sage-king Yao.

The end has no end

The foremost scholar of Shangqing Daoism is Isabelle Robinet. Her work is marked by such meticulous attention to detail and such comprehensive knowledge of her sources that it remains the starting point for research on the subject despite appearing thirty years before the first searchable databases. It is thus fitting to draw extensively on her scholarship for an overview of the eschatological assumptions that underpinned the Shangqing corpus.¹³⁰

¹²⁹ See EoT, s.v. "Apocalyptic eschatology," for the popularity of this timeframe.

One of the most important is that “eschatology” is a misnomer. The finality of the eschaton (from the Greek word for “last”) has no place in traditional Chinese cosmology. This latter is reckoned cyclically, according to the ganzhi 干支 “stem and branch” cycle: ten heavenly “stems” (the gan) match with twelve earthly “branches” (the zhi). The stems and branches follow their own individual cycles, intersecting to form sixty possible combinations. These combinations are used to record hours, days, months, and years.¹³¹ The “eschaton” as described above in the Purple Texts is not the end of history nor the end of all things; it is the end of a cycle. The text of the received version makes this explicit: “When [the Lord of the Golden Porte] thus approaches, the end of a cycle draws near.”¹³²

130 The notion of the eschaton and the methods to escape it that follow here are extracted from Robinet 1: 138-146. She provides a much fuller account of the methods in various works; I concentrate on those relevant to the Rectifying Methods.

131 See Handian, s.v. “時辰,” “干支.” The traditional Chinese hour consisted of two modern hours, with each day containing twelve. The twelve stems were used to record them. See also Adam Smith, “The Chinese Sexagenary Cycle and the Ritual Origins of the Calendar,” in Calendars and Years II: Astronomy and Time in the Ancient and Medieval World, edited by John M. Steele (Oxford: OxbowBooks, 2010): 1-37.

132 Found on CT 442 3b, as translated in Bokenkamp, EDS 345.

Table 1

The Heavenly Stems and Earthly Branches

	Stems	Branches
1	甲 jia	子 zi
2	乙 yi	丑 chou
3	丙 bing	寅 yin
4	丁 ding	卯 mao
5	戊 wu	辰 chen
6	己 ji	巳 si
7	庚 geng	午 wu
8	辛 xin	未 wei
9	壬 ren	申 shen
10	癸 gui	酉 you
11		戌 xu
12		亥 hai

Both stems and branches proceed in linear order: jiazi 甲子 is followed by yichou 乙丑, bingyin 丙寅 by dingmao 丁卯, etc. Once the ten stems are exhausted, the cycle of stems returns to its beginning, while the cycle of branches continues until its own end: jiaxu 甲戌 is followed by yihai 乙亥. Then, the branch cycle resets while the stem cycle continues: bingzi 丙子 is followed by dingchou 丁丑, wuyin 戊寅 by jimao 己卯, etc. The full cycle ends at guihai 癸亥.

The Three Heavens and the Six Heavens

The violence of the northern and southern dynasties took a heavy toll on elite families. For the Rectifying Methods, as for several works of the early northern and southern dynasties period, this violence signaled the end of a cycle. Like days, seasons, and even dynasties, the universe moved through natural periods of growth and decay. The growth was marked by peace and stability; the decay saw extreme violence, societal breakdown, and the disruption of the natural order. Many Daoist works of the period saw the end of the current cycle as the passage of legitimate government from six evil heavens to three benevolent ones, and implicitly implicitly or explicitly contrasted the Six and the Three in their promises of salvation.

To understand this contrast, we must trace the Six Heavens back to the Han. In an influential article, Wang Zongyu 王宗昱 finds the beginning of the theory of the Six Heavens in an attempt by a group of scholars led by Zheng Xuan 鄭玄 (127-200) to systematically interpret earlier ritual works on imperial sacrifice. They claim to see the Six Heavens in Zhou 周 (ca. 1100-256 BCE) works concerning state ritual – specifically, sacrifice to Heaven and the five visible planets. Under the influence of the apocryphal Weft Texts (Wei shu 緯書) – prognostication works that claim to explain the Five Classics (Wu jing 五經) – Zheng then associated Six Heavens with the Han imperial sacrifice to The Grand Monad (Taiyi 太一) and the emperors of the Five Directions. Thus, initially the term tian, far from meaning “heaven,” meant “heavenly spirit.” For Zheng and his associates, it referred to the spirits propitiated in state sacrifices of meat and grain. In return for these gifts, the spirits ensured the welfare of the state and the common people.¹³³

Beginning in the late Han, this interpretation was turned on its head. Early medieval Daoist works like the Inner Explanations agreed with Zheng Xuan and his compatriots that the Six Heavens involved ritual sacrifice of meat and grain to heavenly spirits, but they differed from their predecessors in two important respects. First, for the Inner Explanations and works like it (e.g., the even earlier Nüqing guilü), the term “Six Heavens” referred not just to the earlier six deities of the state cult, but all deities that had received official sanction by the central government – often the spirits of dead generals or men of renown. The Inner Explanations holds that Laozi, here depicted as a god, had repeatedly incarnated throughout history in the role of royal advisor. In this capacity, he did not at first push for the total abrogation of the state cult; rather, he attempted to correct sacrificial customs that had strayed from the true Way. The Six Heavens, though they had erred, were capable of redemption. However, he eventually concluded that this effort was futile. In 142 C.E., Laozi descended to Zhang Daoling and abolished the rule of the Six Heavens, whose “stale qi” (gu qi 故氣) had run its course. He replaced them with the newly-revealed Three Heavens. The spirits of these heavens did not subsist on meat because they were emanations of the pure qi of the heavens; thus, blood sacrifice – previously thought to engender the blessings of both the great spirits of the state cult and the deceased heroes of local veneration – would be ineffective when used to propitiate these newly-revealed gods. The Nüqing guilü takes a harsher stance. It belongs to a genre of texts that aim to protect their bearers from maleficent spirits by listing these spirits' true names. While most such manuals confine themselves to miscellaneous demons of greater or lesser stature, the Nüqing focuses specifically on the spirits of the state cult, stretching back to Zhou times. Unlike in the Inner Explanations, the objects of state sacrifice are depicted here as unequivocally evil. The state cult is decisively rejected.¹³⁴

133 Wang Zongyu, “Daojiao de ‘Liu tian’ zhi shuo,” [The theory of the “Six Heavens” in Daoism], Daojiao yanjiu 16 (1996): 23-27. Bokenkamp presents a similar argument on EDS 200-201 n. 21.

While Wang focuses on the Daoist rejection of official state religion, other scholars broaden the scope of their analysis. Rolf Stein and Ursula-Angelika Cedzich note the interaction between early Daoism, popular religion, and the state cult. Local cults included not only those spirits integrated into the official pantheon, but a variety of deities thought to provide benefits like healing, prognostication, and general good fortune. Daoist authors echoed government officials in their condemnation of these cults, but each group did so for different reasons. Where the officers of the central government were concerned with regulating sacrifice along class lines, Daoist works also integrated meat-eating local gods into the new cosmological scheme of the Inner Explanations under the rubric of the “Six Heavens” and their “stale qi.” The new gods of the Three Heavens were unambiguously separated from local gods, whether state-sanctioned or no; these latter were “mere remnants,” in Cedzich’s words, “of the old, rotten, and demonic order of the Six Heavens.” As Terry Kleeman notes, however, these local gods could be of use to the celestial and terrestrial agents of the Three Heavens – a fact that lends the 134 Wang Zongyu, “‘Liu tian’” 23-36. Stephen Bokenkamp traces the account of the Five Thearchs and their subordination to Taiyi even further back in time to the reign of Han Wudi 漢武帝 (r. 140-87 BCE). See Bokenkamp, “Sources” 452. The passage he cites is from the 1970 Minglun chubanshe 明倫出版社 reprint of Gu shi bian 古史辨, ed. Lü Simian 呂思勉 and Tong Shuye 童書業. The edition accessible to me is different, but substantiates his claim. See Gu Jiegang and Yang Xiangkui, “Sanhuang kao,” in Gu shi bian, comp. Gu Jiegang (Shanghai: Shanghai guji chubanshe, 1981) 7.2: 93-94.

Six Heavens a certain ambiguity in Daoist texts of the early medieval period. Even in works like the Nüqing that reject the deities of the Six Heavens in no uncertain terms, the demons, departed generals, and spirit-soldiers under the Heavens' command could still be turned to the good if such beings submitted to the proper order – that is, the authority of the Daoist pantheon and its human priests. When powerful local gods acknowledged the authority of superior beings, they could be profitably employed as overseers of lesser demonic entities. However, their ubiquity – and the attendant misfortune they cause in our world – is reflective of a more serious problem confronting humanity.¹³⁵

In many of the texts above, the rule of the Six Heavens is connected to a steady degradation of customs in the human realm which is responsible for the state of disorder that prevailed after the fall of the Han. This is made explicit in a fifth-century work, Master Lu's Abridgement of the Daoist Code (CT 1127 Lu Xiansheng Daomen ke lüe 陸先生道門科, hereafter Daomen ke lüe):

The Most High Lord Lao observed that in late antiquity there had been a descent into violence, so that purity was defiled and simplicity lost; the universe had lost direction and men and ghosts mixed in confusion; the stale [qi] of the Six Heavens claimed exalted office and assembled the hundred sprites as well as the ghosts of those who has suffered severe injuries, the dead generals of defeated armies, armies 135 Rolf A. Stein, "Religious Taoism and Popular Religion," in Holmes Welch and Anna Seidel, ed., Facets of Taoism: Essays in Chinese Religion (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1979): 56-58, 63-64, 67, 77-78; Ursula-Angelica Cedzich, "The Organon of the Twelve Hundred Officials and its Gods," Daoism: Religion, History and Society 1 (2009): 49- 50. Here I treat only a small portion of Cedzich's impressive article. In addition to asking critical questions about the nature of textual research on, e.g., 32ff, she also points out how the boundaries between Daoist and non-Daoist gods were necessarily more complex than works like the Inner Explanations and the Nüqing would have the reader believe, as well as efforts by to incorporate undomesticated local deities into their spiritual hierarchy. Terry Kleeman, "Exorcising the Six Heavens: The Role of Traditional State Deities in the Demon Statutes of Lady Blue," in Florian C. Reiter, ed., Exorcism in Daoism: A Berlin Symposium, Asien-und Afrika-Studien der Humboldt-Universität zu Berlin 36, (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz Verlag, 2011), 93-97. Here I follow the basic structure of his argument, which discusses Wang, Stein, and Cedzich. For a more detailed discussion of the nature of traditional sacrifice, including its organization along class lines and Daoist critiques of it, see Kleeman's "Licentious Cults and Bloody Victuals: Sacrifice, Reciprocity, and Violence in Traditional China," Asia Major, 3rd series, 7.1 (1994): 185-211.

that had rebelled and dead soldiers; the men claimed to be generals and the women called themselves ladies; leading ghostly soldiers the moved as armies and rested in camps, roaming freely about heaven and earth wantonly dispensing their might and blessings, attacking the temples of others, seeking the sacrifices offered to them...¹³⁶

These spirits spread disease and death, part of the natural world's responds to human immorality. In the words of Christine Mollier:

The final deluge will be preceded by horrible calamities: wars, barbarian invasions, crimes, social, political and familial dissolution, meteorological disorders, trials, imprisonments and official punishments, oppression of the people, conflagrations, floods, bad harvests, famines, curses, and above all an extraordinary propagation of diseases. All these troubles are produced by gigantic armies of demons (gui 鬼 and mowang 魔王), souls of the dead, and are a consequence of humankind's defilement and evil.

However, some will escape this age of disorder. These are the “seed people” (zhong min 種民), those few Daoists who, because of their good conduct, will live to see the coming age of Great Peace. The concept of seed people arose with the early Celestial Masters movement, which practiced a sexual rite thought to conceive a perfect human being. The explicit nature of these rites resulted in heavy censure by Buddhists and later Daoists. It is perhaps in response to this pressure that we see the Zhen'gao advocate a sublimated version wherein the entire process takes place as a visualization exercise involving a human agent and a spirit-maiden. Contemporaneous to this usage was the equation of zhongmin with terms like liangmin 良民 or zhenmin 真民 that simply connoted people of virtue. Per Bokenkamp, “The metaphor is agricultural. The ‘seed people’ were the elect of Daoist eschatology, those selected to survive the coming end time to form the germ of a new populace at the beginning of a fresh age, once all the evil had been ‘rooted out.’” However, they could not survive the paroxysms of a dying world through virtue alone. They required the recognition of higher celestial authorities.¹³⁷

¹³⁶ Translation taken from Kleeman, “Exorcising” 92.

The appropriate authority here is the Most High Lord Lao, who once again descends to save a suffering world from its own depravity. While traces of a divinized Lord Lao can be seen during the Han, he soon acquired an eschatological aspect as Li Hong 李弘, known also as “The Imperial Lord of the Golden Porte,” (Jinque dijun 金闕帝君) a quasi-messianic figure who appears extensively in the religious milieu of the Northern and Southern Dynasties. The terrors of the final age were often explicitly tied to the political realm: the Inner Explanations, for instance, depicts the Liu-Song 劉宋 (420-497) dynasty as heritors of the mandate of the Han who would inaugurate a peaceful age of religious and political unity. The Lord of the Golden Porte appears in a similar capacity: he will descend in a renchen 壬辰 year (the 29th of the sexagesimal cycle), eight years after the end of the world, to proclaim the commencement of the age of Great Peace (Taiping 太平), populated solely by the elect. It was the duty of these individuals to prepare the realm for his arrival.¹³⁸

137 One exposition of the “seed people” theory occurs in the Commands and Admonitions of the Families of the Great Dao (Dadao jia lingjie 大道家令戒), part of CT 789 Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie ke jing 正一法文天師教戒科經. Bokenkamp introduces and translates the Commandments on EDS pp. 149-185, discussing the seed people on pp. 155-157. Mollier’s words are from EoT, s.v. “Dongyuan shenzhou jing.” See also EoT, s.v. “Seed People.” For an alternative interpretation of the Celestial Masters’ sexual rites see Gil Raz, “The Way of the Yellow and Red: Re-examining the Sexual Initiation Rite of Celestial Master Daoism,” Nan Nü 10 (2008): 86-120.

138 Bokenkamp, EDS 186-188, 221-224; EoT, s.v. “Housheng daojun lieji,” “Li Hong.” The literature on the eschatology of the Six Dynasties period, its historical background, and on Li Hong in particular, is extensive. I refer the reader to the relevant entries in EoT, which are referenced in the articles cited earlier in this note.

The celestial lists

The Lord of the Golden Porte is one of several celestial judges who appear at the end of a cycle to separate the saved from the unsaved. Because of the cyclical nature of time, they do not do so in the manner of Christ redeeming the chosen from damnation at the end of time. Instead, they are rectifying certain lists. These lists contain the names of those who will be saved from the destruction at the end of a cycle. This is merely another iteration (albeit a rather unusual one) of a rather routine bureaucratic process. Just as one was registered on the imperial census as a member of a certain household, so the pertinent facts of one's life (and previous lives, where applicable) were registered with the appropriate otherworldly authorities. These facts, as well as one's behavior during this life, determined one's membership in the lists of those who would survive the end of a kalpa cycle. Emending these lists (or checking them for errors) was a common assignment for celestial officials.¹³⁹ One early version of the Rectifying Methods, for instance, records a similar task being performed in ages past:

白簡青錄，得道人名記。皇民譜錄，數極唐堯。是為小劫一交。其中損益，有二十四萬人應為得者。自承唐之後，數四十六丁亥，前後中間甲申之年，乃小劫之會，人名應定。

The names of those who will attain the Dao are recorded in green records on white slips. The numbers of the Genealogy of the People of the Three Sovereigns [that is, the relevant records referred to above] extended through the time of [the legendary sage-king] Yao. This was the turning of one small kalpa. During this time 2,400,000 were subtracted from the count of those who should attain [the Dao]. In the jiashen year sometime before or after the forty-sixth dinghai year after Yao, there will be a conjunction of small kalpas, and the records must be fixed again.¹⁴⁰

139 See, for instance, WSBY 22.15b, where the Grand Imperial Elder 太帝丈人 gathers with other deities to correct the records of transcendence.

140 See SDZN 9.3b-4b.

A pressing question for Shangqing adepts was how one's name was added to or removed from these lists. Different works provide different techniques for inscribing one's name on the appropriate lists, refer to the lists by different names, and warn of different acts that will cause the gods to strike one's name from them. Addition could require meditation exercises wherein one envisages themselves writing their own name, while others require the adept to recite incantations that demand the gods do it for them.¹⁴¹ Alternatively, the task could require the chanting of hymns or the wearing of talismans. These are a few of several methods that the adept could appeal to; because different versions of the Rectifying Methods contain them and they are in any case common features of Shangqing works (whether or not they work to inscribe the adept's name in celestial lists), I will treat some in detail below. Readers curious about other methods should consult volume one of Robinet. These lists often have exotic names, like the “Green Text on White Slips of the Grand Culmen” (Taiji baijian qingwen 太極白簡青文) or the “Jade Register of the Golden Book of the Shangqing Heaven (Shangqing jinshu yulu 上清金書玉錄). Their names are relatively consistent throughout the Shangqing corpus.¹⁴² As we shall see later, these same names appear in one early version of the Rectifying Methods.

Meditation exercises

The Purple Texts also provide methods for assuring one's membership in the elect:

141 For examples former, see CT 1364 Shangqing dongzhen zhihui guanshen dajie wen 上清洞真智慧觀身大戒文 and CT 1379 Shangqing yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing 上清玉帝七聖玄紀迴天九霄經. Overviews can be found in the relevant entries in TC, and a more detailed introduction to CT 1379 in Robinet 2: 225-228. For the latter, see, for instance, R 2: 163ff, particularly 166.

142 Robinet discusses the chief works that contain these lists on R 2: 225-228 and R 2: 101-110.

若能精洞房於上元，修九真以彌勤，步隱書於七靈，窮八素之用誠，既得涉乎三災而不傷，又必觀更始於太平，又得賜書仙官神真長生也。

If you have been able to make essential the Cavern Chamber in your Upper Prime, have cultivated the [Method of the] Nine Perfected to widely exert their control, have paced according to the secret writings on the seven holy stars, and have assiduously completed the Eight Simplicities, then you will be able to pass through the three plagues without injury. You will also certainly be born again in the age of Great Peace and will receive documents as a Transcendent officer or as a Perfected spirit endowed with long life.¹⁴³

The methods found above, like the Purple Texts' eschatology, are also common throughout the Shangqing corpus.¹⁴⁴ While reference is also made here to dance called "walking along the guideline" (bugang 步剛) recorded in the Baopuzi 抱朴子, the techniques offered by the Purple Texts to escape the apocalypse by and large consist of internal meditation exercises.¹⁴⁵ This is immediately apparent from the allusions to parts of the human body. The Upper Prime here refers to the upper Cinnabar Field, one of the three divisions of the human body that corresponds to the brain; the Cavern Chamber is a location in the Upper Prime that is sometimes situated two inches behind the brow ridge. The Method of the Nine Perfected refers to a series of visualization exercises detailed in CT 1376 and CT 1377 during which the individual envisages various deities combining in their own person and transforming into a single spirit that revitalizes their inner organs. Finally, the Eight Simplicities refers to another series of visualization exercises detailed 143 This is a partial translation of Housheng daojun lieji 3a-4b modified slightly from Stephen Bokenkamp, EDS 345-347.

144 EoT, "Shangqing" reviews characteristic features of the Shangqing textual lineage, including cosmology, eschatology, and methods of salvation. Consult also R: 1 107-47. On Shangqing apocalypticism, see EoT, s.v. "Jinque dijun," "housheng," "Li Hong," as well as Kobayashi, Liuchao daojuan shi 419-426.

145 The dance ultimately descends from the ancient shamanic dance known as the "paces of Yu" Yubu 禹步. See EoT, s.v. "Bugang."

in CT 426 Basu zhenjing 八素真經 (Scripture of the Eight Pure Ladies) and CT 1323 Basu zhenjing fushi ri yue huanghua jue 八素真經服食日月皇華訣 (Authentic Scripture of the Eight Pure Ladies and Instructions on the Absorption of the August Essences of the Sun and Moon). These scriptures teach the adept techniques to absorb the essences of the sun and moon via talismans and meditation exercises, and to visualize the divinities of the planets in order to request that their name be erased from the records of death and inscribed on the records of life. Much like the Purple Texts, though the methods of the Nine Perfected and Eight Simplicities have been pieced apart and scattered throughout the Daoist canon, they nonetheless form a central and indisputable portion of the original Shangqing revelations.¹⁴⁶ The received Rectifying Methods contains a meditation exercise that – though it does not mention the lists – is perfectly coherent with the Shangqing corpus: the adept visualizes his or her body emitting fiery qi that destroys the entire universe (see chapter two’s summary of the work).

Protective spells

Bodily ascent to the heavens is only possible if one survives life’s myriad dangers.

Demons and the disasters they caused were a constant worry. The proliferation of these nefarious spirits during the tumult of the end times would have lent the problem even more urgency. Shangqing works themselves thus often include a variety of techniques designed to ward off the demons. One of the most popular was the chanting of protective spells. These spells sometimes featured in subsidiary compilations meant to prepare the way for the practicing of more exalted methods.¹⁴⁷ But these methods would obviously have interested anyone concerned with demonic threats, and were sometimes excerpted from their original works. This is the case for one chant taken from an early version of the Rectifying Methods. See Appendix C.

146 See Daojiao dacidian, s.v. “三元,” EoT, s.v. “Sanyuan,” “Dantian;” Grand Ricci, s.v. “洞房,” Handian, s.v. “洞房;” EoT, s.v. “Jiuzhen zhongjing” and Robinet, “Introduction,” “Basu jing,” R 2: 67-83, R 2: 51-57.

Talismans

The word “talisman” or “amulet” translates the graph fu 符. In the earliest written record it means “a document written at royal command,” but by a long process of extension came to refer, in a Daoist context, to graphs that – when written on silk and worn by a worthy person – conferred special powers. Daoist amulets have their roots in techniques of imperial legitimation. After the conquest of Shang 商 (ca. 1600-1046 BCE) by Zhou, the right to rule was tied to the perceived virtue of the ruler and confirmed by the interpretation of celestial and natural phenomena. Han rulers added more concrete tokens to the repertoire of legitimation techniques in the form of physical objects like cauldrons or stones. These were often inscribed with messages foretelling or confirming the rule of a particular emperor, and could be conveniently “found” by his supporters. With the rise of the weft texts in the late Western Han (202 BCE-8 CE), these tokens extended to written works themselves. Some foretold or confirmed the ascent of a particular ruler, but their content was secondary; merely possessing them proved one’s legitimacy in the same manner as the earlier non-textual objects.¹⁴⁸ However, the interpretation of omens was not 147 See, for instance CT 1355 Shangqing taishang Yuqing yinshu miemo shenhui gaoxuan zhenjing 上清太上玉清隱書滅魔神慧高玄真經, which casts its chants as a preparatory exercise for the Dadong zhenjing 大洞真經. See the relevant TC entry. For an example of such a chant in this work, see ZHDZ 1.707b-708a.

148 Not all rulers appealed to these signs consistently; see Lagerwey, Le Wushang 9. Zhou Wudi rejects the necessity of talismans to buttress his authority, claiming to rule by virtue alone.

abandoned: celestial phenomena and terrestrial prodigies were used to confirm (or challenge) the mandate of a given ruler, functioning as signs of Heaven's approval or disapproval of his conduct. Amulets would later serve this same function. Rather than an innovation, however, this was an extension of their original use.¹⁴⁹

Fu, properly translated “tally” in this context, were among the signs of diverse kinds that were used by messengers to confirm the proper origin of the information they conveyed. The relationship between emperor and general provides an example. Before departing on a military campaign, a general would be given one half of a fu-tally (usually a physical object like a cylinder or a carving of an animal) while the other half would remain in the emperor's keeping. Orders from the emperor or messages from the general would be accompanied by the corresponding portion of the tally, which functioned as a sign of their authenticity. The stellar omens and auspicious prodigies that confirmed a ruler's legitimacy played the same role: they were the heavenly half of a tally offered in response to the emperor's earthly conduct. In the realm of popular religion, amulets functioned along similar principles: they signified the imprimatur of higher celestial authorities (who kept the other half of the talisman), and so informed spirits and demons that the bearer could command them with legitimate authority. In the Daoist realm, they were bestowed in response to the behavior or destiny of the adept: those of sufficient virtue (or whose fate permitted it) encountered a master (whether divine or mortal) and received either the earthly half of a fu, or the instructions and rituals necessary to generate their own. Like earthly fu-tallies, heavenly ones could be forged, stolen, or transmitted improperly. The gods were not easily fooled, however; they ignored the false tallies and penalized those who improperly transmitted them. The receipt and transmission of fu thus confirmed the authority of the master and disciple involved and situated them both within a heavenly hierarchy. Those who obtained the amulets or accompanying instructions outside the proper channels were ignored by the gods, and those who transmitted them improperly were subject to harsh punishment.¹⁵⁰

¹⁴⁹ The classic work connecting Daoist amulets and works to signifiers of imperial authority is Anna Seidel, “Imperial Treasures and Taoist Sacraments: Daoist Roots in the Apocrypha,” in Tantric and Taoist Studies in Honour of R.A. Stein, vol. 2, ed. Michel Strickmann, pp. 291-371. On Zhou political authority, see Baumbacher, Empowered Writing 33-53; David Pankenier, “The Cosmo-Political Background of Heaven's Mandate,” Early China 20 (1995): 123ff. See also his book-length study, Astrology and Cosmology in Early China: Conforming Earth to Heaven (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2013).

Placing the Rectifying Methods' amulets in the proper context reveals that they implicate the bearer in a complex web of significations. First, he or she received the talismans and accompanying instructions because of innate virtue or moral conduct, and they were transmitted from a master (whether mortal or deity) via a prescribed ritual. Second, they do not possess intrinsic power. The abilities conferred by the Most High Scripture's amulets depend on the assent of the deities who assess the adept's virtue. The amulets signify their bearer's status as a lower but legitimate member of the heavenly hierarchy. While the powers they confer depend on the virtue of the bearer, virtue alone is not enough: it requires the recognition of higher authorities, who bestow tokens in response. The key factor is thus neither virtue nor mere possession, but rather what legitimate possession signifies: the imprimatur of the celestial authorities. The amulets of the Rectifying Methods are the sign of this imprimatur.

150 On fu and other sorts of talismans, see Baumbacher, Empowered Writing 13-31. On fu in popular religion, see ibid., pp. 58-62. On specifically Daoist fu and their antecedents (as well as the role of morality), see pp. 58-62. Threats of punishment for improperly revealing a scripture – known as “leaking” (xie 泄 or lou 漏) it – are common throughout Daoist works. The Zhengfa jing details them in 262c.12-263a.2. For other examples, see, e.g., CT 320 Dongxuan lingbao danshui feishu xiaojie miaojing 洞玄靈寶丹水飛術運度小劫妙經 9b, CT 1336 Dongzhen taishang jinpian hufu zhenwen jing 洞真太上金篇虎符真文經 2b. Like earthly punishments, these punishments often applied not only to the individual actor but also members of his or her family.

Talismans deserve discussion at length because they probably formed the core of the Rectifying Methods as revealed to Yang Xi, just as they form the core of the received version. They are the chief means by which the bearer performs the work for which they have been deputized by the lords of the Three Heavens; that is, they rectify the present chaotic world in preparation for the peaceful era to come.

The Shangqing version

Certain fragments of the Rectifying Methods can be conclusively linked to the Shangqing corpus via intertextual citation, presence in ancient bibliographies, and overlapping content. I will explore these links more fully in the following chapters. Despite disagreements among early sources about the work's antiquity, on balance they argue that certain early fragments can help us reconstruct a hypothetical "proto-version." The information found in these fragments, when compared to the general tenor of the Shangqing corpus as a whole, indicates that the Rectifying Methods as taken up and modified by Yang Xi predicted the end times and promoted certain specific methods of surviving the apocalypse. While the exact work revealed to Yang Xi is not available to us, existing information permits a tentative reconstruction.

Chapter 4: Prophecy and the Pen: The Rectifying Methods and the Rise of the Liu-Song

The Rectifying Methods may have been taken up by Yang Xi, but they did not remain his property alone. Very soon after the Shangqing revelations ceased, the work was altered by other authors who put it to new uses. Just as Yang's revelations spoke to his own historical context, these new authors reshaped the Rectifying Methods according to their own times. A figure that loomed large in this new shaping was Liu Yu 劉裕 (r. 402-422). Founder of the Liu-Song 劉宋 (420-479) and erstwhile general in service of the Eastern Jin 東晉 (317-420), Liu made a name for himself by putting down several rebellions against the throne before deciding to seize it himself. Various Daoist authors decided that his bid to rule China was significant enough to provoke heavenly attention, detailing the signs and wonders that coincided with it. Some decided to support him, presenting him with texts that both augured his rise and – in a tradition stretching back to the Eastern Han “Weft Texts” (chen wei 讖緯) – functioned as tokens which served to legitimate it.¹⁵¹ Others – including the anonymous editors of a new version of the Rectifying Methods – maintained the apocalyptic certainty of the Shangqing works but felt compelled to acknowledge the Liu clan's power.

The sociohistorical fabric

The decline of the Eastern Jin was marked by famine, royal incompetence, and internecine conflict. The dynasty finally fell to one of its own generals, the warlord Liu Yu 劉裕 (363-422). Through cunning and treachery, Liu had managed to assume control of the dominant military power, the elite Northern Palace Army (beifu bing 北府兵). Conceived of by the brilliant general Huan Wen 桓溫 (312-373) and realized in 377 by the statesman Xie An 謝安 (320-385), the Northern Palace Army functioned as a bulwark against northern aggression and a means to retake the Central Plain. The new army proved its worth six years later at the Battle of Feishui 淝水 (383), where it defeated a much larger invading force under the command of the lord of the Former Qin 前秦 (351-395) and recovered a broad swathe of modern Shandong, Henan, and Shaanxi that had been lost to the northerners.

¹⁵¹ Much has been written on the use of texts as talismans that legitimate political authority. See Baumbacher, Empowered Writing 50-56 for a recent example.

However, the Jin court was soon weakened by factional infighting, and their newly-reclaimed territory was carved up by the northern states of Southern Yan 南燕 (398-410) and Latter Qin 後秦 (387-414). Meanwhile, the Jin emperor Sima Yao 司馬曜 (Emperor Xiaowu 孝武, r. 372-396) squandered his kingdom's wealth in pursuit of personal pleasure, and appointed his second son, the severely intellectually-disabled Sima Dezong 司馬德宗 (r. 396-418) heir apparent. With Yao's death, Dezong was crowned Emperor An of Jin 晉安帝. True power, however, lay in the hands of his father's brother, the prime minister Sima Daozi 司馬道子 (364-402). But Daozi's power would not last.

After a devastating famine and a series of agrarian revolts, Huan Wen's son Xuan 桓玄 (369-404), lord of the powerful province of Jingzhou 荊州, took matters into his own hands and rebelled. He bribed the commander of the Northern Palace Army, and their joint forces captured the capital in 403. Xuan executed Sima Daozi and his son, forced Emperor An to abdicate, and established his own dynasty of Chu 楚. The new emperor immediately moved to solidify his power. His chief threat in that regard was the very reason he had captured the capital: the Northern Palace Army. By then, it had become a semi-independent military power that had proven difficult for the throne to control. (Indeed, it had rebelled against Sima Daozi in 397, allying itself with two local warlords.) Exiling its commander and murdering its generals, he sought to bring the army under control by promoting lower-ranking officers who would be loyal to the throne. One of these men was Liu Yu, who immediately began plotting Xuan's ruin.¹⁵²

Liu was the son of an impoverished noble family who had fled their ancestral home in the north. Conscripted into military service, he was made an officer of a general of the Northern Palace Army. Liu's relatively low rank meant he emerged from Huan Xuan's purge unscathed (a fate not shared by his commander). Immediately after the purge of 403, he began plotting against Xuan with other officers of similar rank across the kingdom. On February 28th, 404, simultaneous rebellions led by these officers rocked the nascent Chu dynasty. Liu and his officers slaughtered their overlords (all Huan family members), joined their armies, and marched on the capital. Huan Xuan was forced to flee to his base in Jingzhou with Emperor An in tow. Raising an army in great haste, he met a general of the Northern Route Army in battle. Returning to his base in defeat, Xuan was killed shortly thereafter. Sporadic resistance by Huan clansmen was crushed within a year, and Sima Dezong was reinstated. Liu spent the next several years establishing his fame by recapturing lost territory and vanquishing threats to Jin power. In 409, he destroyed the kingdom of Southern Yan; in 410, he crushed a peasant army led by the warlord Lu Xun 盧循 (?-411). Though the empire appeared stable, it was closer than ever to collapse.

¹⁵² The preceding is a summary of Wang, Wei Jin Nanbeichao shi 333-336, 340-341.

The generals of the Northern Palace Army had seen the writing on the wall, and began jockeying for power. Liu proved the most capable. First one, then another of his former comrades fell before him, and by 413 Liu had solidified power in his own hands. His remaining rivals (including a member of the imperial clan) fled north to Latter Qin. Meanwhile, he was still nominally in Emperor An's service, and enlarged Jin's territory by conquering neighboring states. After the fall of Southern Yan, he sacked Chengdu and annexed its holdings (Yizhou 益州, in modern Sichuan) in 412. Taking advantage of Latter Qin's troubles with nomadic tribes along its northern border, Liu launched a campaign against the rival state in 416. He promptly conquered Luoyang, and the court fled to the ancient capital of Chang'an. This, too, fell before Liu, and the last Latter Qin emperor was dragged off to Jiankang and executed in 417. Having reconquered the heartland, Liu Yu was emperor in all but name. He returned to Jiankang, and in 420 accepted the abdication of the final ruler of the Eastern Jin. Thus was the Liu-Song born.¹⁵³

The Liu-Song and political prophecy

Liu's new dynasty would be short-lived, ending a mere sixty years after it had been founded. But no one knew that at the time. When Liu died unexpectedly in 422, power passed to his son Liu Yifu 劉義符 (406-424). Yifu was quickly assassinated, along with his older brother, by high-ranking officials who sought to rule the Liu-Song from behind the throne. His successor Liu Yilong 劉義隆 proved cunning and capable, however. He had the officials responsible executed and successfully stabilized the new empire, reigning for thirty years as Emperor Wen of the Liu-Song 宋文帝 (r. 424-445). After a brief interregnum, his successor Liu Jun 劉駿 (430-453) presided over another period of relative stability.¹⁵⁴ This stability, coupled with Liu Yu's military success in the central plain, made it seem almost inevitable that the Lius would eventually reunify China. Their success did not go unnoticed by contemporary Daoist authors, who rushed to declare their support for the ascendant dynasty.

¹⁵³ The preceding summarizes Wang, Wei Jin Nanbeichao shi 341-348, 353-359.

The first prophetic text to predict the Liu family's rise was probably the Scripture of the Divine Spells of the Cavernous Abyss (CT 335 Dongyuan shenzhou jing 洞淵神咒經), composed sometime in the early fourth century. In coded language, it declares the fall of the Jin and the rise of the Lius as their legitimate successor, holding that Liu Yu's ascent signals the advent of an age of peace and prosperity under which the true teaching of the Dao will flourish.¹⁵⁵ A contemporaneous work borrows the same coded language to make the same point: the Jin will fall, and the Lius will succeed them.¹⁵⁶ A Celestial Masters work from the same period, the Scripture of the Inner Explanations of the Three Heavens (CT 1205 Santian neijie jing 三天內解經), connects the Liu family with the Dao itself and notes a series of auspicious signs that legitimate their rise.¹⁵⁷

¹⁵⁴ See Wang, Wei Jin Nanbeichao shi 359-360.

¹⁵⁵ See Seidel, "Image of the Perfect Ruler" 237-240. Christine Mollier reviews the internal textual evidence and argues conclusively for a date before or shortly after the ascent of Liu Yu in Une Apocalypse Taoïste, 56-60. See also EoT, s.v. "Dongyuan shenzhou jing."

¹⁵⁶ I refer here to the Scripture of the Numinous Treasure on the Causes and Conditions of Past Lives, of the Cavern of Mystery (CT 322 Taishang dongxuan lingbao benxing yinyuan jing 太上洞玄靈寶本行因緣經). See Mollier, ibid.

¹⁵⁷ See Bokenkamp, EDS 186-188, 221-222.

The second version of the Rectifying Methods appeared in this context. However, that version is not directly accessible to us. It is preserved in a much later compendium, the Pearl Satchel of the Three Caverns (CT 1139 Sandong zhunang 三洞珠囊).¹⁵⁸ The Pearl Satchel is the work of one Wang Xuanhe 王懸河 (fl. 664-684). We know frustratingly little of Wang. He was the calligrapher for two inscriptions of imperial texts, one in 664 and another in 684. This suggests he may have served the Tang emperor Li Zhi 李治 (Tang Gaozang 唐高宗, r. 650-84) in some capacity, and perhaps could have compiled the work at imperial command. An imperial audience is suggested by some section titles, such as “Laozi as the teacher of emperors” (老子為帝師品; see 9.8b), as well as the work’s general concern with the place of Daoism in history and society. But the circumstances of composition are especially difficult to reconstruct because the received version of the Pearl Satchel is not Wang’s original. The version he composed contained thirty juan; the one that has come down to us contains only ten. We do not know how, why, or by whom the work was rearranged. Some sections have been moved; some are missing entirely. But the general ideological thrust is clear. The Pearl Satchel is hortatory literature. Wang did not aim to present a complete survey of Daoist works; rather, he collected extracts containing theory and practice that he favored, as well as the biographies of exemplary Daoists who completed these practices and the benefits they achieved. The Daoism of the Pearl Satchel is not Daoism “as it was” in Wang’s day; it is Daoism as he wanted it to be.

So much is clear from the received work – though given its extensive modification, one must use it with care when attempting to distinguish between Wang’s editorial motives and those of his later redactors. But the Pearl Satchel's use of the Rectifying Methods gives us no reason to challenge the assumptions outlined above. Its only direct citation of that work concerns cosmological theory. The citation takes up almost four pages (9.1a-4b) of a five-page section called “The turning of the kalpas” 劫運品. A kalpa (rendered in Chinese as jie 劫) is a standard Indian unit denoting an unimaginably vast expanse of time that was imported into China along with the spread of Buddhism.¹⁵⁹ A simple conception of the kalpa divides it into two sorts: the small kalpa (xiao jie 小劫) and great kalpa (da jie 大劫). The Pearl Satchel's citation of the Rectifying Methods begins by presenting one method of computing cosmic time, continues by discussing the signs disasters attendant upon a conjunction of small kalpas, and concludes by discussing the signs attendant upon the conjunction of great kalpas. The work continues with much more detailed omens of the coming end, chiefly in the form of the movements of deities and other actions in the hidden realm that would be invisible to the mortal eye. I discuss these in more detail below. For the moment, I want to focus on the material that links the first post-Shangqing recension of the Rectifying Methods with contemporaneous literature that predicted the rise of the Liu family.

¹⁵⁸ What follows is based on TC, s.v. “Sandong zhunang,” and EoT, s.v. “Sandong zhunang.”

This material consists of another detailed prediction:

當有赤星見於東方，白彗干於月門，祆子續黨於蟲口，亂群墳尸於越川，人啖其種，萬里絕煙。強臣稱霸，弱主蒙塵，其後當有五靈曷瑞，義合本根。龍精之後，續族之君，平滅四虜，應符者隆，龍虎之世，三六乃清。民無橫命，柞無危患。自承之後四十六丁亥，是三劫之周。又從數五十五丁亥至壬辰，癸巳是也。則是大劫之周。天翻地覆，金玉化消，人淪山沒，六合冥一。

159 See DDB, s.v. “劫.” The version of the Rectifying Methods consulted by the editors of the Pearl Satchel differs from the classical Buddhist conception of a kalpa. While it follows the typical division into small 小 and great 大 kalpas, its subdivisions of those two periods of time are unique. Usually, a great kalpa is fulfilled after the passage of eight small kalpas, or a total of 1,347,000,000 years.

At this time, the Red Star¹⁶⁰ will appear in the east, the White Sweeper¹⁶¹ will transgress the Lunar Gate. Demons will link together at the mouth of the insects,¹⁶² chaotic mobs will pile their corpses in mounds at the rivers of Yue; people will eat their own posterity; after myriad li, the smoke of cooking fires will be cut off. Strong feudal lords will become hegemony; weak kings will flee the capital. After this there will be bright signs of the five numens; righteousness will accord with its root. The descendant of the Dragon-seed, the lord who continues the clan, will destroy the four rebels.¹⁶³ Talismanic responses will descend.¹⁶⁴ In the generation of the Dragon-tiger, the three-and-six will clarify. The people will have no [urge to] rebel; the throne will have no danger. In the forty-sixth dinghai year after Yao – this will be a complete cycle of three kalpas. Moreover, counting from the fifty-fifth dinghai year to the jisi [month?] of the [following] renchen year: this will be the completion of one great kalpa. Heaven and earth will be overthrown; jade and gold will transform and disappear. The people will sink into oblivion, and the mountains will be drowned. Everything in the Six Directions will become one in the darkness.¹⁶⁵

Many of the figures and portents in this passage remain obscure, but enough remains clear to make an educated guess at its meaning: the end times are at hand. The passage begins by invoking specific celestial phenomena that – unlike the movements in the hidden realm detailed in 9.1b-2a – would have been visible to human beings. It continues by obliquely referring to contemporary events. The “descendant of the Dragon-seed”

160 A star located in the first of the twenty-eight lunar mansions. See Handian, s.v. “赤星,” Grand Ricci, s.v. “角宿.”

161 The White Sweeper appears in the second juan of the Jin shu chapter on astronomy in a quote that nearly matches Zhang Shoujie’s 張守節 (?-?) Correct Meanings of the Records of the Grand Historian (Shiji zhengyi 史記正義) 27.20a. The latter was presented to the throne in the twenty-fourth year (736-737) of the Kaiyuan 開元 reign period (712-742). The interlinear commentary at 27.20 holds that the “essence” 精 of Venus “scatters” 散 into nine stars, one of them being the White Sweeper.

162 I am uncertain what this refers to. It appears to be the only appearance of the two characters 蟲口 as a binome in the canon, other than a citation of this passage at SDZN 9.3b-9.4a. The compound refers to a medicinal plant elsewhere in the Chinese literary corpus.

163 The “lord who continues the clan” is probably Liu Yu 劉裕 (363-422). This would make the “four rebels” four military commanders he defeated. Three of these are probably Sun En 孫恩 (?-402), his younger sister’s husband Lu Xun 盧循 (?-411) and Huan Xuan 桓玄 (369-404); I am uncertain of the fourth.

164 The implication here is that the actions of the “descendant of the Dragon-seed” will form the earthly half of a tally, and the heavenly half – in the form of the signs and wonders depicted above – will manifest.

165 SDZN 9.4aff.

probably refers to Liu Yu. The clan he continues is the house of Liu, founders of the Han 漢 dynasty (202 BCE-220 CE) whose surname had long been associated with dragons. While Liu himself claimed descent from the Han Lius, the facts of the matter are uncertain. That uncertainty was not shared by the author of this version of the Rectifying Methods, however. Like the authors of the Inner Explanations and the Divine Spells, they confidently augur a coming age of peace and prosperity presided over by the most powerful and successful warlord in recent memory.

Another version of the Rectifying Methods that existed around the same time makes the same confident prediction. We find it in the work of Lu Xiuqing 陸修靜 (406-477). A few important things happened around the time of his birth. First, a body of works called the Lingbao 靈寶 (or “Numinous Treasure”) revelations appeared sometime around 400. These works were a direct response to the popularity of the Shangqing revelations. They prominently feature the Ge 葛 family, relatives (and rivals) of the Taos who lived at the same place and time. The new revelations feature more exalted postmortem fates for members of the Ge clan, and in fact claim to supersede the authority of the Shangqing revelations entirely thanks to their own descent from a higher heaven.¹⁶⁶ Though Lu was initiated into the Shangqing lineage, he would later become a stout partisan of the Lingbao corpus. Second, of course, was the ascent of Liu Yu in 402. Though this happened before Lu’s time, the Liu clan would rise to the height of its power during the age of his maturity. As an élite in the favor of the royal family, Lu would certainly have been writing in response to their concerns.

¹⁶⁶ See Bokenkamp, “Sources of the Ling-pao Scriptures,” in Tantric and Taoist Studies in Honor of Rolf A. Stein (Brussels: Institute Belges des Hautes Études Chinoises, 1983) 2:442-443.

This context animates his version of the Rectifying Methods:

按經言：承唐之後四十六丁亥，其間先後庚子之年，妖子續黨於禹口，亂群填尸於越川，強臣稱霸，弱主西播，龍精之後，續祚之君，罷除僞主，退翦逆民，衆道勢訖，此經當行。推數考實，莫不信然。期運既至大法方隆。

The scripture states: “Forty-six dinghai years after [the sage-king Yao], sooner or later within that period of time, in the gengzi year [400], the short-lived ones will continue to form gangs at Yu’s mouth; the rebellious hordes will fill with their corpses the streams of Yue. A strong minister will declare himself hegemon; a weak lord will spread out towards the west. The descendant of dragon seed [is] the lord who will continue the Mandate.” This lord is to eradicate the false ruler and cut down and drive off the rebellious people. At this, the strength of the myriad ways will come to an end, and these scriptures will be put into practice. Figuring by the fated numbers and considering what actually happened, all [these predictions] have proven trustworthy. Since the foretold cycle has arrived, the Grand Law [of Lingbao] has risen to prominence.¹⁶⁷

The similarities to the earlier extract from the Pearl Satchel is obvious. So, too, are the differences. Like the Divine Spells and the Inner Explanations, Lu here predicts a peaceful world order administered by the Liu clan, whose rise is augured by the appearance in the year 400 of the Lingbao scriptures that legitimate their rule. This contrasts sharply with their role in the Pearl Satchel’s version. There, while they indeed preside over a peaceful world, their unification of the realm is merely one of several signs of the end times. The Lius have no power against the disasters that are to come.

¹⁶⁷ The translation is from Bokenkamp, “Lu Xiuqing, Buddhism” 192.

Table 2

Sequence of Events in the Apocalyptic Predictions of the Purple Texts, the Pearl Satchel, and Lu Xiujing's Preface

Purple Texts

Yao rules → 46 dinghai years elapse → Apocalyptic disasters and political decay befall before and after the jiashen year; a weak ruler is referred to in coded language; a remnant is saved → the Lord of the Golden Porte inaugurates an era of Great Peace in a renchen year

The Pearl Satchel

Yao rules → 46 dinghai years elapse → celestial records are rectified → apocalyptic disasters and political decay befall before and after the jiashen year; a remnant is saved → a strong ruler (Liu Yu) is referred to in coded language; he inaugurates an age of peace → the universe is destroyed in a renchen year

Lu's Preface

Yao rules → 46 dinghai years elapse → apocalyptic disasters and political decay befall in a gengzi year (400); a weak king is referred to in coded language; this weak king is supplanted by a strong ruler (Liu Yu). Auspicious omens descend; a peaceful era ensues.

This arrangement is not meant to suggest that the Pearl Satchel's version preceded Lu's. The relationship between the two is unclear, though it is evident that each drew on some version or versions of the Rectifying Methods that modified the Purple Texts.

The Shangqing version: a step forward

It is uncertain whether Lu is citing a different version of the Rectifying Methods or (as has been claimed) revising the version found in the Pearl Satchel.¹⁶⁸ Whatever the case, both versions cited above share a common ancestor in the apocalyptic predictions of the Purple Texts. Disaster strikes around the forty-sixth dinghai year after Yao; events in the political realm presage a peace. This basic timeline was reimagined twice in the Liu-Song. Both new versions augur the rise of the Lius, with coded references to a weak king being replaced by more obvious references to Liu Yu, who takes the realm from the king in question and ushers in a peaceful era. The key difference between the world of the Pearl Satchel and that of Lu's Preface hinges on the fate of this new world. For Lu, it continues under the Liu family's benevolent aegis. For the anonymous editor of the version found in the Pearl Satchel, their rule is but one sign of the coming end.

It is at precisely this point that the Pearl Satchel's version of the Rectifying Methods probably recalls its predecessor among Yang Xi's revelations. Much like the Purple Texts, the Pearl Satchel's Rectifying Methods promises that even as mountains founder and the world burns, not all will be lost:

惟高上三天，白簡青錄，乃得晏鴻翻而騰翔，飛景霄而盼目耳。

Only those [whose names are inscribed] in green records on white slips in the exalted Three Heavens will in ease and comfort take flight on great wings, fly on the phosphors to the empyrean, paying a visit to and fixing their regard upon [the Three Heavens].¹⁶⁹

168 Bokenkamp, "Lu Xiujing, Buddhism" 317 and n.41.

169 SDZN 9.4a-b. For a discussion of the term 盼目, see the appendix.

One learns the identity of the “green records on white slips” at the beginning of the Pearl Satchel’s citation of the Rectifying Methods:

白簡青錄，得道人名記。皇民譜錄，數極唐堯。是爲小劫一交。其中損益，有二十四萬人應爲得者。自承唐之後，數四十六丁亥，前後中間甲申之年，乃小劫之會，人名應定。

The names of those who will attain the Dao are recorded in green records on white slips. The numbers of the Genealogy of the People of the Three Sovereigns extended through the time of Yao. This was the turning of one small kalpa. During this time 2,400,000 were subtracted from the count of those who should attain [the Dao]. In the jiashen year sometime before or after the forty-sixth dinghai year after Yao, there will be a conjunction of small kalpas, and the records must be fixed again.

The passage from the Pearl Satchel quoted earlier that explicitly predicts Liu Yu’s rise functions like a commentary on this passage, detailing the specific signs that occur near the forty-sixth dinghai year after Yao. Those meant to survive the cataclysm have their names recorded on the heavenly lists – here called the “Genealogy of the People of the Three Sovereigns.” While this portion of the Pearl Satchel has clearly undergone editing by a Lingbao-affiliated author, I will suggest nonetheless that this is a collective name for all of the records included in the version of the Rectifying Methods received by Yang Xi. The presence of one’s name on these records guaranteed salvation from the disasters predicted by the work itself.

Chapter 5: A Lord of Space and Time: The Secret Essentials and the Quest for Power
The final iteration of the Rectifying Methods to appear during the early medieval period was a product of sectarian debate and imperial ambition. The pressure of these twin forces moved the editors of a government-sponsored encyclopedia to fashion a new version. The result was the Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens of the Cavern of Perfection (Dongzhen santian zhengfa jing 洞真三天正法經). It combined inherited and created material to meet the needs of a new political age.

The sociohistorical fabric

The bloody politics of the sixth century informed the creation of the Dongzhen zhengfa jing. Its place was the Northern Zhou 北周 (557-581), a kingdom formed from the ruins of the Western Wei 西魏 (535-556), itself a rump state of the Northern Wei 北魏 (386-534). Northern Zhou's foundations were laid by the general Yuwen Tai 宇文泰 (507-56), who poisoned the final emperor of the Northern Wei and inaugurated the Western Wei, with himself as the power behind the throne. As Tai lay dying of illness in 556, he faced a crisis of succession; with his own sons too young to assume power, he appointed Yuwen Hu 護 (515-572), the son of his eldest brother, as successor. Hu in turn crowned Tai's legitimate son Yuwen Jue 覺 (542-557) as the first emperor of the Northern Zhou. Jue was not Tai's oldest son, however; that honor belonged to Yuwen Yu 毓 (534-560), son of a concubine. This became relevant for the Northern Zhou when Jue came of age, at which point Hu poisoned him and installed Yu as emperor. Hu repeated the process in 560, this time appointing Tai's fourth son, Yuwen Yong 邕 (543-78), who would later be known by the posthumous name Emperor Wu of Zhou 周武帝. It was Emperor Wu who finally outwitted Yuwen Hu, assassinating him during a meeting with the Empress Dowager in 572. Thus, at age 30, Zhou Wudi became the first son of Yuwen Tai to hold power in his own right.¹⁷⁰

With his chief political rival dead, Emperor Wu began sweeping reforms to the structure of Northern Zhou social life. At the kingdom's inception, the economic and military power of Northern Zhou rested on the twin pillars of the equal-field (juntian 均田) system of land allotment, first developed during the Northern Wei, and the fubing 府兵 armies (an innovation of Yuwen Tai). Under the equal-field system, land was allotted to peasants according to their projected manpower. During the Northern Wei, for instance, this meant every male above twenty-five sui was given forty mu 畝 of arable land, with each woman being granted half that; in the Northern Zhou, each married couple was given one hundred and forty mu, divided into plots devoted to mulberry trees and various sorts of crops, and required to meet certain agricultural quotas. The fubing system divided the military into armies of various sizes. The base unit was the yitong 儀同, comprised of one thousand men; these were further grouped into bureaus called kaifu 開府, with two kaifu under the command of a general (da jiangjun 大將軍) and two generals under a Grand General, Pillar of the State (zhuguo dajiangjun 柱國大將軍). With a total of six Grand Generals, the early Northern Zhou had at its command 48,000 troops. Aside from its organization of the military, the fubing system also registered military households separately from the peasantry and exempted them from taxes and corvée. Zhou Wudi abolished this practice, combining the military and equal-field registries – a reform that vastly broadened the pool of potential recruits.¹⁷¹

¹⁷⁰ This summary of events is taken from Wang Zhongluo, Wei Jin Nanbeichao shi 565-569. Wang details Zhou Wudi's extensive economic and military reforms on pp. 569-580. Lewis provides an overview of the collapse of the Wei, the formation of the Northern Zhou, and the rise of the Sui on Empires 73-85.

One significant check on this reform was the vast number of Buddhist monasteries within Northern Zhou territory. According to one estimate, they numbered around ten thousand, housing around one tenth of the total population – some one million people. Jaques Gernêt, relying on Buddhist sources, raises the number of monasteries to over forty thousand and counts three million monastics in total. Because monastics were exempt from taxes, corvée labor, and military service, this represented a significant drain on the Northern Zhou coffers, as well as its agricultural output and military strength. These costs extended to the construction, maintenance, and ornamentation of monasteries, which often required significant expenditures of manpower and materials. One Northern Wei monastery in Luoyang, for instance, was over 200 meters tall and contained numerous furniture and decorations of gold and rare stone; the construction of another cost well over six hundred thousand in cash. While such displays of extravagance were rare, the sheer number of monasteries and monastics meant that aggregate costs were high.¹⁷² Emperor Wu's response was to institute the first persecution of Buddhism in Chinese history. He demolished thousands of temples, seizing their land and wealth to 171 Wang, Wei Jin Nanbeichao shi 574-575, 579. On the juntian system, see Hanyu dacidian, s.v. “均田.” It has been the subject of much scholarly attention. See, for instance, Han Guopan 韓國磐, Beichao Sui Tang de juntian zhidu [The equal field system of the Northern Dynasties, Sui, and Tang], Shanghai: Shanghai renmin chubanshe, 1984.

172 Wang, Wei Jin Nanbeichao shi 583, estimates the total number of monastics at one million, or around one-tenth of the total population; Jacques Gernet's estimates come from Les aspects économiques du Bouddhisme dans la société Chinoise du V^e au X^e siècles (Paris: École Française d'Extrême-Orient, 1956), 4. See also pp. 15-16.

fund his armies. He also laïcized vast numbers of monastics: two million in 574 alone. The result was a vast expansion in the land and labor available to the state, and a corresponding explosion in the size of the army: at its height, Emperor Wu commanded some 240,000 troops. He used this vast military force to conquer the neighboring state of Northern Qi at the end of 576, reunifying North China. His dominance of the region assured, he turned his attention to stabilizing the empire and asserting his own authority. The Dongzhen zhengfa jing played a minor role in this process as part of a much larger work.¹⁷³

The first comment on this work to be found in the historical record is a remark by the Buddhist monk Daoxuan 道宣 (596-667):

周武平齊……自續道書號《無上祕要》。

After Emperor Wu of Zhou pacified Qi... he compiled a Daoist book called the Secret Essentials of the Most High.¹⁷⁴

At first glance, this seems to be an unproblematic statement. John Lagerwey notes, however, that it is likely incorrect: the WSBY's compilation had probably commenced in 574 at the Belvedere for Penetrating to the Way (Tongdao guan 通道觀). Assuming Lagerwey's dating is sound, why would Daoxuan provide an incorrect date? The answer rests on a fundamental principle of Chinese historiography: within certain constraints, facts are subordinate to narrative. In the compilation of biographies, for instance, certain facts of a subject's life were routinely manipulated so that he or she conformed to the 173 For the size of Wudi's army, see Wang, Wei Jin Nanbeichao shi 580; for his "persecution" of Buddhism, see 584. Gernet, Les aspects 7 n 4, records him siezing 40,000 monasteries and distributing them to feudal lords.

174 The note appears in his Continued Biographies of Eminent Monks (Xu gaoseng zhuan 續高僧傳), T 50.436c10-14.

models set by famous worthies of previous ages. Interpolations and deletions were standard practice in this effort. Well-known incidents from tradition were frequently inserted at key points in the biography in order to convey the biographer's judgment on the subject or to illustrate the subject's character. Such manipulations would have been immediately evident to the intended audience, who would have understood them in these terms and not as blatant distortions of the historical record; indeed, "fictional" incidents that stretched the bounds of credulity would have been immediately noticed by that audience and, on occasion, were condemned by the biographer recruited by the deceased's friends and family.¹⁷⁵ Further, any biography – especially those included in the Standard Histories – was the final product of a long editorial process that required hard decisions about which episodes from the subject's life ought to be omitted and which included. Twitchett details the criteria a biographer would have applied in making such choices:

The historian sought to establish the subject's basic characterization by categorizing his biography in terms of one of the normalized roles [in imperial society]... To maintain consistency, the historian often had recourse to the device of recording events that did not fit into this general picture in some other section of the history, often in the annals or in somebody else's biography, so as to leave the picture of the individual intact and at the same time preserve his own professional integrity as a recorder of the true facts... Biographies, then, in spite of their having each derived from.. separate... [sources], were to be judged as a corpus of exemplary lives from a given period.¹⁷⁶

Knowledge of these historiographic conventions allows us to detect the ideological charge behind Daoxuan's comment. His "mistake" was justified by the ideological requirements of history writing. Even if he were not mistaken, the same ideological charge applies: by connecting the WSBY's compilation to the conquest of Qi, the historian implicates it in the process of unification.

¹⁷⁵ On the role of "fictional" incidents in Chinese biography, see Denis Twitchett, "Problems of Chinese Biography," in Arthur F. Wright and Denis Twitchett, eds., Confucian Personalities (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1962): 28-30.

¹⁷⁶ Twitchett, "Problems" 32-33.

This notion is supported by the general role of encyclopedias in a given emperor's ideological project. As detailed earlier, encyclopedias were more than simple repositories of facts. They were explicitly ideological efforts aimed at cementing a ruler's rhetorical authority. This is no less true of Daoist encyclopedias like the Wushang biyao than it is of "secular" works like the Taiping yulan. All partook of a common heritage that stretched back to the Warring States. In the words of Mark Edward Lewis:

In the late Warring States period, developments within the textual traditions and the political realm coincided to produce new forms of writing intended to encompass the world in writing... These works were part of a general trend proclaiming completeness or totality as the highest form of textual authority. This dream of writing the world in a single text prefigured, in turn, the enterprise of uniting the world in a single state. The close links in imperial China of political authority with textual mastery or patronage emerged out of this confusion of the intellectual and political realms in a shared ideal of a single, comprehensive authority. I call the texts reflecting this development "encyclopedic," not in the modern sense of a reference work consulted for basic information on all matters of concern, but in its original sense of "cycle of learning," grand schemes that led the reader through an ordered, often hierarchical sequence including all essential knowledge...[A]ll [of these works] sought to create a sense of completeness through appeals to schemata of recurrent patterns, ultimate origins, numerical categories implying totality... or related models.¹⁷⁷

As it happens, many of these same principles animated the compilation of the Wushang biyao. As Lagerwey notes:

The cosmological speculations of the Daoists... would not displease an emperor whose political ambitions fittingly demanded a religion that embraced all, from the highest heavens to the deepest hells... [T]he encyclopedia responds perfectly to this ideological exigency. Beginning with the Great Dao that precedes the division of the unitary qi, the Wushang biyao follows an itinerary that passes through all the distinctions of the heavens, the hells, divinities, writings, techniques, and prescriptions to arrive at a conclusion in spontaneity and the return to silence.¹⁷⁸

¹⁷⁷ Lewis, Writing and Authority in Early China (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1999), 287.

¹⁷⁸ Lagerwey, Wu-shang 29.

Lagerwey is commenting here on the organization of the Wushang, which begins with the parturition of primordial chaos into the heavens and continues by describing the heavens; the cycles of time; the bureaucracies of the unseen world; the gods' appearances, regalia, and attendants; the various sorts of Daoist writings (including scriptures, talismans, petitions, and hymns) and their proper transmission; methods for preserving the body and extending life; and finally the completion of the Way and the return to silence.¹⁷⁹ We see here a direct connection to the encyclopedic works of an earlier epoch, which – like those that would follow in the Tang and the Song – formed an ideological instrument for the unification of empire.

The ideological function of the WSBY in Zhou Wudi's reunification of China is further confirmed by the administrative work he undertook during its process of compilation. As Lagerwey notes:

According to the annals of the Book of Zhou, [Emperor Wu] spent the last eighteen months of his life reorganizing the administration of his enlarged empire and preparing the unification of all of China... [T]he end of the reign of Emperor Wu was as much devoted to the political unification of China as... the beginning was to the ideological unification of his empire. It is for this reason that it seems probable to us that this phrase in the Continued Lives has only an indicative value.

The compilation of the Wushang biao was part of a long and ambitious plan. It is of a piece with his early administrative work to stabilize and expand the Northern Zhou, his military conquests, and the later reorganization of his empire. All were driven by the same aim: to unify and rule all of China. Central to this effort was the ideological foundation provided by a detailed and coherent written world.

179 See EoT, "Wushang biao," and Lagerwey, Wu-shang 220-221.

A Buddhist critique and a Daoist response

The coherent world of the Secret Essentials arose in response to a variety of editorial pressures. The two most important were the ideological needs of the nascent Zhou state and the critiques of Buddhist monks and functionaries who were competing to meet these needs with Confucian and Daoist counterparts. The conflict gave rise to a series of court debates held by Emperor Wu, from which the Daoists emerged victorious.¹⁸⁰ The victors did not ignore the critiques of their opponents, however. As a compilation of extracts from various Daoist works, the Secret Essentials depended for its own coherence on the coherence of its constituent works. It was this exact point that attracted the ire of Buddhist polemicists. Notable among these was the mathematician and astronomer Zhen Luan 甄鸞 (fl. 535-81). While not a monk himself, Zhen's sympathy for Buddhism was sufficient to prompt the compilation (at imperial command) of a treatise measuring the relative merits of Buddhism and Daoism. The result was Laughing at the Dao (Xiaodao lun 笑道論), presented to the throne of Emperor Wu in 570. Displeased with Zhen's effort, the emperor ordered the work burned. A summary survives in the later Expanded Collection Spreading the Light of Buddhism (Guang hongming ji 廣弘明集, 7th c.). Zhen presents extracts from a variety of Daoist works organized into thirty-six chapters. These chapters cover a variety of topics; cosmogony, cosmology, and demonology constitute just a few. In each case, Zhen cites Daoist works on his chosen topic to form what he considers a coherent position, before offering a response headed by the phrase "I laugh at this and say...” 臣笑曰……. His response draws on other Daoist works that contradict the position he establishes in the first section of the chapter.

180 The debates are discussed extensively in Livia Kohn, Laughing at the Tao: Debates Among Buddhist and Taoists in Medieval China (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1995), 3-46. Lagerwey, Wu-shang 21ff discusses their background as it relates to the Secret Essentials.

It is Zhen’s work that preserves the first post-revelation recension of the Rectifying Methods. He cites the work four times, in each case on matters of cosmogony, cosmology, and the creation of humankind. (For a discussion and translation of these citations, see Appendix E.) Each citation is designed to contradict some other account of these matters as portrayed in a different Daoist work. This ideological thrust should remind us that Zhen was at least as interested in providing a damning picture of Daoism as he was in faithfully presenting his source material. However, it is inappropriate to dismiss his version of the Rectifying Methods as a distortion of whatever version he had at hand (despite the fact that this might indeed be the case). Like all other authors of the Rectifying Methods’ various incarnations, he worked under specific historical constraints with a particular purpose in mind. The different version preserved in the Secret Essentials shows that its editors took Zhen’s product seriously.¹⁸¹

Their regard for Zhen’s critique is particularly evident in their first citation of the Rectifying Methods. The sixth juan of the Secret Essentials demonstrates the latter in particular. It forms a unit with juan seven, which concerns the foundations of moral action. Both are implicit in the creation of the state, because good government proceeds from the moral excellence of the ruler and the harmony of the state with the cosmos.¹⁸²

181 Appendix C provides a full translation of each quotation or mention of the Rectifying Methods found in the Secret Essentials, as well as a brief discussion of how the translated material fits into the editors’ larger project. What follows here excerpts that material.

182 This harmony was sometimes literal. Sound and tuning were matters of concern not just in what we today consider “musical” contexts, but in the synchronization of human conduct and the cosmic order. This concern is reflected in a treatise on tuning included in the History of the Latter Han (Houhan shu 後漢書) as well as forays into musicology by the courtiers of Wang Mang’s 王莽 (45 BCE-23 CE) Xin 新 Dynasty (9-25 CE). See Noa Hegesh, “In Tune with the Cosmos: Tuning Theory, Cosmology,

Obviously, such harmony was only possible when the ruler possessed intimate knowledge of the cosmos' inner workings. The editors of the Secret Essentials appeal to the Rectifying Methods on exactly this point.

The version of the Rectifying Methods they consult contains two different methods of computing cosmic time. Each is subdivided into earthly and heavenly components. Both methods begin with the smallest unit of time and build to small and great kalpas, with disasters accompanying the change of each; the conjunction of great kalpas is accompanied by the worst disasters of all.¹⁸³ While the two methods share common terminology, each also contains unique periodizations; further, the terminus of each calendrical method is different, with different disasters accompanying it.

The heavenly component of the first method (ZHDZ 28.110a.14-b.22) emphasizes the motion of heavenly qi. It first introduces the Celestial Pass, which is pushed forward by the stars of the Dipper and cycles through each of the Nine Heavens. Each heaven has four doors, with each door being associated with a period (literally “watch” hou 候). In one day and one night, the Dipper pushes the Celestial Pass through one door, thus completing one period; when the Pass has moved through each period in each of the Nine Heavens, one revolution (lun 輪) is completed; one revolution thus constitutes 36 complete cycles of day and night. Three hundred and sixty revolutions constitutes one circuit (zhou 周) of the Nine Heavens. At this point, the qi of the Six Heavens returns to and Concepts of Sound in Early China” (PhD diss., University of Pennsylvania, 2018).

183 A kalpa (rendered in Chinese as jie 劫), is a standard Indian unit denoting an unimaginably vast expanse of time. It was imported into China along with the spread of Buddhism. See DDB, s.v. “劫.” The version of the Rectifying Methods consulted by the editors of the Secret Essentials differs from the classical Buddhist conception of a kalpa. I present these alternative periodizations below. See also chapter x, p. x, n. x.

the upper Three Heavens, which rectify the qi and send it back down. 3600 circuits completes one small kalpa. This is a period of great change: in the heavens, the Nine Qi are transformed and rectified, and celestial emperors shift places in the otherworldly bureaucracy. On earth, evil spirits are annihilated along with the vast majority of humankind. With only good people remaining, earthly government is tranquil and all is harmonious.

The terrible events that accompany the conjunction of great kalpas are a marked contrast. Great kalpas, like their smaller counterparts, are measured in circuits: where 3600 complete one small kalpa, a great kalpa requires 9900. At this time, the qi of the celestial bodies moves with unusual vigor. In response, the demons and devils that inhabit the human realm multiply and become similarly agitated, causing illness and harm at will. The story stops here; no era of peace is promised, nor are any humans destined for salvation. Moving on to the earthly component, we find it similarly bleak.

Where the focal point of the heavenly component was on the qi of the Nine Heavens, the earthly component centers around the proper circulation of yin qi and yang qi. Earthly timekeeping revolves around the terrestrial counterpart to the Celestial Pass: the Floodgates of the Earth (diji 地機). These are located in the southeast, under the Nine Springs. Every day, the ji 機 lines of the earth (introduced later) push earthly waters eastward, and so qi – presumably yin qi, associated with waters and darkness – gathers at the Floodgates after each cycle of day and night. From there it circulates upwards to the Heavenly Source. This latter is presumably a locale of intense yang qi (correlated with light and heat); the infusion of yin qi would then serve to balance it. For 33 days and nights – constituting one revolution (lun 輪) – this cycle maintains itself. After one complete revolution, however, yin qi and yang qi fall out of balance. The northeastern Heavenly Source extends, and the southwest – the location of Fengdu and likewise a gathering point for yin qi – contracts. The yin qi destined for the Heavenly Source flows downward, and the Nine Rivers overflow. Yin qi surges over the earth. 330 such revolutions constitute one measure (du 度), at which point apocalyptic figures associated with yin convene or ascend to the Three Heavens. 330 measures are one “yin blockage” (yin fou 隱否). In response to the buildup of yin qi, the moon (a focal point of yin qi) is eclipsed, and so floods cover the earth. 9300 measures constitute the end of one great kalpa, at which point the Nine Springs surge forth, “mountains and seas merge in the darkness, and all in the Six Directions is laid bare. This is the end of one yin cycle, the stimulation of the qi of the earth.” Yin qi – the qi of the earth, in contrast to the yang qi of the heavens – is thus in severe excess. At a later point in the text, we learn what happens when yang is in excess and yin deficient, but first chapter six of the Secret Essentials introduces the divisions of the sky and the earth, while reintroducing terms we have already seen.

What immediately follows is the second method of computing time, centered around gang 綱 (“net”) and ji 機 (“cable”) lines. Gang lines divide the sky into twelve portions, while ji lines (which first appear above) divide the earth by the same number. As before, a circuit occurs after 360 revolutions of the Celestial Pass, while a measure occurs after 330 revolutions of the Floodgates of the Earth. At this point, two new terms are introduced: “yang swelling” (yang bo 陽勃) and “yin corrosion” (yin shi 陰蝕). The former occurs after 3600 complete circuits (i.e., one small kalpa according to the first method); the latter occurs after 330 measures (i.e., one yin corrosion according to the first method). A small kalpa ends when a yin corrosion and a yang flourishing both occur at the same time. At this point, the qi of heaven and earth reverse their usual order: heavenly qi becomes yin, while earthly qi becomes yang. As in the first method, “the myriad emperors change their stations,” but new changes are also introduced. Along with the reversal of the qi of heaven and earth, the cosmic order is upended: the sun and moon quit their revolutions, the Nine Springs run dry, and a variety of apocalyptic deities appear. However, we learn that the seed people survive – though we are not told how. A complete reversal of the cosmic order might seem bad enough, but the end of a great kalpa promises yet more horrors. A great kalpa ends at the conjunction of 9900 complete heavenly circuits (a “yang corrosion”) and 9300 earthly measures (a “yin flourishing”). At this point the entire universe is destroyed and then reverts to primal unity: “Heaven is upended and earth is flipped; the seas surge and rivers burst their dikes; humankind disappears and mountains drown; gold and jade transform and disappear; and all in the six directions muddles into one.”

It is understandably tempting to read this passage eschatologically, but doing so ignores its context. J. six and seven are not concerned with the end of the world; they are concerned, as Lagerwey notes, with the order of the universe and the foundation for proper moral action within it – that is, the rhetorical foundation of Emperor Zhou’s state. Their concerns become even more apparent when one browses the chapter contents themselves. Immediately after the cosmological speculations discussed above, one finds discussion of mythical sovereigns (6.5a-7b; these individuals may or may not have been taken as real by the readers of the time); an introduction to the lands outside the central plain (6.7b-10a); a discussion of virtuous rule (6.10a-b); and advice on governance (6.11aff).¹⁸⁴ The context clearly places speculation on the end of the universe within the realm of what we might call political science. The point is not the universe's end, but its continuation. Emperor Wu's ability to measure that continuation demonstrates the potential of his government to accord with the natural rhythms of the continuing cosmos.

The Secret Essentials' other citations or mentions of the Rectifying Methods further emphasize the emperor's intimate knowledge of the cosmos. The compilation moves from a general account of the cosmos and its cycles to its celestial inhabitants and the individual works they send down to human beings; the prescriptions contained in these works and their regimes of practice; the minutiae of daily life these regimes require; and the beneficial effects for the adept who practices the regimes faithfully – namely, union with the great Dao.¹⁸⁵ We find the Rectifying Methods inserted at appropriate points in this structure. So, j. 22, which concerns the organization of the celestial bureaucracy and the abodes of its various deities, places the work in a specific celestial palace. J. 30-32, on the provenance, character, and function of celestial writings – including, significantly, their power as political tools for the transformation of imperial subjects – discusses the amulets in the Rectifying Methods and the powers they bestow upon the bearer. J. 43, on ritual dress and the recitation of scriptures, details the proper procedures for chanting a hymn that formed part of the Methods.¹⁸⁶ The overall picture is of a work that was reshaped by new authors in response to political exigency and sectarian critique.

184 See Lagerwey, Wu-shang 50-51. Where he has 論德品, both HFL and ZHDZ eds. have 論意品. The contents, however, still concern morality and just governance. See ZHDZ 28.23a-b.

185 Lagerwey discusses this structure extensively in Wu-shang, pp. 38-48.

The Shangqing version: a step forward

The amulets discussed in j. 30-32 are worthy of extended discussion because they provide the closest link between the Rectifying Methods and the Shangqing corpus. A previous chapter discussed how the Shangqing adept could hope to escape the end times with recourse to a variety of methods. One of these required his or her name to be inscribed on the appropriate celestial lists – a task that could be accomplished (inter alia) via meditation exercises, incantations, or the wearing of talismans. A version of the Rectifying Methods preserved in the Pearl Satchel of the Three Caverns gave a collective name for the lists: The “Genealogy of the People of the Three Sovereigns.” The Secret Essentials goes into more detail about the lists themselves and their relationship to the amulets found in the Rectifying Methods.

The locus of this detail is a long quotation from a work devoted to celestial lists. The Scripture of the Return to the Nine Heavens, Mystical Records of the Seven Saints of the Jade Emperor of Utmost Purity (CT 1379 Shangqing yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing 上清玉帝七聖玄紀迴天九霄經) details these lists and relevant information about them.¹⁸⁷ In a section called “The Lodged Lot of Those who Encounter Scripture” (Yujing sufeng pin 遇經宿分品), the Secret Essentials quotes the Mystical Records extensively (though in a different form than we find it today). What follows in the ¹⁸⁶ These are just a few of the Secret Essentials’ citations or mentions; see Appendix E.

¹⁸⁷ For more on this work, see Appendix E.

“Lodged Lot” is a long series of citations from other scriptures about the same material. Among these is a quote from the Rectifying Methods that links its own amulets to the heavenly lists in the Mystical Records. While the latter work concerns itself with practices that help the adept inscribe his or her name in these records, the quote from the Rectifying Methods holds that receipt of a given amulet acts as proof that the recipient’s name is already inscribed in the associated celestial record. These proofs are enumerated in a list of entries that are identical in format: “All whose names are inscribed in [record X] will attain sight of [amulet Y]” 凡名參……者得見…… The Secret Essentials thus reassures the adept that – should they possess the relevant amulet – their names are already inscribed on the celestial lists. They are safe from disaster.

This quotation from the Mystical Records is important because it provides a tight link between the Secret Essentials’ version of the Rectifying Methods and the Shangqing corpus as a whole. Although the received Records has been pieced apart and edited, portions of it – including the section on celestial lists – are verifiably ancient. These lists provide a solid link to another early Shangqing work. This is The Annals of Lord Lao of the Latter Age (CT 442 後生道君列記) The Annals is a member of the original Shangqing corpus that is devoted to the Lord of the Golden Porte. It opens with his biography and describes his efforts to save humankind as well as the heavens to which certain elect will ascend, should their names be inscribed on the appropriate celestial records.¹⁸⁸ 188 See TC, s.v. “Shangqing yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing,” and R 2:225-228. For more on these works, see Appendix E and the notes.

Conclusion: Afterlives

The previous chapters summarized the probable form and content of Yang Xi's version of the Rectifying Methods. Our two chief sources for the material were the sixth-century compendium called the Secret Essentials of the Most High and the seventh-century hortatory encyclopedia called the Pearl Satchel of the Three Caverns. Both projects were conducted by editors with their own agendas who were responding to their own conditions, and these exigencies left their mark on the Rectifying Methods. They dictated what material from earlier versions was selected for inclusion, what was omitted, and – in one particular case – what was invented. While the versions of the Rectifying Methods preserved in the two works were demonstrably reshaped to fit the needs of their times, they still provide clues to the content of the version revealed to Yang Xi. This was probably a work that was consistent in tenor with the rest of his revelations. It would have combined apocalyptic prophecy with methods to escape the end times that relied on the chanting of hymns, the wearing of amulets, and exercises to inscribe the adept's name on celestial lists. Later authors' revisions of Yang Xi's material led to versions of the work that had fundamentally different ideas about the end of the world. It is to these ideas that we now turn.

Versions and voices

This dissertation began in part by introducing the concept of literary “voices.” These are different, relatively unified perspectives that can be discerned within a single work. My example was the “Priestly” and “Lay” voices usually discerned in the Pentateuch. The first was concerned with the principles of creation and featured an abstract, distant God;

the second accounted for some of the fundamental problems of daily human life, with a God who walks in the garden in the cool of the day. The Rectifying Methods displays a similar duality. This is only true if one sees it as a “work” in McGann’s sense – an abstract entity that supervenes its constituent versions. Taking this view, one can discern two different voices. One continued the eschatological bent of its immediate predecessor, while the other – which quickly became dominant – featured a world in no danger of an imminent end. The first voice I will call “apocalyptic;” the second, “continuous.”

The final days

The Shangqing corpus is characterized most of all by its eschatological vision. This might seem counterintuitive, given that so few expositions of the end times survive. (The Rectifying Methods, as it exists in the Pearl Satchel and the Secret Essentials, is actually one of the longest.) But the intense concern held by Yang Xi and his associates with the eschaton is reflected more than anything else in the detailed methods to escape it preserved in the works revealed to him. The exact date of the end as it features in those revelations is uncertain; the Purple Texts provides only a loose sketch of the events surrounding them, featuring a failing political order and a weak king supported by warlords. The version of the Rectifying Methods preserved in the Pearl Satchel is remarkable for its elucidation of this sketch. The focus turns to the “descendant of the Dragon-seed” who restores the realm. However, the peaceful world he presides over is short-lived; soon enough, all is destroyed as it reverts to the state of primal unity that precedes the beginning of a new kalpa. The end as depicted in the Purple Texts receives new urgency as the signs that surround it, originally nebulous, become much clearer: the king is clearly identifiable, as are stellar and terrestrial omens that would have been visible to the naked eye. Anyone could see that the end was nigh.

The world continues

Around the same time, strikingly similar language was being used by the Lingbao prelate Lu Xiuqing to emphasize the world's continuity. Whether he was modifying the Pearl Satchel's version or referring to one of his own, Lu used some version of the Rectifying Methods to make the case to the Liu-Song kings that the Lingbao canon was an auspicious sign that both augured and legitimated their rise. The Lius would pacify a disordered realm and inaugurate a peaceful age. In the Purple Texts, as in the Pearl Satchel's version of the Rectifying Methods, political disorder (whether pacified or not) was only a prelude to the end of the kalpa and the concomitant reversion of all into nothing. Lu's version omits this part of the story – one that was probably integral to the Shangqing version – and instead presents the disorders as a backdrop for the Liu family's rise to power.

The longest addition to the Rectifying Methods arose in a very similar context. 150 years after Lu Xiuqing presented his version to the throne of Liu Yu, the editors of the Secret Essentials of the Most High found themselves working for the benefit of a different king with equally grand ambitions. Fresh from the conquest of the north, Emperor Zhou of Wu signaled his intention to unify all of China with the creation of a comprehensive mirror of the universe in the realm of writing. Untroubled by Daoism's apparent contradictions, Emperor Wu found in the religion a vehicle for his own ideological legitimation. At imperial command, his team of editors compiled a work that reflected in the rhetorical realm the unity the emperor sought to bring to the material world. The result was none other than the Secret Essentials. Its compilers were also sensitive to recent challenges by Buddhists and their sympathizers at court, and their extensive interpolations to the Rectifying Methods reflected these dual goals. Elaborate methods of marking cosmic time served both to illustrate their patron's mastery over the cosmos and reply to Buddhist charges of incoherence. While the continuous voice thus proved popular at the imperial level across the centuries, Daoist authors with no apparent concern for imperial politics also found it useful during the same period.

Further uses of the “Rectifying Methods”

It was this continuous voice that dominated further use of our work. Authors felt free to extract specific techniques to suit their own needs, while leaving the apocalyptic content – one of the most significant components of the Shangqing revelations as a whole – behind. One of the earliest examples of this is the Precious Writs.¹⁸⁹ This is a collection of Shangqing and Lingbao amulets probably dating from the Northern and Southern Dynasties period that includes several entries found in the Secret Essentials version of the Rectifying Methods, all unattributed. Some of the Shangqing amulets featured here belong to the original revelations, while others are later. In contrast to the sometimes-complicated transmission histories found in the Secret Essentials (see the section of Appendix C on j. 30-32) every amulet here is subsumed under the heading “Transmitted by the Queen Mother of the West” 西城金母王夫人受. This is an important difference.

¹⁸⁹ The full title is Precious Writs and True Formulas on [Prescribed] Lengths of Silk, Determining the Rank of Those who Seek Immortality (CT 128 Taishang qiuxian dinglu chisu zhenjue yuwen 太上求仙定錄尺素真訣玉文).

The Shangqing deities associated with transmitting methods to mortals are the Lord of the Golden Porte and the Azure Lad. They both appear in the transmission history of the Secret Essentials, and both typically transmit their methods to a select few mortals just before the apocalypse. The Queen Mother of the West, by contrast, has no historical apocalyptic association. The notable absence of deities associated with the apocalypse is the first hint that the author of the Precious Writs was less preoccupied with the end times than the author of the Shangqing version of the Rectifying Methods. Further evidence follows immediately. The Precious Writs opens with a template for an ordination ritual that accompanies the transmission of the text. The template begins in the typical format: “On the first day of such-and-such month of such-and-such year...” 某年月朔日甲子 before noting that the adept must have already been ordained at lower level in order to receive the Precious Writs. The generic template and concern with ordination hierarchy presuppose a transmission ceremony to be repeated many times under many circumstances, as well as a set of ordination practices that are widely-established. Both of these premises are out of place in a world that is about to end.¹⁹⁰

The Rectifying Methods are put to similar use in a contemporaneous text, the Forty-four Prescriptions on Yellow Silk.¹⁹¹ This quotes a chant given in the Shangqing version, the purpose of which is to repel demons. The Forty-four Prescriptions seeks to integrate into the original Shangqing revelations a few methods that postdate it slightly. It presents itself as “statutes on yellow silk” 黄素之科, and contains extensive rules for its own transmission as well as the transmission of other works. This emphasis on transmission is not unusual for members of the original Shangqing corpus; many contain such rules, as well as penalties for breaking them. What is unusual is the degree of ritualization. Transmission requires the involvement of several officiants who are listed by title, and it is these titles that betray the late date of the text. They only arose after both the Shangqing and Lingbao revelations, and mark the beginning of a shift towards an ecclesiastical hierarchy that would reach its fullest form centuries later. For the same reason as the Precious Writs, the Forty-four Prescriptions endorses a worldview that relies on the continuation of the cosmos in much the same form as it already existed.

¹⁹⁰ I take the opposition between apocalyptic orientation and an emphasis on organization from New Testament criticism of the letters of Paul. Many scholars dispute the authenticity of the so-called “Pastoral Epistles” – 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus – based on their concern with church hierarchy; concern for the long-term longevity of the church as an organized body clashes with the emphasis on the imminent end of the world established in the genuine Pauline letters. For an introduction to this view, see Bart D. Ehrman, The New Testament: A Historical Introduction 2nd ed. (New York: Oxford University Press, 2000): 357-362. On CT 128, see TC, s.v. “Taishang qiuxian dinglu chisu zhenjue yuwen,” R 2: 427. The summarized passages are on CT 128 1a.

¹⁹¹ The work number is CT 1380. The full title is Shangqing taishang huangsu sishisi fang jing 上清太上黄素四十四方經. See R 2: 229-232.

Both the apocalyptic and continuous voices of the Rectifying Methods testify to the generative potential early medieval editors found in the work. It attracted the interest of different audiences, who modified it with different goals in mind. One question that immediately suggests itself is: what made the Rectifying Methods so special to so many different people in so many different contexts? Is there some unique spark within the work itself, hidden like a lamp under a bushel? Or was it simply random chance that caused it to catch the eye of so many across the centuries? Finding a way out of this dilemma is beyond the scope of the present work. For now, I want only to note that none of the changes in the work across the early medieval period were wholesale innovations. The earliest version contained within it all the elements that later editors would find so appealing. The cosmological speculation added by the editors of the Secret Essentials found precedent in the story of origin and destruction that probably formed part of the work first revealed to Yang Xi. The amulets excerpted by the editors of the Precious Writs and the incantation quoted by the author of the Forty-four also probably sprung from that same common source. This might suggest to some that the Rectifying Methods' generative potential is intrinsic to the work itself – that it contained some unique essence that possessed transhistorical appeal. This assumption falls flat, however, when one notes that every use to which the Rectifying Methods was put depended on a particular historical situation. Certain people with certain interests somehow came into contact with a version or versions of the same work and adapted it to their own purposes. The version(s) of the Rectifying Methods they produced were therefore a co-production of the existing resources provided by the work itself and the interests of the editors who appealed to it.

The “Rectifying Methods” as material object

The focus of the Rectifying Methods' editors quickly shifted away from the next world to this one. At the same time, their editorial practices varied. Some authors were content to preserve the essential integrity of the text, merely inserting or deleting portions as necessary. Others took a more radical approach. In their eyes, it was not necessary to keep the Rectifying Methods whole in order for the work to be of use. Both of these tendencies are already on display during the Northern and Southern Dynasties with the Precious Writs and the Forty-Four Prescriptions, which extract amulets and/or incantations from the Rectifying Methods and place them in separate collections to be transmitted during ordination rituals. Compared to the earlier versions of the Rectifying

Methods, these works show an attenuated concern with the end of the world. The Precious Writs, for instance, lacks any apocalyptic deities, and contains a template for an ordination ritual that presupposes different grades of ordination. This suggests a developed ritual structure that requires continuity over time – a concern far removed from the editors behind the Rectifying Methods transcribed by Yang Xi. The continuous voice in the Rectifying Methods only became more pronounced as time moved on.

Continuing a trend that began with the Precious Writs and the Forty-four Prescriptions, the Rectifying Methods or the amulets it contains began to be transmitted during ordination rituals. One example of this is the Protocol of the Ritual Pledges, a mid-Tang work that enumerates the physical goods to be offered as pledges of sincerity upon attaining a higher rank in the organizational framework of Tang Daoism.¹⁹² Other works invoke the Rectifying Methods or its talismans for healing or personal protection.¹⁹³ One factor that unites these disparate catalogues is that they presuppose not the end of the world but its continuation. The amulets originally found in the Rectifying Methods no longer feature in the esoteric knowledge of a small group; rather, they exist in a communal context. Paradoxically, they sometimes confer powers, like ascent to the heavens, that are typically meant to rescue the adept from the end of the world. But the settings in which the amulets were used and transmitted suggest that these powers were not expected to be exercised on the spot. (This is in contrast to other powers, like healing or the summoning of spirit guards, that would have been of more immediate import.)

192 The full title is CT 1244 Shoulu cidi faxin yi 受籙次第法信義. See TC 461-462.

193 See CT 1347 Dongzhen taishang shangqing neijing 洞真太上上清內經 and CT 463 Yaoxiu keyi jielü chao 要修科儀戒律鈔.

While the editors of these later texts see no need to strip the amulets of salvific powers connected to the end of days, their immediate concerns lie elsewhere.

Another unifying factor in each of these applications – ritual, apotropaic, or healing – is the role played by the Rectifying Methods. In each case what matters is not only its text – the meaning it contains – but its physical presence as an object. The legitimate possession of the Rectifying Methods or its amulets is what certifies a Daoist's admission to a higher grade in the ritual hierarchy. Legitimate possession, not semantic content, is what ensures its proper function as a demon-queller or curative – that is, as a controller of spirits. Scholarly students of the Rectifying Methods must therefore leave behind the Müllerian vision of religious texts (what I have called “works”) as containers of meaning that provide access to a religion's core beliefs. That is simply not how the Rectifying Methods functions.

Different works, different needs, different times

If the compilers of the Ming Daoist canon had been successful in their attempt to fix the Rectifying Methods, one would expect references to other versions to drop off as the received version became hegemonic. But this is not the case: a variant remained popular centuries afterwards. The Book of Ancient Subtleties (Guweishu 古微書) was compiled by Sun Jue 孫穀 (fl. 1607-1608) in an attempt to reconstruct lost apocryphal texts based on existing quotations. When the study of apocryphal texts exploded during the Qing, the Book of Ancient Subtleties became the foundational text of the new field. Sun quotes the Rectifying Methods extensively in sections on cosmology, and the material cited is none other than the elaborate methods of marking cosmic time inserted by the editors of WSBY 6 – and excluded, for whatever reason, from the received version.¹⁹⁴ Sun never indicates he doubts the legitimacy of the version he has at hand; indeed, he never mentions the canonical version in his sections on cosmology. Why Sun chose to cite the Rectifying Methods here is less important than the fact that he chose to cite a non-canonical version.¹⁹⁵ This shows that while one version may have received official sanction, at least one influential author felt free to ignore it. Canonizers are not always successful.

The introduction situated the Rectifying Methods alongside other works that found different shapes under the hands of different editors. Like the Rectifying Methods, distinct versions of the Secret Revelation to John and the story of Ghazi Miyan were produced to suit the purposes of different editors. Contingent circumstances spurred these authors to find cultural resources in each work that appealed to their individual purposes. If this is the manner in which works are reproduced and altered, to designate any version “final” can only be a motivated move. In the case of a canon (officially-sponsored or otherwise), the motivations of the participants are more or less clear. Clear, too, are the scholarly motives that underlie the compilation of a critical edition. One major difference 194 See Guweishu 33.9a-10a, 35.57a-58a. Chen is commenting on a story of the decline of civilization after Yu tamed the flood, apparently taken from TPYL 2.7a, 36.5a. The citation from the Rectifying Methods he inserts here is not included in the source material, so I assume it is his own addition. On the Guweishu, see Yang Quan 杨权, “Chenwei yanjiu shulüe” [A summary of research on the Weft Texts], Zhongguo shi yanjiu dongtai 6 (2000): 12-13. Sun attained his jinshi 進士 degree – the highest degree granted by the imperial examination system – in the 35th year of the Wanli Emperor’s 萬曆 reign, corresponding to the period between January 28th, 1607 and February 15th, 1608 in the Western calendar. I assume 穀 is a misprint for 穀 for a few reasons. First, the Book of Ancient Subtleties is elsewhere attributed to a 孫穀. See An Examination of the Charts of the Book of Changes 易緯稽覽圖 3b. In addition, the entry for Sun Yue is preceded by the one for his father, Sun Yuhou 孫羽侯 (jinshi 1589/90). On the dates for Chen and his father, see the Huarong xianzhi [Annals of Huarong County] 1882/1883, repr. Huarong jiaoyuju, 1930/31: 178-179.

195 It is of course possible that Sun lacked access to the canonical version, but I assume an elite literatus moving in imperial circles would have had both access to and familiarity with the canon.

between the two is that the latter makes explicit the principles of its own construction, leaving open the possibility of different configurations – the addition, deletion, or reinterpretation of material. The former seeks to hide the circumstances that gave rise to itself, presenting the resulting configuration of material as the only natural one. In a related rhetorical move, canonizers seek to set a seal on the creative process that leads to new versions. By adopting the view point of the canonizer, scholars of the Rectifying Methods adopt these two goals as their own and shut a window upon the lives of people who used and altered the work they study.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

This bibliography lists the works consulted during the writing of this dissertation. In addition, it aims to introduce the reader to some of the important works in Daoist and Chinese studies in English, Chinese, Japanese, and French. My Japanese being limited, the inclusion of a Japanese work should by no means indicate I have read it in exhaustive detail.

PRIMARY SOURCES

For works in the Taishō canon I have consulted the online edition published by the Chinese Buddhist Electronic Text Association (Zhonghua dianzi Fodian xiehui 中華電子佛典協會) and available at CBETA.org. Works in the Siku Quanshu 四庫全書 are cited in the same way as HFL (see below), and follow the editions available at ctext.org and <https://www.kanripo.org>. Works in the Daoist Canon are cited according to their number in Volume 3 of TC. For passages marked ZDHz, I have consulted:

Zhang Jiyu 張繼禹 comp. Zhonghua daozaog 中華道藏. 49 vols. Beijing: Huaxia chubanshe 夏出版社, 2004).

When this abbreviation is absent, or when I have included the abbreviation HFL, I have followed the Hanfenlou edition of 1923-26. Works therefrom are cited by juan 卷 (“scroll”) and page number, followed by “a” for recto, and “b” for verso – e.g. “46.7b” indicates the recto side of page seven of juan 46.

WORKS IN THE DAOIST CANON

CT 1 靈寶無量度人上品妙經 Lingbao wuliang duren shangpin miaojing

CT 5 太上無極總真文昌大洞仙經 Taishang wuji zongzhen Wenchang dadong xianjing

CT 6 上清大洞真經 Shangqing dadong zhenjing

CT 7 大洞玉經 Dadong yujing

CT 22 元始五老赤書玉篇真文天書經 Yuanshi Wulao hishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing

- CT 55 高上太霄琅書瓊文帝章經 Gaoshang taishang taixiao langshu qiongwen dizhang jing
- CT 56 太上玉珮金璫太極金書上經 Taishang yupei jindang taiji jinshu shangjing
- CT 64 九天應元雷聲普化天尊玉樞寶經集註 Jiutian yingyuan leisheng puhua tianzun yushu baijing jizhu
- CT 87 元始無量度人上品妙經四注 Yuanshi wuliang duren shangpin miaojing sizhu
- CT 89 元始無量度人上品妙經通義 Yuanshi wuliang duren shangpin miaojing tongyi
- CT 91 元始無量度人上品妙經註解 Yuanshi wuliang duren shangpin miaojing zhujie
- CT 103 太上無極總真文昌大洞仙經註 Taishang wuji zongzhen Wenchang dadong xianjing zhu
- CT 128 太上求仙定錄尺素真訣玉文 Taishang qiuxian dinglu chisu zhenjue yuwen
- CT 133 太上洞房內經注 Taishang dongfang neijing zhu
- CT 166 元始上真衆仙記 Yuanshi shangzhen zhongxian ji
- CT 167 洞玄靈寶真靈位業圖 Dongxuan lingbao zhenling weiye tu
- CT 184 太真玉帝四極明科經 Taizhen yudi siji mingke jing
- CT 292 漢武帝內傳 Han Wudi neizhuan
- CT 294 列仙傳 Liexian zhuan
- CT 303 紫陽真人內傳 Ziyang zhenren neizhuan
- CT 318 自然九天生神章經 Ziran jiutian shengshen zhangjing
- CT 320 洞玄靈寶丹水飛術運度小劫妙經 Dongxuan lingbao danshui feishu xiaojie miaojing
- CT 322 太上靈寶天地運度自然妙經 Taishang lingbao tiandi yundu ziran miaojing
- CT 352 太上洞玄靈寶赤書玉訣妙經 Taishang dongxuan lingbao chishu yujue
- CT 354 上清三元玉檢三元布經 Shangqing sanyuan yujian sanyuan bujing

- CT 361 太上洞玄靈寶八威召龍妙經 Taishang dongxuan lingbao bawei zhaolong maojing
- CT 369 太上洞玄靈寶滅度五鍊生尸妙經 Taishang dongxuan lingbao miedu wulian shengshi miaojing
- CT 375 太上洞玄靈寶天尊說濟苦經 Taishang dongxuan lingbao tianzun shuo jiku jing
- CT 388 太上靈寶五符序 Taishang lingbao wufu xu
- CT 405 上清紫精君黃初紫靈道君洞房上經 Shangqing zijing jun huangchu ziling daojun dongfang shangjing.
- CT 421 登真隱訣 Dengzhen yinjue
- CT 426 洞真太上八素真經 Dongzhen taishang basu zhenjing
- CT 427 上清修行經訣 Shangqing xiuxing jingjue
- CT 442 上清後生道君列記 Shangqing housheng daojun lieji
- CT 446 上清衆經諸真聖祕 Shangqing zhongjing zhuzhenshengbi
- CT 456 太上洞玄靈寶三元品戒功德輕重經 Taishang dongxuan lingbao sanyuan pinjie gongde qingzhong jing
- CT 463 要修科儀戒律鈔 Yaoxiu keyi jielü chao
- CT 489 金錄解壇儀 Jinlu jietan yi
- CT 507 太上黃籙齋儀 Taishang huanglu zhaiyi
- CT 547 靈寶玉鑑 Lingbao yujian
- CT 605 四明洞天丹山圖詠集 Siming dongtian danshan tu yong ji
- CT 615 赤松子章歷 Chisongzi zhangli
- CT 616 廣成集 Guangcheng ji
- CT 736 南華真經章句音義 Nanhua zhenjing zhangju yinyi

- CT 742 南華真經註疏 Nanhua zhenjing zhushu
- CT 783 墉城集仙錄 Yongcheng jixian lu
- CT 789 正一法文天師教戒科經 Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie ke jing.
- CT 790 女青鬼律 Nüqing guilu
- CT 880 太清金液神丹經 Taiqing jinye shendan jing
- CT 1016 真誥 Zhen'gao
- CT 1032 雲笈七籤 Yunji qiqian
- CT 1114 太上洞玄靈寶本行宿緣經 Taishang dongxuan lingbao benxing suyuan jing
- CT 1125 洞玄靈寶三洞奉道科戒營始 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi
- CT 1127 陸先生道門科略 Lu Xiansheng Daomen ke lue
- CT 1128 道門經法相承次序 Daomen jingfa xiangcheng cixu
- CT 1138 無上祕要 Wushang biyao
- CT 1139 三洞珠囊 Sandong zhunang
- CT 1168 太上老君中經 Taishang Laojun zhongjing
- CT 1205 太上三天正法經 Taishang santian zhengfa jing
- CT 1205 三天內解經 Santian neijie jing
- CT 1219 高上神霄玉清真王紫書大法 Gaoshang shenxiao yuqing zhenwang zishu dafa
- CT 1220 道法會元 Daofa huiyuan
- CT 1125 洞玄靈寶三洞奉道科戒營始 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi
- CT 1244 受錄次第法信義 Shoulu cidi faxin yi
- CT 1269 上清修身要事經 Shangqing xiushen yaoshi jing

- CT 1313 洞真高上玉帝大洞雌一玉檢吾老寶經 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi dadong ciyi yujian wulao baojing
- CT 1315 洞真上清青要紫書金根衆經 Dongzhen Shangqing qingyao zishu jingen zhongjing
- CT 1314 洞真太上素靈洞元大有妙經 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing
- CT 1317 洞真上清開天三圖七星移度經 Dongzhen shangqing kaitian santiantu qixing yidu jing
- CT 1323 八素真經服食日月皇華訣 Basu zhenjing fushi riyue huanghua jue
- CT 1324 洞真太上八素真經登壇符札妙訣 Dongzhen taishan basu zhenjing dengtan fuzha miaojue
- CT 1328 洞真太上八道命籍經 Dongzhen taishang badao mingji jing
- CT 1329 太上九赤班符五帝內真經 Taishang jiuchi banfu wudi neizhen jing
- CT 1330 洞真太一帝君太丹隱書洞真玄經 Dongzhen taiyi dijun taidan yinshu dongzhen xuanjing
- CT 1331 洞真上清神州七轉七變舞天經 Dongzhen Shangqing shenzhou qizhuan qibian wutian jing
- CT 1332 洞真太上紫度炎光神玄變經 Dongzhen taishang zidu yanguang shenxuan
- CT 1334 洞真太上神虎隱文 Dongzhen taishang shenhu yinwen
- CT 1336 洞真太上金篇虎符真文經 Dongzhen taishang jinpian hufu zhenwen jing
- CT 1338 上清高上金元羽章玉清隱書經 Shangqing gaoshang jinyuan yuzhang Yuqing yinshu jing
- CT 1339 洞真八景玉籙晨圖隱符 Dongzhen bajing yulu chentu yinfu
- CT 1344 洞真太上說智慧消魔真經 Dongzhen taishang shuo zhihui xiaomo zhenjing
- CT 1345 洞真太上道君元[= 玄]丹經 Dongzhen taishang daojun yuandan shangjing
- CT 1347 洞真太上上清內經 Dongzhen taishang shangqing neijing

- CT 1352 洞真太上太霄琅書 Dongzhen taishang taixiao langshu
- CT 1355 上清高上滅魔洞景金元玉清隱書經 Shangqing gaoshang miemo dongjing jinyuan yuqing yinshu jing
- CT 1358 上清高上金元羽章玉清隱書經 Shangqing gaoshang jinyuan yuzhang yuqing yinshu jing
- CT 1360 上清九天上帝祝百神內名經 Shangqing jiutian shangdi zhu baishen neiming jing
- CT 1364 上清洞真智慧觀身大戒文 Shangqing dongzhen zhihui guanshen dajie wen
- CT 1368 上清迴神飛霄登空招五星上法經 Shangqing huishen feixiao dengkong zhao wuxing shangfa jing
- CT 1372 上清高上玉晨鳳臺曲素上經 Shangqing gaoshang yuchen fengtai qusu shangjing
- CT 1373 上清外國放品青童內文 Shangqing waiguo fangpin qingtong neiwen.
- CT 1376 上清太上帝君九真中經 Shangqing taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing
- CT 1377 上清太上九真中經絳生神丹訣 Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue
- CT 1378 上清金真玉光八景飛經 Shangqing jinzhen yuguang bajing feijing
- CT 1379 上清玉帝七聖玄紀迴天九霄經 Shangqing Yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao fa
- CT 1380 上清太上黃素四十四方經 Shangqing taishang huangshu sishisi fang jing
- CT 1382 上清九丹上化胎精中記經 Shangqing jiudan shanghua taiqing zhongji jing
- CT 1389 上清高聖太上大道君洞真金元八景 Shangqing gaosheng Taishang Dadao jun dongzhen jinyuan bajing
- CT 1393 上清元始變化寶真上經九靈太妙龜山玄籙 Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiuling taimiao guishan xuanlu
- CT 1395 上清大洞九微八道大經妙籙 Shangqing dadong jiuwei badao dajing miaolu

CT 1411 洞玄靈寶長夜之府九幽玉匱明真科 Dongxuan lingbao changye zhi fu jiuyou yukui mingzhen ke

WORKS IN THE BUDDHIST CANON

T 50 虛高僧傳 Xu gaoseng zhuan

T 603 陰持入經 Yinchi ru jing

T 2110 辯正論 Bianzheng lun

T 2013 廣弘明集 Guang hongming ji

WORKS IN THE SIKU QUANSHU

古微書 Guweishu

禮記集說 Liji jishuo

呂氏春秋 Lüshi qunqiu

史記正義 Shiji zhengyi

太平御覽 Taiping yulan

易緯稽覽圖 Yiwei jilan tu

揚子雲集 Yangzi yunji

文選 Wen xuan

周禮注疏 Zhouli zhushu

REFERENCE WORKS

Reference works are listed by the abbreviation used in the dissertation.

Daojiao dacidian: Daojiao dacidian 道教大辭典. 1st ed. Beijing: Huaxia chubanshe 華出版社, 1993.

- EoT: Pregadio, Fabrizio, ed. The Encyclopedia of Taoism. 2 vols. Abingdon, UK: Routledge, 2008.
- Grand Ricci: Le Grand Dictionnaire Ricci de la langue chinoise*. 1st ed. 7 Volumes. Paris and Taipei: Instituts Ricci and Desclée de Brouwer, 2001.
- Handian: Hanyu Dacidian 漢語大辭典, with supplement. Shanghai: Hanyu dacidian chubanshe 漢語大辭典出版社 1993. Supplement copyright 2010.
- Kroll: Kroll, Paul W. A Student's Dictionary of Classical and Medieval Chinese. Leiden: Brill, 2015.
- TC: The Daoist Canon: A Historical Companion to the Daozang. 3 vols. Edited by Kristofer Schipper and Franciscus Verellen. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 2004.
- Zhonghua daojiao dacidian: Hu Fuchen 胡孚琛, ed. Zhonhua daojiao dacidian 中華道教大辭典. Beijing: Zhongguo shehui kexue chubanshe 中國社會科學出版社, 1995.

WORKS IN FRENCH AND ENGLISH

- Amin, Shahid. Conquest and Community: The Afterlife of Warrior Saint Ghazi Miyan. Hyderabad: Orient Blackswan, 2015.
- Aune, David E. Apocalypticism, Prophecy, and Magic in Early Christianity. Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006.
- Benedict, Ruth. Patterns of Culture. New York: Mentor Books, 1959 [1934].
- Bumbacher, Stephan Peter. Fragments of the "Daoxue zhuan": Critical Edition, Translation, and Analysis of a Medieval Collection of Daoist Biographies. European University Studies Series 27, Asian and African Studies 78. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1996.
- . Empowered Writing: Exorcistic and Apotropaic Rituals in Medieval China. St. Petersburg, FL: Three Pines Press, 2012.
- Bokenkamp, Stephen. Ancestors and Anxiety: Daoism and the Birth of Rebirth in China. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2007.
- . With a contribution by Peter Nickerson. Early Daoist Scriptures. Taoist Classics 1. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1997.

- . “Lu Xiujing, Buddhism, and the First Daoist Canon.” In Culture and Power in the Reconstitution of the Chinese Realm, 200-600, edited by Scott Pearce, Audrey Spiro, and Patricia Ebrey, 181-199. Cambridge, MA: The Harvard University Asia Center, 2001.
- . “Research Note: Buddhism in the Writings of Tao Hongjing.” Daoism: Religion, History, and Society 6 (2014): 247-268.
- . “The Silkworm and the Bodhi Tree: The Lingbao Attempt to Replace Buddhism and Our Attempt to Place Lingbao Taoism.” In Religion and Chinese Society, edited by John Lagerwey. Hong Kong and Paris: École française d’Extrême-Orient and The Chinese University of Hong Kong, 2004: 317-339.
- . “Sources of the Ling’pao Scriptures.” In Strckmann 1983, 434-486.
- . “Time After Time: Daoist Apocalyptic History and the Founding of the T’ang Dynasty.” Asia Major, 3rd Series 7.1 (1994): 59-88.
- . “Word as Relic in Medieval Daoism.” In Medieval and Early Modern Devotional Objects in Global Perspective: Translations of the Sacred, edited by Elizabeth Ann Robertson and Jennifer Jahner, 21-35. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2010.
- Bujard, Mariane. “State and Local Cults in Han Religion.” In Early Chinese Religion Part Two: The Period of Division (220-589 AD) 2, edited by John Lagerwey and Lü Pengzhi. Volume 21, number 2 of Handbook of Oriental Studies 4: China. Leiden: Brill, 2010.
- Campany, Robert Ford. Making Transcendents: Ascetics and Social Memory in Early Medieval China. Honolulu: University of Hawai’i Press, 2009.
- . “The Sword Scripture: Recovering and Interpreting a Lost 4th-Century Daoist Method for Cheating Death.” Daoism: Religion, History, and Society No. 6 (2014): 33-84)
- . To Live as Long as Heaven and Earth: A Translation and Study of Ge Hong’s “Traditions of Divine Transcendents.” Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 2002.
- Carré, Patrick. Le Livre de la Cour Jaune: Classique taoïste des IV-Ve siècles. Paris: Éditions du Seuil, 1999.
- Chennault, Cynthia, Keith N. Knapp, Alan J. Berkowitz, and Albert E. Dien, ed. Early Medieval Chinese Texts: A Bibliographic Guide. China Research Monograph 71.

- Berkeley, CA: Institute of East Asian Studies at the University of California, Berkeley, 2015.
- Copp, Paul. The Body Incantatory: Spells and the Ritual Imagination in Medieval China. New York: Columbia University Press, 2014.
- Csordas, Thomas. "Embodiment and Cultural Phenomenology." In Perspectives on Embodiment: The Intersections of Nature and Culture, edited by Gail Weiss and Honi Fern Haber, 143-162. New York: Routledge, 1999.
- Czedich, Ursula-Angelica. "The Organon of the Twelve Hundred Officials and its Gods." Daoism: Religion, History and Society, no. 1 (2009): 1-93.
- Denzey Lewis, Nicola, and Justine Ariel Blount, "Rethinking the Origins of the Nag Hammadi Codices." Journal of Biblical Literature 133, no. 2 (2014): 399-419.
- Duquette Smith, Cynthia, and Theresa Bergman. "You Were on Indian Land: Alcatraz Island as Recalcitrant Memory Space." In Places of Public Memory: The Rhetoric of Museums and Memorials, edited by Greg Dickson, Carole Blair, and Brian L. Ott, 160-188. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2010).
- Girardot, Norman. "Max Müller's Sacred Books and the Nineteenth-Century Production of the Science of Comparative Religions." In History of Religions 41, no. 3 (Feb., 2002): 213-250.
- Dien, Albert. Introduction to State and Society in Early Medieval China, edited by Albert E. Dien, 1-29. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1990.
- "Editorial Statement." Material Religion 1, no. 1 (2005): 4-9.
- Ehrman, Bart. After the New Testament: A Reader in Early Christianity. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- . The New Testament: A Historical Introduction. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Eliade, Mircea. The Myth of the Eternal Return. Translated by Willard R. Trask. Princeton, NJ: Princeton/Bollingen Paperbacks, 2005.
- . The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion. Translated by Willard R. Trask. (Orlando: A Harvest Book, 1957).
- . Preface to The Quest: History and Meaning in Religion, n.p. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969. Reprinted by Midway, 1984.

- Eno, Robert. "Shang State Religion and the Pantheon of the Oracle Texts." In Early Chinese Religion Part One: Shang Through Han, edited by John Lagerwey and Marc Kalniwsky, 41-102. Volume 21, number 1 of Handbook of Oriental Studies 4: China. Leiden: Brill, 2009.
- Funk, Wolf-Peter. "The Linguistic Aspects of Codifying the Nag Hammadi Gospels." In Les textes de Nag Hammadi et le problème de leur classification: Actes du colloque tenu à Québec du 15 au 19 Septembre 1993, edited by Louis Painchaud and Anne Pasquier, 107-147. Quebec City, Quebec: Les Presses de l'Université Laval, 1995.
- Gallagher, Edmon L., and John D. Meade. The Biblical Canon Lists from Early Christianity: Texts and Analysis. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2017.
- Gernet, Jacques. Les aspects économiques du Bouddhisme dans la société Chinoise du V^e au X^e siècles. Paris: École Française d'Extrême-Orient, 1956.
- Granet, Marcel. Études sociologiques sur la Chine. Paris: Presses universitaires de France 1953.
- Harvey, Paul. "Transcendental Empiricism and the Transcendental Blues: A Response to More Than Belief." Material Religion 24, no. 4-5 (2012): 445-463.
- Hegesh, Noa. "In Tune with the Cosmos: Tuning Theory, Cosmology, and Concepts of Sound in Early China." PhD diss., University of Pennsylvania, 2018.
- Hsieh Hsu-wei "Writing From Heaven: Celestial Writing in Six Dynasties Daoism." PhD diss., Indiana University, 2005.
- Hughes, Jennifer Schepper. "A Materialist Theory of Religion: The Latin American Frame." Material Religion 24, no. 4-5 (2012): 430-44.
- Johnson, Sylvester A. "The Rise of the Nacirema and the Descent of European Man: A Response to Manuel A. Vásquez's More Than Belief. Material Religion 24, no. 4-5 (2012): 464-481.
- Jülch Thomas. "In Defense of the Saṃgha: The Buddhist Apologetic Mission of the Early Tang Monk Falin." In The Middle Kingdom and the Dharma Wheel: Aspects of the Relationship between the Buddhist Saṃgha and the State in Chinese History, edited by. Thomas Jülch, 18-93. Leiden: Brill, 2016.
- The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium*, edited by Alexander P. Kazhdan. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1991.

- King, Karen. The Secret Revelation of John. Harvard, MA: Harvard University Press, 2006. First paperback edition, 2008. Page references are to the paperback edition.
- Kleeman, Terry. Celestial Masters: History and Ritual in Early Daoist Communities. Harvard-Yenching Institute Monograph Series 102. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2016.
- . “Exorcising the Six Heavens: The Role of Traditional State Deities in the Demon Statutes of Lady Blue.” In Reiter 2011: 89-104.
- . Great Perfection: Religion and Ethnicity in a Chinese Millennial Kingdom. Honolulu: University of Hawai’i Press, 1998.
- . “Licentious Cults and Bloody Victuals: Sacrifice, Reciprocity, and Violence in Traditional China.” Asia Major, 3rd series, 7.1 (1994): 185-211.
- Knechtges, David R. “Wen xuan.” In Chennault 2015: 380-388.
- Kohn, Livia. Laughing at the Tao: Debates Among Buddhist and Taoists in Medieval China. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1995.
- Lagerwey, John. Wu-shang pi-yao: Somme Taoïste du Vie siècle. Paris: École Française d’Extrême Orient, 1981
- Lanciotti, Lionello, and Piero Corradini, eds. Understanding Modern China: Problems and Methods. Rome: Centro Ricerche Sinologiche, Istituto Italiano per il Medio ed Estremo Oriente, 1979.
- Layton, Bentley. The Gnostic Scriptures: Ancient Wisdom for the New Age. A New Translation with Annotations and Introductions. New York: Doubleday, 1995.
- Lewis, Mark Edward. China Between Empires: The Northern and Southern Dynasties Period. Cambridge, MA, and London: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 2009.
- . Writing and Authority in Early China. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1999.
- Lin Hsin-yi. “Dealing with Childbirth in Medieval Chinese Buddhism.” PhD diss., Columbia University, 2017.
- Li Ling, “An Archaeological Study of Taiyi (Grand One) Worship.” Translated by Donald Harper. Early Medieval China 2 (1995-96): 1-39.

- Loewe, Michael. Divination, mythology, and monarchy in Han China. University of Cambridge Oriental Publications 48. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- . “The authority of the emperors of Ch’in and Han.” In Loewe 1994: 85-111.
- . “Water, earth and fire.” In Loewe 1994: 55-60.
- Lofton, Kathryn. “The Body (Under Review): On Manuel Vásquez’s More Than Belief. Material Religion 24, no. 4-5 (2012): 482-496.
- “Lord Byron.” The Courier, February 1, 1814.
- “Lord Byron.” The Morning Post, February 8, 1814.
- Lundhaug, Hugo, and Lance Jennot. The Monastic Origins of the Nag Hammadi Codices. Studien und Texte zu Antike und Christentum 97. Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2015.
- Marks, Herbert, ed. The English Bible: King James Version: The Old Testament: A Norton Critical Edition. New York: W.W. Norton and Co., 2012.
- Masuzawa, Tomoko. “Culture.” In Critical Terms for Religious Studies, edited by. Mark C. Taylor, 70-93. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- McGann, Jerome. A New Republic of Letters: Memory and Scholarship in the Age of Digital Reproduction. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2014.
- . “Theory of Texts.” Review of Bibliography and the Sociology of Texts: The Panizzi Lectures 1985, by D.F. McKenzie. London Review of Books, February 18th, 1988.
- Metzger, Bruce M. The Canon of the New Testament: Its Origin, Development, and Significance. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1987.
- Miščević, Dušana Dušanka. “Oligarchy or Social Mobility? A Study of the Great Clans in Early Medieval China.” PhD dissertation, Columbia University, 1992.
- Miller, James. China’s Green Religion: Daoism and the Quest for a Sustainable Future. New York: Columbia University Press, 2017.
- Mollier, Christine. “La méthode de l’empereur du nord du mont Fengdu: Une tradition exorciste du Taoïsme médiéval.” T’oung Pao, Second Series, 83.4/5 (1997): 329-385.

- . Une Apocalypse taoïste du Ve siècle: Le livre des incantations divines des grottes abyssales. Paris: Collège de France, 1990.
- Muers, Rachel, and Rhiannon Grant. "Documentary Theology: Testing a New Approach to Texts in Religious Communities." Journal of the American Academy of Religion 86, no. 3 (2018): 616-641.
- Nattier, Jan. A Guide to the Earliest Chinese Buddhist Translations: Texts from the Eastern Han and Three Kingdoms Periods. Bibliotheca Philologica et Philosophica Buddhica 10. Tokyo: The International Research Institute for Advanced Buddhology, Soka University, 2008.
- Nylan, Michael. The Five 'Confucian' Classics. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Pankenier, David. Astrology and Cosmology in Early China: Conforming Earth to Heaven. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2013.
- . "The Cosmo-Political Background of Heaven's Mandate." Early China 20 (1995): 121-176.
- Pinsky, Robert. "Marianne Moore's 'Poetry': Why did she keep revising it?" Slate, June 30th, 2009. http://www.slate.com/articles/arts/poem/2009/06/marianne_moore's_poetry.html
- Prothero, Rowland E. The Works of Lord Byron: A New, Revised, and Enlarged Edition, With Illustrations, vol. II. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1898. Available at <https://archive.org/details/in.ernet.dli.2015.235130/page/n1>.
- Queen, Sarah. From Chronicle to Canon: The Hermeneutics of the Spring and Autumn, According to Tung Chung-shu. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Raines, John. Marx on Religion. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2002.
- Raz, Gil. "Creation of Tradition: The Five Talismans of the Numinous Treasure and the Formation of Early Daoism." PhD diss., Indiana University, 2004. ProQuest (3134135).
- "The Way of the Yellow and Red: Re-examining the Sexual Initiation Rite of Celestial Master Daoism." Nan Nü 10 (2008): 86-120.
- Reiter, Florian, ed. Exorcism in Daoism: A Berlin Symposium. Asien-und Afrika-Studien der Humboldt-Universität zu Berlin 36. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz Verlag, 2011.

- Robinet, Isabelle. "Introduction au Kieou-tchen tchong-king." Society for the Study of Chinese Religions Bulletin 7 (Fall 1979): 24-43.
- . La révélation du Shangqing dans l'histoire du Taoïsme. 2 vols. Publications de L'École Française d'Extrême Orient 138. Paris: L'École Française d'Extrême Orient, 1984.
- . "Le Ta-tung chen-ching: Son authenticité et sa place dans les textes du Shang-ch'ing ching." In Strickmann, Tantric Studies, 394-433.
- . Taoist Meditation: The Maoshan Tradition of Great Purity. Translated by Julian F. Pas and Norman Girardot. Albany: SUNY Press, 1993.
- Robson, James. Power of Place: The Religious Landscape of the Southern Sacred Peak (Nanyue 南嶽) in Medieval China. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2009.
- Schafer, Edward. Pacing the Void: T'ang Approaches to the Stars. Warren, CT: Floating World Editions, 2005.
- Schipper, Kristofer. "Millénarismes et messianismes dans la Chine ancienne." In Lanciotti and Corradini, Understanding Modern China, 31-49.
- Seidel, Anna. "The Image of the Perfect Ruler in Early Taoist Messianism: Lao-tzu and Li Hong." History of Religions 9, no. 2-3 (1969-1970): 216-247.
- . "Imperial Treasures and Taoist Sacraments: Daoist Roots in the Apocrypha." In Strickmann, Tantric Studies, 291-371.
- . La divinisation de Lao Tseu dans le taoïsme des Han. Paris: Ecole Française d'Extrême-Orient, 1969.
- . "Taoist Messianism." Numen, no. 31 (1983): 161-74.
- Smith, Adam. "The Chinese Sexagenary Cycle and the Ritual Origins of the Calendar." In Calendars and Years II: Astronomy and Time in the Ancient and Medieval World, edited by John M. Steele, 1-37. Oxford: OxbowBooks, 2010.
- Smith, J.Z. "The 'End' of Comparison: Redescription and Rectification." In A Magic Still Dwells: Comparative Religion in the Postmodern Age, edited by Kimberley C. Patton and Benjamin C. Ray, 237-241. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.

- Stein, Rolf. "Les mouvements du taoïsme politico-religieux au IIe siècle ap. J.-C." T'oung Pao, Second Series, 50.1/3 (1963): pp. 1-78.
- . "Religious Taoism and Popular Religion." In Welch and Seidel 1979: 53-81.
- Stocking, George W., Jr. Victorian Anthropology. New York: The Free Press, 1987.
- Stone, Jon R. The Essential Max Müller: On Language, Mythology, and Religion. New York: Palgrave MacMillan, 2002.
- Strickmann, Michel. Chinese Magical Medicine. Edited by Bernard Faure. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2002.
- . "The Longest Taoist Scripture." History of Religions 17, no. 3/4 (1978): 331-354.
- . "The Mao-Shan Revelations: Taoism and the Aristocracy." T'oung Pao 63 (1977): 1-64.
- . "On the Alchemy of T'ao Hung-ching." In Facets of Taoism: Essays in Chinese Religion, edited by Holmes Welch and Anna Seidel, 123-192. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1979.
- , ed. Tantric and Taoist Studies in Honor of Rolf A. Stein, vol. 2. Mélanges chinoises et bouddiques 21. Brussels: Institut Belge des Hautes Études Chinoises, 1983.
- Suvorova, Anna. Muslims Saints of India: The Eleventh to Fifteenth Centuries. New York: RoutledgeCurzon, 2004.
- Swartz, Wendy, Robert Ford Campany, Yang Lu, and Jessey J.C. Choo, eds. Early Medieval China: A Sourcebook. New York: Columbia University Press, 2014.
- Tian Xiaofei. The Record of a Dusty Table: Tao Yuanming and Manuscript Culture. Seattle: University of Washington, 2005.
- Twitchett, Denis. "Problems of Chinese Biography." In Confucian Personalities, edited by Arthur F. Wright and Denis Twitchett, 24-39. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1962.
- Vásquez, Manuel. More Than Belief: A Materialist Theory of Religion. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2011.
- . "Work at the Limits: A Response to My Critics." Material Religion 24, no. 4-5 (2012): 497-517.

- Verellen, Franciscus. "The Heavenly Master Liturgical Agenda According to Chisong zi's Petition Almanac." Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 14: 291-343.
- "Voices from Alcatraz Island." Indian Country Today, September 2, 2017.
<https://newsmaven.io/indiancountrytoday/archive/voices-from-alcatraz-island-rhwn dtlnwES8WRChgoRsuw/>
- Ware, James, trans. and ed. Alchemy, Medicine, and Religion in the China of A.D. 320: The Nei P'ian of Ko Hung ("Pao-p'u tzu"). New York: Dover Publications, 1966.
- Tim Lai-chi. "The 'Demon Statues of Nüqing' and the Problem of the Bureaucratization of the Underworld in Early Heavenly Master Daoism." T'oung Pao 88.4/5 (2002): 251-81.
- Walters, J. Edward. Review of The Biblical Canon Lists from Early Christianity: Texts and Analysis, by Edmon L. Gallagher and John D. Meade. Reading Religion, September 6th, 2018. <http://readingreligion.org/books/biblical-canon-lists-early-christianity>.
- Weibke, Denecke, Wai-yee Li, and Xiaofei Tian, ed. The Oxford Handbook of Classical Chinese Literature (1000 BCE – 900 CE). New York: Oxford University Press, 2017.
- Welch, Holmes, and Anna Seidel, eds. Facets of Taoism: Essays in Chinese Religion. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1979.
- Wells, Matthew. "Baopuzi." In Chennault 2015: 6-12.
- Wilkinson, Endymion. Chinese History: A New Manual, Revised & Enlarged. 5th ed. (digital). Harvard University Asia Center, 2018.
- Zacchetti, Stefano. "An Early Chinese Translation Corresponding to Chapter 6 of the Peṭakopadeśa: An Shigao's Yin chi ru jing T 603 and its Indian Original: A Preliminary Survey." Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London 65.1 (2002): 74-98.
- Zürcher, Erik. "Buddhist Conquest of Early Taoism." Buddhism in China: The Collected Papers of Erich Zürcher, edited by Jonathan A. Silk. Leiden: Brill, 2013.
- . "'Prince Moonlight': Messianism and Eschatology in Early Medieval Chinese Buddhism." T'oung Pao 68 (1982): 1-75.

Zurndorfer, Harriet T. "The Passion to Select, Collect, and Protect: Fifteen Hundred Years of the Chinese Encyclopedia." In Encyclopaedism from Antiquity to the Renaissance, ed. Jason König and Greg Woolf (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2013), 505-28.

WORKS IN CHINESE AND JAPANESE

Chen Guofu 陳國符. Daozang yuanliu kao 道藏源流考 [An investigation into the origins and evolution of the Daoist canon]. Beijing: Zhonghua shuju chubanshe 中華書局出版社, 1963.

Feng Yujie. 冯渝杰 "Lun Wudoumi dao de 'guanliao xing' tezhi" 論五斗米道德 "官僚性" 特質 [On the bureaucratic nature of the Wudoumi sect of daoism]. Sichuan daxue xuebao (Zhhexue shehui kexue ban) 四川大學學報 (哲學社會科學版) 1 (2016): 126-134.

Fukunaga Mitsugi 福永光司 钦伟刚. "Zhongguo zongjiao sixiang shi (shang) 中國宗教思想史(上) [A history of Chinese religious thought, part one]. Translated by Qin Weigang. Zongjiaoxue yanjiu 宗教學研究 4 (2008): 122-137.

Gao Guofan 高國藩. Dunhuang fuzhou fengsu 敦煌符咒風俗 [Customs surrounding talismans and incantations in Dunhuang]. Dunhuang minsuxue congshu 敦煌民俗學叢書. Dongya wenhua chubanshe 東亞文化出版社, 2005.

Gu Jiegang 顧頡剛 and Yang Xiangkui 楊向奎. "Sanhuang kao" 三皇考 [A study of the Three Emperors]. In Gu shi bian 古史辨 [Disputations of the Ancient Histories], compiled by Gu Jiegang 顧頡剛. Shanghai: Shanghai guji chubanshe 上海古籍出版社, 1981 7.2: 20-282.

Han Guopan 韓國磐. Beichao Sui Tang de juntian zhidu 北朝隋唐的均田制度 [The equal field system of the Northern Dynasties, Sui and Tang]. Shanghai: Shanghai renmin chubanshe 上海人民出版社, 1984.

Hu Baitao 胡百涛. "Liuchao Daojiao Shangqing pai cunsi daofa yanjiu – yi Shangqing Dadong Zhenjing wei zhongxin" 六朝道教上清派存思道法研究 – 以《上清 大洞真經》為中心 [Visualization methods of the Shangqing Daoist school during the Six Dynasties, with a central focus on the Shangqing dadong zhenjing]. PhD diss., Zhongguo shehui kexue yuan 中國社會科學院, 2013.

Huarong xianzhi 華容縣志 [Annals of Huarong County]. 1882/1883. Reprinted by Huarong jiaoyuju 華容教育局, 1930/3.

- Kikuchi Norikata 菊地章太. Rikuchō dokyō ni okeru shūmatsu shisō no keisei 六朝道教における終末思想の形成 [The formation of Daoist eschatology in the Six Dynasties]. In Ōka daigaku kenkyū kyō 桜花学園大学研究紀要 2 (1999): 131-169.
- Kobayashi Masayoshi 小林正美. Rikuchō dokyō shi kenkyū 六朝道教史研究 [A study on the history of the Taoist religion during the Six Dynasties]. Tokyo: Sōbunsha, 1990.
- . Liuchao daojiao shi yanjiu 六朝道教史研究 [A study on the history of the Taoist religion during the Six Dynasties]. Translated by Li Qing 李庆. Chengdu: Sichuan renmin chubanshe 四川人民出版社, 2001.
- Matsumura Takumi 松村巧. “Shinkō” ni mieru “Rafūmiyako” kikai “真誥”に見える“羅酆都” 鬼界説 [The theory of “Luofeng Capital” in the “Zhen’gao.”] In Yoshikawa 1998: 167-188.
- Ōfuchi Ninji 大淵忍爾. Dokyō to sono kyōten 道教とその經典 [Religious Daoism and its scriptures]. Tokyo: Sōbunsha, 1997.
- Ozaki Masaharu, “Taijō santen seihō kyō seiritsu kō” 《太上三天正法經》成立考 [Reflections on the formation of the Most High Scripture of the Three Heavens]. Tōhō shūkyō 東方宗教 43 (1974): 13-29.
- Ren Jiyu 任繼愈, ed. Daozang tiyao 道藏提要 [A Summary of the Daoist Canon]. Beijing: Zhongguo shehui kexue chubanshe 中國社會科學出版社, 1991.
- Sanguo Xijin shiqi* 三國西晉時期 [The Three Kingdoms and Western Jin Periods]. Volume 3 of Zhongguo lishi ditu ji 中國歷史地圖集 [The Historical Atlas of China]. Edited by Tan Qixiang 譚其驤. Beijing: Zhongguo ditu chubanshe 中國地圖出版社, 1996.
- Wang Chengwen 王承文. “Gudai guojia jisi yu Han Tang Daojiao ‘Bajie zhai’ yuanyuan liukao (shang) – jianhui Lü Pengzhi boshi yi xilie zhi ying de dafu” 古代国家祭祀与汉唐道教“八节斋”渊源论考(上)——兼对吕鹏志博士一系列质疑的答复 [A discussion of the origins of ancient national sacrificial ceremonies and the “purificatory fast of the eight nodal days” of Han-Tang Daoism (part one) – a reply to the doubts raised by Dr. Lü Pengzhi]. Daojiao yanjiu 道教研究 3 (2016): 10-22.
- Wang Haoyue 王皓月. “Santian zhengfa jing de chengshu he yanbian” 三天正法經的成書和演變 [The genesis and evolution of the Scripture of the Rectifying

- Methods of the Three Heavens*]. Shijie zongjiao wenhua 世界宗教文化 (August 2013): 71-77.
- Wang Li 王力. Hanyu shilü xué 漢語詩律學 [Chinese prosody]. 3rd ed. Shanghai: Shanghai jiaoyu chubanshe 上海教育出版社, 1964.
- Wang Ming 王明, ed. Baopuzi neipian jiaoshi 抱朴子內篇校釋 [The inner chapters of the Baopuzi, collated and annotated]. Xinbian zhuzi jicheng 新編諸子集成 1. Beijing: Zhonghua shuju 中華書局, 1996.
- Wang Zhongluo 王仲華. Wei jin nanbeichao shi 魏晉南北朝史 [The history of the Wei, Jin, and Northern and Southern Dynasties periods]. Shanghai: Shanghai renmin chubanshe 上海人民出版社, 2003.
- Wang Zongyu 王宗昱. “Daojiao de ‘Liu tian’ zhi shuo” 道教的‘六天’之說 [The theory of the Six Heavens in Daoism]. Daojiao yanjiu 道教研究 16 (1996): 22-49.
- Xu Jialu, 許嘉璐 ed. Wei shu 魏書 [The book of Wei]. Ershi si shi quanyi 二十四史全譯 [Complete translations of the twenty-four histories]. Shanghai: Hanyu dacidian chubanshe 漢語大辭典出版社, 2004.
- Yang Quan 楊叔 “Chenwei yanjiu shulüe” 讖緯研究述略 [A summary of research on the Weft Texts], Zhongguo shi yanjiu dongtai 中國史研究動態 6 (2000): 12-22.
- Yoshikawa Tadao 吉川忠夫, ed. Rikuchō dokyō no kenkyū 六朝道教の研究 [Research into Six Dynasties Daoism]. Kyōto: Shunjūsha 春秋社, 1998.
- ., and Mugitani Kunio 麥谷邦夫. Zhen’gao jiaozhu 真誥校注 [The annotated Zhen’gao]. Translated by Zhu Yueli 朱越利. Beijing: Zhongguo shehui kexue chubanshe 中國社會科學出版社, 2006.
- Zhang Chaoran 張超然. “Shiguan yǔ baojū: Dongjin Nanchao Daojiao shilian chuantong jiqi fazhan” 試觀與保舉：東晉南朝道教試煉傳統及其發展 [Examination and promotion: Daoist traditions of self-refinement in the Eastern Jin of the Southern Dynasties and their development]. In “Zongjiao shiye xia de shilian yu kunnan” 宗教視野下的試煉與苦難. Special issue, Zhongguo wenzhe yanjiu tongxun 中國文哲研究通訊 23.1 (March 2013): 5-37.
- Zhang Songhui 張松輝, ed. Xinyi Zhuangzi duben 新譯莊子讀本 [A newly-translated Zhuangzi reader]. Taipei: Sanmin shuju 三民書局, 2007.

Zhou Zuoming 周作明. “Lun zaoqi daojing yu daxing cishu bianzuan” 論早期道經與大型辭書編纂 [On early Daoist texts and the compilation of large-scale dictionaries]. Guangxi shehui kexue 廣西社會科學 216 (2013): 155-158.

APPENDIX A

MENTIONS OF THE WORK OR ASSOCIATED CONCEPTS

Differences in cosmology and amulets throughout the canon reveal something of the textual company kept by the Rectifying Methods and its various versions, as well as their continued relevance over the centuries. There is more to be learned, however: citations, transmission requirements, and titles that diverge from the received text indicate that variant editions preserved in encyclopedias were cited and consulted well into the Qing 清 (1636-1912). I have attempted to collect mentions of the Rectifying Methods or some of its chief themes below.

CT 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 上清太上八素真經 (Eastern Jin, 317-420)

The “True Scripture of the Eight Purities” was one of the original Shangqing revelations. The earliest version of this work was broken and scattered throughout the Canon. (See R 2: 51-57 for details.) CT 426 is one of the longest portions, and 4b-5a begins with a hierarchial ranking of Shangqing texts into Ways (dao 道) of the Upper (shang 上) Middle (zhong 中), and Lower (xia 下) Perfected. The Zhengfa jing is among the Middle Ways; other texts of the Middle Way include two we have encountered previously: the Sanyuan sanbu jing and the Sanhuang neiwen. The end of this section lists the benefits that accrue to those who practice techniques of the Middle Way”

右中真之道，總而行之，則爲上清中道真人，給玉童玉女各一千人，位爲上清左右卿相之師。行則紫毛之節，從萬神千真，前吹鳳鳴，後奏天鈞，玄龍啓道，五帝驂軒，飛行太空，遨戲丹霄。

The above are Ways of the Middle Transcendents. All those who practice them will become Transcendents of Upper Clarity of the Middle Way, and be given one thousand Jade Lads and Jade Maidens [as guards], and be appointed masters of the grand ministers of Upper Clarity. If they practice them, they will [be given?] a staff [adorned] with purple hair (?). They will be served by ten thousand spirits and a thousand transcendents; before them phoenixes will blow and cry; behind them will play celestial music. Black dragons will open the ways before them; the Five Emperors will drive their chariot, and [they will] fly to the grand void, sauntering and taking their ease in the red empyrean.

Precious Writs

The phrase “Santian zhengfa” appears twice in the Chisu zhenjue: at 20a and 23a-b. 20a includes it in a list of amulets that all appear in the Jiuwei badao and/or the Zhengfa jing; 23a-b places it at the end of a list of deities inscribed on an amulet to be worn during a breathing exercise.

CT 1 Lingbao wuliang duren shangpin miaojing 靈寶無量度人上品妙經

“Wondrous Superior Book of Immeasurable Salvation from the [Canon of] the Marvelous Jewel.” The central scripture of the Lingbao corpus, the original Duren jing is indisputably among its original works. It is probably this unquestionable antiquity and importance that inspired later additions and revisions. While the first juan dates from before the fifth century, the following sixty were added after 1112. Juan 54.8b mentions “spirits of the Correct Law of the Three Heavens” (Santian zhi shen 三天之神).

The next four works contain the same information about the Zhengfa jing. I will introduce each text and conclude with the information itself.

CT 1345 Dongzhen taishang daojun yuandan shangjing 洞真太上道君元丹上經

“Superior Scripture of the Mysterious Cinnabar.” TC provides no date for this text. The editors of the Zhonghua daoze date it to the Eastern Jin, and while their dating can be suspect this particular extract gives no reason to doubt it. The relevant portion of the text is 24b-25b, which is equivalent to a portion of CT 1314 (discussed below) called the “Sworn Codes of the Nine Perfected” (Jiuzhen mingke 九真明科).

CT 1314 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing 洞真太上素靈洞元大有妙經
“The Wondrous Scripture that Penetrates Mystery of the [Room of] Unadorned Spirituality [in the Palace of] Vast Possession, of the Dongzhen Canon.” CT 1314 is a pastiche of different Shangqing texts and is probably not later than the early fifth century. The relevant passage (51b-52a) forms a portion of the Jiuzhen mingke.

CT 1409 Taishang jiuzhen mingke 太上九真明科

“Sworn Code of the Nine Perfected.” This text is included in its entirety at the end of CT 1314. WSBY cites it under that title, which implies that the present CT 1409 may have originally formed part of the received CT 1314 but was detached from it at a later date. The text often refers to itself as the “Upper Chapters of the Mystic Capital” (Xuandu shangpin 玄都上品), an abbreviation for “Upper Chapters of the Sworn Code of the Nine Perfected of the Mystic Capital (Xuandu jiuzhen mingke shangpin 玄都九真明科上品). Chapter Five (beginning on 5b of the received text) groups together several works in a single celestial palace and gives the schedule of their transmission as well as the rites required to do so, while the next chapter (6a-b) records their material transmission requirements.

玄都上品第五篇曰：傳《消魔智慧》《玉清隱書》《寶洞飛霄絕玄金章》《紫鳳赤書八景晨圖》《金真玉光》《靈書紫文》《金璫玉佩》《金根上經》《三

天正法》皆太上大道君，元始天王，金闕帝君之寶章，祕在玉清之宮，金房紫戶之內。衛靈文玉童玉女各三千人。元始之初，皆千劫一傳。自三天立正之後，七百年內聽得三傳。百年中有其人，聽一傳。給玉童玉女依四極明科。授者對齋九十日或三十日或九日而傳，不依科而傳，罪延七玄之祖，長充鬼役，無有解脫。己身被風刀之考，死充下鬼，萬不得仙。

The fifth section of the Upper Chapters of the Mystic Capital says: “The “Hidden Book of Demon-Destroying Wisdom,” “The Hidden of the Palace of Jade Clarity,” the “Golden Stanzas of the Precious Cavern Flying Empyrean Ultimate Mystery,” the “Red Book of the Purple Phoenix and Dawn-Chart of the Eight Phosphors,” the “Numinous Text in Purple Characters of Golden Perfection and Jade Light,” the “Scripture of the Golden Pendant and Jade Belt-Pendant,” the “Upper Scripture of the Golden Root,” the “Correct Method of the Three Heavens” – all are treasured by the Most High Lord of the Dao, the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement, and the Lord of the Golden Porte. They are hidden away in the Purple House of the Golden Chamber of the Palace of Jade Clarity. Guarding the numinous text are jade lads and jade maidens, each numbering three thousand. Since the very beginning, they have been transmitted once every ten thousand kalpas. Since the Three Heavens rectified [the cosmos], in seven hundred years they have been transmitted three times. If there is an appropriate person, then in one hundred years they can be transmitted once. [Their recipient] will receive jade lads and jade maidens [as guardians], as prescribed by the Siji mingke. Those who transmit [授=受] them must engage in a purificatory fast for ninety days or thirty days or nine days, then transmit it. If one transmits it but does not abide by the statutes, the guilt will extend to one’s ancestors in the seven darknesses; they will for long be charged with labor as ghosts, with none to save them. One’s own body will undergo the trial of wind and swords, and in death one will become a lower ghost, absolutely not attaining transcendence.

玄都上品第六篇曰：五傳……三天正法清繒三十尺青布四十三尺金環五雙以爲密誓上金十兩通神之信。

The sixth section of the Upper Chapters of the Mystic Capital says: Transmitting... the Santian zhengfa [requires] thirty chi of azure-black silk, forty-three chi of azure-black cloth, and five pairs of golden hoops as an Oath of Secrecy. It requires ten liang of gold as an Oath for Penetrating to the Spirits.¹⁹⁶

In addition to the Zhengfa jing, all but one of the texts in this list bear titles similar to texts that either form part of the original SQ revelations or that were integrated therein slightly afterwards. See R 2: 179-186 (#1); 237-246 (#2, #4); 45-49 (#5); 101-110 (#6); 213-218 (#7); 119-125 (#8).

196 Cf. the required offering given in the text itself at ZHDZ 262c.12-263a, which says “Thirty chi of red-and-indigo silk is the offering for possession. Thirty chi of indigo cloth is the [offering] of the oath of secrecy. Five pairs of golden hoops is the [offering] of the Grand Oath to Heaven.”

CT 184 Taizhen yudi siji mingke jing 太上四極明科經

“Sworn Code of the Four Poles.” The relationship between this work and the Zhengfa jing is complex. Contrary to Robinet in TC, s.v. Taishang siji mingke jing, the citations of the Siji mingke that appear in the Zhengfa jing do not correspond exactly to the same passages in CT 184. Comparing Siji mingke 5.6b-7a to ZHDZ 262a.1-6 shows this. CT 184 reads:

太玄都四極明科曰：凡受四極明科，三天正法，佩帶真文，恒當沐浴盥洗爲急每，令屐履衣服盛潔不使污穢。真靈遠離，凶邪所乘。有犯此禁，五犯退削陟真之爵，十犯左官所考，死入地獄，萬劫還生不人之道。《玄都中宮女青律文》受者明慎奉行。

The Siji mingke says: All those who receive the Siji mingke and the Santian zhengfa, who wear belted at their waist the True Writs – they must always regard it as significant to bathe and wash their hands and face, and each time [they wear the talismans?] cause shoes and clothing to be exceedingly clean and not to become impure. [Otherwise] the Perfected and numens will stay far away from you, and misfortune and deviances will seize the opportunity. If you offend against these prescriptions five times, your ranking among the Perfected will be revoked. After ten offenses, the Official of the Left will subject you to judicial torture. Upon death, you will enter the earth-prisons. After ten thousand kalpas, you will be reborn in one of the paths of non-humans [according to] the Statutes and Writs of Lady Blue of the Middle Palace of the Mystic Capital. Those who receive this text must be cautious about this and behave reverently [toward the text].

Cf. ZHDZ 262a.1-6:

太上告後聖君曰：凡受三天正法，佩帶真文，恒當沐浴盥洗爲急每，令屐履衣服盛潔，不使污穢。真靈遠離，凶邪所乘，便有毀敗。學者宜明慎之。有犯此禁，太極領仙退削子陟真之爵。

The Most High told the Housheng jun: All those who receive the Santian zhengfa and wear the True Writs must always regard it as significant to bathe and wash their hands and face, and each time [they wear the talismans] cause shoes and clothing to be exceedingly clean and not to become impure. [Otherwise] the Perfected and numens will stay far away from you, and misfortune and deviances will seize the opportunity, and there will be ruin. Those who study [the Way] should understand and be diligent about this. If you offend against these prescriptions, the [Perfected of the] Grand Bourne will order the transcendents to revoke your ranking among the Perfected.

The first four precepts given by the Zhengfa jing differ in the same way from their equivalent passages in CT 184.¹⁹⁷ The Zhengfa jing versions threaten the practitioner with the revocation of a celestial post and cite the Siji mingke, while the precepts in that work threaten imprisonment in the hells and an unfortunate rebirth, citing a different text as their authority.¹⁹⁸

Three rhetorical features shared by the precepts in the Zhengfa jing suggest the work's editors modified an existing version of CT 184 to suit their purposes. The first hint at a later date for at least part of this process is that each precept in the Zhengfa jing opens with the phrase "The Most High told the Lord of the Golden Porte..." As detailed by R 2: 89, this format is never utilized by the undisputed members of the original Shangqing revelations. Indeed, it recalls Lingbao texts, wherein the Celestial Worthy of Primordial Commencement (Yuanshi tianzun 元始天尊) plays the role of teacher in the same manner as the Buddha in Buddhist scriptures. Second, the references to the Statutes and Writs of Lady Blue found in CT 184 are deleted. The motive for this move is difficult to ascertain from a limited textual sample, but the picture becomes clearer when one takes the third alteration into account. The Zhengfa jing warns the disobedient that they will be stripped of their ranking among the Perfected, where CT 184 combines the more traditional postmortem consignment to the earth-prisons with rebirth among “the paths of nonhumans” (buren zhi dao 不人之道). This locution is confined almost entirely to CT 184, with other occurrences (e.g., YJQQ 40.10a-b, SDZN 6.5a) citing the underlying Statues and Writs. Despite this isolation, the phrase itself immediately recalls the Buddhist notion of unfortunate rebirth more commonly conveyed by the phrase “Three Paths” (san tu 三途) – rebirth in a hell realm, as an animal, or as a hungry ghost.

197 The fifth is a general exhortation to behave correctly, linking improper behavior to demonic attack as in the first precept. Given the prevalence of demonic etiology throughout the early medieval period, this precept in and of itself provides no clues as to the Zhengfa jing's textual association. Its most notable feature for our purposes is that it does not appear in the received Siji mingke.

198 The Statutes and Writs is probably not the famous Nüqing guilü, an eschatological and apotropaic work from the fourth century that provides the names of demons as well as methods of averting their malign influence. EoT, s.v. "Nüqing guilü." Cf. TC, s.v. "Taizhen yudi siji mingke jing," "Nüqing guilü," EoT, s.v. "Nüqing guilü." The summaries of the Nüqing guilü in these two works paint a very different picture from the quotation of the Statutes and Writs given here. Interestingly, the phrase I gloss here as "unfortunate rebirth" (buren zhi dao 不人之道) is confined almost entirely to CT 184, with other occurrences (e.g., YJQQ 40.10a-b, SDZN 6.5a) citing the underlying Statutes and Writs.

The punishment threatened by the received Zhengfa jing implies a celestial bureaucracy divided into various ranks (jue 爵) similar to the degrees of earthly officialdom. The terms used to describe a mortal’s rise and fall in this hierarchy are exactly those used to describe movement through the earthly bureaucracy: we can ascend (zhi 陟) to certain ranks, but also be stripped of them (tui 退). This constellation of terms relates the Zhengfa jing more closely to the Shangqing corpus. One sort of question frequently put to Yang Xi by members of the Xu and Ge families included the postmortem fate of deceased family members, expressed in terms of celestial ranks such as Lord Transcendent of the Left (zuo xiangong 左仙公).¹⁹⁹ It also harmonizes the Siji mingke more closely with the received Zhengfa jing, portions of which promise ascent to transcendence.

Wushang biyao. On the Wushang, see chapter five.

While Zhengfa jing extracts from the Wushang feature extensively above, there is more that text can tell us. ZHDZ 28.102a.13-b.6 connects the Zhengfa jing with several other texts with which we have already seen it keeping company. A quote from one “Golden Book of the Jade Belt-Pendant and Golden Pendant of the Grand Bourne” (Yupei jindang taiji jinshu 玉珮金璫太極金書, a text modified by Yang Xi that predated the Shangqing revelations, lists it along with the Jingen zhongjing and three books we haven’t yet seen: the Purple Book of the Green Essentials (Qingyao zishu 青要紫書), the Shijing jinguang zangjing luxing shenjing 石精金光藏景錄形神經, and the Jinzen yuguang taishang yinshu 金真玉光太上隱書. The first book forms part of the Shangqing revelations; the second predates them, though it exists only in citations; and the third is an early apocryphon.²⁰⁰

¹⁹⁹ Bokenkamp, Ancestors and Anxiety

T 2110 Bianzheng lun 辨正論

“Disputations on What is Correct.” An early seventh-century apologia by the monk Falin 法琳 (572-640), the Disputations testifies to Falin’s extensive knowledge of Daoist literature through its copious citation. Along with various pre-Tang works like the Waiguo fangpin and the Duren jing, he cites a Santian zhengfa jing in 8.547b to prove that earlier Daoist works lacked Vajra-spirits (jingang zhi shen 金剛之神), a variety of guardian deity depicted in large statues at the entrance of Buddhist monasteries. Another is the yakṣa, and it these spirits with which Falin is concerned here. Yakṣa are typically malevolent spirits, but in this context they have been converted to Buddhism and act as the Buddha’s guards. In this capacity they are known as miji lishi 密迹力士 in Chinese. Falin has this to say about the earlier Daoist works he consulted:

200 On the Yupei jindang, Shijing, and Jinzen yuguang see R 2: 213-218, 137-140, 45-49.

具序太玄之都，玉光之州，金真之郡，天寶之縣，元明之鄉，定志之里。金闕，玉京，及清靈宮，極真宮，紫陽宮等，並是道家尊神所坐之處。但有騏驎鳳凰，白雀朱鶚，鷗雞靈鵠，赤鳥青雀等……亦無金剛之神，密迹力士之像。

All [of these texts] are arrayed in the Capital of Grand Mystery, in the Province of Jade Light, in the Prefecture of Golden Perfection, in the County of Heavenly Treasure, in the Village of Primordial Brightness, in the borough of Fixed Intention. The Jade Capital and the Golden Porte, the Palace of Clear Numinosity, the Palace of Ultimate Perfection, the Palace of Purple Yang, etc., are all the abodes of venerated spirits in Daoism. They only have qilin, phoenixes, white swallows, crimson ospreys, rocs, numinous swans, red birds, azure phoenixes, etc... but they do not have vajra-spirits or statues of yakṣa.

Daoists of his day, by contrast, had noted the popularity of these spirits in Buddhist texts and had added them to their own texts, calling them tiangang 天岡. The location of the Zhengfa jing given here does not match any of the various locations for the work or its components given in the received Zhengfa jing/Jiuwei badao, nor do Daoist heavens of the early medieval period typically follow the administrative divisions of the human realm so closely. This suggests either that Falin was consulting some work that has not come down to us, or that he was taking liberties with his source material in the service of his larger rhetorical goal.²⁰¹

Sandong zhunang. On this text, see chapter four. 8.31b claims one Santian zhengfa jing mentions a Most August Master (Shanghuang xiansheng 上皇先生) and equates it with Laozi's manifestation as counselor to the Zhou. This is not in the received version. The SDZN also quotes the Siji mingke, claiming the Santian zhengfa is "hidden in above the 201 On Falin and the Bianzheng lun, see Thomas Jülch, "In Defense of the Saṃgha: The Buddhist Apologetic Mission of the Early Tang Monk Falin," in The Middle Kingdom and the Dharma Wheel: Aspects of the Relationship between the Buddhist Saṃgha and the State in Chinese History, ed. Thomas Jülch (Leiden: Brill, 2016), 33ff. For the locations, cf. ZHDZ 259b.22-24, 259c.22-26, 259c.26-260a.22 and 260b.22-260c.4.

Nine Heavens, in the Heaven of Jade Clarity, in the Golden Chamber, in the Purple Room.” This does not match any of the locations in the received Zhengfa jing, though it does match Siji mingke 3.9a.²⁰²

CT 1132 Shangqing dao leishi xiang

“The True Appearances of the Categories [Pertaining] to the Way of Shangqing.”

Compiled by the same author as the SDZN, this is an aide-mémoire to the personages that feature in various early medieval Shangqing works. It lists their names and residences. It includes the same quotation from the Siji mingke as in the SDZN.

CT 1129 Daojiao yishu 道教義樞

“The Pivotal Meaning of Daoist Doctrine.” The Pivotal Meaning is a small encyclopedia devoted to Daoists terms and concepts, composed by Meng Anpai 孟安排 (fl. 699). 2.4a-b claims a Writ of the Song of the Pure Phoenix, Correct Method of the Three Heavens of the Heaven of Highest Clarity 上清三天正法曲素鳳文 in thirty-one juan was received by Xu Hui. The same entry appears in YJQQ 4.3a; 5.3b specifies that Xu became a “Master of Registers” (lu shi 籙師) upon receiving it, and 6.4a has Xu Mi receiving the work as well. The title itself appears nowhere else in the Canon. 2.11b echoes the Inner Explanations, claiming that Lord Lao descended to Zhang Daoling and bestowed upon him the “Correct Law of the Three Heavens.”

202 祕於九天之上，玉清金房紫戶之內。

CT 463 Yaoxiu keiyi jielü chao

16.8b concerns practices for the well-being of a Disciple of the Three Phosphors who is ill. One of the registers in the possession of such a master is the “Register of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens.”

CT 1212 Jiao sandong zhenwen wufa zhengyi mengwei lu licheng yi 醮三洞真文五法正一盟威錄立成儀

“Complete Ritual for Offering to the Gods of the Registers of the Three Caverns, the Five Methods, and the One and Orthodox Covenant.” A Tang work that lists the titles of the registers, with their deities, that are propitiated in the ritual. A 三天正法三元大君 appears twice – at 9a and 19a – but it is unclear which amulet in particular the deity is associated with. Few of the amulets given in the work (on 8b) correspond to those in the Zhengfa jing/Jiuwei badao.

CT 433 Qiyu xiuzhen zhengpin tu 七域修真正證品圖

“Diagram Demonstrating the Hierarchy of Degrees of the Practice of the True [Way] and of the Seven Regions [of the Immortals]. This Tang work contains a list of Shangqing methods taken from the Zhen’gao and establishes a hierarchy of the spiritual degrees of their practitioners. 3a contains a disordered copy of Zhen’gao 5.2a that includes the familiar Chu liutian zhi wen santian zhengfa.

CT 1239 Zhengyi xiuzhen lüe yi 正一修真略儀

“Concise Treatise for the One and Orthodox Cultivation of the True [Way].” This Tang work collects doctrine and protocols related to 24 registers belonging to the Three Caverns. It divides these registers into three groups. First and lowest are those belonging to the Way of the Celestial Master; second are those of the Sanhuang and Lingbao traditions; final and highest are the registers of Shangqing. A “Register of the Correct Methods of the Three Heavens” (Santian zhengfa lu 三天正法錄) appears among the Shangqing registers, along with some other registers mentioned in the Jiuwei badao and Zhengfa jing, either directly or by alternate names that feature elsewhere (e.g., the True Book of the Middle Prime).

CT 617 Taishang xuanzi zhuhua zhang 太上宣慈助化章

“Most High Memorials That Proclaim Mercy and Are Helpful in Working Wonders.” This work, compiled by Du Guangting 杜光庭 (850-933) collects 23 petitions that aim either to ameliorate or prevent certain illnesses or misfortunes. As in the below work, the phrase Santian zhengfa occurs in one such petition.

CT 461 Shangqing gusui lingwen guilü 上清骨髓靈文鬼律

“Demon Code of the Spinal Numinous Writ of the Shangqing Tradition.” This is the penal code applied in the exorcistic ritual of the Correct Method of the Heart of Heaven (tianxin zhengfa 天心正法), an influential exorcistic and therapeutic tradition that arose during the Song. The date of the text itself is uncertain; while the Correct Method appeared as early as the ninth century, its textual corpus was not formed until the twelfth. Juan 3 is devoted to priestly titles and formulas for ritual documents. The phrase Santian zhengfa appears twice in this juan, in each case forming part of a petition.²⁰³

Song tongzhi, “Yiwen lue” 宋通志, 藝文略

“Bibliographic Summary” chapter of the “General Annals of the Song.” Compiled under the direction of Zheng Qiao 鄭樵 (1104-1160), the “General Annals” is an encyclopedia. Its contents range from the typical entries in the Standard Histories (imperial annals, biographies of empresses, genealogical tables) to the more unusual (phonetics and philology, zoology, topography). The Bibliographic Summary, as the name implies, collects the titles of various works into various rubrics. The “School of the Way” (Dao jia 道家) contains a Taishang santian zhengfa jing in one juan.²⁰⁴

Yunji qiqian.

“Cloudy Bookbag in Seven Satchels.” The incantation that features in WSBY j. 65 (on which, see below) appears here under the same title as in the Sishisi fang and the Wushang biyao. It is this version I translate in that chapter. The Yunji is a Daoist encyclopedia presented to Song Renzong 宋仁宗 (r. 1023-1064). Scholars differ on its focus. Kristofer Schipper, following John Lagerwey, divides the work into 37 sections; nearly half, he says, are devoted to longevity techniques under the rubric of “tending life” (yang sheng 養生). He notes that the heavy emphasis on yang sheng was more likely to be of interest to an emperor like Renzong, who was not a devoted patron of Daoism. The cost of such a slant is the comparatively scanty sections on talismans and the total lack of liturgical material. By contrast, Judith Boltz divides the work into sixteen sections. 4.3a lists a Tanshang santian zhengfa qusu fengwen 清三天正法曲素鳳文 in 31 juan. This title appears nowhere else in the Canon, apart from the DLSX entry noted above. 4.19b-20b quotes the fifth and sixth chapters of the Xuandu shangpin as they appears above in the Jiuzhen mingke, with minor variations in the number of days required for a fast. Note that in both cases the material and purificatory requirements differ from those given in Siji mingke 3.9a-b and in the received work at ZHDZ 262c.12-264.a.11. 5.3 records that Yang Xi bestowed the text upon him, at which point he became a Master of Registers (as detailed above). 6.4 specifies that Xu Mi received the text as well. While this exact title does not appear anywhere else in the Canon, a similar one appears at 6.7b. The sixth juan of YJQQ is devoted to explicating the contents of the Three Caverns, and is appropriately titled “Texts and Teachings of the Three Caverns” (Sandong jingjiao bu 三洞經教部). This juan contains a subsection by the name of “Official Ranks of the Three Caverns” (Sandong ge 三洞格), which includes a work called Santian zhengfa feng zhen zhi wen, jiuzhen shengxuan zhi wen 三天正法鳳真之文九真昇玄之文. An appended note echoes the Basu zhenjing, explaining that the works listed are “the methods of the Middle Transcendents. If one practices all of them, one will ascend to the Heaven of Highest Clarity as a Transcendent of the Middle Circuit,” (ZHDZ 29.65a).

²⁰³ See EoT, s.v. “Tianxin zhengfa.”

²⁰⁴ In dividing works into various jia, Zheng Qiao was probably modeling his work on the Records of the Grand Historian (Shi ji 史記), compiled by Sima Qian 司馬遷 (145-86?) and presented to the throne in 100 CE. Sima Qian’s categorization was uncritically accepted by Western Sinologists as an objective assessment of the works under his purview, but the problems with this assumption are now well-known. Briefly, Sima Qian’s categorization explicitly favored works he placed in “School of the Way” (Dao jia 道家), and in any event his classificatory scheme simplifies a complex process of oral transmission and later systematization. On the second point, see Wilkinson, Chinese History s.v. “Daoism.”

6.17b-19a (= ZHDZ 29.68c.32-69b.3) does not mention the Santian zhengfa by name, but records a composition process that is very similar for a different text, the Rites Newly-Appeared (Xinchu zhi yi 新出之儀). According to one Jade Weft (Yuwei 玉緯), the Xinchu originated thusly:

昔元始天王，以開皇元年七月七日丙午中時，使玉童傳皇上先生白簡青籙之文，自然得乎此法虛無先生傳於唐堯。又後聖帝君命小有天王撰集宣行。青童云：自爾之後，得此文者乃七千人，皆飛龍玄昇或淪化潛引不可具記。得道者藏文五嶽，精思積感，先得此文。此文極妙，得之隨緣文來或出河洛或戒經方依因結果也

In the days of old, the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement, in the first year of the Kaihuang reign period, in the seventh month, on the seventh day (a bingwu day), in the middle double-hour, ordered the Jade Lad to transmit to the August High Master writs of azure registers on white slips. [The Master] spontaneously attained this method. Master Void transmitted this to Yao. Moreover, the Lord of the Golden Porte ordered the Azure Lad to compile and promulgate them. The Azure Lad said, “From this point on, those who receive the text will number seven thousand. In all cases those who mysteriously ascend to [to the heavens on] flying dragons, or undergo a great change and retire from the world, will be uncountable. Those who attain the Way will hide this text in the Five Marchmounts. [Others] who would refine their thought and pile up their sentiments [i.e., consistently and sincerely seek the Way] must first attain these texts. These texts are wondrous to the limit; those who attain them will be able to do anything they wish. As for the coming of the texts – sometimes they emerge [like] the River Chart and Book of Luo; sometimes they [arise] from keeping the precepts of the scriptures. The result is according to one’s causes and conditions.

Some of the particulars here recall events in the received work and the cosmological extract from WSBY 6, though it overlaps perfectly with neither. The date and time of the register, some of the parties involved, and the color of the records match WSBY 6, while the composition process echoes the received work. The titles “Jade Weft” and “Rites Newly-Appeared” do not match any received texts. However, a passage very similar to the above citation appears at Daojiao yishu 2.10b-11a.

Juan 40 of the Yunji sheds some light on the Statutes and Writs of Lady Blue of the Middle Palace of the Mystic Capital (see above). The juan is an explanation of precepts that connects morality to disease, naming various good acts as “medicines” and continuing by listing several different sets of precepts. One of these bears the title Statutes and Precepts (jie 戒) of Lady Blue of the Middle Palace of the Mystic Capital, and contains two precepts that match exactly the first two of Siji mingke 5.6b-7a. Finally, 49.8a quotes a passage attributed to a Santian zhengfa that conforms exactly to an existing sentence in the Yuwen.

CT 296 Lishi zhenxian tidao tongjian 歷世真仙體道通鑑

“Comprehensive Mirror of Immortals who Embodied the Dao through the Ages.” This text was probably composed shortly after the fall of the Song by Zhao Daoyi 趙道一, about whom little is known. Here, he collects existing biographies of eminent Daoists and arranges them according to his own groupings, with the overall aim of providing a Daoist counterpart to the Comprehensive Mirror for Aid in Government (Zizhi tongjian 資治通鑑) and the Buddhist Comprehensive Mirror for Those of the Sakya Clan (Shishi tongjian 釋氏通鑑) – collections of eminent lives meant for the study and emulation of princes (in the former case) and Buddhists (in the latter). Juan 25 includes a biography of Xu Hui that claims he received the Santian zhengfa qusu fengwen (see above, in the entry on the Yunji qiqian) from Yang Xi.

CT 1353 Shangqing daobao jing 上清道寶經

“Shanqing Book of the Treasures of the Dao.” An encyclopedia of Daoism that probably dates to the Song, the Daobao jing draws mostly on Shangqing works for information on topics ranging from scriptures and practice to the pantheon. 1.6b adopts the rubric of the Basu zhenjing, including the Zhengfa jing among the “Middle Ways.”

CT 304 Maoshan zhi 茅山志

The ninth juan of this work includes a bibliography and a list of 32 Shangqing registers. The bibliography lists a Shangqing santian zhengfa jing twice (9.2a, 9.5a) while the registers include a Shangqing santian zhengfa lu. The list also includes several registers that appear in the Jiuwei badao, e.g. the Most High Perfected Book of Penglai.

CT 1483 Tianhuang zhidao taiqing yuce 天皇至道太清玉冊

“Most Pure and Precious Books on the Supreme Dao of August Heaven.” This encyclopedia was completed in 1483 by Zhu Quan 朱權 (1378-1448), seventeenth son of Ming Taizu 明太祖 (Zhu Zhangyuan 朱璋元, r. 1368-1398). Pp. 208ff are a calendar that lists the deities that descend on each day of the month. Zhu sometimes includes a parenthetical note about that day: for instance, he calls the eighth day of the fourth month “the opening of summer” (qixia zhi ri 啟夏之日; the more typical name is lixia 立夏, a date falling between the fifth and the seventh day of the fifth month of the solar calendar). The first day of the fifth month, according to Zhu, was the day on which the Most High Lord Lao bestowed the Santian zhengfa upon Zhang Daoling. This is the month and day recorded in the Inner Explanations (see Bokenkamp, EDS 215).

CT 1430 Daozang quejing mulu 道藏闕經目錄

“Catalogue of Missing Books in the Daoist Canon.” Compiled by the editors of the Ming Daoist Canon, this is a list of titles included in previous Daoist canons that were no longer extant by the time the Ming editors began their work. A Taishang santian zhengfa jing jue 訣 appears in a section called “Rites” (yi 儀).

CT 1219 Gaoshang shenxiao yuqing zhenwang zishu dafa 高上神霄玉清真王紫書大法

“Great Magic from the Purple Book of the True King of the Highest Divine Empyrean Jade Purity.” A work of unknown date in the tradition of Five Thunder Magic (Wu lei fa 五雷法). This was a method of summoning rain current in the early tenth century. On Shenxiao (“Divine Empyrean”) Daoism, see TC, pp. 1081-1083. Despite internal references that suggest it was compiled during the reign of Song Huizong 宋徽宗 (Zhao Ji 趙佶, r. 1100-1125), more compelling evidence near the end of the text gives the impression it was a later document. The Zishu dafa is an exorcism manual; juan 10 collects various incantations, with one “Hidden Incantation for Dispelling [the Qi of] the Six Heavens at 10.23b-24a.

Guang bowu zhi 廣博物志

“Expansion of a Treatise on Curiosities.” Compiled by Dong Sizhang 董斯張 (1586-1628) in 1607. In contrast to more typical encyclopedias (leishu 類書), the Guang bowu zhi includes what we would call “natural history.” Topics include food and drink (juan 41), botany (juan 42-43), and fauna (44-50). Juan 28 concerns art and literature, and cites Daoist works, Buddhist works, and the Standard Histories. 28.31b includes a garbled quote of Zhen’gao 5.2a, which mentions the Chu liutian zhi wen santian zhengfa.²⁰⁵

Daozang mulu xiangzhu 道藏目錄詳

“Annotated Table of Contents to the Daoist Canon.” The received version was presented to the throne in Qianlong 46 (1781-82), but was originally compiled by the Ming Daoist priest Bai Yunji 白雲霽 (fl. 1626), who presented it to the throne in the bingyin year (1626-27) of the Tianqi 天啟 reign period (1621-1628) of Ming Xizong 熹宗 (Zhu Jiaoyou 朱校由, 1605-27). 4.38a of this text claims a Zhengfa jing in one juan was bestowed upon Zhang Daoling by the Most High Lord Lao.

Daming Daozangjing mulu 大明道藏經目錄

“Table of Contents to the Scriptures in the Daoist Canon of the Great Ming.” A Santian zhengfa in one juan is listed under the “Orthodox Unity” (Zhengyi 正一) section, thus placing it among Celestial Masters works. This is a marked departure from earlier material – e.g., CT 1239 (Tang) or CT 461 (Song) – which include the works or methods by its name in the Shangqing tradition.

²⁰⁵ On Ming leishu in general, and the Guang bowu zhi in particular, see Harriet T. Zurndorfer, “Fifteen hundred years of the Chinese encyclopedia,” in Encyclopaedism from Antiquity to the Renaissance, ed. Jason König and Greg Woolf (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2013), 518-19.

Yuding pianzi leibian 御定駢字類編

“Imperially-commissioned [Lexicon of] Binomes [Containing] Categorized Excerpts [from Classic Works].” This is a dictionary-like compendium containing over 1600 entries in 240 juan compiled under the auspices of Gao Yu 高輿 (?-1717) on the order of the Kangxi 康熙 Emperor (1662-1722). The title is a pun; the word pian (“paired,” “parallel”) refers to binomes as a word class in the phrase pianzi, but also to a style of writing called pianwen 駢文 that began in the Han and flourished during the Northern and Southern Dynasties. Sometimes translated “parallel prose,” pianwen is characterized by emphasis on syntactic and lexical parallelism as well as tonal alternation. After the Tang, the dominant form of this style involved alternating phrases of four and six characters, thus earning it the name “four-six prose” (siliu wen 四六文). The purpose of the Pianzi leibian was to aid literati as they wrote in this style.

The Pianzi leibian is notable for our purposes in that it three citations of the YJQQ that concern the Zhengfa jing. Juan 98 contains a series of binomes beginning with 五. Under 五雙 we find an excerpt that contains the transmission requirements for the Zhengfa jing (part of 98.11a-b = part of YJQQ 4.20b); in 102.11a-b, we find the quote from YJQQ 4.19b that sites the Santian zhengfa and several other Shangqing works in the Heaven of Highest Clarity; and at 123.50a under 上學 we find the citation of the Zhengfa jing that appears in YJQQ 40. In each case, the YJQQ is credited by name. This fact becomes significant when one considers the many divergences between the version of the Zhengfa jing preserved in the YJQQ and the received text.

APPENDIX B

THE “RECTIFYING METHODS” IN THE ANCIENT LISTS

The following contain bibliographies of Shangqing works. This appendix is based on the list in R 2: 15. I have noted where the Rectifying Methods appears and the name under which it appears.

CT 426 Basu zhenjing

4b-5a: 三天正法鳳真之文

CT 442 Housheng daojun lieji 後聖道君列記: does not appear

Ziyang zhenren neizhuan 紫陽真人內傳 (part of YJQQ 106.8a-15b): does not appear

CT 303 Ziyang zhenren neizhuan 紫陽真人內傳 46:192a-193c, 195a-c: does not appear

CT 1331 Dongzhen shangqing shenzhou qizhuan qibian wu tianjing 洞真上清神州七轉

七變舞天經 (ZHDZ 1:368)

2b: 三天正法威制六天

27b: 威制六天三天正法消魔上經

Jiuzhen mingke 九真明科 (Part of CT 1314 洞真太上素靈洞元大有妙經)

1:124a-b.

The biography of Lord Pei at YJQQ 105 (YJQQ 105, ZHDZ 29:816-817): does not appear

The Dadong zhenjing mu 大洞真經目 Dame Wei's biography (P 2337)

上清除六天文三天正法 in one juan.

APPENDIX C

THE WSBY EDITION OF THE RECTIFYING METHODS

The editors of the Secret Essentials refer to their edition of the Rectifying Methods almost exclusively as the Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens of the Cavern of Perfection (Dongzhen santian zhengfa jing 洞真三天正法經). They cite or mention the work eight times: in j. 6, 22, 30, 31, 32, 43, 47, 65, and 95. In what follows, I translate each citation and explain how it fits into the Secret Essentials' larger ideological project.²⁰⁶

Juan 6

The editors first invoke their version of the Rectifying Methods at a particularly crucial moment in their own work. Legitimate rulership required personal moral perfection and knowledge of the workings of the cosmos. WSBY 6 demonstrates the latter in particular. It forms a unit with chapter 7, which concerns the foundations of moral action. Both are implicit in the creation of the state, because good government proceeds from the moral excellence of the ruler and the harmony of the state with the cosmos.²⁰⁷ The editors make their reasoning explicit in their summary of the latter portion of j. 6, in which they quote the Rites of Zhou (Zhou li 周禮): “It is the king who establishes the state.”²⁰⁸ I will say 206 This section is heavily indebted to Lagerwey, Wu-shang. On j. 6, see pp. 38-42, 50-51, and 81-82; on j. 30-32, pp. 42-43, 58-59, 100ff; on j. 44, pp. 45-47, 62, 143ff; on 44, pp. 35-47, 63, 147ff; on 65, pp. 47, 64-66, 170-174, esp. 172-173; on 66, pp. 47, 65, 174ff (note that this is actually a silent citation of an incantation associated elsewhere with the Rectifying Methods; thus, I do not discuss it here); on 95, pp. 47-48, 68-70, 203ff.

207 This harmony was sometimes literal. Sound and tuning were matters of concern not just in what we today consider “musical” contexts, but in the synchronization of human conduct and the cosmic order. This concern is reflected in a treatise on tuning included in the History of the Latter Han (Houhan shu 後漢書) as well as the musicological predilections of one of Wang Mang's 王莽 (45 BCE-23 CE) courtiers. See Noa Hegesh, “In Tune with the Cosmos: Tuning Theory, Cosmology, and Concepts of Sound in Early China” (PhD diss., University of Pennsylvania, 2008).

208 惟王建國。See Lagerwey, Wu-shang 51.

more on the organization of WSBY 6 and its contents below. A partial translation of WSBY 6 follows. It corresponds to ZHDZ 28.110a.14-c17.²⁰⁹

道曰：天關在天西北之角，與斗星相御。北斗七星則天關之綱柄，玉宸之華蓋，梵行九天十二辰之氣，斗綱運關，則九天並轉。天有四候之門，九天合三十六候，一晝一夜則斗綱運關，經一候之門，晝夜三十六日，則經三十六候都竟。三十六候竟，則是九天一轉。三百六十輪為九天一周。

The Dao says, “The Celestial Pass²¹⁰ is in Heaven’s northwest corner. It is driven forward with the stars of the [Northern] Dipper. The seven stars of the Dipper are thus the headrope and handle of the Celestial Pass, [which is] the beflowered canopy of the Jade Mansions [of Heaven]. [The stars of the Dipper] move the qi of Nine Heavens through the [cycles] of time.²¹¹ The net of the dipper turns the Pass, and so the Nine Heavens revolve. Each heaven has four doors that correspond each to a period [of time]; therefore, in total the Nine Heavens have thirty-six periods. In one day and one night, the net of the dipper turns the Celestial Pass through the doors of one period; in a collection of thirty-six days and nights, it thus passes through thirty-six periods. With thirty-six periods complete, one revolution of all the Nine Heavens is complete. Three hundred and sixty [such] revolutions equals one complete circuit of the Nine Heavens.

九天一周，則六天之氣皆還上上三天，三天改運，促會以催其度。三千六百周，則為小劫交。

In one complete circuit of the Nine Heavens, the qi of the Six Heavens returns to the upper Three Heavens. The Three Heavens rectify the revolution [of the Six], urging them to gather [in the Three Heavens] to hasten onward in their appointed degree. The conjunction of small kalpas occurs after three thousand and six hundred complete circuits.

小劫交，則九氣改正，萬帝易位，民亡鬼滅，善存清治，六合寧一，九千九百周為大劫終。

At the conjunction of small kalpas, the Nine Qi are transformed and rectified. The myriad [celestial] thearchs change their places; the people are obliterated, the ghosts are destroyed. The good remain and purify the rule [of the kingdom], and [all in] the 209 The following translation was aided immensely by Lagerwey, Wu-shang 38-43, 81-82; Bokenkamp, “Time After Time: Taoist Apocalyptic History and the Founding of the T’ang Dynasty,” Asia Major, 3rd series, 7.1 (1994): 68-72; ibid., “Lu Xiuqing, Daoism, and the First Buddhist Canon,” in Culture and Power in the Reconstitution of the Chinese Realm, 200-600, edited by Scott Pearce, Audrey Spiro, and Patricia Ebrey (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001): 192-193, 317-318 notes 41-42.

210 The star Polaris.

211 The phrase shi’er chen 十二辰 means literally, “the watches of the night,” or “the twelve earthly branches used to measure time.”

Six Directions becomes tranquil and unified.²¹² After nine thousand nine hundred complete circuits, one great kalpa is completed.

大劫終，則九天數盡，六天運窮。六天欲窮，則氣激於三五，羣妖凶橫，因時而行，放毒威民。此皆運窮數極，乘機而鼓，以致於此。

When one great kalpa is completed, the days of the Nine Heavens reach their end, and the movement²¹³ of the Six Heavens weakens. When the Six Heavens near their end, then qi is stimulated in the three-and-five²¹⁴ and the massed anomalies become bold and fierce. Moving about in response to the times, they freely spread illness and cause harm among the people. At the end of the turnings [of a great kalpa], these beings are nearly infinite, and they seize upon [the unfortunate times] to drum themselves up [to do great harm].

地機在東南之分，九泉之下，則九河之口吐噏之。靈機上通天源之淘注，旁吞九洞之淵奧。十二時，紀推四會之水東迴，一晝一夜則氣盈，氣盈並湊九河之機，晝夜三十三日機轉。西北迴，東北張，西南噏，張則溢，噏則虧，周於四會。天源下流，九泉涌波，是為一輪。三百三十輪為一度，一度則水母促會於龍王，河侯受對於三天。三千三百度謂之陰否，陰否則蝕陰，蝕[陰]²¹⁵水涌，水涌河決，山淪地沒，九千三百度為大劫之終，陰運之極。當此之時，九泉涌於洪波，水母鼓行，山海冥一，六合坦然。此陰運之充，地氣之激也。

The Floodgates of the Earth are in the southeast, under the Nine Springs, and the mouths of the nine rivers spit forth and suck in there. The numinous Floodgates – above, they penetrate to the Heavenly Source,²¹⁶ to dredge and irrigate it; to the side, they swallows the deeps of the Nine Caverns. In one day, the ji lines of the earth push the waters of the Four Directions eastward. Because of this, during the passage of one day and one night, qi overflows; qi overflows and it all gathers at the Floodgates of the Nine Rivers.²¹⁷ Thirty-three days and nights is one complete rotation of the pivot. The northwest turns, the northeast extends, and the southwest

212 The SDZN version of this portion reads 冥一 “muddle into one.”

213 Reading 運 for 欲. While phonetic confusion on the part of the scribe was unlikely – the two characters sounded little alike in early medieval literary Chinese – correcting the passage in this way allows it to follow the same rhetorical pattern established earlier in the work: anadiplosis of a phrase, whereby the same phrase ends one sentence and begins the next. This is evident in the previous line: 九千九百周為大劫終. 大劫終，則九天數盡… See Sylva Rhetoricae, s.v. “anadiplosis.”

214 The sun, moon, stars, and five naked-eye planets; see Grand Ricci, s.v. “三五.”

215 I insert 蝕 to preserve the anadiplosis referred to above.

216 I have been unable to find an explanation of this term.

217 In translating ji 機 as floodgate, I follow Lagerwey, Wu-shang 81. Because ji lines are not introduced until the next paragraph, the only way for the translation to make sense is if that paragraph had preceded this one in the original edition of the Wushang.

contracts. [The northeast] extends and so spills over; [the southwest] contracts and so is deficient. [Yin qi] circulates throughout the Four Directions. The Heavenly Source flows downward, and the Nine Springs surge and rush. This is one revolution. 330 revolutions is one measure. After one measure, then the Water Mother hurries to meet with the Dragon King, and the River Lord receives the summons of the Three Heavens. Three thousand three hundred measures are called one yin blockage.²¹⁸ After one yin blockage, there is an eclipse of the moon. The moon is eclipsed, and the waters [of the Nine Springs] surge forth. The waters surge fourth, and so the rivers are cut off, the mountains sink and the earth drowns. Nine thousand three hundred measures are the end of one great kalpa, the limit of the hidden turning. At this time, the Nine Springs surge into great waves, the Water Mother drums herself up and moves about, mountains and seas merge in the darkness, and [all in] the six directions is laid bare. This is the fulfillment of a yin cycle, the stimulation of the qi of the earth.

天圓十二綱，地方十二紀。天綱運關，三百六十輪爲一周。地紀推機，三百三十輪爲一度。天運三千六百周爲陽勃。地轉三千三百度爲陰蝕。天氣極於太陰。地氣窮於太陽。故陽激則勃。陰否則蝕。陰陽勃蝕，天地氣反。天地氣反，乃謂之小劫。小劫交，則萬帝易位。九氣改度，日月縮運。陸地通於九泉，水母決於五河。大鳥屯於龍門，五帝受會於玄都。當此之時，凶穢滅種，善民存焉。

The round space of Heaven [is divided by] twelve gang lines; the square space of Earth [is divided by] twelve ji lines.²¹⁹ When Heaven's gang [lines] turn [it] around the [Celestial] Pass three hundred and sixty times, it is one complete circuit. When the terrestrial ji lines push the Floodgates of the Earth three hundred and thirty times, it is one measure. When the heavens turn for three thousand and six hundred complete circuits, it is a "swelling of yang." When the earth revolves for three thousand three hundred measures, it is a "yin corrosion." Heavenly qi reaches its limit in the Grand Yin; earthly qi exhausts itself in the Grand Yang. Yang is stimulated and flourishes; yin is negated and corrodes. The corrosion of yin and the flourishing of yang is the reversal of the qi of heaven and earth. The reversal of the qi of heaven and earth is the conjunction of small kalpas. During the conjunction of small kalpas, the myriad emperors change their stations, and the nine qi run counter to their norm. The sun and moon quit their revolutions. Dry land surges forth from the nine springs, and the Water Mother bursts from the five rivers. The Great Bird is visible in the Dragon Gate;²²⁰ the Five Emperors gather at the Mystic Capital. At this time, disasters accumulate and annihilate all beings. The good seed people will survive.

218 See Kroll, s.v. "否."

219 See Kroll, s.v. 綱. The term also suggests the headrope of a fishing net, and its meaning was extended to "main lines" or "guiding principle" (of a policy, an argument, etc.). The author of the WSBY version of the Zhengfa jing conceptualizes heaven as a circular net divided into sections by twelve of these gang lines, while the earth is a square net divided by twelve ji lines. The character ji suggests subsidiary lines to the gang headrope (though its extended sense carries the same meaning as gang). The gang lines of Heaven push it in revolutions around the Heavenly Pass, while the ji lines of Earth push it in revolutions around the Earthly Pivot.

220 Perhaps the region of Luoyang, in the old territory of Zhou.

天運九千九百周爲陽蝕。地轉九千三百度爲陰勃。天蝕則氣窮於太陽。地勃則氣謀於太陰。故陽否則蝕，陰激則勃，陰陽蝕勃則天地改易，謂之大劫交。大劫交，天翻地覆，海涌河決，人淪山沒，金玉化消，六合冥一。

When the heavens revolve for nine thousand nine hundred complete circuits, it is a “Yang corrosion.” When the earth turns for nine thousand three hundred measures, it is a “Yin swelling.” Heaven is corroded and its qi is exhausted in the Grand Yang; earth flourishes and its qi gathers at the Grand Yin. Thus yang is negated and corrodes, while yin is stimulated and flourishes. Yin flourishes and yang corrodes, and heaven and earth change and shift – this is called a conjunction of great kalpas. At the conjunction of great kalpas, heaven is upended and earth is flipped; the seas surge and the rivers burst their dikes; humankind disappears and mountains drown; gold and jade transform and disappear, and [all in] the six directions muddles into one.

右出《洞真三天正法經》

The preceding comes from the Correct Method of the Three Heavens of the Cavern that Penetrates Perfection.

For a summary of these passages, see chapter four.

Juan 22

Though juan 22 contains only a mention – not a citation – of the Rectifying Methods, it is nonetheless worth considering. Juan 22 belongs to a section of the text (j. 8-23) that describes the organization of the celestial bureaucracy, illustrating that Emperor Zhou’s knowledge comprehends even the minutiae of the heavens’ inner workings.²²¹ At WSBY 22.1b, the editors place a “Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens” (Santian zhengfa 三天正法) in one of the highest celestial palaces, the Purple Chamber of the Universe (Liuhe zifang 六合紫房; the phrase liuhe literally means “the Six Directions,” here standing for everything within them). Whether the Secret Essentials is referring to the work as a whole or to methods contained therein is unclear. The very mention of the Rectifying Methods in the context of heavenly organization accords it great importance; the editors of the Secret Essentials would have had a multitude of works available to them, and choosing this particular work or part of a work to include here indicates they held it in great esteem. Their placement of the Rectifying Methods in one of the highest palaces reinforces this impression.

²²¹ See Lagerwey, Wu-shang 42-43.

Juan 30-32

The next citations of the Rectifying Methods occur during a long discussion of the provenance, character, and function of celestial writings. J. 30 gives the provenance and names of books and talismans; j. 31, their powers and the duration for which they will remain in the world, as well as the fated preconditions one must possess in order to receive them; and j. 32, the procedures for their transmission. The import of these writings is not in doctrine, but in part in their power as political tools. The editors make this point later on when they discuss the proper transmission of Daoist works: “The norms of the scriptures transform the world.”²²² J. 30 mentions, but does not cite, the Rectifying Methods. From it, we learn that the Rectifying Methods came to be together with the Celestial King of Primordial Commencement, and that he thereafter bestowed it upon the Most High Lord of the Great Dao (i.e., the deified Laozi). The implication here is that the work formed together with the highest gods out of the primordial qi of the universe, thus granting it almost unexcelled status among works. Following a general principle of Daoist hierarchy, its exalted status would have come with exalted powers: the nearer to the cosmic unity a deity or work, the greater its power.

²²² 經法化世. See Lagerwey, Wu-shang 60. My translation differs from his.

J. 31 explicitly cites the Rectifying Methods. It links the work to a number of other works that form part of the core of the Shangqing canon. The nexus of these relationships is CT 1379 Shangqing yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing 上清玉帝七聖玄紀迴天九霄經 “Scripture of the Return to the Nine Heavens, Mystical Records of the Seven Saints of the Jade Emperor of Utmost Purity.” This Eastern Jin text is a reworked member of the original Shangqing revelations that is quoted extensively in the WSBY. It provides a list of records – the ji 紀 of the title – on which one’s name must be inscribed in order to ascend to the heavens, a method of visual meditation for writing one’s name in said records, hymns to the seven patrons of the scripture, and a list of Seven Wounds (qi shang 七傷). These are faults in behavior that harm the Marks of Immortality – that is, the physical characteristics borne by a human destined to become a transcendent. Per Robinet, “[t]he names of the paradises [to which one can ascend], the characteristics of the records, and the Marks of Immortality correspond exactly to the terms found in CT 442 (The Annals of Lord Lao of the Latter Age).” CT 442 is a member of the original Shangqing corpus that is devoted to the Lord of the Golden Porte; it opens with his biography and describes his efforts to save humankind as well as the heavens to which certain elect will ascend, should their names be inscribed on the appropriate celestial records.²²³

Establishing an early date for the Qisheng xuanji and linking it to the Shangqing corpus is important because it helps date the amulets in the received Rectifying Methods, many of which are associated with the celestial records at the center of the Qisheng. However, this association does not exist in the received version of the Qisheng xuanji. Instead it is found in a chapter of WSBY 31 called “The Lodged Lot of Those who Encounter Scripture” (Yujing sufeng pin 遇經宿分品). This chapter opens with a condensed version of the introduction to the received Qisheng (which it cites by name) before providing quotations related to that text found in elsewhere in the Daoist canon. On ZHDZ 28.107c-108a, it quotes an extract from the Rectifying Methods (absent from the received version) that links the amulets to various celestial records in Qisheng (and thereby CT 442). While the received Qisheng is concerned with practices that help the adept inscribe his or her name in these records, in the Rectifying Methods extract, receipt of a given amulet acts as proof that the recipient’s name is already inscribed in the associated celestial record from the Qisheng. These proofs are enumerated in a list of entries identical in format: “All whose names are inscribed in [record x] will attain sight of [amulet Y]” 凡名參……者得見…… All of the amulets in WSBY 31 are found in the received Jiuwei badao, and all but one of the records listed are found in the received Qisheng xuanji. What follows is a partial translation of WSBY 31. The text is available at ZHDZ 28.107c-1-108a. My own notes appear in brackets.

²²³ See CT, s.v. “Shangqing yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing,” and R 2: 225-228.

凡名參上清金書玉籙者，得見太上衆文籙。

All those whose names are in the Jade Registers of the Golden Books of Upper Clarity will gain sight of the Register of the Massed Writs of the Most High. [The Jade Registers are the second record in the Qisheng. The Massed Writs is the name of the first group of amulets in the received Jiuwei badao. It is treated as a single amulet in WSBY 31 and 32, as well as at Precious Writs 20a.]

凡名參太極白簡青文者，得見除六天文三天正法。

All those whose names are in the Indigo Writs on White Slips of the Grand Culmen will gain sight of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens for Expelling [the Qi of] the Six Heavens. [The Indigo Writs is the third record in the Qisheng. The Rectifying Methods is the second amulet in the Jiuwei badao.]

凡名參方諸玄素紫名者，得見太微靈都婉轉[三方]真文。

All those whose names are in the Obscure Plain Purple Names of Fangzhu will attain sight of the Turning Writ [of Three Prescriptions] of the Perfected of the Numinous Capital of Grand Tenuity. [The Plain Purple Names is the fourth record in the Qisheng. The Turning Writ is the fifth amulet in the received Jiuwei badao.]

凡名參金闕玉名者，得見九老仙都玄流紫極元君真書。

All those whose names are in the Jade Names of the Golden Porte will gain sight of the Perfected Book of the Dame of the Mysterious Flows of the Purple Culmen at the Transcendent Capital of the Nine Elders. [The Jade Names is the first record in the Qisheng. The Perfected Book of the Dame of the Mysterious Flows is the sixth amulet in the received Jiuwei badao.]

凡名參太清玉籍絳名者，得見清和宮天帝君真書。

All those whose names are in the Red Names of the Jade Records of the [Heaven of] Grand Clarity will gain sight of the Perfected Book of the Heavenly Thearch-Lord of the Palace of Clear Harmony. [The Red Names is the fifth record in the Qisheng. The Perfected Book of the Heavenly Thearch-Lord is the seventh amulet in the Jiuwei badao.]

凡名參太素瓊簡金字者，得見紫微玄宮玉帝飛天真書。

All those whose names are in Golden Characters on Green Slips of Primordial Substance will gain sight of the Flying Heaven Perfected Books of the Jade Emperor in the Mysterious Palace of Purple Tenuity. [The Golden Characters is the sixth record in the Qisheng. The Flying Apsaras Perfected Books are the ninth amulet in the Jiuwei badao.]

凡名參玄都丹臺白玉金字者，得見玄洲仙伯開天萬仙真書。

All those whose names are in the Golden Characters on White Jade in the Red Platform of the Mystic Capital will gain sight of the The Perfected Book of the Myriad Transcendents that Opens Heaven, of the Transcendent Count of the Mysterious Continent. [The Golden Characters is the ninth record in the Qisheng. The Perfected Book of the Myriad Transcendents is the tenth amulet in the Jiuwei badao.]

凡名參南極丹文紫籙者，得見崑崙壙臺飛天真文

All those whose names are in the Unadorned Register in Cinnabar Script of the Southern Culmen will attain sight of the Flying Apsaras Perfected Writ of the City Wall of Kunlun. [The Unadorned Register is the seventh record in the Qisheng. The Flying Apsaras Perfected Writ is the twelfth amulet in the Jiuwei badao.]

凡名參玄宮青金赤書者，得見蓬萊高上真書。

All those whose names are in the Crimson Books of Blue-Green Gold of the Palace of Mystery will gain sight of the Exalted Perfected Books of Penglai. [The Crimson Books do not appear in the received Qisheng. The Exalted Perfected Books is the fourteenth amulet in the Jiuwei badao.]

凡名參三元宮琳札青書者，得見天帝丈人黃上真書。

All those whose names are in the Azure-black Memorials of the Palace of the Three Primes will gain sight of the Perfected Books of the Celestial Thearch Elder of the Yellow August. [The Azure-black Memorials are the tenth record in the Qisheng. The Perfected Books of the Celestial Thearch Elder is the sixteenth amulet in the Jiuwei badao.]

右出洞真三天正法經

The foregoing is extracted from the Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens, of the Cavern of Perfection.

Given the context in which they appear, the import of the amulets and records listed above rests not just in their ability to confer certain powers on the bearer, but also in the intimate knowledge of the cosmos they demonstrate. The list of amulets in WSBY 31 accords imperfectly with a list given in WSBY 32. What follows is a partial translation of WSBY 32. It appears at ZHDZ 28.112c-113a.

上清清微天始青正法六天文，元始傳九天父母，萬始先生。三天真書，一名金陽洞靈文，三天玉童所出，傳皇上先生。太上衆文籙，太上傳金闕帝君。三元玄臺告六天符，傳太上元老。三天正法，傳鬱絕真王。三天九微玄都太真陰陽靈籙上元章，太帝丈人受之於太虛无上真君。太微靈都宛轉真炁三方文，九天真王以授太上丈人。九老仙都玄流紫極真元君[真書]，受之於三天玉童。驅虎豹符，九炁丈人受之玄私陰陵上帝。清和宮天帝君皇熙真書，太上元君以授黃軒。紫微玄宮玉飛天真書，太清元始天王以授西王母。玄洲仙伯開天萬仙真書，東海小童以授得道人。崑崙壙臺靈飛天真[書]，太上大夫以授衆仙得道者。蓬萊高上真書，玄成清天上皇以傳寧封。

右出洞真三天正法經

The Writ [for Expelling] the Six Heavens, Rectifying Method of the Heaven of Clear Tenuity, [one of] the Heavens of Highest Clarity, was transmitted by the [Celestial King] of Primordial Commencement to the Master of Myriad Commencements,

Father-and-Mother of the Nine Heavens.²²⁴ The Perfected Book of the Three Heavens, also called “Writ of Golden Yang of Dongling,²²⁵ is that which the Jade Slips of the Three Heavens came out of, and was transmitted to Master Huangshang. The Register of the Massed Texts of the Most High was transmitted by the Most High to the Lord of the Golden Porte. The Talismans for Accusing the Six Heavens of the Mysterious Platforms of the Three Primes were transmitted to the Most High Mysterious Elder.²²⁶ The Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens were transmitted to the Perfected King of Luxuriant Extinction.²²⁷ The Numinous Registers of Yin and Yang of the Grand Perfected [One] of the Mystic Capital of the Nine Heavens – the Venerable Grand Thearch received it from the Unexcelled Perfected Lord of the Grand Void.²²⁸ The Writ of Three Winding Prescriptions of Perfected Qi of the Numinous Capital of the Heaven of Grand Tenuity – The Perfected King of the Nine Heavens conferred it upon the Most High Elder.²²⁹ The Perfected Prime Lord of the 224 The Father and Mother of the Three Heavens appears throughout the Shangqing corpus, particularly in early works. See, e.g., CT 1331 Dongzhen shangqing shenzhou qizhuan qibian wutian jing 洞真上清神州七轉七變舞天經 3b, 6a, 23a, 25b; Sanyuan bujing 26b. The earliest mention of the Master of Myriad Commencements occurs in an authentic Shangqing revelation, CT 55 Gaoshang taixiao langshu qiongwen dizhang jing 高上太霄琅書瓊文帝章經 8b. On this work, see R 2: 233-35. He also appears in works that postdate slightly the original Shangqing revelations: CT 1393 Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiuling taimiao guishan xuanlu 上清元始變化寶真上經九靈太妙龜山玄錄 28b-29a (though in an older stratum of the version), and CT 1378 Shangqing jinzhen yuguang bajing feijing 上清金真玉光八景飛經 24b. On these works, see R 2: 219-223, 45-49. He also appears at Sanyuan bu jing 24b. This is either an original revelation or a slight reworking. See R 2: 132-33.

225 Dongling is one of the Cavern-Heavens. See Handian and Grand Ricci, s.v. 洞靈. Master Huangshang is relatively rare. He appears at CT 1358 Shangqing gaoshang jinyuan yuzhang yuqing yinshu 上清高上金元羽章玉清隱書經 23b in the line of transmission for an amulet. This work slightly postdates the original Shangqing revelations. See R 2: 242-44. He appears in several citations in the WSBY.

226 The Mysterious Elder is also rare. This is his earliest appearance in the canon. Of note is that he also appears in The Petition Almanac of Master Redpine (CT 615 Chisong zi zhangli 赤松子章曆), an important collection of Celestial Master petitions dating to the Tang. On this, see EoT, s.v. Chisong zi zhangli and citations, especially Franciscus Verellen, “The Heavenly Master Liturgical Agenda According to Chisong zi’s Petition Almanac,” Cahiers d’Extrême-Asie 14: 291-343.

227 The Perfected King of Luxuriant Extinction appears only here and in this amulet’s entry in the Jiuwei badao.

228 The Venerable Grand Thearch is discussed in more detail elsewhere in the WSBY. In juan 23, “Graded Palaces and Bureaus of the Three Realms” (Sanjie gong fu pin 三界宮府品), he gathers with other officials at the Azure-Black Palace of the Jade Daïs (Qinghua yujie gong 青華玉陛宮) east of the Mystic Capital, under the auspices of the Grand Sage of Primordial Commencement of the Eastern Heaven of Lingbao (Yuanshi lingbao dongtian dasheng 元始靈寶東天大聖) to correct the records of the merits and faults of people who study the Way of Transcendents. While he first appears in a member of the original Shangqing corpus (CT 1372 Shangqing gaoshang yuchen fengtai qusu shangjing 上清高上玉晨鳳臺曲素上經) and the earlier Lingbao wufu xu, he proved immensely popular throughout later ages.

229 The Most High Elder was probably part of the original Shangqing pantheon. His earliest mention is in CT 1372 上清高上玉晨鳳臺曲素上經 12a, 14b. Though Robinet declines to state for certain that the Qusu shangjing is a member of the original revelations (see R 2: 187-190), its appearance in many

Purple Culmen, Ninth Elder of the Mysterious Flows of the Transcendent Capital received it from the Jade Lad of the Three Heavens.²³⁰ The Elder of the Nine Qi received the Talisman for Expelling Tigers and Wolves from the Upper Thearch of Mysterious Harmony of the Hidden Tumulus.²³¹ The Most High Prime Lord bestowed the Perfected Book of August Splendor of the Lord Heavenly Thearch of the Palace of Clear Harmony on the Yellow Emperor.²³² The Celestial King of Primordial Commencement of the Heaven of Grand Clarity bestowed the Perfected Book of the Jade [Emperor] in the Mysterious Palace of Purple Tenuity [that Allows the Bearer] to Fly to the Heavens on the Queen Mother of the West. As for the Perfected Book of the Myriad Transcendents that Opens Heaven, of the Transcendent Count of the Mysterious Continent – the Little Lad of the Eastern Sea bestowed it upon those who had attained the Dao. As for the Grand Perfected Book for Flying to Heaven of the Platform of the Fortified Wall of Kunlun Range – the Grand Officer to the Most High bestowed it upon those many transcendents who had attained the Dao.²³³ The High August of Mysterious Attainment of the Heaven of Clarity transmitted the Book of the Most High Perfected of Penglai to Ningfeng.²³⁴

The foregoing comes from the Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens, of the Cavern of Perfection.

WSBY 31 and 32 contain many citations of a Dongzhen zhengfa jing that link it to early Shangqing works via apotropaic amulets. They provide strong evidence that warding off demons and ascent to the heavens were two primary focuses of one early version of the early lists suggests great antiquity – though it has probably undergone revision.

230 There appears to be some confusion about this title in the WSBY version about this name, as it appears in WSBY 31 not as a deity but as an amulet.

231 The Elder of Nine Qi predates the Shangqing canon. He appears first in juan 1 of CT 880 Taiqing jinye shendan jing 太清金液神丹經, which Chen Guofu dates conclusively to the Eastern Han (25-220 CE). TC, s.v. “Taiqing jinye shendan jing” and Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao (Taipei: Mingwen shuju, 1983): 289-292, esp. p. 291. The Upper Thearch of Mysterious Harmony of the Hidden Tumulus (read 和 for 私) is rare, appearing only in the WSBY and at Zhenling weiye tu 10b.

232 The Most High Prime Lord predates the Shangqing revelations, appearing first in the Later Han Taishang laojun zhongjing (CT 1168 太上老君中經, 1.1b) as a hypostasis of the Most High Lord of the Dao with nine heads on one body.

233 The Grand Officer of the Most High is rare, appearing only twice elsewhere: at Zhenling weiye tu 6a and Chuanshou sandong jingjie 21b.

234 The High August of Mysterious Attainment is also rare, appearing only once elsewhere in the WSBY (84.6a) and in the Siji mingke (3.6a). Ningfeng is a well-known transcendent with a biography in CT 294 Liexian zhuan 列仙傳, comp. Liu Xiang 劉向 (77-6 BCE).

work. However, other passages in the same sections show that the version of the Rectifying Methods consulted by the editors of the WSBY had already undergone significant alteration. The deities and locales in WSBY 32 place the Dongzhen zhengfa jing slightly later than the original Shangqing revelations. Though they are camouflaged by allusions to much older works – Ningfeng and the Elder of the Nine Qi, for instance, predate the Shangqing corpus by far – the Chamber of the Three Purities and Master Huangshang are only to be found in apocrypha attached to early texts in the Shangqing corpus. Given the temporal proximity between the Shangqing and Lingbao revelations – the latter appeared around 400, less than thirty years after Yang Xi’s revelations ceased – it is very likely the composition of the Dongzhen zhengfa jing overlapped with the composition of the early Lingbao revelations. The editors of the WSBY thus appealed to contemporary religious developments as they crafted their encyclopedia for the emperor.

Another section of WSBY 32 indicates that the Dongzhen zhengfa jing included not just amulets, but hymns. The case in point is the Hymn-Writ of the Three Heavens (Santian songwen 三天頌文). The Secret Essentials does not record the hymn itself; merely its title and powers, spread out over two juan. Juan 32 concerns its history:

三天頌文，三天元始祕於三素之房九曲瓊室。千年一傳。青童君曰：自唐之後，得此文乃七千人。皆得馭飛龍而玄昇，晏鴻翻而騰翔。或託形輪化，潛引而飛空也。如此，不可具記。依三天格制，七百年一出。

右出《洞真三天正法經》

The [Heavenly King of] Primordial Commencement²³⁵ hid the Hymn-Writ of the Three Heavens in the Bejeweled Sidechamber of the Nine Springbends, in the 235 The work reads “The Primordial Commencement of the Three Heavens.” Because “Primordial Commencement” is a common abbreviation of the title “Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement,” and the phrase santian yuanshi appears only once in the Chinese literary corpus outside this citation, I take the phrase “Three Heavens” to be an accidental interpolation.

Chamber of the Three Purities.²³⁶ He transmits it once in a thousand years. The Lord Azure Lad says: Since King Yao this writ has been transmitted to seven thousand people. All rode flying dragons and mysteriously ascended, took their ease on grand wings and flew away. Some entrusted their form to the transformations of the wheel; some retired into hiding and flew into emptiness.²³⁷ Those that were like this – they cannot all be recorded. According to the rules and policies of the Three Heavens, it emerges once every seven hundred years.

The foregoing comes from the Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens, of the Cavern of Perfection.

As discussed above, the rhetorical function of this portion of the WSBY is to demonstrate knowledge of the tools used to bring harmony to the people and master the cosmos.

Juan 43

Juan 43, on ritual dress and the recitation of scriptures, concerns the detailed conduct of Daoists in the oratory. As one summary says, “In opening and reciting [the scriptures] according to the rules, [the adept] enters into communication with the spirits and attracts good fortune.”²³⁸ Much like j. 30-32, j. 43 demonstrates the editors’ knowledge of how to communicate with the unseen realm – knowledge which their compilation extends to Emperor Wu. It is here we learn specifically what sort of good fortune the Hymn-Writ attracts:

三天頌文，凡受此文誦之於別室。千徧，通神，萬徧，通真。通神，則與神交，言逆知吉凶。通真，則與元始觀顏，入水不沉，入火不然，經災履厄，騰景三清。

As for the Hymn-Writ of the Three Heavens, those who receive this writ should recite it in the sideroom. After a thousand times, they will enter into communication with spirits; after ten thousand times they will enter into communication with the Perfected. When they enter into communication with spirits, they will converse with spirits, speak predictions, and foresee the auspicious and inauspicious. When they enter into communication with the Perfected, they will look upon the face of the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement. They will enter water without drowning; they will enter fire and not burn up. They will make it through disasters and traverse adversity. They will ride phosphors to the Three Clarities.

236 The Bejeweled Sidechamber of the Nine Springbends appears nowhere else in the Chinese literary corpus. The Chamber of the Three Purities appears at Huangsu sishisi fang 9a as the residence of Jade Lads and Jade Maidens 玉童玉女.

237 Despite its Buddhist resonance, the term lunhua 輪化 appears chiefly in Daoist works during the early medieval period.

238 開讀合儀，通靈致福。See Lagerwey, Wu-shang 62.

Juan 47

J. 47 raises once again the matter of textual transmission, this time in the context of the purificatory fasts (zhai 齋) that precede the legitimate transfer of a work from master to student. Concerning the Rectifying Methods, it has this to say:

《洞真除六天之文三天正法經》男受投書，不祭。女受當祭。不投書皆齋；七日或三日。

As for the Rectifying Methods, when a man receives copy of the work, he need not perform the sacrifice. When a woman receives a copy of the work, then she must perform the sacrifice. Even those not receiving the text should perform a purificatory fast of seven days or three days in length.

Here, the editors of the WSBY are extending the proper ordering of the universe down to the transmission of the works that are created out of the same qi that formed its deities and human inhabitants. Recall that according to these same editors, the Rectifying Methods formed together with one of the highest gods; its proper receipt and transmission are thus of utmost importance.

Juan 65

J. 65 marks a transition from matters heavenly (the forces of karmic retribution; the characteristics of immortals) to the specifics of Daoist religious life. It is followed in j. 66 by rules governing the minutiae of behavior in the oratory (preparatory bathing; lighting lamps; burning incense). J. 65 advocates a life of reclusion. It cites the Rectifying

Methods in a section called “On living in the mountains” 山居品. As the citation makes clear, such an abode is not without its dangers. The editors draw on the Rectifying Methods for a protective chant. Here we see some of the most concrete instructions for Daoist practice. Several chapters of such advice precede a return outward to more abstract matters – what Lagerwey calls “the return to silence.”²³⁹ As above, demonstrating their ability to prescribe even the minutiae of daily life emphasizes the comprehensive nature of the editors’ project.

凡修六天之文三天正法，遊行五嶽履涉川澤，當行三天正一之祝，威凶滅試召
靈致仙之法。登山之初，當先於山外叩齒九通，閉目思五色之雲勃勃四會，掩
冠一山及我身在雲炁之中。良久見五嶽仙官及山形林木草澤禽獸，萬物悉來朝
己仰祝曰

上帝出遊日吉時良

玉華覆蓋太一扶將

左翼白元右輔無英

八帝九真陵逢履昌

道我送我與我同光

履行五嶽群仙奉迎

出入河海萬道開張

役御六丁旋攝五行

三天有命蕩除萬凶

割落掃穢流金滅殃

正法清通嚴如威霜

華精奕奕龍輿昂昂

239 See Lagerwey, Wu-shang 64-66, 29. 170ff.

流青翠羽飛錦羅裳

所向所之靡不吉昌

萬真來朝齊昇玉京

畢引炁三十六咽。右出《洞真三天正法經》

All those who cultivate the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens, the Writ [for Expelling the Qi of] the Six Heavens – when they travel to the Five Marchmounts, when their shoes touch the rivers and marshes, they practice the Incantation of the Orthodox One of the Three Heavens, a method to overawe disasters and destroy adversaries, to summon numens and call transcendents. Before you enter the mountain range, clack your teeth nine times, shut your eyes and imagine a five-colored cloud flourishing and gathering from all sides, covering the entire mountain and “my” body within the cloudy qi. After a while, see the transcendent officials and all the mountain’s features – trees of the forest, grasses, marshes, birds and beasts, and all the myriad phenomena altogether coming to pay court to myself. Welcome them with an incantation, saying:

The High Thearch goes forth to travel, the day being auspicious and the time fine.

Jade flowers cover and canopy him; the Grand Monad supports and leads him by the hand.

On his left, he is escorted by the White Prime; on his right, he is assisted by the Matchless Hero.

The Eight Emperors and Nine Perfected rise up to meet me and we tread in glory.

They lead me and escort me, joining in radiance with me.

[I] walk on the five marchmounts, and flocks of transcendents worshipfully welcome me.

Coming and going within the rivers and seas, the ten thousand ways open and extend before me.

Making servants of and commanding the six ding deities, I gather and command the Five Phases at my will.

The Three Heavens have commanded; they annihilate the myriad disasters.

Cutting and chopping, they sweep away impurities; flowing gold annihilates calamities.

The orthodox method clarifies and penetrates, severe as a hard frost.

Flowery essence is splendid; dragon carts are brave.

Flowing green and azure wings, they fly with brocaded skirts.

I go where I want, with naught but good fortune.

The myriad perfected come to pay court to me, together ascending to the Jade Capital.

When finished, suck in qi thirty-six times.

The preceding comes from the Rectifying Scripture of the Three Heavens of the Cavern of Perfection

Appearances in other texts

Understanding the names and terms found within the Incantation of the Orthodox One as well as its appearances elsewhere in the Daoist Canon sheds some light on the antiquity of the chant as well as the sources on which the editors of the WSBY drew. The Incantation of the Orthodox One appears in its full form in the following works.

CT 427 Shangqing xiuxing jingjue 上清修行經訣, hereafter Formulary

“Formulary for Shangqing Practices.” The Formulary is a collection of methods revealed to Yang Xi 楊羲 (330-86), a spirit medium in the service of the Xu 許 family of Jurong 句容 county (near modern Nanjing). The Formulary consists of a patchwork of citations from other works. The presence of one Lingbao work and several Shangqing works that postdate the Zhen’gao revelations indicate that the received version of the Xiuxing must have undergone revision. Each method is preceded by a title and a gloss indicating its source. The Incantation occurs on pp. 26a-b as the first of several incantations to be chanted when entering mountains or marshes. The editor of the Xiuxing jingjue attributes it to the Xiaomo jing 消魔經, an abbreviated title for several different texts.²⁴⁰

CT 1269 Shangqing xiushen yaoshi jing 上清修身要事經, hereafter Essentials of Practice.

“The Essentials of the Practice of Perfection” The Essentials of Practice is almost identical to the Formulary. In the text, the Incantation is called the “Yuqing shaomo daoshi youxing shanze zhufa” 玉清消魔道士遊行山澤祝法, which I tentatively translate as the “Incantation-method from the Heaven of Jade Clarity [for] destroying demons [to be used by] Daoist priests entering traveling in the mountains and marshes.”²⁴¹

Names and terms

High Thearch (Shangdi 上帝)

Shangdi is well known as lord of the realm of deceased ancestors and a focus of royal veneration during the Shang 商 dynasty (?- c. 1046 BCE). Though he was replaced in this capacity by Tian 天 with the rise of the Zhou, worship of Shangdi continued under Qin 秦 (255-207 BCE) and Han (206 BCE-219 CE), and in fact he is nearly omnipresent in the 240 TC, s.v. “Shangqing xiuxing jingjue.” The works referred to as the Xiaomo jing include, e.g., the portion of CT 1358 Shangqing gaoshang jinyuan yuzhang yuqing yinshu jing 上清高上金元羽章玉清隱書經, hereafter Jinyuan yuzhang) called Yuqing shaomo dawang jinxuan baishen neizhou yinwen 玉清消魔大王金玄百神內咒隱文 (ZHDZ 1.733), which does not contain the “Zhengyi zhou.” For an introduction to the Jinyuan yuzhang, see TC, s.v. “Shangqing gaoshang jinyuan yuzhang yuqing yinshu jing.” For a list of works that appear under the name Xiaomo jing, see R 2:179.

241TC, s.v. “Shangqing xiushen yaoshi jing.”

Chinese literary canon: from the official histories to poetry to local gazetteers, his presence is felt throughout the entirety of dynastic Chinese history.²⁴²

The Grand Monad (Taiyi 太一)

Like Shangdi, Taiyi was an important figure long before the Northern and Southern Dynasties. One of his early appearances, in the Guodian manuscripts, has him responsible for “generating water” (shengshui 生水). This preceded a varied career in which he appeared as a meditative state of “pure oneness” in the late Warring States; the primordial breath (yuan qi 元氣) in the Weft Texts; the source of the ritual in the Annals of Master Lü (Lushi chunqiu 呂氏春秋, 249 BCE); the root of music used in charismatic transformation in the early Han Record of Rites (Liji 禮記); and as the focus of a Han state cult in the 2nd c. BCE. While official veneration declined in the early Common Era, Taiyi remained important outside official circles, and indeed rose to prominence again in the Yellow Turbans movement, as well as featuring in the mortuary rituals of the Celestial Masters in the early Northern and Southern Dynasties period. Works of this time place special emphasis on his role as administrator of human destinies who exists both in the star Kochab and as the overlord of the spirits of the human body. He is taken 242 See Robert Eno, “Shang State Religion and the Pantheon of the Oracle Texts,” in John Lagerwey and Marc Kalinowsky, ed., ECR Part One: Shang Through Han 1:41-102 (Leiden: Brill, 2009), for an explanation of the Shang significance of Shangdi and its relationship to other supernormal beings. Mariane Bujard, “State and Local Cults in Han Religion,” in ECR 2, ed. John Lagerwey and Lü Pengzhi, 783, 794. Here are a few mentions of Shangdi in the Chinese literary canon, drawn almost at random from Kanripo’s database: he appears in a controversy over rites during the reign of Mingdi 明帝 (Liu Yu 劉彧, r. 464-472) of the Liu-Song 劉宋 (420-478) in Song shu 宋書 16.23a-b; in a poem by Emperor Wu 武 (Sima Yan 司馬炎, r. 265-289) of the Jin 晉 (265-419), preserved in Wen xuan 20.22a-25a; and an entry in the Shandong tongzhi 山東通志 concerning local sacrifices to Shangdi. The entry is dated to the fourth year (bridging 1726 and 1727 in the Western calendar) of the Yongzheng 雍正 Emperor (Aisin-Gioro Yinzhen 愛新覺羅胤禛, r. 1723-1735) of the Qing 清 (1644-1911).

up by the Shangqing corpus as an important bodily deity. The received Rectifying Methods makes him responsible for the turning of the kalpas in an internal meditation exercise that has the adept consume the entire universe in a conflagration of fiery qi emanating from their own body.²⁴³

White Prime (Baiyuan 白元)

The identity of this spirit varies according to the work consulted. The Huangting neijing jing (on which, see below) claims it is a spirit of the lungs, which the Taidan yinshu (discussed more fully below) confirms. However, it appears as a spirit of the brain in the Hymn to the Gods of the Cave-Chamber (CT 133 Taishang dongfang neijing zhu 太上洞房內經注, hereafter Dongfang neijing zhu), which was integrated into the Shangqing corpus at an early date. Baiyuan plays an important role in the Shangqing corpus, and so appears elsewhere as well. In addition to the Taidan yinshu, he can be found in the Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue (discussed earlier), as well as texts like the Zhen'gao and the Esoteric Biography of Ziyang the Perfected (CT 303 Ziyang zhenren neizhuan 紫陽真人內傳) that form the core of the Shangqing corpus. The deity's antiquity is further attested by a citation in the Wushang biyao. Finally, 243 EoT, s.v. "Taiyi." For a detailed overview of Taiyi that takes into account excavated texts, tomb paraphernalia, and Dunhuang manuscripts in addition to received material, see Li Ling, "An Archaeological Study of Taiyi (Grand One) Worship," trans. Donald Harper, Early Medieval China 2 (1995-96): 1-39. Isabelle Robinet, in Julian F. Pas and Norman Girardot, trans., Taoist Meditation: The Maoshan Tradition of Great Purity (Albany: SUNY Press, 1993), 134-138 provides an overview of Taiyi's diverse manifestations in the human body. See also R 1:129. For the Santian zhengfa jing citation, see ZHDZ 1:261b.22-261c.11.

Baiyuan links the Incantation to the received Rectifying Methods, where he appears early on in the commentary of the Azure Lad.²⁴⁴

The Matchless Hero (Wuying 無英)

Baiyuan and Wuying often compose two parts of a trio that also includes The Yellow Old Lord of the Center (Zhongyang Huanglao jun 中央黃老君); this is how they appear in the Santian zhengfa jing. Along with Taiyi and Baiyuan, Wuying is an important bodily deity in the Shangqing corpus.²⁴⁵

The Eight Emperors Badi 八帝

These might be the Demon Kings of the Eight Directions (Badi damowang 八帝大魔王) mentioned in the Jinyuan yuzhang, a text that was integrated into the Shangqing corpus at an early date. (For more on these beings, see below.) The Demon Kings appear in this text as villains to be driven away by spirits marshalled by the adept. Thus, their association here with the benevolent Nine Perfected would be strange. However, there are 244 See the Grand Ricci, s.v. “Bai yuan”; the Huangting neijing jing in YJQQ 11.25b; EoT, s.v. “Taidan yinshu,” but cf. R 1:129, which lists Baiyuan as a spirit of the brain. See also Dongfang neijing zhu 3b-4b; TC, s.v. “Taishang dongfang neijing zhu”; Zhen’gao 9.14b, 13.11a, where Baiyuan appears as a spirit of the brain; he also appears as a spirit of the brain in Ziyang zhenren neizhuan 8b-9a; WSBY 3.12a; Santian zhengfa 1b.

245 He is sometimes known as Yuanying 元英; see, e.g., Suling jing (full title: CT 1314 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing 洞真太上素靈洞元大有妙經) 18a and CT 1339 Dongzhen bajing yulu chentu yinfu 洞真八景玉籙晨圖隱符 6a. In both cases he is associated with Baiyuan, and so is probably a confusion of 元 with 无, an alternate form of 無. The Bajing yulu was incorporated into the Shangqing corpus at an early date after the Shangqing revelations; see TC, s.v. “Dongzhen bajing yulu chentu yinfu.” For the association of Baiyuan, Wuying and Zhongyang Huanglao jun in the Shangqing corpus, see R 1:129; Ciyi jing 5b-6a, 25a-b; Dongfang neijing zhu 1b, 4b, 9a; Ziyang zhenren neizhuan 8b-9a, where Zhongyang Huanglao jun is the “great spirit that cannot be named,” thanks to his association with Taiwei; Denzhen yinjue 1.3a. Dadong zhenjing 2.10b-11a pairs Wuying with Baiyuan, as does Taidan yinshu 20a and Huangting neijing jing 1.10b, where Wuying goes by an alternate name (Gongzi 公子); Santian zhengfa jing 1b.

references to benevolent Eight Emperors scattered throughout the Shangqing corpus. The Jade Rule of the Three Original Ones and the Promulgated Scripture of the Three Female Original Ones (CT 354 Shangqing sanyuan yujian sanyuan bujing 上清三元玉檢三元布經) was integrated into the main body of Shangqing texts some fifty years after the Shangqing revelations; in an incantation it contains, the Eight Emperors command transcendents to dispatch a “flying chariot” (feibing 飛輶) that carries the adept to the Grand Void (taixu 太虛). In The Nine Crimson Speckled Talismans of the Five Emperors’ Inner Contemplation (CT 1329 Taishang jiuchi banfu wudi neizhen jing 太上九赤班符五帝內真經), a member of the original Shangqing corpus, they appear in an incantation to the Lord of Mount Tai (Taishan jun 泰山君). More significantly, they appear in a text associated with the Nine Perfected, the Mount Turtle Register of the Nine Spirits Pertaining to the Superior Scripture of Transformation of Primordial Beginning (CT 1393 Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiuling taimiao guishan xuanlu 上清元始變化寶真上經九靈太妙龜山玄籙, hereafter Guishan xuanlu); thus, these Eight Emperors are probably the same referred to in the incantation. In the received Rectifying Methods (259b.19-21), they appear as emperors of the Eight Directions, with one set of eight dwelling in each of the upper three heavens.²⁴⁶

246 Zhonghua daojiao dacidian, s.v. “八帝大魔王.” For the names and descriptions of the Eight Demon Kings, see the Jinyuan yuzhang at ZHDZ 1.733ff. Sanyuan bujing 37a/ZHDZ 1.356; on the work, see TC, s.v. “Shangqing sanyuan yujian sanyuan bujing.” Jiuchi banfu 9b/ZHDZ 1.444-445. On the work, see TC, s.v. “Taishang jiuchi banfu wudi neizhen jing.” The Guishan xuanlu is perhaps the most complete list of the seventy-four Shangqing gods. See TC, s.v. “Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiuling taimiao guishan xuanlu.”

Nine Perfected (Jiu zhen 九真)

The Nine Perfected play a critical role in the Shangqing corpus, and are named and described in the Taidan yinshu as residents of the Three Primes (Sanyuan 三元), here referring to the upper, middle, and lower sections of the body. Each of the Three Primes is itself divided into upper, middle, and lower levels, and one Perfected is assigned to each level. It is in this capacity that they help the adept transform their body in the Jiuzhen zhongjing. However, the Three Primes also have cosmological significance as hypostases of the three primordial qi that generate the universe, and accordingly the Nine Perfected play an essential role in governing the cosmos. In the Rectifying Methods as it has come down to us, they appear as residents of the Three Primes, conceived of in that version as mutations of the qi of the Nine Heavens. The Nine Perfected reside in the Three Heavens of Clear Tenuity (Qingwei 清微), Yuyu 禹餘, and Grand Crimson (Dachi 大赤).²⁴⁷

247 See ZHDZ 1.520a-521a for their names and significance on both the human and cosmological levels. EoT, s.v. “Sanyuan;” Zhonghua daojiao dacidian, s.v. “三元;” Daojiao dacidian, s.v. “Sanyuan.” They appear in Santian zhengfa jing, ZHDZ 1.259b. The Three Heavens appear in many Shangqing works. Yuyu appears here as an abbreviation for Xuanwei ziran shangxu yuyu tian 玄微自然上虛禹餘天, the sixth of the thirty-six heavens according to CT 1373 Shangqing waiguo fangpin qingtong neiwen 上清外國放品青童內文. The characters 禹餘 (pronounced hjuXyo in Middle Chinese) were probably chosen for their phonetic value as imitations of Sanskrit, since the Yuyu tian appears in the Waiguo fangpin next to pseudo-Sanskrit heavens like the Yudan wuliang tian 鬱單無量天 or the Bujiaole tian 不驕樂天. “Yudan” (MC: ‘juttan) was the typical transcription of the Sanskrit Uttarakuru, a utopian northern continent (not heaven) of the Buddhist pantheon, and 不驕樂 renders Sanskrit Nirmāṇarati, the fifth Buddhist heaven. Accordingly, I leave it untranslated, in contrast to Livia Kohn, EoT, s.v. “San qing.” Elaborate Chinese names meant to resemble Sanskrit words were common in other heavens. See ZHDZ 1.287ff; Zürcher, “Buddhist Conquest,” in Silk, Buddhism in China 144-145n.

Six ding deities (Liu ding 六丁)

These deities are associated with the six combinations of the Heavenly Stems and Earthly Branches that include the stem ding. They act variously as guardians of the adept's body and as sources of information on future events. They appear both in Ge Hong's Baopuzi and the Upper Scripture of Purple Texts Inscribed by the Spirits (Lingshu ziwen 靈書紫文), a text revealed to Yang Xi.²⁴⁸

Five Phases (Wu xing 五行)

Important in realms as diverse as bodily health, imperial politics, and military strategy, the first systematic account of the Five Phases appears in the Annals of Master Lü. This work was assembled in 239 BCE out of quotations from diverse sources, some of which are no longer extant. In Warring States and Han thought, political dynasties were each linked to one of the Five Phases. The rise and fall of particular dynasties was thus conceived of as a natural process on the same order as the weather, the seasons, and the motion of the planets. However, given the close association between the Five Phases and six ding deities in this portion of the incantation, the author of the text probably meant to stress the divinatory aspect of wu xing, which had been well-known since Han times. The Five Phases are not directly mentioned in the Rectifying Methods, though their influence can be seen in the orderly progression of one dispensation of the heavens to another.²⁴⁹

248 For the ding deities in Ge Hong, see Campany, Heaven and Earth 72-75. The Lingshu ziwen is scattered throughout the modern Daozang. See Stephen R. Bokenkamp, EDS 275-372 for an introduction to and translation of the work. Robinet, in EoT, s.v. "Lingshu ziwen," also provides an introduction.

249 For the wu xing in politics and strategy, see Michael Loewe, "The authority of the emperors of Ch'in and Han," in Divination, mythology, and monarchy in Han China (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994): 85-111; "Water, earth and fire," in Divination 55-60, as well as 125-127, 244. EoT, s.v.

Three Heavens (Santian 三天)

The Three Heavens have a storied lineage in Chinese cosmology. While they first appear in the Wufu xu, the first systematic exposition of the Three Heavens system occurs in the Inner Explanations. As reviewed above, this text portrays Zhang Daoling, the putative founder of the Way of the Celestial Masters, as establishing the Three Heavens on behalf of the deified Laozi and thus abrogating the rule of the Six Heavens, whose dispensation – though legitimate – had run its course in same manner as political dynasties. The received Rectifying Methods shares key assumptions of the Inner Explanations: the Three Heavens (there identified as Shangqing, Yuyu, and Dachi), like the Six Heavens they succeed, are at once cosmological locales, stages in the parturition of the universe, and forces with a legitimate claim to worldly governance. The Nine Heavens (jiu tian 九天) also deserve mention, as they are sometimes depicted as the heritors of the mandate from the Six. I am unsure of the relationship between the Nine and the Three.²⁵⁰

Jade Capital (Yu jing 玉京)

The Jade Capital was well-known as an abode of transcendents by the time of the Shangqing version of the Rectifying Methods. The Register of the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement, the Superior Perfected, and the Hosts of Transcendents (CT

“Wu xing” focuses on the Five Phases’ use in medical works and its place in correlative cosmology. A brief discussion on wu xing divination in the context of other forms (such as stalks and turtle plastrons) occurs in Loewe, Divination 169-170. In the Santian zhengfa jing, the decline of the Six Heavens and the rise of the Three is described in the work and the Azure Lad’s commentary on ZHDZ 1.259c.

250 For a brief introduction to the Three Heavens that cites Bokenkamp, see EoT, s.v. “Santian and liutian.” The Three Heavens are named in Santian zhengfa jing, ZHDZ 1.259b.

166 Yuanshi shangzhen zhongxian ji 元始上真衆仙記), a Northern and Southern Dynasties work spuriously attributed to Ge Hong, describes it thusly:

元始天王在天中心之上，名曰玉京山，山中宮殿並金玉飾之。

The Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement dwells above the center of the Heavens. [His dwelling place] is called the Mountain of the Jade Capital. On the mountain, there are palace compounds and royal dwellings, all ornamented with gold and jade.

The “Account of [the teachings] of Buddha and Laozi” (Shi Lao zhi 釋老志) in the sixth-century Book of Wei (Wei shu 魏書) describes it as the dwelling place of the “Numinous King,” located above the Palace of Purple Tenuity:

道家之原出於老子，其自言也。先天地生以資萬類。上處玉京為神王之宗，下在紫微為飛仙之主。

The School of the Way originates in the words of Laozi himself, who created it before the formation of Heaven and Earth in order to save the myriad sorts of beings. Above is the Jade Capital, where dwells the ancestor of the Numinous King. Below is the Lord of the Flying Transcendents, who dwells in the [Palace] of Purple Tenuity.

The Jade Capital does not feature in the received Rectifying Methods, though the Palace of Purple Tenuity appears in the name of an amulet that features in the text.²⁵¹

Juan 95

By the time the reader reaches j, 95, they have passed once again from detailed prescriptions for daily life back to more abstract matters. The WSBY mentions the Rectifying Methods in a section devoted to exalting a different work, the Seven Recitations of the Divine Realm with Seven Transformations for Dancing in Heaven

251 Zhongxian ji 2b. For an introduction to the work, see TC, s.v. “Yuanshi shangzhen zhongxian ji.” Zhonghua daojiao dacidian, s.v. “玉京”; Daojiao dacidian, s.v. “Yujing”; Handian, s.v. “玉京.” Wei shu 114.31a; cf. Xu Jialu, ed., Wei shu, Ershi si shi quanyi (Shanghai: Hanyu dacidian chubanshe, 2004): 2463. For the amulet in question, see Santian zhengfa, ZHDZ 1.262b.18-19.

(preserved today in CT 1331 Dongzhen Shangqing shenzhou qizhuan qibian wutian jing 洞真上清神州七轉七變舞天經; whether this is the same version as that consulted by the editors of the WSBY is unclear). The juan teaches the adept how to ascend personally to the Purple Empyrean. It opens with the biography of the Lord of the Purple Empyrean 紫晨君, a Shangqing deity of long standing who figures prominently in the above-mentioned Guishan xuanlu. Before ascending to the Purple Empyrean and assuming his title, he travels to the ends of the universe and receives a series of works from exalted deities. He then rises to the Jade Capital and receives the Rectifying Methods as well as new garb and tokens of his new rank. It is only then – after using the Rectifying Methods to pacify the Six Heavens – that he ascends to the Purple Empyrean and performs the methods of the Seven Recitations.²⁵² The Rectifying Methods finds an important place in the story, but only as a preparatory exercise (albeit the final and therefore most significant) for the methods of the Seven Recitations.

²⁵² See Lagerwey, Wu-shang 203-204, ZHDZ 28.281c-283a, esp. 282b.8-11. According to the excerpt from the Seven Recitations, the methods in several other works rely on it for their efficacy.

APPENDIX D

THE “RECTIFYING METHODS” IN THE SDZN

The SDZN preserves what is probably the earliest revision of the Rectifying Methods, but also presents a work that had undergone considerable revision by Wang Xuanhe's time. It cites or mentions the Rectifying Methods three times.

Juan 6

Wang first mentions the Rectifying Methods in a section of j. 6 concerned with rules and precepts. The section is called “Prohibited Acts When Establishing Merit” 立功禁忌品, and situates the Rectifying Methods among various other “methods of Shangqing” 上清之法 (in which it includes, e.g., exercises from the Sishisi fang). The authority he cites is the Regulations of Nüqing of the Middle Palace of the Grand Mystic Capital.²⁵³ With only a slight difference, this is the title of the fifth juan of the received Siji mingke. The text, too, nearly matches – but again, with slight differences. The relevant citation runs as follows. See SDZN 6.4b-5a/ZHDZ 28.438b-c. My punctuation differs slightly from the ZHDZ ed.

又云：凡上學之士受三天正法，四明之科，佩帶真文，出入三光及冥卧息不得露頭，不著巾帽及脫衣露形。毀慢身神，恥辱真文，令真靈遠逝，空尸獨在。三犯不得入仙也，五犯死入地獄，萬劫還生不人之道也。

[The Regulations] also state: As for all those who receive the Rectifying Methods and the Bright Statutes of the Four [Poles]: When wearing the True Writs or coming and going with the Three Luminaries or resting in their bed in the dark night, they must not reveal their heads [due to] not wearing a headcovering, nor remove their clothing and reveal their form. [Doing so will] slander and offend their bodily spirits and disgrace the True Writs, causing the noble numens to go far away; only their empty corpse will remain. After three offenses, they will not attain entry into transcendence. After five offenses, upon death they will enter the earth prisons, being reborn after myriad kalpas on the path of nonhumans.²⁵⁴

253 《太玄都中宮女青律》

254 The True Writs probably refers to what we know today as The Perfected Script in Five Tablets Written in Red Celestial Writing of the [Celestial Worthy of] Original Commencement and the Five Ancient Lords (CT 22 Yuanshi wulao chishu wu pian zhenwen tianshu jing 元始五老赤書玉 [五] 篇真文天書

又云：凡上學之士受三天正法，四極明科，不得妄入淹穢哭泣悲淚，吊問死喪，五犯伐功，斷事不得入仙也，十犯死入地獄，萬劫還生不人之道也。

The Regulations also state: As for all those who receive the Rectifying Methods and the Bright Statutes of the Four [Poles]: They must not heedlessly enter into the impurities [surrounding] death and mourning, nor present their condolences at funerals. After five offenses, they will destroy their accumulated merit. Their case will be decided [by celestial authorities], and they will not attain entry into transcendence. After ten offenses, upon death they will enter into the earth prisons, and after myriad kalpas return to life on the path of nonhumans.

Juan 8

The eighth juan of SDZN is a selection of quotes from various works on a variety of subjects, including the dress of the gods and the auspicious signs required of (or possessed by) those destined to view certain works. Among these is a quotation from a certain Most High Scripture of the Eight Effulgences (Taishang bajing jing 太上八景經, possibly the received CT 1378 Shangqing jinzhen yuguang bajing feijing 金真玉光八景飛經). The Eight Effulgences, according to the SDZN, places the Rectifying Methods “above the Nine Heavens, in the Heaven of Jade Clarity, in the Golden Chamber, in the Purple Grotto.”²⁵⁵

Juan 9

The only direct citation of the Rectifying Methods is a long one, occupying nearly four juan (9.1a-4b). It begins by repeating the WSBY’s second method of computing cosmic time. This method begins by dividing the earth into gang and ji lines, continues by discussing the signs disasters attendant upon a conjunction of small kalpas, and concludes 經, the first work in the Lingbao corpus. Per Daojiao dacidian, “coming and going with the Three Luminaries” probably refers to an embryonic breathing exercise.

255 九天之上，玉清金房，紫戶之內。

by discussing the signs attendant upon the conjunction of great kalpas. Its portents are worth repeating:

At the conjunction of great kalpas, heaven is upended and earth is flipped; the seas surge and the rivers burst their dikes; humankind disappears and mountains drown; gold and jade transform and disappear, and [all in] the six directions muddles into one.

SDZN j. 9 continues with material not seen in the WSBY:

白尸飄於無涯，孤爽悲於洪波，大鳥掃穢於靈嶽，水母受事於九河，五龍吐氣於北元，天馬玄轡以徒魔，赤鎖伏精於辰門，歲星滅王於金羅，日月昏翳於三豪之館，五氣停暈於九嶺之巔，龍王鼓華於東井之上，河侯受對於九海之下，聖君顯駕於明霞之館，五帝科簡於善惡。當此之時，萬惡絕種，鬼魔滅跡，八荒四極，萬不遺一，至於天地之會，自非高上三天所不能禳，自無青籙白簡所不能脫也。

The Shangqing santian zhengfa jing says: The White Corpse²⁵⁶ floats on the boundless; the lonely souls²⁵⁷ grieve on great waves. The Great Bird sweeps away impurities at the Numinous Marchmount; the Water-Mother receives her charge at the Nine Rivers.²⁵⁸ The Five Dragons spit forth qi at the Northern Prime; the 256 The earliest reference I have been able to find to the White Corpse is in CT 1315 Dongzhen shangqing qingyao zishu jingen zhongjing 洞真上清青要紫書金根衆經, a work partially revealed to Yang Xi that may in fact predate the Shangqing revelations. It contains visualization and meditation practices, but also methods for escaping the apocalypse and for dealing with the pollution caused by sight of a corpse. See the relevant entry in TC. It is the latter to which the word belongs, appearing in an incantation to speed the corpse on its journey to rebirth. Here, bai shi refers to the corpse itself – see 1.21b. While this incantation would persist (e.g., in YJQQ 47.7a and Xiuxing jingjue 8b), another conception of the bai shi would arise that related it to the “Three Worms” (San chong 三蟲) or “Three Corpses” (San shi 三尸) – malevolent spirits thought to dwell in the human body and cause disease in a variety of ways. See EoT, s.v. “Sanshi and jiuchong.” YJQQ 82.19a numbers the White Corpse among five corpses that keep the company of the Three Worms and should be expelled from the body via an incantation that sends them down to the Yellow Springs. Note that this enumeration of the Three Worms and Five Corpses differs from that given in the EoT article.

257 The phrase I translate “lonely souls” includes the character shuang 爽, used since at least the time of Cao Zhi 曹植 (192-232) to refer to human will in jing shuang 精爽 “essence and soul.” The compound that appears here, gua shuang 孤爽 also appears in other Daoist works when they discuss the components of the person: CT 369 Taishang dongxuan lingbao miedu wulian shengshi miaojing 太上洞玄靈寶滅度五鍊生尸妙經 19a contrasts it with “rotten bones” (xiu hai 朽骸), while CT 103 Yuqing wuji zongzhen Wenchang dadong xianjing zhu 玉清無極總真文昌大洞仙經註 3.8a claims Ge Hong spoke of it as something to be “venerated and refined” (ji lian 祭煉). Here the term probably refers to the ghosts of the unfed dead that lodge in the fetus and help constitute new persons. See Bokenkamp, “Tao Hongjing and Buddhism” 264-265.

258 The Great Bird and the Water Mother are omens of the impending apocalypse. See Robinet, Taoism 160-161; Grand Ricci, s.v. “大鳥;” Handian, s.v. “水母;” Grand Ricci, s.v. “水母.” The Numinous Marchmount” probably refers to Mount Tai, in modern Shandong. See Handian, s.v. “靈嶽.” The “Nine

Heavenly Horse [grasps] the mysterious reins in order to imprison demons;²⁵⁹ The Red Lock causes demons to bow their heads in defeat at the Starry Gates; the Spirit of the Year Star destroys [demon]-kings at the Golden Net.²⁶⁰ The sun and moon are occluded and dimmed in the offices of the Three Eminences; the Five Qi halt their halos above the peaks of the Nine Ranges;²⁶¹ The Dragon King moves about, shining, at the Eastern Well; the River Liege receives a summons under the Nine Seas;²⁶² The Sage-Lord manifests his chariot in the Office of the Bright Dawn-rose Clouds; the Five Emperors weigh the good and evil [deeds of humans] and decide [their fates].²⁶³ At this time, the myriad evil [beings] will cut off the seed people, and the devils and demons will obliterate their traces. In the eight wastes and four poles, not one in ten thousand will be left, even coming to the conjunction of heaven and earth. If [you] are not [of] the Most High Three Heavens then you cannot avert it; if your name is not carved in green registers on slips of white jade, you will not be able to escape it.²⁶⁴

Rivers” refers to the Milky Way. See Handian, s.v. “九河.”

259 The “Five Dragons” are probably the spirits of the Five Agents. See Grand Ricci and Handian, s.v., “五龍.” The Northern Prime could refer to one of the bureaus in Fengdu charged with processing the deceased. It is so named in CT 456, 18a. This is little more than a guess, however, as the referent is uncertain: for instance, Northern Prime is the taboo name of one of the lads dwelling in the stars of the Northern Dipper in CT 446 Shangqing zhongjing zhu zhensheng bi 上清眾經諸真聖祕, a compendium of Shangqing saints and gods dating from the second half of the Tang. See CT 446 1.17a and the relevant entry in TC.

260 I am unsure what the “Red Lock” refers to; this appears to be its only occurrence in the Canon. “Starry Gates” is a term used in laboratory alchemy; see, e.g., YJQQ 68.23a-b. I am unsure what it is doing here. The “Spirit of the Year Star” dwells in Jupiter. According to Guishan xuanlu 114a, Golden Net County is a place in the Heaven of Jade Clarity. The phrase “Golden Net” also features in hymns to the kings of the Shangqing heavens in CT 55 Gaoshang taishang taixiao langshu qiongwen dizhang jing 高上太霄琅書瓊文帝章經 15b-16b, and in a pseudo-Sanskrit placename in Waiguo fangpin 1.9a.

261 I am unsure what san hao 三豪 means, though it clearly refers to astronomical phenomena here. There is no other occurrence in the Daoist Canon, and it seems to be a rare term in the works of this period. The Five Qi probably refers to the qi of the Five Agents. I am uncertain what the Nine Ranges refers to. It appears in several Daoist works of the Northern and Southern Dynasties period, but the works never go into detail about it. See, e.g., CT 1338 Yuqing yinshu jing 15b, where it appears in an incantation to revert from old age to youth and save one’s ancestors from a shadowy afterworld; CT 55 Gaoshang taixiao langshu qiongwen dizhang jing 高上太霄琅書瓊文帝章經 13b, where it appears in a hymn to the highest Shangqing heaven. The Famous Mountains of the Subcelestial Realm (Tianxia mingshan ji 天下名山記) has an entry for a Nine Ranges in Yunnan province (7.58b-59a), but this is almost certainly different from the one mentioned here.

262 The Dragon King is a powerful aquatic spirit associated with the Water Office in Duren jing 51.1a. The Eastern Well is the twenty-second of the twenty-eight lunar lodges. The River Liege is an aquatic spirit. The Nine Seas is perhaps a collective term for all the oceans; it appears in Duren jing 51.1a in the phrase bafang jiu hai 八方九海, where bafang is the “Eight Directions.”

263 The Sage-Lord is the Lord of the Golden Porte. The Five Emperors are the Emperors of the Five Directions.

The passage continues with what, in WSBY 6, is the first method of computing cosmic time (“The Gates of Heaven are in Heaven’s northwest corner...), then proceeding with what – in WSBY 6 – is the first method of computing time (“The Floodgates of the Earth...).²⁶⁵ As detailed in the notes, the figures and signs that feature in the above passage are firmly rooted in Shangqing eschatology. The last line is particularly interesting in light of the celestial records introduced in the WSBY: one’s name must “be of the Most High Three Heavens” in order to survive the eschaton, and – according to this passage, at least – that status requires one to have their name inscribed in the appropriate lists. The “Three Heavens” that feature here are the same common to Six Dynasties cosmology, which opposed three “correct” heavens to six “deviant” heavens. According to this cosmology, the deviant heavens have ruled since ancient times, but their rule has now come to an end; the Three have assumed legitimate governorship of the universe. While one cannot be certain, equating the “green registers on slips of white jade” with the records listed in WSBY 31 is not at all beyond the pale if one assumes (as I do) that the editors of the Sandong zhunang and WSBY were consulting the same edition of the Zhengfa jing.

A collective name for these records is suggested by another passage from the Sandong zhunang:

又云：赤精開皇元年七月七日丙午中時，登琳琅之都，月之上館，受符於元始天王。開金陽玉匱，玄和玉女口命出皇民錄譜。自開皇已前，三象明曜以來，至于開皇，經累億之劫，天地成敗非可稱載。九天丈人於開皇時，算定天元，校推劫運。

264 SDZN 9.1b-2a. I have been unable to find another occurrence of this prophecy – or anything like it – in the Daoist canon or elsewhere in the Chinese literary corpus.

265 SDZN 9.2a-3b1.

[The Shangqing santian zhengfa jing] also says, “In the reign period of Kaihuang,²⁶⁶ in the seventh month, on the seventh day (a bingwu day), in the middle watch, in the capital of Fine Jade, Red Essence²⁶⁷ bestowed a talisman upon the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement. He opened the Jade Casket of Golden Yang²⁶⁸ at the command of the Jade Lady of Mysterious Harmony and withdrew the Genealogy of the People of the Three Sovereigns.²⁶⁹ Before Kaihuang, the Three Images²⁷⁰ shone forth; [from this time] until Kaihuang, one hundred million kalpas elapsed, and the successes and failures of heaven and earth cannot be measured. In the Kaihuang reign period, the Elder of the Nine Heavens²⁷¹ numbered and fixed the heavenly cycles, pushed forward the turning of the kalpas according to the proper order.

266 The third of the three kalpas that inaugurated the universe. According to WSBY 24.1a-b, the texts of the Three Caverns issued forth during these kalpas. Dadong 大洞 (more typically dongzhen 洞真), corresponding to Shangqing texts, were revealed during the Longhan 龍漢 kalpa; Dongxuan 洞玄, corresponding to the Lingbao corpus, were revealed during the Chiming 赤明 era, and the books in the Dongshen 洞神 (= Sanhuang 三黃 texts) cavern appeared in the Kaihuang 開皇 era. If the Rectifying Methods follows this arrangement – by no means certain – then the Genealogy of the People of the Three Sovereigns would be associated with the Sanhuang corpus.

267 This is a spirit of the south that appears throughout the Chinese literary corpus. In Zhen Xuan’s 鄭玄’s commentary to the Canon of Rites (Liji 禮記) as preserved in the Song Collected Explanations of the Canon of Rites (Liji jishuo 禮記集說) 41.18a, Chijing appears as vassal of the Flame Emperor (Yandi 炎帝, but cf. Zheng Xuan, Zhouli zhushu 周禮注疏 18.36a). He was taken up by Daoist authors: in WSBY 32.9a. Chijing appears below the Queen Mother of the West in the line of transmission for an amulet, and in Santian neijie jing 1.3a he appears as an incarnation of Laozi who advised the legendary emperor Zhuangzi 莊子. Chijing appears low in a hierarchy of deities presented in the sixth-century CT 361 Taishang dongxuan lingbao bawei zhaolong maojing 太上洞玄靈寶八威召龍妙經 1.7b-8b.

268 A Jade Casket (yu kui 玉匱) was a box used by the emperor for storing jade slips that certified his receipt of the Mandate of Heaven. See Handian, s.v. “玉匱,” “玉冊.” Here, it contains the Registers of the August People, on which is recorded the names of those who will escape the disasters that presage the end of the world.

269 The Jade Woman of Mysterious Harmony appears frequently in the Lingbao corpus or in works that have undergone editing by authors writing in that tradition. To cite one example, in CT 361 Taishang dongxuan lingbao bawei zhaolong maojing 太上洞玄靈寶八威召龍妙經 1.7b-8b she is one of the officials dispatched by a group of deities headed by the Most High Elder and the Most High Lord Lao. They are sent to transmit a writ for quelling spirits to twenty-four perfected. The Three Augusts are legendary rulers of antiquity. Their identities vary according to the list, but are usually given as Fu Xi 伏羲, Shen Nong 神農, and Huangdi 皇帝 or Fu Xi 伏羲, Nu Wa 女媧, and Shen Nong 神農. See Grand Ricci, s.v. “三皇.”

270 This phrase has many meanings. According the Lüshi qunqiu 呂氏春秋 5.10b, it is the name of a song composed by the Duke of Zhou. Here, however, it probably refers to the xuan 玄, yuan 元, and shi 始 qi. See CT 1128 Daomen jingfa xiangcheng cixu 道門經法相承次序 (ca. 680) 3.4b: 三象: 玄氣, 青; 元氣, 白; 始氣, 黃

271 The Elder of the Nine Heavens appears throughout the Shangqing corpus, where he transmits texts to mortals. See R: 1, p. 127

白簡青錄，得道人名記。皇民譜錄，數極唐堯。是爲小劫一交。其中損益，有二十四萬人應爲得者。自承唐之後，數四十六丁亥，前後中間甲申之年，乃小劫之會，人名應定。在此之際，陽九百六。二氣離合，吉凶交會。得過者特爲免哉。然甲申之後，其中壬辰之初，數有九周至。庚子之年，吉凶候見，其道審明。

The names of those who will attain the Dao are recorded in green records on white slips. The numbers of the Genealogy of the People of the Three Sovereigns extended through the time of Yao. This was the turning of one small kalpa. During this time 2,400,000 were subtracted from the count of those who should attain [the Dao]. In the jiashen year sometime before or after the forty-sixth dinghai year after Yao, there will be a conjunction of small kalpas, and the records must be fixed again. At this juncture will be a yang [nine and] a hundred-six. The two qi will separate and reunite; good and evil will mix and mingle. Those who will pass through will be specially selected to avoid [destruction]. After a jiashen year, at the beginning of the renchen year in this period, a period of nine circuits will reach its limit. In a gengzi year, good and evil omens will appear, and their ways will be made clear.²⁷²

9.3b-4b provides background on the celestial records referred to above. The text calls these records the Genealogy of the People of the Three Sovereigns. A key feature of these records is their mutability: at the end of each small kalpa, celestial beings remove the names of the unworthy and add the names of the worthy. Their first recension occurs after the rule of the legendary sage-king Yao, when 2,400,000 names are subtracted. The next small kalpa will end during a jiashen year after the forty-sixth dinghai year after Yao's rule, and the records will again require rectification. The cyclical nature of the Chinese calendar makes it very difficult to determine the correct dinghai year with certainty.²⁷³

What follows elaborates on the above. It provides the most concrete signs yet that the time is nigh:

當有赤星見於東方，白彗干於月門，祆子續黨於蟲口，亂群墳尸於越川，人啖其種，萬里絕煙。強臣稱霸，弱主蒙塵，其後當有五靈曷瑞，義合本根。龍精之後，續族之君，平滅四虜，應符者隆，龍虎之世，三六乃清。民無橫命，柞無危患。自承之後四十六丁亥，是三劫之周。又從數五十五丁亥至壬辰，癸巳

²⁷² SDZN 9.3b1-4a. Read 現 for 見.

²⁷³ On this, see Bokenkamp, "Time After Time" 68-72.

是也。則是大劫之周。天翻地覆，金玉化消，人淪山沒，六合冥一。天地之改運，非真所如何，惟高上三天，白簡青籙，乃得晏鴻翻而騰翔，飛景霄而盼目耳。此玄和玉女口命，金陽玉匱，論天地之成敗，吉凶之是非也。

At this time, the Red Star²⁷⁴ will appear in the east, the White Sweeper²⁷⁵ will transgress the Lunar Gate. Demons will link together at the mouth of the insects,²⁷⁶ chaotic mobs will pile their corpses in mounds at the rivers of Yue; people will eat their own posterity; after myriad li, the smoke of cooking fires will be cut off. Strong feudal lords will become hegemony; weak kings will flee the capital. After this there will be bright signs of the five numens; righteousness will accord with its root. The descendant of the Dragon-seed, the lord who continues the clan, will destroy the four rebels.²⁷⁷ Talismanic responses will descend.²⁷⁸ In the generation of the Dragon-tiger, the three-and-six will clarify. The people will have no [urge to] rebel; the throne will have no danger. In the forty-sixth dinghai year after Yao – this will be a complete cycle of three kalpas. Moreover, counting from the fifty-fifth dinghai year to the jisi [month?] of the [following] renchen year: this will be the completion of one great kalpa. Heaven and earth will be overthrown; jade and gold will transform and disappear. The people will sink into oblivion, and the mountains will be drowned. Everything in the Six Directions will become one in the darkness. If you are not one of the Perfected, then what is to be done? Only those [whose names are inscribed] in green records on white slips in the exalted Three Heavens will in ease and comfort take flight on great wings, fly on the phosphors to the empyrean, paying a visit to and fixing their regard upon [the Three Heavens]. This is [what] the oral command of the Jade Maiden [brought forth from] the Jade Casket of Golden Yang; it discusses the success and failure of the universe, the correctness and incorrectness of fortune and misfortune.²⁷⁹

274 A star located in the first of the twenty-eight lunar mansions. See Handian, s.v. "赤星," Grand Ricci, s.v. "角宿."

275 The White Sweeper appears in the second juan of the Jin shu chapter on astronomy in a quote that nearly matches Zhang Shoujie's 張守節 (?-?) Correct Meanings of the Records of the Grand Historian (Shiji zhengyi 史記正義) 27.20a. The latter was presented to the throne in the twenty-fourth year (736-737) of the Kaiyuan 開元 reign period (712-742). The interlinear commentary at 27.20 holds that the "essence" 精 of Venus "scatters" 散 into nine stars, one of them being the White Sweeper.

276 I am uncertain what this refers to. It appears to be the only appearance of the two characters 蟲口 as a binome in the canon, other than a citation of this passage at SDZN 9.3b-9.4a. The compound refers to a medicinal plant elsewhere in the Chinese literary corpus.

277 The "lord who continues the clan" is probably Liu Yu 劉裕 (363-422). This would make the "four rebels" four military commanders he defeated. Three of these are probably Sun En 孫恩 (?-402), his younger sister's husband Lu Xun 盧循 (?-411) and Huan Xuan 桓玄 (369-404); I am uncertain of the fourth.

278 The implication here is that the actions of the "descendant of the Dragon-seed" will form the earthly half of a tally, and the heavenly half – in the form of the signs and wonders depicted above – will manifest.

279 SDZN 9.4a-b. The term 盼目 is a strange one, and my translation is conjectural. In Daoist works, it frequently functions as a verb that takes an exalted place as its direct object. For instance, the "Song of

Many of the figures and portents in this passage remain obscure, but enough remains clear to make an educated guess at its meaning: the end times are at hand. The passage begins by invoking specific celestial phenomena that – unlike the movements in the hidden realm detailed in 9.1b-2a – would have been visible to human beings. It continues by obliquely referring to contemporary events. The political turmoil inaugurated by the fall of the Han would not end until the Tang, but in the interim many kings appealed to Daoist and Buddhist apocalyptic texts in order to justify much grander imperial ambitions. The two most notable are probably Yang Jian 楊堅 (541-604), founder of the Sui 隋 (581-618), and Li Yuan, founder of the Tang.²⁸⁰ But they were not the first to do so.

The “descendant of the Dragon-seed” probably refers to Liu Yu 劉裕 (r. 402-422). He was the founder of the fifth-century Liu-Song dynasty, and was supposedly descended from Liu Bang, founder of the Han. The similarities between the structure of this prophecy and that found in the Purple Texts are clear: both foretell the rise of a ruler in the forty-sixth dinghai year after Yao; both tell of disasters befalling people “before and after a jiashen year,” and of the salvation of the good. Finally, the prediction in the SDZN once again emphasizes the importance of having one’s name inscribed on the

the High Transcendent Who Pays a Visit, Roaming, to [the Cavern-Heaven] Dongling” (高仙盼遊洞靈之曲, YJQQ 96.9a-b) contains the line “The Beflowered Palace of the Red Dawn – how can one pay a visit to it and fix their regard upon it?” 絳晨華臺何盼目; in a poem bestowed upon Yang Xi by a Perfected informant, we find the line “The Eight Terraces – one can visit them and fix the gaze upon them.” 八臺可盼目

280 Their appeals to eschatology are discussed extensively in Bokenkamp, “Time After Time” 72-87. The classic study of apocalypticism as related to political events is Anna Seidel, “The Image of the Perfect Ruler in Early Daoist Messianism,” History of Religions 2.3 (1969-70): 216-247. She discusses the Northern and Southern Dynasties on pp. 230ff. Another is Erich Zürcher, “‘Prince Moonlight’: Messianism and Eschatology in Early Medieval Chinese Buddhism,” T’oung Pao 68 (1982): 1-75. It is reprinted in Silk, ed., Buddhism in China 187-257.

appropriate celestial records. These are known here as the “Genealogy of the People of the Three Sovereigns.” Assuming the editors of the SDZN and WSBY were consulting the same edition of the Zhengfa jing, the “Genealogy” would then be a collective name for the list of records found in WSBY 31, and viewing the amulets listed there would assure the adept that his or her salvation was guaranteed.

APPENDIX E

THE “RECTIFYING METHODS” IN THE XDL

The earliest quotation of the Rectifying Methods available to us survives in the Xiaodao lun, a polemic against Daoism written by the mathematician and astronomer Zhen Luan 甄鸞 (fl. 535-81) and presented to the throne in 570. As with each version of the Methods, the XDL was produced in a particular context for a particular purpose; modern readers thus must remain alert to the possibility that, in addition to more run-of-the-mill “modifications” like slips of the pen or faulty memory, Zhen Luan may have been abridging or even intentionally misquoting his source material. While Emperor Wu (r. 560-78) ordered the original Xiaodao lun burned, an abbreviated version can be found in pp. 143c-152c of T 2103 Guang hongming ji 廣弘明集 (Expanded Collection Spreading the Light of Buddhism, 7th c.). The extant Xiaodao lun contains thirty-six sections devoted to diverse topics: cosmogony, cosmology, and demonology constitute just a few. The sundry and detailed quotations in even this abbreviated version attest to the author’s intimate knowledge of the Daoist works of his day. Zhen consults the Zhengfa jing four times on matters of cosmogony, cosmology, and the creation of humankind. His citations always appear as one of several incommensurable accounts drawn from various Daoist texts. His overall aim is to illustrate how Daoism fails to provide a coherent account of the beginnings of the universe and its inhabitants. Below I have translated Zhen’s citations of the Rectifying Methods. In the XDL, the citations themselves are preceded by citations of different Daoist texts with which Zhen contrasts the Methods in order to illustrate Daoism’s fundamental incoherence. I have also summarized these passages below.²⁸¹

281 Consult Kohn, Laughing 55, 56 n. 14; 62 and n. 3, 63 and n. 7; 66 and n. 1; 140 and nn. 5-8. My translations of the Rectifying Methods citations, and sometimes the XDL itself, differ from hers.

The first citation of the Rectifying Methods (under the name Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens in Original Chaos) appears in the first section of the XDL, called “The highest lord of the Dao created heaven and earth” 太上道君造立天地. Here, Zhen contrasts the creation account in the Rectifying Methods with other accounts in different Daoist texts. In one, Laozi creates the universe by transforming his body into its various elements: his right eye becomes the moon, his left the sun, etc. See Kohn 53-57, a translation of T 2103.52.144b13-144c15.

《三天正法混沌經》云：混沌之始。清氣爲天濁氣爲地。便有七曜萬像之形其來久矣。²⁸²

The Santian zhengfa hundun jing says: The clear qi became heaven, and the turbid qi became earth. Then there were the seven luminaries²⁸³ and the forms of the myriad phenomena. Their origins are old!

The second citation of the Rectifying Methods can be found in chapter 3, “The Three Primes turned into heavenly people” 三元為天人者. This chapter presents differing accounts of the origin of the Three Primes, the highest divisions of the heavens. It also complains that, because the highest deities formed out of pure qi, they were in no position to order human beings to attain the same state via personal cultivation (as other Daoist texts advocated). See Kohn 62-66, a translation of T 2103.52.145a.18-145b.23.

《三天正法經》云：天光未朗，蔚積未澄。七千餘劫玄景始分。九氣存焉。一氣相去九萬九千九百九十里。青氣高澄，濁混下降。而九天真王，元始天王生於九氣之中。氣結而形焉。便有九真之帝。皆九天清氣凝成九字之位。三元夫人從氣而生，在洞房宮，玉童玉女各三千而侍。以天為父，以氣為母。生於三元之君。²⁸⁴

282 T 2103.52.144c1-3.

283 The sun and moon plus the five naked-eye planets: Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. See Handian, s.v., “七曜.”

284 T 2103.52.145a27-145b5.

The Santian zhengfa jing says: The lights of the sky had not yet begun to shine. The deep accumulation of qi had not yet clarified. After over seven thousand kalpas, the Mysterious Phosphors²⁸⁵ began to divide, and the Nine Qi came into being. Each Qi was separated by ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and ninety li. The clear qi rose and clarified; the turbulent qi descended. Then, the Perfected King of the Nine Heavens and the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement were born in the midst of the Nine Qi, which knotted together and produced their forms. Then the Emperors of the Nine Perfected were created. They all [formed] when the clear qi of the Nine Heavens coagulated and were established the thrones of the Nine Dwellings.²⁸⁶ The Lady of the Three Primes was born of Qi and abides in the Palace of the Cavern-Chamber. She is served by three thousand jade lads and jade maidens. Heaven is her father, and qi is her mother. She gave birth to the Three Prime Dames.²⁸⁷

The next citation of the Rectifying Methods occurs in chapter four, “Humanity was created from earth” 結土為人. It contrasts the creation of humanity as given in the Rectifying Methods with other versions in different Daoist texts. One, for instance, adheres to the Buddhist notion of karmic causality, holding that rebirth as a “barbarian” is the result of evil deeds committed in a previous life. This obviously contrasts with the creation account given below. See Kohn 66-68, a translation of T 2103.52.145b24-145c11.

《三天正法經》云：九氣既分。九真天王乃至三元夫人，三元之君，太上道君於是而形。逮至皇帝始立生民，結土為像於曠野。三年能言。各在一方。故有僮秦夷羌。五情合德，五法自然。承上真之氣而得為人也。²⁸⁸

285 Elsewhere in the Shangqing corpus, the division of the Mysterious Phosphors is one of the initial steps in the parturition of the universe. See Jingen zhongjing 2.1a, which describes this process (and the birth of the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement) in strikingly similar terms.

286 This translation is indebted to Kohn, Laughing 63-64.

287 I am unsure who the Dame of the Three Primes is here. The received version is clear that this is another title of the Three Ladies of Prime Simplicity, but Zheng’s quotation appears to take them as two different deities or groups of deities. It is possible that either the author of his version was mistaken, or that Zheng intentionally misquoted his text.

288 T 2103.52.145b24-45b28.

The Santian zhengfa jing says: After this, the Nine Qi divided. The Heavenly King of the Nine Perfected²⁸⁹ and the Dame of the Three Primes, the Three Prime Dames of Grand Simplicity, and the Most High Lord of the Dao thereupon took form. When the Yellow Emperor ascended to the throne, he created the people. He formed earth into images [of humans], [placing them] in the wild wastes. After three years, they could speak. Each was in one direction. This is why there are the crude Northerners,²⁹⁰ the Qin barbarians,²⁹¹ Di barbarians,²⁹² and the Qiang barbarians.²⁹³ People of the Five Sentiments²⁹⁴ were of one purpose. They modeled themselves on Spontaneity, receiving the qi of the Upper Perfected and becoming human.

Zhen's final citation of the Rectifying Methods is found in chapter 32, "Five million layers of heaven" 五億重天者. It draws from different Daoist works to show that Daoism provides no single coherent account of the heavens. It takes the five million layers of the title from one work, combining it with the nine heavens of the Rectifying Methods in order to show that such a vision of the heavens is mathematically ridiculous, resulting in an earth 10,000 miles thick covered by a heaven of five million layers of two feet each. See Kohn 139-141, a translation of T 2103.52.151b24-151c11.

289 I am unsure who this is, but he is relatively rare in the Chinese literary corpus. He appears in Falin's Bianzheng lun at 8.545a-b among other deities, heavens, and practices; in toto they are meant to show the contradictory nature of Daoist doctrine. In two 14th-century commentaries to the Duren jing, CT 91 Yuanshi wuliang duren shangpin miaojing zhujie 元始无量度人上品妙經註解 2.21a-b and CT 89 Yuanshi wuliang duren shangpin miaojing tongyi 元始無量度人上品妙經通義 2.18a he appears as the lord of one of the eight heavens of the east. Here, however, a simpler explanation suggest itself: in writing the name "Perfected King of the Nine Heavens" (Jiutian zhenwang 九天真王), a copyist has transposed the characters for "Heaven" (tian 天) and "Perfected" (zhen 真), resulting in the present name.

290 Cang 儻 was a disparaging name used by southerners to refer to Northerners – both those who dwelled in the North and those who moved south of the Yangzi.

291 Inhabitants of modern Shaanxi, enfeoffed by King Xiao of Zhou and relocated to modern Gansu.

292 Inhabitants of the northwest.

293 An ethnic group that was spread over what is now Gansu, Qinghai, and Sichuan.

294 The Five Sentiments are joy, anger, sadness, love, and hate. They constitute the emotional vocabulary of human beings – here in implicit contrast with the five "barbarian" groups.

《三天正法經》云：天光未明。七千餘劫，玄景始分。九氣存焉。九真天王，元始天王稟自然之胤，置九天之號。上中下真，真爲一元。元有三天。上元宮即太上大道君所治。²⁹⁵

The Santian zhengfa jing says: The lights of heaven were not yet bright. After more than seven thousand kalpas, the Mysterious Phosphor began to divide, and the Nine Qi were. The Heavenly King of the Nine Perfections and the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement were heritors of Spontaneity and established the names of the Nine Heavens. As for the Upper, Middle, and Lower Perfected – each [grade of] Perfected created one Prime. Each Prime had three heavens. The Most High Lord Lao governed the Palace of the Upper Prime.

295 T 2103.52.151b29-c3.

APPENDIX F

AMULETS IN THE RECEIVED “RECTIFYING METHODS”

The amulets attributed to the Rectifying Methods vary according to the work consulted. Even the present version (comprising both the Zhengfa jing and the Jiuwei badao) disagrees with itself on which amulets should be included; their names; their transmission histories; and their powers. Noting the contradictions between both this version and its historical antecedents illustrates that the Shangqing version of the Rectifying Methods did not remain stable over time, and in fact began changing very early in its history. The overall picture is of a work that was seen from earliest times not as an unalterable absolute unit, but as a toolkit that could be modified at the discretion of various authors and editors. Despite various alterations, additions, and subtractions, one function of the work remained consistent over time: it is primarily a repository of apotropaic devices meant to protect the adept from various ills and ensure ascent to the heavens.

Texts consulted

CT 1138 Wushang biyao 無上祕要

“Secret Essentials of the Most High.” Juan 32 is called The Gathered Sages [who] Transmit Scriptures (Zhongsheng zhuanjing pin 眾聖傳經品), and is a collection of extracts from various texts detailing the transmission histories of texts and text-like objects. A quotation from the Dongzhen santian zhengfa jing 洞真三天正法經 includes the transmission history of many of the amulets included in the Jiuwei badao, as well as some that are not. See ZHDZ 42.328b-329a. WSBY 31 and 43 contain quotes related to amulets from a Zhengfa jing that do not match the received text.

CT 1379 Shangqing yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing 上清玉帝七聖玄紀迴天九霄經

“Scripture of the Return to the Nine Heavens, Mystical Records of the Seven Saints of the Jade Emperor of Utmost Purity.” This Eastern Jin text is a reworked member of the original Shangqing revelations that is quoted extensively in the WSBY. It provides a list of records – the ji 紀 of the title – on which one’s name must be inscribed in order to ascend to the heavens, a method of visual meditation for writing one’s name in said records, hymns to the seven patrons of the scripture, and a list of Seven Wounds (qi shang 七傷). These are faults in behavior that harm the Marks of Immortality – the physical characteristics borne by a human destined to become a transcendent. Per Robinet, “[t]he names of the paradises [to which one can ascend], the characteristics of the records, and the Marks of Immortality correspond exactly to the terms found in CT 442, The Annals of Lord Lao of the Latter Age).” CT 442 is a member of the original Shangqing corpus that is devoted to the Lord of the Golden Porte; it opens with his biography and describes his efforts to save humankind as well as the heavens to which certain elect will ascend, should their names be inscribed on the appropriate celestial records.²⁹⁶

Establishing an early date for the Qisheng xuanji and linking it to the Shangqing corpus is important because it helps date the amulets in the Zhengfa jing and the Jiuwei badao, many of which are associated with the celestial records at the center of the Qisheng. However, this association does not exist in the received version of the Qisheng xuanji. Instead it is found in a chapter of WSBY 31 called “The Lodged Lot of Those who Encounter Scripture” (Yujing sufēn pīn 遇經宿分品). This chapter opens with a condensed version of the introduction to the received Qisheng (which it cites by name) before providing quotations related to that text found in elsewhere in the Daoist canon. On ZHDZ 28.107c-108a, it quotes a Santian zhengfa jing extract (absent from the received text) that links the amulets to various celestial records in that text. While the Qisheng is concerned with practices that help the adept inscribe his or her name in these records, in this Santian zhengfa jing extract, receipt of a given amulet acts as proof that the recipient’s name is already inscribed in the associated celestial record from the Qisheng. These proofs are enumerated in a list of entries identical in format: “All whose names are inscribed in [record x] will attain sight of [amulet Y]” 凡名參...者得見... In the entry for each amulet, I will list the associated record in the WSBY quotation where such an association exists.

²⁹⁶ See CT, s.v. “Shangqing yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing,” and R 2:225-228.

CT 128 Taishang qiuxian dinglu chisu zhenjue yuwen 太上求仙定錄尺素真訣玉文
 “Precious Writs and True Formulas on [Prescribed] Lengths of Silk, Determining the Rank of Those who Seek Immortality.” For this text, see the conclusion.

CT 354 Shangqing sanyuan yujian sanyuan bujing 上清三元玉檢三元布經
 “Jade Rule of the Three Original Ones [and the] Promulgated Scripture of the Three [Female] Original Ones.” Composed some fifty years after the Shangqing revelations, the Sanyuan bujing is actually two texts. The “Promulgated Scripture of the Three [Female] Original Ones” (Sanyuan bujing) is a set of visualization practices for discerning the true forms of deities that appear during meditation and for meditating on the Three Pure Dames; both practices link the Sanyuan bujing to other texts composed soon after the original revelations. The “Jade Rule of the Three Original Ones” (Sanyuan yujian) forms part of one of the oldest Shangqing rituals to appear after the gods descended to Yang Xi. It contains three sets of talismans: the “Grand Register of the Upper Prime for Regulating Heaven” (Shangyuan jiantian dalu 上元檢天大錄), the “Jade Writ of the Lower Prime for Regulating Earth” (Xiayuan jiandi yuwen 下元檢地玉文), and the “True Book of the Middle Prime for Regulating Transcendents” (Zhongyuan jianxian zhenshu 中元檢仙真書). One of these – the True Book of the Middle Prime – also features in the Zhengfa jing and/or the Jiuwei badao.²⁹⁷

The amulets

The Jiuwei badao divides its amulets into two groups: the Register of the Massed Writs of the Most High (Taishang zhongwen lu 太上衆文錄, ZHDZ 260c.5-265a) and the Amulets of the Nine Tenuities and Eight Ways (Jiuwei badao fulu 九微八道符錄, 265a-266a.4). Each have general transmission requirements, but some amulets have their own individual transmission requirements as well. The Jiuwei badao opens with a set of transmission requirements that forms part of a passage almost identical to the postface of the Zhengfa jing – with the important exception of the transmission requirements themselves. The Zhengfa jing requires four sets of offerings for the transmission of what it calls the “Rectifying methods of the Shangqing heavens for expelling the [qi of] the Six Heavens” (Shangqing chu liutian zhi wen santian zhengfa 上清除六天之文三天正法).

²⁹⁷ R 2: 131-135; TC, s.v. “Shangqing sanyuan yujian sanyuan bujing.”

Because the passage that details these offerings immediately follows a list of amulets and their spirit guards, I take the “Rectifying methods” to refer here to those amulets, which include members of both the Massed Writs and the Amulets of the Nine Tenuities. The first accompanies the “pledge offering” (yao xin 要信): thirty chi 尺 of silk of red and indigo.²⁹⁸ Next is the offering of “the oath of secrecy” (mi shi 密誓): thirty chi of indigo cloth. Five pairs of golden hoops are required for the offering paired with the “Grand Oath to Heaven” (zhi tian dayan 指天大誓). Finally, during the transmission ceremony itself, the disciple offers their master ten liang 兩 of good-quality gold.²⁹⁹ The transmission requirements listed in the Jiuwei badao for the Massed Writs are much less strict; they comprise merely the ten liang of fine gold offered to the master during the transmission ceremony itself.³⁰⁰

The transmission history of the amulets also varies according to the text consulted. The Jiuwei badao holds that the Sage-Lord of the Eastern Tomb (Dongling shengjun 東陵聖君) ordered the Azure Lad to compile the Methods of the Three Heavens for Expelling the Qi of the Six Heavens and directed the transcendent and perfected to store them away, transmitting them to human beings only three times in seven hundred 298 The length of one chi varied over time. In the Han, it was 0.231 meters; thus, assuming the author intended the Han measurement system (an unlikely proposition), 30 chi would equal almost 7 meters of silk.

299 In Han times, one liang was equivalent to 24 zhu 銖, with one zhu being the weight of 100 grains of millet.

300 See ZHDZ 262c.12-264a.11 The Jiuwei badao calls this the “pledge for penetrating to the spirits” (tongshen zhi xin 通神之信) – that is, a pledge offering to draw the spirits’ attention to the transmission ceremony – but the Zhengfa jing does not give it a specific name.

years.³⁰¹ The context seems to indicate here that the “Methods of the Three Heavens” refers only to the Massed Writs, since the Jiuwei gives separate transmission requirements – but no separate transmission history – for the Amulets of the Nine Tenuities. The Zhengfa jing’s transmission history is much more complicated, but consistent with the discussion of the Santian zhengfa (by its various names) throughout that work: the Lord of the Golden Porte received them from the Most High, and the Azure Lad compiled them (presumably on the orders of the Most High). Unless otherwise noted, these separate transmission histories apply to the amulets below. What follows is not a complete list of amulets in the Jiuwei badao; it includes only those that appear frequently throughout works of the early medieval period.

1) Register of the Massed Writs of the Most High (Taishang zhongwen lu 太上衆文錄)³⁰²
The quotation from a “Scripture of the Rectifying Methods of the Three Heavens” (Santian zhengfa jing 三天正法經) in WSBY 31 appears to treat the Massed Writs as a single amulet, giving its associated celestial record as the Jade Register of the Golden Book of the Shangqing Heaven (Shangqing jinshu yulu 上清金書玉錄); this record appears at Housheng Daojun lieji 9b. WSBY 32 appears to treat it as a single amulet as 301 The identity of Dongling shengjun is uncertain. This is the only occurrence of the name in the Chinese literary corpus. The logical inference, then, is that 東陵 is a scribal error – but for what, I do not know. Two commentaries to the Zhuangzi equate Dongling with Mount Tai 泰山; see CT 736 Nanhua zhenjing zhangju yinyi 南華真經章句音義 (11th c.) 5.3b, CT 742 Nanhua zhenjing zhushu 南華真經註疏 10.18a (Cheng Xuanying’s 成玄英 (fl 650) subcommentary to the Zhuangzi). CT 783 Yongcheng jixian lu 壩城集仙錄, a collection of hagiographies of the attendants of the Queen Mother of the West, includes a Dongling shengmu 母 at 6.128a. All works cited in this note are in the Zhengtong daoze edition.

302 While the Massed Writs appears in the Jiuwei badao as a category of amulets, Precious Writs 20a includes it (reading 文 for 元) in a list composed mostly of individual amulets. I regard it as a list for present purposes.

well, which the Most High transmitted to the Lord of the Golden Porte. It appears as a single amulet at Precious Writs 20a.

1.2) The True Writs of the Shangqing Heavens for Expelling [the Qi of] the Six Heavens (Shangqing chu liutian zhenwen 上清除六天真文) (264b.7-9)

According to the Jiuwei badao, it is “[one of] the Correct Methods of the Three Heavens, to be transmitted to outstanding perfected kings.”³⁰³ Those who do not wear it “will not be welcomed into the Shangqing heavens by the Lord of the Golden Porte when the Era of Great Peace Arrives.” Its talisman is missing. It does not appear in the Zhengfa jing, but appears in Precious Writs 20a.³⁰⁴ Its associated celestial record is the Green Text on White Slips of the Grand Culmen (Taiji baijian qingwen 太極白簡青文), which appears as baijian qinglu 籙 at Housheng Daojun lieji 9a.³⁰⁵ It appears at Precious Writs 20a as 上清除六天真文.

1.4) Stanzas of the Upper Prime, Grand Perfected Register of Yin and Yang of the Mystic Capital [of the] Three Heavens and Nine Tenuities (Santian jiuwei xuandu taizhen yinyang linglu shangyuan zhang 三天九微玄都太真陰陽靈籙上元章) (259c.26-260a.8, 264c.3-7)

303 This translation is strengthened by the fact that WSBY 32 gives the same transmission instructions for the Correct Methods of the Three Heavens.

304 上清除六天真文: 不佩此籙者, 太平期至不得奉迎聖君於上清宮也。三天正法, 傳鬱絕真王。

305 See ZHDZ 28: 395c.22-23: 三天正法云: 三元玄臺, 六天符在其位 (reading 內 for 位). See also 400a.1-2: 上清三天正法云: 烏日之室, 元始三天正法除六天之文封其內也; see Maoshan zhi 9.6b-8a.

The Stanzas of the Upper Prime is the first amulet in the Jiuwei badao to receive its own transmission history, which features two deities that have heretofore not been introduced. The Grand Imperial Elder (Taidi zhangren 太帝丈人) bestowed it upon the Unexcelled Perfected Lord of the Grand Void (Taixu wushang zhenjun 太虛無上真君).³⁰⁶ While this transmission history agrees with that given in WSBY 32, it differs markedly from both the general Jiuwei badao transmission history as well as that given in Zhengfa jing 259c.26-260a.8. The latter is much more complex: the Perfected King of the Nine Heavens bestowed it upon the Most High and the Jade August of the Three Heavens, who then bestowed it on the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement. The latter then bequeathed it to the Queen Mother of the West, who in turn transmitted it to the Most High Elder [who] Numinously Flies to Grand Perfection (Lingfei taizhen taishang zhangren 靈飛太真太上丈人); finally, this last deity transmits the amulet to qualified human beings.³⁰⁷ Neither the Zhengfa jing nor the Jiuwei badao list any of the amulet's powers, though the Zhengfa jing notes its location and the fact that it is venerated by a series of august beings.³⁰⁸ It appears at Precious Writs 20a and receives an extensive treatment on page 20a of the Sanyuan sanbu jing. There, it features as an alternate name for the True Book of the Middle Prime for Regulating Transcendents and boasts an impressive array of powers and spirit guards. Its talisman is missing in the Jiuwei badao, 306 The Unexcelled Perfected Lord is otherwise-unattested in the Daoist canon, but the Grand Imperial Elder appears in WSBY 22.15b, where he and a series of other officials gather in a palace east of the Mystic Capital to correct the records of transcendence.

307 The Most High Elder of Grand Perfection is one of the officials who corrects transcendent records at WSBY 22.15b.

308 This portion of the Zhengfa jing is quoted in TPYL 3.6a, 676.4a-b, and again at 679.1a.

though it appears in the Sanyuan bujing. The ritual associated with it there is very different, however.

1.5) The Turning Writ of Three Prescriptions of the Perfected of the Numinous Capital of Grand Tenuity (Taiwei lingdu wanzhuan sanfang wen 太微靈都婉轉真人三方文) (262b.13-15, 264c.3-7)

Grand Tenuity is a constellation near Polaris and the residence of the Grand Monad, with the Numinous Capital as its chief city.³⁰⁹ The Jiuwei badao gives the Lingdu wanzhuan an extensive list of powers and spirit guards. Its bearers will be protected by three hundred zhifu 直符, six thousand jade maidens, and eight “people of the Six Heavens” (liutian baren 六天八人).³¹⁰ Their lifespans will extend to ten billion years and they will ascend to the Perfected Palace of the Numinous Capital of Grand Tenuity – provided they keep their intention fixed on cultivating their conduct and revering the amulet.³¹¹ The Zhengfa jing gives it lesser powers, but counts it among the Methods of the Three Heavens for Controlling the Six Heavens; thus, it shares the same transmission history as the Massed Writs. The process of transmission is much simpler in the Jiuwei badao, with the Perfected King of the Nine Heavens bestowing it upon the Most High Elder; WSBY 32 gives the same transmission history. Its name varies somewhat across works: though it 309 Its identity varies, however: in WSBY 32.17a it is the capital of Grand Tenuity, just as it is here, but it can also be a palace in the Jade Capital (Yujing 玉京) of the Xuyan 須延 Heaven (the third of the Nine Heavens) according to WSBY 23.3a, or a palace in Shangshang Heaven according to WSBY 21.1a. Grand Tenuity can also be a palace in the Shangqing heavens.

310 Zhifu was an office in the Han. It is also listed among several relatively minor popular spirits in the Treatise of a Recluse (Qianfu lun 潜夫論) of Wang Fu 王符 (ca. 85-162 or 90-165). See Handian, s.v. “直符;” Grand Ricci, s.v. “潜夫論.”

311 弟子誓志修奉

keeps this name in SDZN 6.5, it appears in WSBY 31.10a as the Taiwei lingdu wanzhuan zhenwen 太微靈都婉轉真文, and WSBY 32.10a as Taiwei lingdu wanzhuan zhenqi sanfang wen 太微靈都宛轉真炁三方文. Its associated celestial record in WSBY 31 is the Purple Names on Black Silk of Fangzhu (Fangzhu xuansu ziming 方諸玄素紫名), which appears at Housheng Daojun lieji 10a.

1.6) Talisman for Repelling Tigers and Wolves (Qu hubao fu 驅虎豹符) (264c)

The Jiwei badao lists two transmission histories for this amulet, giving the impression that it was originally two amulets that have been combined into one. It promises the bearer relief from disaster, poisons, and various deaths. In addition, “the qi of [their] person will rise” (renqi shangsheng 人氣上昇) and evil spirits will submit before the spirit-guardians of this talisman. The Qu hubao fu first claims it was received from the Perfected Prime Lord of the Purple Culmen, Ninth Elder of the Mysterious Flows of the Transcendent Capital (Jiulao xiandu xuanliu ziji zhen yuanyun 九老仙都玄流紫極真元君). Such an august title is found nowhere else in the Daoist canon or outside of it, but the Perfected Prime Lord of the Purple Culmen features in the line of transmission for an Upper Scripture of the Seven Recitations of the Divine Realm (Shenzhou qizhuan shangjing 神州七轉上經), part of Seven Recitations of the Divine Realm with Seven Transformations for Dancing in Heaven (CT 1331 Dongzhen shangqing shenzhou qizhuan qibian wutian jing 洞真上清神州七轉七變舞天經), an early Shangqing text that postdates the original revelations. In the first line of transmission (corroborated by WSBY 32), the recipient of the Qu hubao fu is the Lord Jade Lad of the Three Heavens (Santian yutong jun 三天玉童君), who appears nowhere else in the Daoist canon. The second transmission history is less obscure. It begins with the Upper Thearch of Yin and Yang of Primal Unity (Xuanhe yinyang shangdi 玄和陰陵上帝). This is a deity of middling rank in the highest Shangqing heaven in Zhenling weiye tu 10b, and the lord of the Middle Heaven of the Grand Culmen in WSBY 85.16a. He bestows the amulet upon the Elder of the Nine Qi (Jiuqi zhangren 九氣丈人), who ranks below him in the Weiye tu. The amulet appears to be known by a different title in WSBY 31, the Perfected Book of the Dame of the Mysterious Flows of the Purple Culmen [who Dwells at] the Transcendent Capital of the Nine Elders. ([Jiu]lao xiandu xuanliu ziji yuanjun zhenshu 老仙都玄流紫極元君真書). Its associated record is the Jade Names of the Golden Porte (Jinque yuming 金闕玉名), which appears at Housheng Daojun lieji 9b.

1.7) The Perfected Book of August Splendor of the Lord Heavenly Thearch of the Palace of Clear Harmony (Qinghe gong tian dijun huangxi zhenshu 清和宮天帝君皇熙真書) (262b.15-16, 265a)

The Perfected Book promises its bearer the ability to “cause to pay court to them the myriad spirits, to make servants of the hundred animals, and to ascend to the heavens in the bright day.” We learn in addition that “their years will extend without end.”³¹²

Heading its line of transmission is the Most High Prime Lord (Taishang yuanjun 太上元君), a deity that has not been introduced in either the Zhengfa jing or the Jiuwei badao. The Prime Lord also features in textual transmission elsewhere in the Canon: Huangsu sishisi fang 11a has him dwelling in the Transcendent Capital, from whence he approves the transmission of a method to dispel evil spirits; WSBY 98.2a places him in the same capital and has him transmitting a “Precious Writ of the Three Augusts” (Sanhuang baowen 三皇寶文). Here, he transmits the Perfected Book to the Yellow Emperor, who bequeaths it to a series of famous transcendents. WSBY 31 knows the amulet as The Perfected Book of the Lord Heavenly Thearch of the Palace of Clear Harmony (Qinghe gong tiandi jun zhenshu 清和宮天帝君真書), and its associated celestial record is the Red Names of the Jade Records of the Heaven of Grand Clarity (Taiqing yuji jiangming 太清玉籍絳名), which appears at Housheng Daojun lieji 10a. Its transmission history in WSBY 32 is the same as that given in the Jiuwei badao, as is the name by which it is known.

312 佩此上真文朝萬神役百禽白日昇天延年無終黃上君授之於赤松子... 白日上昇

Thus concludes the list of amulets in the Taishang zhongwen lu. Not all of them are written in characters comprehensible by humans, however: two are in imitation seal-script, written echoes of celestial writing.

2) The Amulets and Registers of the Nine Tenuities and Eight Ways (Jiuwei badao fulu 九微八道符錄)

2.1) Perfected Book of the Jade [Emperor] in the Mysterious Palace of Purple Tenuity [that Allows the Bearer] to Fly to the Heavens (Ziwei xuangong yufei tianzhen shu 紫微玄宮玉飛天真書) (262b.18-19, 265a)

According to the Jiuwei badao, the bearer of this amulet will be promoted to “transcendent ancestor” (xian zong 仙宗) after thirty thousand years. The “Perfected of the Thousand Hills” (Qianqiu zhenren 千丘真人) – a figure otherwise unattested in the Chinese literary corpus – will pay court to them, and twenty thousand “Perfected of the hundred rivers” (Bai du zhenren 百瀆真人) will guard them. The more modest Zhengfa jing promises twenty-four jade lads and jade maidens as spirit guards. It knows the Perfected Book by a nearly identical name (the Ziwei xuangong yuwen feitian zhenshu 紫微玄宮玉文飛天真書), and provides no special transmission requirements nor transmission history. By contrast, the Jiuwei badao relates that the Celestial King of Primordial of Commencement bestowed it upon the Queen Mother of the West; here, the Celestial King is known as the “Celestial King of Primordial Commencement who Dwells in Grand Clarity.” This title is previously unknown to either the Zhengfa jing or the Jiuwei badao, but WSBY 32 gives the same name and transmission history. This amulet exhorts its recipients to perform a sacrifice when the text is transmitted to them: they must swear an oral oath to the central of the Five Emperors and offer white and indigo silks. The Perfected Book closes by enjoining the recipient to transmit the amulet for myriad generations. Its associated celestial record is the Golden Characters on Slips of Precious Jade of Grand Simplicity (Taisu qiongjian jinzi 太素瓊簡金字), which appears at Housheng Daojun lieji 10a (which replaces zi with ming 名 “name.”

2.2) The Perfected Book of the Myriad Transcendents that Opens Heaven, of the Transcendent Count of the Mysterious Continent (Xuanzhou xianbo kaitian wanxian zhenshu 玄洲仙伯開天萬仙真書) (262b.22-262c.1, 265b)

According to the Jiuwei badao, this amulet grants its bearer the power to dispel various evil spirits, cause good spirits to pay court to them, avoid disease and illness, and ascend to the Transcendent Capital. Both the Jiuwei badao and WSBY 32 claim it was transmitted from the Azure Lad to qualified mortals, while the Jiuwei informs its reader that the Wanxian zhenshu goes by the alternate names “Amulet of the Way of the Transcendents” (Xianrendao lu 仙人道錄) and the Covenant-Writ of Grand Mystery for Ascending to Transcendence (Taixuan dengxian mengwen 太玄登仙盟文). Its associated celestial record in WSBY 31 is Golden Names on White Jade of the Cinnabar Terrace of the Mystic Capital (Xuandu dantai baiyu jinzi 玄都丹臺白玉金字), which appears at Housheng Daojun lieji 10b.³¹³

313 The Mystic Capital is located in the first Shangqing heaven (Yudan wuliang 鬱單无量) in Taixiao langshu 1.12b-1.13b and in the Heaven of Jade Clarity according to Chen Xuanying’s commentary to the Duren jing (Duren jing sizhu 3.12a-b).

2.3) The Grand Perfected Book for Flying to Heaven of the Platform of the Fortified Wall of Kunlun Range (Kunlun yongtai feitian taizhen shu 昆仑墉臺飛天太真[書]) (262c.1-2, 265b)³¹⁴

The Zhengfa jing promises the bearer of this amulet a modest twelve jade maidens as spirit guards, and names it Guangsheng taizhen wuyue binfu 廣生太真五嶽兵符, the Amulet of [Spirit-] Soldiers of the Five Marchmounts and the Grand Perfected of Broad Life. The Jiuwei badao is more effusive, promising that “those who wear it will traverse the Five Marchmounts. Mountain spirits will pay court to them, revering and guarding them. The many sprites will bow down and flee... the Goldstone will open for those who wear it.”³¹⁵ Its alternate names are Guangsheng taizhen (廣生太真), the Upper Amulet of the Five Marchmounts 五嶽上符, and the Amulet of the Numinous Tiger 神虎符. The first is actually the name of a deity featured in WSBY 24.7a-b; thus, this amulet must somehow be associated with it. The second appears unattested outside this particular entry, but the third is well-known as a talisman with a wide range of powers that belongs at the core of the Shangqing corpus.³¹⁶ It appears at Precious Writs 20a as Shenhu xuandong 玄洞. The Most High Elder (Taishang daifu 太上大夫) transmitted it to qualified mortals according to both WSBY 32 and the Jiuwei badao.³¹⁷ The amulet’s 314 Worth noting is that the phrase I translate as an attributive (“...for flying to heaven”) is used as a noun to translate Sanskrit apsara in Buddhist inscriptions.

315 The Goldstone is a category of alchemical ingredients with a peculiar property: they are invisible to ordinary people, showing themselves only to those who are properly equipped. In performing this function, the Taizhen shu recalls the Five Talismans of Lingbao, amulets that both protected their bearer during dangerous forays into the mountains and revealed alchemical ingredients that spurred the journeys. See Daojiao dacidian, s.v. “金石.”

316 See R:2 179-186, 249, 251-252.

317 This figure appears at Zhenling weiye tu 6a.

associated celestial record is the Purple Register in Red Script of the Southern Culmen (Nanji danwen zilu 南極丹文紫籙), which appears at Housheng Daojun lieji 10a. It is known in WSBY 31 as the Perfected Writ for Flying to Heaven of the Fortified City Wall of Kunlun (Kunlun yongtai feitian zhenwen 崑崙墉臺飛天真文).

2.4) The Most High Perfected Book of Penglai (Penglai gaoshang zhenshu 蓬萊高上真書) (262b.20- 21, 265b)

The Jiuwei badao promises that those who wear it “will traverse the rivers and the four seas; the many dragons will guard and serve them; the water sprites will tremble and submit to them,” and that they will “ride the clouds and ascend to the heavens.” Whether the Most High Perfected Book is indeed a single amulet, or two that have combined into one, is unclear. The Jiuwei gives two alternate names and two separate transmission histories. The first alternate name is the Most Mysterious Tablet of Penglai (Penglai taixuan zhi zha 蓬萊太玄之札), while the second is the Perfected Book of the Nine Flows (Jiuliu zhenshu 九流真書). According to the first transmission history (confirmed by WSBY 32), the High August of Mysterious Overawing Power of the Clear Heaven (Xuanwei qingtian shanghuang 玄威清天上黃) transmitted it to the legendary Master Ningfeng 甯封; the second has the Elder of the Northern Hill (Beiling zhangren 北陵丈人) transmitting it to the transcendents Ma Huang 馬皇 and Wen Quan 文泉. The Zhengfa jing holds that the amulet grants its bearer a spirit guard of twelve jade lads. The Most High Perfected Book appears at WSBY 31.321b and 32.329a. Its associated celestial record at WSBY 31 is the Red Book on Green-Gold [Slips] of the Mysterious Palace (Xuangong qingjin [jian] chi 玄宮青金[簡]赤書), which appears at Housheng daojun lieji 10b. It appears at Precious Writs 20a.

2.5) The August High Book of the Elder Heavenly Thearch (Tiandi zhangren huangshang zhenshu 天帝丈人皇上真書) (262b.21-22, 265c)

The Zhengfa jing assigns its bearer “one hundred jade maidens and the knowledge of the auspicious and inauspicious,” while the Jiuwei badao promises one hundred jade maidens as spirit guards, as well as the assistance of twenty-four thousand jade maidens in divining the future via dreams. It appears in WSBY 31.321b, where its associated celestial record is the Purple Register in Cinnabar Script of the Southern Culmen (Nanji danwen zilu 南極丹文紫籙), which appears at Housheng Daojun lieji 10a.

Thus ends the Amulets of the Nine Tenuities and Eight Ways. Like the Massed Writs, some of them appear only in celestial transcription, unreadable by mortals. These three can be found on 265a-c. Finally, there is one amulet that appears in the Zhengfa jing but not the Jiuwei badao: the Perfected Book of the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement (Yuanshi tianwang zhenshu 元始天王真書, 262c.2-4). This amulet grants a spirit guard of twelve jade lads and twelve jade maidens as well as “the power to go between the realms of existence and nonexistence.” It appears nowhere else in the Chinese literary corpus.

In addition to discussing amulets featured in the Zhengfa jing/Jiuwei badao textual complex, the same portions of the texts discussed above (see “Texts consulted”) often contain information about amulets that feature in neither work. Analyzing these amulets may provide useful information about the works to which the Zhengfa jing and Jiuwei badao are linked. In format, the below entries are similar to those above. However, they do not record every appearance of each amulet in the Canon; because this portion of the appendix concentrates on links between the Jiuwei badao/Santian zhengfa and other parts of the Daoist Canon, I focus chiefly on appearances in the works I have already discussed. In addition, I discuss amulets that appear in quotations of the Rectifying Methods that do not match the received text. I thus hope to gain some insight into the wider circles in which the received Rectifying Methods must have circulated before assuming its present form.

WSBY 32

3.2) The Perfected Book of the Three Heavens (Santian zhenshu 三天真書)

Also known as the Penetrating (read 通 for 洞) Numinous Writ of Golden Yang (Jinyang dongling wen 金陽洞靈文). This amulet appears in Sanyuan bu jing 1.1a.

3.3) The Amulet of the Mysterious Terrace of the Three Primes for Lodging an Accusation Against the Six Heavens (Sanyuan xuantai gao liu tian fu 三元玄臺告六天符).

This amulet's transmission history is cut off before it begins in WSBY 32. It appears under this name in Dao leishi xiang j. 3. The Mysterious Terrace of the Three Primes appears as pleasant location connected to an internal meditation exercise in Guishan xuanlu 2.9a-10b, but plays a far more important role elsewhere. It is among the many palaces and bureaus enumerated in WSBY 22; there, one can glimpse the Hidden Writ of the Upper Tenuities of the Three Heavens and Nine Numens (Santian jiuling shangwei yinwen 三天九靈上微隱文) once every eight thousand kalpas. This latter is none other than the Yinyang linglu according to the Sanbu jing, and has all the powers associated with it; the Sanbu jing, like WSBY 22, locates it in the Mysterious Terrace of the Three Primes.³¹⁸

WSBY 33

3.4) The Hymn-Writ of the Three Heavens (Santian songwen 三天頌文)

Appearing at WSBY 33.13a, the Hymn-Writ should be recited. It has the power to refine the form; to give them powers of prognostication; and to protect them from the myriad disasters that befall humankind during the end of a kalpa cycle. As the title indicates, it is not an amulet but a hymn; it must be included here, however, as WSBY 33 indicates it is a direct quote of the Rectifying Methods.

³¹⁸ In that work, the same location is connected to the Jade Writ of the Lower Prime for Regulating Earth. WSBY 22 quotes two different works: the Dongxuan jing 洞玄經 and the Zhenji jing 真迹經. I am uncertain which works in the received canon. (if any) these names refer to.

Conclusion

The textual footprint of the amulets above reveal a Rectifying Methods of considerable antiquity that has undergone considerable revision through the centuries. Citations in the original Shangqing revelations (e.g., the Sanbu jing and a version of the Qisheng xuanji preserved in the WSBY) attest to the early date of some version of the work, and circumstantial evidence confirming this is provided by the Rectifying Methods' consistent association with other early members of that corpus. The work itself, however, did not remain unaltered. Daoist authors of the early medieval period saw it not as an unalterable whole but as a toolkit containing apotropaic devices. These devices could be freely excerpted from their original setting, sometimes with little regard for their original names, transmission histories, or specific powers. The function remained the same, however: assuring the good fortune of the bearer, whether by warding off demons or permitting ascent to Shangqing heavens.

A different compilation of slightly more certain date – the Precious Writs – provides some insight into the possible logic of its editor and demonstrates the different uses to which the amulets were put in the early medieval period. The editor of this text extracted amulets from the Shangqing and Lingbao corpuses, but – in the case of the Shangqing amulets, at least – stripped them of any association with apocalyptic Shangqing deities. Further, the author placed them in a ritual setting that suggested repeated transmission. Both factors combine with the verifiably later date to suggest that the early Shangqing texts' anxiety concerning the imminent apocalypse had abated by the time of CT 128's compilation.

APPENDIX G

DEITIES AND PLACES IN THE “RECTIFYING METHODS”

Perfected King of the Xiaoyou Cavern-Heaven (Xiaoyou zhenwang 小有真王)

This is another name for the Azure Lad (Qingtong jun 青童君), one of the chief deities of the Shangqing textual corpus and an important intermediary between the gods and human beings. He is also called “Supreme Minister, Lord Azure Lad” (Shangxiang Qingtong jun 上相青童君), or “Lord Azure Lad of Fangzhu” (Fangzhu Qingtong jun 方諸青童君). Fangzhu is one of the island paradises located in the Eastern Sea (Donghai 東海). As Supreme Minister, his position is just below that of Lord Li 李君, the savior of humanity who plays a critical role in the Daoist eschatology of the Northern and Southern Dynasties. According to The Inner Biography of Emperor Wu of the Han (CT 292 Han Wudi neizhuan 漢武帝內傳, ca. 6th c.), he is a disciple of the Perfected King of the Nine Heavens (Jiutian zhenwang 九天真王), who rules the second of the Nine Primordial Shangqing Heavens. The Azure Lad also manages the affairs of earthbound transcendents (dixian 地仙), and functions as the Great Director of Destinies (Da Siming 大司命), overseeing the other Directors of Destinies in the Five Marchmounts (Wu yue 五嶽) and the Grotto-Heavens (Dongtian 洞天). Accordingly, the Precious Scripture on the Female One and the Five Elders (CT 1313 Ciyi jing, full title: Dongzhen gaoshang yudi dadong ciyi yujian wulao baojing 洞真高上玉帝大洞雌一玉檢吾老寶經) describes Xiaoyou as the foremost of all the cavern-heavens. He composes the Santian zhengfa jing, as well as playing a major role in its transmission and internal cosmology. He is also able to bestow transcendent status on human seekers.³¹⁹

319 TC, s.v. “Santian zhengfa jing;” R 1:127, EoT, s.v. “Qingtong,” Han Wudi neizhuan 20b; Ciyi jing 20a. Methods in the Ciyi jing are widely cited in other Shangqing works, and the Ciyi itself is a long and complex collection of various methods. Robinet dates it to after the seventh century. See R 2:261-283. It is one of the 三奇 sanqi, “Three Wondrous [Texts],” along with the Dadong zhenjing and the Suling jing. While dating after Yang Xi’s revelations, these works assimilate to the Shangqing corpus practices

Nine Perfected (Jiu zhen 九真)

The Nine Perfected play a critical role in the Shangqing corpus, and are named and described in the Taidan yinshu as residents of the Three Primes (Sanyuan 三元), here referring to the upper, middle, and lower sections of the body. Each of the Three Primes is itself divided into upper, middle, and lower levels, and one Perfected is assigned to each level. It is in this capacity that they help the adept transform their body in the Jiuzhen zhongjing. However, the Three Primes also have cosmological significance as hypostases of the three primordial qi that generate the universe, and accordingly the Nine Perfected play an essential role in governing the cosmos. In the Zhengfa jing, they appear as residents of the Three Primes, conceived of in that work as mutations of the qi of the Nine Heavens. The Nine Perfected reside in the Three Heavens of Clear Tenuity (Qingwei 清微), Yuyu 禹餘, and Grand Crimson (Dachi 大赤).³²⁰ that predated them. On the sanqi, see R 1:76-80.

320 See ZHDZ 1.520a-521a for their names and significance on both the human and cosmological levels. EoT, s.v. “Sanyuan;” Zhonghua dao jiao dacidian, s.v. “三元;” Dao jiao dacidian, s.v. “Sanyuan.” They appear in Santian zhengfa jing, ZHDZ 1.259b. The Three Heavens appear in many Shangqing works. Yuyu appears here as an abbreviation for Xuanwei ziran shangxu yuyu tian 玄微自然上虛禹餘天, the sixth of the thirty-six heavens according to CT 1373 Shangqing waiguo fangpin qingtong neiwen 上清外國放品青童內文. The characters 禹餘 (pronounced hjuXyo in Middle Chinese) were probably chosen for their phonetic value as imitations of Sanskrit, since the Yuyu tian appears in the Waiguo fangpin next to pseudo-Sanskrit heavens like the Yudan wuliang tian 鬱單無量天 or the Bujiaole tian 不驕樂天. “Yudan” (MC: ‘juttan’) was the typical transcription of the Sanskrit Uttarakuru, a utopian northern continent (not heaven) of the Buddhist pantheon, and 不驕樂 renders Sanskrit Nirmāṇarati, the fifth Buddhist heaven. Accordingly, I leave it untranslated, in contrast to Livia Kohn, EoT, s.v. “Sanqing.” Elaborate Chinese names meant to resemble Sanskrit words were common in other heavens. See ZHDZ 1.287ff; Zürcher, “Buddhist Conquest,” in Silk, Buddhism in China 144-145n.

White Prime (Baiyuan 白元)

The identity of this spirit varies according to the work consulted. The Huangting neijing jing (on which, see below) claims it is a spirit of the lungs, which the Taidan yinshu (discussed more fully below) confirms. However, it appears as a spirit of the brain in the Hymn to the Gods of the Cave-Chamber (CT 133 Taishang dongfang neijing zhu 太上洞房內經注, hereafter Dongfang neijing zhu), which was integrated into the Shangqing corpus at an early date. Baiyuan plays an important role in the Shangqing corpus, and so appears in several works. In addition to the Taidan yinshu, he can be found in the Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue (discussed in the previous chapter), as well as works like the Zhen 'gao and the Esoteric Biography of Ziyang the Perfected (CT 303 Ziyang zhenren neizhuan 紫陽真人內傳) that form the core of the Shangqing corpus. The deity's antiquity is further attested by a citation in the Wushang biyao. Finally, Baiyuan links the “Zhengyi zhou” to the Santian zhengfa jing, where it appears early on in the commentary of the Azure Lad.³²¹

The Matchless Hero (Wuying 無英)

Baiyuan and Wuying often compose two parts of a trio that also includes The Yellow Old Lord of the Center (Zhongyang Huanglao jun 中央黃老君); this is how they appear in 321 See the Grand Ricci, s.v. “Bai yuan”; the Huangting neijing jing in YJQQ 11.25b; EoT, s.v. “Taidan yinshu,” but cf. R 1:129, which lists Baiyuan as a spirit of the brain. See also Dongfang neijing zhu 3b-4b; TC, s.v. “Taishang dongfang neijing zhu”; Zhen 'gao 9.14b, 13.11a, where Baiyuan appears as a spirit of the brain; he also appears as a spirit of the brain in Ziyang zhenren neizhuan 8b-9a; WSBY 3.12a; Santian zhengfa 1b.

the Santian zhengfa jing. Along with Taiyi and Baiyuan, Wuying is an important bodily deity in the Shangqing corpus.³²²

The Eight Emperors Badi 八帝

These might be the Demon Kings of the Eight Directions (Badi damowang 八帝大魔王) mentioned in the Jinyuan yuzhang, a work that was integrated into the Shangqing corpus at an early date. (For more on these beings, see below.) The Demon Kings appear in this work as villains to be driven away by spirits marshalled by the adept. Thus, their association here with the benevolent Nine Perfected would be strange. However, there are references to benevolent Eight Emperors scattered throughout the Shangqing corpus. The Jade Rule of the Three Original Ones and the Promulgated Scripture of the Three Female Original Ones (CT 354 Shangqing sanyuan yujian sanyuan bujing 上清三元玉檢三元布經) was integrated into the main body of Shangqing works some fifty years after the Shangqing revelations; in an incantation it contains, the Eight Emperors command transcendents to dispatch a “flying chariot” (feibing 飛輶) that carries the adept to the Grand Void (taixu 太虛). In The Nine Crimson Speckled Talismans of the Five Emperors’ Inner Contemplation (CT 1329 Taishang jiuchi banfu wudi neizhen jing 太上九赤班符五帝內真經), a member of the original Shangqing corpus, they appear in an incantation to ³²² For Yuanying, see, e.g., Suling jing (full title: CT 1314 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing 洞真太上素靈洞元大有妙經) 18a and CT 1339 Dongzhen bajing yulu chentu yinfu 洞真八景玉籙晨圖隱符 6a. In both cases it is associated with Baiyuan, and so constitutes 元/无 confusion. The Bajing yulu was incorporated into the Shangqing corpus at an early date after the Shangqing revelations; see TC, s.v. “Dongzhen bajing yulu chentu yinfu.” For the association of Baiyuan, Wuying and Zhongyang Huanglao jun in the Shangqing corpus, see R 1:129; Ciyi jing 5b-6a, 25a-b; Dongfang neijing zhu 1b, 4b, 9a; Ziyang zhenren neizhuan 8b-9a, where Zhongyang Huanglao jun is the “great spirit that cannot be named,” thanks to his association with Taiwei; Denzhen yinjue 1.3a. Dadong zhenjing 2.10b-11a pairs Wuying with Baiyuan, as does Taidan yinshu 20a and Huangting neijing jing 1.10b, where Wuying goes by an alternate name (Gongzi 公子); Santian zhengfa jing 1b.

the Lord of Mount Tai (Taishan jun 泰山君). More significantly, they appear in a work associated with the Nine Perfected, the Mount Turtle Register of the Nine Spirits Pertaining to Pertaining to the Superior Scripture of Transformation of Primordial Beginning (CT 1393 Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiuling taimiao guishan xuanlu 上清元始變化寶真上經九靈太妙龜山玄錄, hereafter Guishan xuanlu); thus, these Eight Emperors are probably the same referred to in “Zhengyi zhou.” In the Santian zhengfa jing 259b.19-21, they appear as emperors of the Eight Directions, with one set of eight dwelling in each of the upper three heavens.³²³

“The Lord Emperor” (Dijun 帝君)

The Lord Emperor is the supreme deity of the Dadong zhenjing, and is associated both with attaining transcendence and the records of transcendence. He plays an important role in the meditation exercises that comprise early Shangqing works like the Taidan yinshu and the Jiuzhen zhongjing. In the Jiuzhen zhongjing he grants transcendent status alongside the Azure Lad. In contrast to his preeminence elsewhere, he appears subordinate to other figures in the Santian zhengfa jing.³²⁴

323 Zhonghua dao jiao da cidian, s.v. “八帝大魔王.” For the names and descriptions of the Eight Demon Kings, see the Jinyuan yuzhang at ZHDZ 1.733ff. Sanyuan bujing 37a/ZHDZ 1.356; on the work, see TC, s.v. “Shangqing sanyuan yujian sanyuan bujing.” Jiuchi banfu 9b/ZHDZ 1.444-445. On the work, see TC, s.v. “Taishang jiuchi banfu wudi neizhen jing.” The Guishan xuanlu is perhaps the most complete list of the seventy-four Shangqing gods. See TC, s.v. “Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiuling taimiao guishan xuanlu.”

324 See Isabelle Robinet, trans. Julian F. Pas and Norman Girardot, Taoist Meditation: The Maoshan Tradition of Great Purity (Albany: SUNY Press, 1993) 107-8, 137, as well as the “Method of the Nine Perfected” in the Jiuzhen zhongjing (ZHDZ 1.222-225). The Jiuzhen zhongjing was integrated into the Shangqing corpus at a very early date, and is closely related to two other works: CT 1377 Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue 上清太上九真中經絳生神丹訣 and CT 405 Shangqing zijing jun huangchu ziling daojun dongfang shangjing 上清紫精君黃初紫靈道君洞房上經. See R 2:67-83, EoT, s.v. “Shangting taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing,” s.v. “Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue,” s.v. “Shangqing zijing jun huangchu ziling daojun

The Nine Heavens (Jiutian 九天)

The Nine Primal Heavens of Shangqing appear in several different works. They appear in the Santian zhengfa jing as hypostases of the primordial Nine Qi that took form after the same Nine Qi had formed the Heavenly King of Primordial Commencement and the Perfected King of the Nine Heavens.³²⁵ dongfang shangjing.” For a detailed introduction to the Jiuzhen zhongjing, see Robinet, “Introduction au Kieou-tchen tchong-king,” Society for the Study of Chinese Religions Bulletin 7 (Fall 1979): 24-43. EoT, s.v. “Taidan yinshu.” The Nine Perfected are named in another scripture that features Taiwei – see ZHDZ 1.520a-c, part of CT 56 Taishang yupei jindang taiji jinshu shangjing 太上玉珮金璫太極金書上經 (hereafter Yupei jindang, ZHDZ 1.518-529). Dijun appears in Santian zhengfa jing, ZHDZ 259c.22-26.

325 See R 1:131 for a general introduction to the heavens, including works that provide a complete list. Their relationship to Buddhist heavens of similar name is the focus of Erik Zürcher’s “Buddhist Conquest of Early Taoism,” in Jonathan A. Silk, ed., Buddhism in China: The Collected Papers of Erich Zürcher (Leiden: Brill, 2013), 144-155n. The Nine Heavens first appear in Santian zhengfa jing, ZHDZ 1.259a.10-11.

Florian C. Reiter

Basic Conditions
of Taoist Thunder Magic 道教雷法

2007

Harrassowitz Verlag · Wiesbaden

ABHANDLUNGEN ÜBER DIE KUNDE DES MORGENLANDES

Im Auftrag der Deutschen Orientalischen Gesellschaft

Verlag Otto Harrassowitz

ALD
PJ
5

.D4

Bd. 61

Bibliografische Information der Deutschen Nationalbibliothek
Die Deutsche Nationalbibliothek verzeichnet diese Publikation in der Deutschen Nationalbibliografie; detaillierte bibliografische Daten sind im Internet über <http://dnb.d-nb.de> abrufbar.

Bibliographic information published by the Deutsche Nationalbibliothek
The Deutsche Nationalbibliothek lists this publication in the Deutsche Nationalbibliografie; detailed bibliographic data are available in the internet at <http://dnb.d-nb.de>.

For further information about our publishing program consult our website <http://www.harrassowitz-verlag.de>

© Otto Harrassowitz GmbH & Co. KG, Wiesbaden 2007

This work, including all of its parts, is protected by copyright.
Any use beyond the limits of copyright law without the permission of the publisher is forbidden and subject to penalty. This applies particularly to reproductions, translations, microfilms and storage and processing in electronic systems.

Printed on permanent/durable paper.

Printing and binding: Hubert & Co., Göttingen

Printed in Germany

ISSN 0567-4980

ISBN 978-3-447-05593-2

Contents

Foreword	VII
Introduction	1
The Biography of Yeh Ch'ien-shao	5

Chapter I: Man and Thunder Magic

A First Approach to Thunder Magic	13
Human Nature and Thunder Magic	15
Summoning and Uniting [Thunder Divinities]	19
Assembling the Divine Force	32
The Basis for Writing Amulets	41
Praying for Rain	47
Killing and Crusading, the Martial Side of Thunder Magic	54
The Creative Impetus	62

Chapter II: The Scope of Thunder Magic

The Divine Texts of the Great Methods of the Five Thunders at the Jade Department in the Heaven of Highest Purity:

Preface by Wang Wen-ch'ing	69
The Arrangement of the Offices of Thunder and Thunderclaps	74
Method of Consecrating Seals	79
Locations and Departments of the Five Thunders	81
Sacrifice to the Great Divinity of Law and Order	85
The Application of Thunder Breaths	87
Writing out Amulets to Cure Illnesses, Raise Dragons and Produce Rainfall	88
The Establishment of Hells for Evil Demons	96
Altars and Prayers for Rain or Clear Skies	100
The Crusade against Temples and the Eviction of Wicked Spirits	109
Ritual Steps and Mudrās	112
Conditions for the Ritual Transmission and [Spirit] Promotion	117

Abbreviations	121
Bibliography	123
The Sources in the Taoist Canon.....	126
Glossary	129

Foreword

Today Taoist Thunder Magic or Thunder Rituals (Lei-fa 雷法/Wu-lei fa 五雷法) constitute an established element in Taoist religious culture. Many ritual practices, convictions and emblems of Thunder Magic stem from antique traditions. The ritual specialisation and the name of Thunder Magic emerged during the Sung period (11th-13th cts.), uniting, developing and rationalizing exorcist and ritual methods that were already current in earlier periods of Taoist history albeit without the label of Thunder Magic.

This study intends to describe the basic notions, practices and intentions of Thunder Magic that often is connected with the names of Shen-bsiao (神霄) and Ch'ing-wei (清微) Taoism. The Taoist Canon contains abundant materials that show Thunder amulets, altars, seals and other ritual assets. Learned Discussions (Lei-fa shuo 雷法說) and similar texts show that Thunder Magic is not a unified religious and ritual element of Taoist culture but comprises ritual methods that many different local traditions, documentations and the patronage of legions of divinities identify.

Many texts cannot be attributed to any individual author but later Taoists, for example Pai Yü-ch'an (白玉蟾 fl. 1209-1224), are widely assumed to have had a hand in the actual formation of those texts. However, some texts very likely emerged in the time of Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿 1093-1153) who was a persuasive and famous promoter of Thunder Magic at the imperial court of the Sung (宋) dynasty. I try to focus on materials of that early period of Thunder Magic (12th ct.). Admittedly, the texts are often hard to understand and it is difficult to grasp the practical implications that they only indicate. In a sense, this presentation has a tentative character.

The German Research Foundation (Bonn) and the Ministry of Education of Taiwan (Taipeh) supported me to spend some time in Taiwan where I could consult Taiwanese colleagues and ritual specialists, who were very kind and helpful. In this sense, I especially wish to thank Profs. Lee Fong-mao (Academia Sinica) and Hsieh Ts'ung-hui (Taipei Normal University). The Katholische Akademische Ausländer Dienst (Bonn) gave Prof. Li Yüan-kuo (China/Chengdu, Academy of Social Sciences) the financial support to spend a couple of weeks in Berlin and work with me on some of the Thunder Magic materials that I present in this book. Yet, this book is just an attempt on my part to sort out the basic conditions of Taoist Thunder Magic. I hope to draw the attention of the scholarly world to this fascinating field of research that matters for the understanding of Taoist religious culture as we have it today. Concerning the publication of this book I wish to express my sincere thanks for the support by Harrassowitz Company (Wiesbaden), especially Mr. J. Ferkenheuer.

Berlin 2007

Florian C. Reiter

Introduction

Throughout history, the workings of religious Taoism are present on all levels of the Chinese society. Canonical hagiographies of saints and immortals and the biographies of historic persons show the activities and subtle influences that Taoists exerted. We usually read that they were learned persons who mastered the scriptures of Taoism and Confucianism, and they used to employ a great variety of practical skills and rituals. Skills and rituals saved from epidemics, droughts, floods and illness. Taoists acted for the wellbeing of the people, the administration and the state at large. This seems to be the standard range of Taoist aspirations and activities, and it is for this reason that we easily find the appropriate and persuasive rhetoric in Taoist texts throughout all ages.

Never mind the time and the period, Taoists always were very expert at divination. They healed illness and exorcised baleful influences, using amulets and other ritual devices. The Taoist activists seem to make use of a rather secret personal way of life, of prayer and meditation. There is, of course, the need for a protracted and rather complicated education that may lead to the career as a priest (tao-shih 道士), and again there is some secrecy about the actual reality of this career.¹ However, we also notice that in many cases we never learn whether the respective Taoist was a priest or not, whether he knew how to perform rituals or not. Perhaps there was the general understanding that this profession had to be taken for granted.

Some canonical encyclopaedias present superb literary summaries of the Taoist religious culture. Sometimes they were compiled at the behest of emperors and rulers. The series of such encyclopaedias started with the title W'u-shang pi-yao (無上必要6ct.). Encyclopaedias turn out to be major stepping-stones when we take up our studies of religious Taoism.²

On the other hand, biographies and hagiographies often speak about alleged historical persons and pose to feature the actual combination of all those

1 F.C.Reiter: The Aspirations and Standards of Taoist Priests in the Early T'ang Period, pp.133-150, in: AAS 1.

2 J.Lagerwey: W'u-shang pi-yao, somme taoïste du VI^e siècle. Paris 1981.

theoretical and practical elements that characterize the Taoist and his vocation. Such sources show that the Taoist can interfere in the course of nature, for example, when he organises his individual essences of life, which goes with the Taoist self-cultivation to strive after an individual immortality. Taoism is characterized by elusive concepts of immortality that point to the very individual and final goal.

The Taoist, who lives in rural settings or even at the imperial court, is employed to fight against rain, drought and other natural disasters that need the deployment of martial spirit forces. Biographies and hagiographies bring us to realize that there must be a special relationship between the individual quality of the practitioner and the outer or social realities of his Taoist activities. We can find elaborate explanations for this delicate relationship in various canonical sources, and some of them are quite prominent in a book that intends to describe the conditions of Thunder Magic or Thunder Rituals.

Many activities in Thunder Magic remind of ecstatic and exorcist performances that certainly call to mind the opaque sphere of shaman culture. Taoist sources on the other hand explicitly reject the idea that Taoists have anything to do with the shaman branches of religious proficiency. We may suppose that the ecstatic state of mind and exorcist performances can hardly be a concern for an educated and learned person. Taoism, however, proves such a supposition to be wrong.

This study of Basic Conditions of Taoist Thunder Magic elucidates the workings of Thunder Magic (wu-lei fa 五雷法). This branch of ritual proficiency is associated with other schools in Taoist history, namely the Sben-hsiao tao (神霄道) and T'ien-hsin cheng-fa (天心正法).

Since the Sung-period the name Thunder Magic is a general and comprehensive name for a vast variety of exorcist rituals that later continued to flourish and were labelled Cb'ing-wei (清微) school (14th ct.). Finally, Thunder Magic became part of the general Taoist religious culture without being explicitly named Thunder Magic and singled out for separate practices. We can study this development, for example, in present day Taiwan, which, however, does not exclude the conscious continuation of Thunder Magic by individual priests or specialists who may claim to have family traditions reaching back to Taoists of the Sung period. The translation "magic" for the Chinese word fa (法) is the formulation that I prefer. In fact, we deal with rituals. Thunder Rituals would also be a good name translating lei-fa (雷法).

We know that the emergence of Thunder Magic in the Northern Sung-period is based on antique traditions of interpreting and handling natural phenomena, which always was and is a major concern in Taoism. There were specific rituals that focussed on the destructive force of thunder and lightning. They were employed in remote periods of Chinese history. For example, the scholar Wang Ch'ung (王充) in the Han-period disputes in his Lun-heng (論衡) the existence of a divinity called Thunder Lord (lei-kung 雷公), saying that thunders are simply fire (huo 火).³ The statement by Wang Ch'ung (王充) seems to prove that ages ago a spirit or divine Thunder Lord was an object for scholarly considerations and, most certainly, for religious veneration. The darkness of history conceals those antique rituals. Anyway, we know for sure that the actual tasks, the purposes and means of Thunder Magic were matters of great concern, and they were integral parts of Taoism long before Thunder Magic explicitly appeared.

The T'ang Taoist Chang Wan-fu (張萬福 fl.711-713) tells us: "concerning the comprehensive rule over all divinities and demons in heaven and on earth, concerning the killing and subduing of wicked demons (hsieh-mo 邪魔), the beheading and the annihilation of bad spirits (yao-ching 妖精), the recruitment of divine forces (ling 靈) and the summoning of vital forces (ch'i 氣), the realisation of control and order for mountains and rivers, the cleansing of filthy atmospheres, the dispatch of petitions and the employment of postal [spirit] agents, the direct communication with the immortals (shen-hsien 神仙), there is just nothing that has any priority to [the methods and rituals of] Orthodoxy and Unity (Cheng-i 正一)." Ages later in the Sung period, Thunder Magic did serve well all these tasks.⁴ It is quite telling that the statements of Chang Wan-fu (張萬福) read like an early summary of the programmatic range of the much later Thunder rituals. We want to keep in mind that there are also some other, additional aspects of the ritual practice in Thunder Magic that classify such rituals as proper parts of Cheng-i (正一) Taoism.

We consider that the Thunder specialists employed mostly secret skills and crafts that go with the name of Thunder Magic to solve individual and communal problems that people believed to have a spiritual or transcendent cause. For example, droughts and floods are such problems that can endanger the wellbeing of agrarian communities. The ritual help by means of Thunder Magic, however, is most seldom a communal event in which the local population can participate, in one way or other joining the festivities. Thunder Magic is a rather personal and secret matter. The communal participation is restricted to a few sections of the old and established thanksgiving rituals (chiaotai). When the Thunder specialist and priest had secretly performed his Thunder rituals and had been successful, the community may then stage such communal rituals.

3 Wang Ch'ung: Lun-heng 6, 23, 96-103, esp. pp. 100-101 (Lei-hsü p'ien). Shanghai 1974.

4 TT 1241 Cb'nan-shou san-tung ching-chieh fa-lu lüeh-shuo 1.4a-4b, following the text Cheng-i fa-wen k'o-chieh p'in (正一法文科戒品). Concerning this text see, U.A.Cedzich, p. 458, in: K.Schipper and F.Verellen eds.: The Taoist Canon, A Historical Companion to the Daozang (henceforth Companion). 3 vols. Chicago 2004.

Before taking up any details, I present the biography of the Taoist Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) who lived in the 9th century, well before the heyday of Thunder Magic. His biography substantiates most of the aspects of Taoist culture that I addressed so far. The text also unites many characteristics that generally describe the Taoist priest and exorcist.

The practical and ritual means that were at the avail of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) have a long history in China. They stem from historical periods before the reputed beginning of organized Taoism in the 2nd century A.D. The Sung (宋) period started in 960 A.D., about one hundred years after the life of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) who shows activities and spiritual potentials that forecast specific elements of the later Thunder Magic. His biography indicates the personal qualities that characterize the practitioners of Thunder Magic. The term Thunder Magic stands for the attempt to rationalize a welter of long established religious notions and rituals, which may be due to the intellectual and rationalistic disposition of the Sung (宋) period. We also remember that emperor Sung Hui-tsung (宋徽宗 r. 1100-1126) developed a great personal interest in the Taoist religion and actually thought himself and his staff to represent the heavenly spirit-administration. On the other side, the priest and Thunder specialist professes to embody a spirit-career with ranks and varied promotions, which enables him to live up to the extraordinary standard of being divine. Our sources do not let us have any doubts about this claim.⁵ We notice that we find in A Dictionary of Official Titles in Imperial China many of the spirit-titles that refer to the assumed power structure of Taoist Thunder specialists and their deities.⁶

5 See the grand spirit-ranks and promotions for the Taoist priest in TT 1220 Tao-fa hui-yuan 56.39a-39b. For a translation of this chapter in TT 1220 see below, Chapter II: The Scope of Taoist Thunder Magic.

6 See Charles O. Hucker, Stanford 1985 (henceforth Hucker).

The biography of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) serves us well as an entertaining example to illustrate the practical and visible role of Taoist Thunder Magic. The biography is contained in the collection "Supplementary Lives of Immortals" (Hsü-hsien chuan 續仙傳) by Shen Fen (沈汾) of the Southern T'ang period (937-975). The biography of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) is one of the twelve items in chapter 2: "Hidden Transformations" (yin-bua 隱化).

The Biography of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶)⁷

(17a) "Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) had the name (tz'u 字) Lu-ts'ung (魯聰) and hailed from Chien-ch'ang (建昌) district in Hung-chou (洪州).⁸ When he was young he adhered to the Taoist skills (tao-shu 道術) of his [spiritual] teacher masters, the [two] Taoists from the Western Mountains (hsi-shan 西山), the Perfect Lords (chen-chün 真君) Hsü [Sun] (許遜) and Wu [Meng] (吳猛).⁹ He abstained from cereals and practiced breathing techniques (fu-ch'i 服氣).

7 See Yeh Ch'ien-shao in: TT 295 Hsü-hsien chuan 2, 16b-18b. Also see Hsü-hsien chuan 2, 13a-13b; in: Hsiao T'ien-shih ed.: Li-tai, chen-hsien shih-chuan (Tao-tsang ching-bua 5/7, Taipei 1980); Concerning TT 295, see F. Verellen, Xu xian chuan, pp. 429-430, in: Companion, he also indicates other editions of this title that are either complete or fragmentary. See T'ai-p'ing kuang-chi (太平廣記) 394 (lei 雷 2), 6a-6b (p. 1607, ed.: Kyoto 1972) contains the story of a certain Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉遷韶) who was initiated by Lei-kung (雷公) as to be able to summon thunders and to save people. The deity explained that he had five brothers. The two Yehs (葉) most likely are the same person, although their places of origin read different. Both names most certainly stand for the one person who hails from Chiang-hsi province. The background of the person in TT 295 sounds better and more learned, whereas the T'ai-p'ing kuang-chi (太平廣記) of Li Fang (李昉, 978 CE) speaks about a young lad who collected firewood when he experienced that divine encounter. I translate the TT 295 version.

8 This is today's Nan-ch'ang district in Chiang-hsi province, where Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) also hails from.

9 Concerning the two famous Taoists (3rd ct.) who allegedly were experts in Thunder Magic, see TT 1220 Tao-fa hui-yuan 56.10a; for a complete translation of this chapter (nr. 56) in A Corpus of Taoist Ritual see below Chapter II. See F.C. Reiter: "The Name of the Nameless and Thunder Magic", p. 115 in: P. Andersen and F.C. Reiter eds.: Scriptures, Schools and Forms of Practice in Daoism, A Berlin Symposium, in: AAS 20. TT 1220: 125.1a sq. Chiu-chou she-ling man-lei ta-fa (九州社令蠻雷大法) shows Hsü Sun (許遜) to be the very first spiritual patron saint of the Earth Altar (Thunder) rituals. The phrasing in TT 295 is opaque. It literally says: "...he served the Taoists...as his teacher masters. His Taoist skills [were] the avoidance of cereals and the breathing technics ..." Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) reputedly lived in the T'ang-period, a few centuries after the times of Hsü and Wu. Concerning the Altar of Earth Thunder, see below Chapter II, cf. TT 1220:

Once he stayed alone in a mountain when suddenly storm and rain came up together with thunder and lightning. There was a person clad in white garments who [appeared and] reverently addressed Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) saying that his Taoist virtuous ways were accomplished to the highest degree, and the registers of the immortals have recommended him for the ascent [to the immortals]. [Now,] in the world of man he should employ demons and deities as his servants and emissaries and so continue furthermore to display his meritorious deeds. Today, a divine person (shen-jen 神人) is about to descend, and he, Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶), would be able to meet the divine person. He should not be afraid at all.

Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) thereupon burnt incense and retired with folded hands to practice silent meditation. In a moment, a perfected [spirit] official who was clad in red garments (chu-i chen-kuan 朱衣真官) descended, arriving from the clouds far away. More than ten [spirit] generals additionally [descended] carrying swords, and on their belts they all carried the dragon-and-tiger amulet (lung-hu fu 龍虎符). The accompanying units (pu-ts'ung 部從) of demoniac and divine [troops] were legions. There were also two attendants who were clad in yellow and green garments, and each of them held one role of registers (pu i chüan 簿一卷) [from the heavenly archives]. The divine generals (shen-chiang 神將) lined up to salute Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶). The perfected [spirit] official [with red garments] addressed him and said:

"[Obeying] the decree of heaven we transfer to you these registers (pu 簿). [We], the divine generals, emissaries and troops are obliged to provide perfectly any service as your emissaries in order to save your contemporaries."

(17b) Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) reverently received the heavenly documents (t'ien-shu 天書), held them in both hands and perused them. They resembled worldly military registers (ping-chi 兵籍). The attendants who firmly held the registers and documents asked [Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶)] for his summons, so that they could execute his orders.

After [the encounter] Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) could shout long screams,¹⁰ and in this way, the wind was aroused in forests and abysses. When he spit out water,¹¹ rain fell in the plains. When he heavily pressed down his feet onto the ground, the noise of thunder evolved [resembling the noise of a] windlass. When [he seemed to] paint with his hand in empty space,¹² radiant lightning would occur which baffled everybody.

56.13a.

10 Or translate: "he roared". Shouts or the loud, almost explosive dispatches of concentrated breaths are a rather usual feature of some Taoist techniques.

Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) roamed then through the world and feigned to be mad. Often being drunk, he popped around in thoroughfares. When he suddenly made loud and threatening noises, he seemed to shake with might. When he was questioned what it was all about, he gave this sort of answer: "I saw in this or that place a fire", or "[I saw] in this or that place a drought and I [just] dispatched rain to save [the situation]". When the people set out to search for the facts, they always found [his words] to have been true.

Occasionally he passed some prefectures and districts and they all asked him for help when they were suffering from a drought. Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) would prepare an altar (hsiang-an 香案) and start to speak spells (ch'i-chow 啟咒). Rain would begin to fall within a short moment. When people asked him to let thunders [rumble], he would press his feet onto the ground and consequently the sound [of thunders] would emerge from below in the earth like [the rolling of] a windlass.

In other cases when bad rainstorms had occurred and the prayers for a clear sky got no response at all, [the people] would ask Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) to stop it. Consequently he would perform his [exorcist] methods (tso shu 作術) (18a) and achieved that the sky cleared up (ch'ing-chi 晴霽). When a drought occurred during the wintertime and prayers for snow were to be offered Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) wore simple unlined clothes and stood barefooted in the sun. He would scream and recite [spells], and within a moment, wind and clouds would assemble and snow would fall throughout all the night.

Furthermore, he used amulets (fu 符) to save [and heal] illness and distress. He did not wait for people to come up to him and ask for help, but when he saw a sick person, he always felt sympathy and saved then that person. When wicked mei-demons (hsieh-mei 邪魅) were around and heard the name of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶), they spontaneously reformed their ways to the better. Mei-

11 Possibly this means amulet water.

12 This means the drawing of physically unseen amulets in empty space.

demons (hsieh-mei 邪魅) that were treated with [his] amulets did not again display [any wicked might] until the end of their days.¹³

In the eleventh year of the reign title hsien-t'ung (咸通 11; 870 A.D.) he set out to travel and finally reached Hao-chou (濠州),¹⁴ where he learnt that the governor Liu Fang (劉昉) suddenly had been struck by a wind and was about to die. Some famous physicians had already been called in but they could not cure the governor.

Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) entered with his travel stick [Hao-] chou (濠州) and said [to Liu Fang (劉昉)]: "[You] induced me to come here in order to make you come back again to life". Thereupon he wrote three amulets that he fastened on the top of the shoulder [of the governor], on his ribs and on a leg and said: "I force the wind to come forth from your feet. In three days [you] should be well again." Finally, the wind made a whizzing sound and came forth from the hollows of the feet of the governor. [The governor] recuperated after three days and was well as before.

Liu Fang (劉昉) was a very learned person. He was well familiar with literature and was generally dedicated to Taoist crafts (tao-shu 道術). He made an official career and attained the prefecture [as governor] where he exerted a good government that reached the common folks. He once said to his guests and attendants (18b): "in all my life, I took the Tao to be my teacher. Once a violent wind suddenly hit me and thereupon I experienced the impact of a saint (sheng-jen 聖人) who made use of some emblems (hsiang 相) to save and heal me."¹⁵ [The experience] that [a man like] Tung Feng (董奉) returns harmonised bun-souls (魂) to a man (shih 士), this really is something one has to wait for.¹⁶ In fact, this was a response due to the strength of Tao (dao-li 道力)". The people in the prefecture sensed that divine qualities were at hand in the person of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶). Liu Fang (劉昉) welcomed then Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉

13 This speaks about demons in the shape and with the face of humans.

14 This is a location in An-hui province.

15 This (hsiang 相) should refer to the amulets.

16 Here, Tung Feng (董奉) most certainly is a personal name that points to a Taoist healer who was a rather famous figure in Chiang-hsi province. He is said to have brought back to life some other high official, see TT 1248 San-tung ch'ün-hsien lu 4.5a-5b; TT 1139 San-tung chu-nang 1.18b-19a. Especially see, Ch'en Shu-yü (陳舜俞): Lu-shan chi (廬山記) 2.2a-2b, in: Pi-chi hsi-pien. Kuang-wen Comp. Taipei 1969. See F.C.Reiter: Der "Bericht über den Berg Lu (Lu-shan chi) von Ch'en Shun-yü, ein historiographischer Beitrag aus der Sung Zeit zum Kulturraum des Lu Shan, pp.117-119. München 1978.

千韶) at a fasting festivity (chai 齋) in the prefecture and expressed his wish to serve him as his teacher master. He gave him a lot of gold and brocade to express his thanks. Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶), however, speedily deserted Liu Fang (劉昉) and disappeared. A search for him was made but no traces [of the Taoist] could be found.

Later, in the regions of Ching and Hsiang (荊襄) some persons saw [him] when he talked laughing about the events in Hao-chou (豪州). It was evident that he was hiding away in the Western Mountains (hsi-shan 西山) for more than ten years. Among the people of today there are some persons who had eventually seen him". ***

Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) relies on the spiritual and perhaps even practical guidance of two Taoists of old, namely Wu Meng (吳猛) and Hsü Sun (許遜). He finds his motivation in their reputed successes, practices the abstention from cereals and breathing techniques (fu-ch'i 服氣).¹⁷ Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) must have been an advanced Taoist, which the apparition of a company of spirit administrators and guards seems to prove. They appeared as a divine response in honour of the Taoist success of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶). Perfected spirit officials with an entourage of warriors and emissaries entrusted him with the registers of divine martial forces that from now on would obey his commands. These spirit forces most likely were Thunder deities, because the Taoist started to achieve successes that in later times would have been identified with Thunder Magic. He also acquired a new personal quality and rank, which he outwardly wished to conceal and therefore he behaved like a lunatic. He could enter the mental and physical state of ecstasy, screaming, spitting and stampeding with his feet. In this way, he could procure magic responses in the cosmos. He could see what was going on in remote places far away, and so he dispatched rain, for example, to relieve a drought or fires in those places. Rain, fair weather, snow in winter, anything what was needed Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) knew how to handle the situation. He may show up barefooted and clad in ragged clothes, possibly with dishevelled hair, and perform rituals to improve the weather conditions.

17 This is pars pro toto for his self-cultivation. Wu Meng (吳猛) hailed from Yü-chang (豫章). He was an exorcist, who could subdue epidemics and had access to the world of the immortals, see Ch'en Kuo-fu: Tao-tsang yüan-liu k'ao, pp.461-462 (Kao-hsien chuan). Rpr.Taipei 1975. See F.C.Reiter: "Die Ausführungen Li Tao-yüans zur Geschichte und Geographie des Berges Lu (Chiang-hsi) im „Kommentar zum Wasserklassiker“, und ihre Bedeutung für die regionale Geschichtsschreibung", p. 20, in: Oriens Extremus 28/1 (1981). The canonical biography of the temporary Magistrate of Hsi-an, Wu Meng (西安令 吳猛), is TT 296 Li-shih chen-hsien t'ü-tao t'ung-chien 27, 1a-2b. At the age of forty he received the "divine recipes" (shen-fang 神方) of the perfected Ting I (丁義). He took as his teacher master the governor of Nan-hai (南海太守) Pao Ching (鮑暄), who passed on to him some unspecified "secret methods". During the period Huang-lung (吳黃龍, 229-232) "heaven revealed the White Cloud Amulets (pai-yün fu 白雲符)" that enabled him "to practice greatly his Taoist skills (tao-shu 道術)". Later (Chin 晉) "the Perfected Lord Hsü (許真君) joined him and received then his complete Taoist professional secrets (pi-yao 秘要)". The biography reports his magic and exorcist abilities. For example, Wu Meng (吳猛) stopped stormy winds with the application of his amulets. The geographic indication Western Mountains (西山) may allude to the mountains "west of the great Chiang", in this case the mountains west of Nan-ch'ang might be the actual point of reference (南昌西山). Also, see, J.M.Bolz: A Survey of Taoist Literature, Tenth to Seventeenth Centuries, pp. 70-72, concerning the two Taoists. Berkeley 1987.

In any case, he performed specific skills (tso-shu 作術) to achieve the desired results. The writing of amulets was one of his crafts. He used them to subdue demons in human shape and appearance. It is significant that his amulets were used to heal illness. The Taoist would offer such help without being asked for, and he was even mighty enough to save a person from the danger of imminent death.

Anyway, Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) was not a spectacular Taoist who would have enjoyed the attention of the social elite and the court. He rejected profane goods in return for spiritual help and preferred seclusion when he felt uncomfortable about public attention.

The biography mentions en passant an official Taoist fasting and purification chaiturgy (齋) at which the Taoist participates. All his other activities can be labelled magic or exorcist, and in fact, exactly this feature is very much in the focus of the biography. The text does not give any explanation or assessments. We observe that his magic and exorcist activities go with the installation of altars and offerings of incense. They are clearly structured religious acts. I find it most important that the exorcist actions of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) are based on heavenly documents (t'ien-shu 天書), which are the registers of martial spirit forces. It is also a characteristic feature of the historically later Taoist Thunder Magic to have such registers (lu 錄). We notice that descriptions of such ritual elements are contained in many biographies in the Taoist Canon. They are the standard assets of Taoist professional life. It is very much rewarding to study the canonical explanations and descriptions of the spiritual forces and the suitable ritual means, which characterize Taoist religious culture.

A first approach to Thunder Magic

Thunder Magic is an elusive term that covers a huge array of Taoist ritual practices. Most of them seem to serve exorcist purposes, and therefore they may not enjoy the broad scholarly attention that the standard repertoire of Heavenly Master Taoism receives.¹ Hagiographical and biographical sources show that the Taoist participation in social life implies much more than the mastery of the liturgy of great festivities that the terms chiao (醮) and chai (齋) identify.² Taoist priests traditionally operated as faith healers. They also were keen to lend their helping hands when droughts, floods and other unpleasant or disastrous events marred daily life. Taoists often seem to have used exorcist rituals to expulse malignant influences and their causes that people believed to be the influences of wicked demons.³

This situation is well documented in the history of the Taoist religion. I list just a few renowned sources that provide such information. There is, for example, the Scripture of the Great Peace (T'ai-p'ing ching 太平經) that is connected with the Taoist history in the second century of the Christian era.⁴ The later encyclopaedias San-tung chu-nang (三洞珠囊), Tao-tien lun (道典論) and Tao-chiao i-shu (道教義樞)⁵ list numerous entries that tell us how Taoists dealt

1 We have some remarkable Chinese studies, for example, the two monographs: Li Yüan-kuo (李遠國): Sben-hsiao lei-fa (神霄雷法). Chengdu 2003; and Liu Chung-yü (劉仲宇): Tao-chiao fa-shu (道教法術). Shanghai 2002. Also see L.Skar: "Administering Thunder: A thirteenth Century Memorial Deliberating the Thunder Rites", in: Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 9, pp.159-202 (1996-1997). And the same "Ritual Movements, Deity Cults, and the Transformation of Daoism in Song and Yuan Times", pp.413-463, in L.Kohn ed.: Daoism Handbook (Leiden 2000). A rough survey on Thunder Magic materials and related sources in the Taoist Canon gives K.Schipper and F.Verellen eds.: Companion, pp.1384-1386.

2 See M.R.Saso: Taoism and the Rite of Cosmic Renewal. Washington 1972. Also see K.Schipper: Le corps taoïste. Paris 1982, J.Lagerwey: Taoist Ritual in Chinese Society and History. New York 1987, R.Hymes: Way and Byway, Taoism, Local Religion, and Models of Divinity in Sung and Modern China. Berkeley 2002; and F.C.Reiter: Religionen in China, Geschichte, Alltag, Kultur. München 2002.

3 F.C.Reiter: Der Perlenbeutel aus den Drei Höhlen (San-tung chu-nang), Arbeitsmaterialien zum Taoismus der frühen T'ang Zeit, p.9 sq. („Hilfe und Führung“). AF 112.

4 K.Schipper: "Taiping jing", pp.277-280, in: Companion. See B.Hendrischke: The Scripture on Great Peace, The Taiping jing and the Beginnings of Daoism. Berkeley 2006.

5 See note 3, and see F. C. Reiter, pp.440-441; H.-H. Schmidt, pp.445-446, 442, in: Companion. See F.C. Reiter: Kategorien und Realien im Shang-ch'ing Taoismus (Shang-ch'ing tao lei-shih hsiang), Arbeitsmaterialien zum Taoismus der frühen T'ang Zeit. in: AF 119; Wang Zongyu (王宗昱): Daojiao yishu yanjiu (道教義樞研究). Shanghai 2001.

A first approach to Thunder Magic

Thunder Magic is an elusive term that covers a huge array of Taoist ritual practices. Most of them seem to serve exorcist purposes, and therefore they may not enjoy the broad scholarly attention that the standard repertoire of Heavenly Master Taoism receives.¹ Hagiographical and biographical sources show that the Taoist participation in social life implies much more than the mastery of the liturgy of great festivities that the terms chiao (醮) and chai (齋) identify.² Taoist priests traditionally operated as faith healers. They also were keen to lend their helping hands when droughts, floods and other unpleasant or disastrous events marred daily life. Taoists often seem to have used exorcist rituals to expulse malignant influences and their causes that people believed to be the influences of wicked demons.³

This situation is well documented in the history of the Taoist religion. I list just a few renowned sources that provide such information. There is, for example, the Scripture of the Great Peace (T'ai-p'ing ching 太平經) that is connected with the Taoist history in the second century of the Christian era.⁴ The later encyclopaedias San-tung chu-nang (三洞珠囊), Tao-tien lun (道典論) and Tao-chiao i-shu (道教義樞)⁵ list numerous entries that tell us how Taoists dealt

- 1 We have some remarkable Chinese studies, for example, the two monographs: Li Yüan-kuo (李遠國): Sben-biao lei-fa (神霄雷法). Chengdu 2003; and Liu Chung-yü (劉仲宇): Tao-chiao fa-shu (道教法術). Shanghai 2002. Also see L.Skar: "Administering Thunder: A thirteenth Century Memorial Deliberating the Thunder Rites", in: Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 9, pp.159-202 (1996-1997). And the same "Ritual Movements, Deity Cults, and the Transformation of Daoism in Song and Yuan Times", pp.413-463, in L.Kohn ed.: Daoism Handbook (Leiden 2000). A rough survey on Thunder Magic materials and related sources in the Taoist Canon gives K.Schipper and F.Verellen eds.: Companion, pp.1384-1386.
- 2 See M.R.Saso: Taoism and the Rite of Cosmic Renewal. Washington 1972. Also see K.Schipper: Le corps taoïste. Paris 1982, J.Lagerwey: Taoist Ritual in Chinese Society and History. New York 1987, R.Hymes: Way and Byway, Taoism, Local Religion, and Models of Divinity in Sung and Modern China. Berkeley 2002; and F.C.Reiter: Religionen in China, Geschichte, Alltag, Kultur. München 2002.
- 3 F.C.Reiter: Der Perlenbeutel aus den Drei Höhlen (San-tung chu-nang), Arbeitsmaterialien zum Taoismus der frühen T'ang Zeit, p.9 sq. („Hilfe und Führung“). AF 112.
- 4 K.Schipper: "Taiping jing", pp.277-280, in: Companion. See B.Hendrischke: The Scripture on Great Peace, The Taiping Jing and the Beginnings of Daoism. Berkeley 2006.
- 5 See note 3, and see F. C. Reiter, pp.440-441; H.-H. Schmidt, pp.445-446, 442, in: Companion. See F.C. Reiter: Kategorien und Realien im Shang-ch'ing Taoismus (Shang-ch'ing tao lei-shih hsiang), Arbeitsmaterialien zum Taoismus der frühen T'ang Zeit. in: AF 119; Wang Zongyu (王宗昱): Daojiao yishu yanjiu (道教義樞研究). Shanghai 2001.

with the spirit world, mostly quoting scriptures dating from the Nan-pei ch'ao (南北朝) period.

In the Northern Sung Period during the reign of emperor Sung Hui-tsung (宋徽宗 rg.1100-1126) a welter of old concepts and practices came to be assembled under the name of Thunder Magic (wu-lei fa 五雷法). Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿 1093-1153) effectively managed to perform Thunder rites and enthralled the emperor with his obvious successes that were believed to result from his ritual expertise. The Taoist eliminated fox spirits and at one time enforced good weather conditions for state rituals. Wang Wen-ch'ing's (王文卿) ritual efforts are documented in his canonical biography and in A Corpus of Taoist Ritual (Tao-fa hui-yüan 道法會元) of the 14th century.⁶

This literary collection contains quite a number of texts from the School of Pure Subtlety (Ch'ing-wei 清微) that from the 13th century onwards continued and extended the traditions of Sung Thunder Magic. It is well known that a remarkable number of canonical texts are either directly connected with Thunder Magic or can be associated with the concepts of Thunder Magic.⁷ Very long periods of Taoist history and activities elapsed until the 12th century when literary and rather comprehensive efforts were made to assemble and formulate what could be said about Thunder Magic. Many of these materials are hard to date, even if we can place them within the frame of about two hundred years, which means from the 12th to the 14th centuries. The exact date of origin of quite a few tracts on Thunder Magic in A Corpus of Taoist Ritual remains uncertain.

We have some texts in A Corpus of Taoist Ritual that explicitly indicate Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) to be the author, and I accept this information as long as textual evidence does not contradict the attribution. Studying these texts, I describe some basic features and specific activities. They all are closely interwoven and reveal the conditions and workings of Thunder Magic.

6 K.Schipper and Yuan Bingling, pp.1105-1113, in: Companion. P. van der Loon: "A Taoist Collection of the Fourteenth Century", pp. 401-405, in: W.Bauer ed.: Studia Sino-Mongolica, MOS 25. F.C.Reiter: "A Preliminary Study of the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing (1093-1153) and his Thunder Magic (lei-fa)", in: Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft (henceforth ZDMG), 152, pp.155-184. And the same, "The Discourse on the Thunders 雷說, by the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing 王文卿 (1093-1153)", in: Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society (henceforth JRAS), 14/3, pp.207-229.

7 Compare Companion pp.1384-1385. See F.C.Reiter: Grundlemente und Tendenzen des religiösen Taoismus, das Spannungsverhältnis von Integration und Individualität in seiner Geschichte zur Chin-, Yüan- und frühen Ming-Zeit, pp.42-55 (concerning Qingwei 清微), in: MOS 48.

The Taoist patriarch Chang Yü-ch'ü (張宇初 1361-1410) acted on imperial orders in 1406 when he started to recompile the Taoist Canon after its destruction under Mongol rule in the 13th century. He classified Thunder Magic rituals as minor rituals (hsiao-fa 小法), which seems to be a belittling qualification. This assessment does in fact not say anything about the religious and spiritual standards of such minor rituals which I have shown somewhere else.⁸ In the book Basic Conditions of Taoist Thunder Magic, I present texts that reveal the religious and spiritual quality of Thunder Magic. I consider various practical aspects, completely basing myself on canonical sources that we can associate with or even attribute to Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿). I present information to show that such minor rituals actually comprise the whole range of well-established Taoist notions and practices. They are demanding as far as the religious and personal standing of the performing priest is concerned, which again Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) perfectly exemplified.

Human Nature and Thunder Magic

Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) presents a fair number of theoretic expositions that elucidate basic and ritual actions of Thunder Magic. Many of these texts are didactic expositions and pointedly explain rather specific themes. The answers that Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) gives his students are to the point, and yet, they should not be understood as the final solutions to the questions that originally were raised. We certainly miss the oral and secret instructions of the Taoist that he may have passed on to his advanced disciples. However, his answers are always conclusive and therefore we have a good chance to collect a lot of information that should help us understand the basics of Thunder Magic. I start out enquiring about the practical concerns and activities of a Thunder specialist.

The Thunder specialist is a Taoist priest (tao-shih 道士) who performs exorcist crafts. He summons individual divine forces in order to employ them for ritual purposes. He first addresses divine and transcendent entities that are not at all beyond the confines of his own human body. We know that the Taoists developed and fostered specific convictions concerning the divine nature of the human being, or to be more precise, of "the self" (tzu-chi 自己). This conviction is the absolute basis for any ritual activity, which is easy to illustrate. We find, for example, in the following short essay the explicit identification of the individual self of the priest with the Divine Norm (ling-far 靈法) of Thunder Magic.⁹

8 F.C.Reiter: "The Management of Nature: Convictions and Means in Daoist Thunder Magic (Daojiao leifa)", pp.193-210, in F.C.Reiter ed.: Purposes, Means and Convictions in Daoism, A Berlin Symposium, in: AAS 29; and see my Grundelemente und Tendenzen des religiösen Taoismus, pp.11-35; 132-139, in MOS 48.

The Secret Instructions Concerning the Thunder Rituals (lei-far pi-chi 雷法秘旨) (2b) explain: the self is the Divine Norm (ling-far 靈法). As to the divine self (ling-woo 靈我), if it is not divine, what [else then] could unite with the thunder divinities (lei-sheen 雷神)? I (wo 我) am capable to excite [them] in a good way, and the thunder divinities respond in a good way. One appeal to [the thunder divinities] has one response, and thus absolutely everything is settled. When there is a [right] mind [at work], it can appeal to the divinities. When the divinities turn away and do not respond, the appeal was done without a proper mind. The response [of the divinities] is like an echo, and just for nothing, there is also no response at all. You must not have any erratic thoughts. The completely true mind (i-p'ien chen-bsin 一片真心) must be completely free.¹⁰ [In this way] the mind and the thunder divinities intermingle and are just like one united entity. In this way, I am the thunder divinity, and the thunder divinity is I. All the [divine] responses are concurrent with me. There is no response that would not occur, (3a) [for example], sympathy, compassion, profit and help. Above, I unite with the heart of heaven (t'ien-bsin 天心).¹¹ My love for the living beings is my virtue, and it is for this reason that heaven certainly does not disregard me. Thunders receive respectfully the heavenly orders. How could they disregard me?¹²

9 TT 1220: 77.2b-3a. See TT 1220: 84.8b, referring to the encounter of Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) with his teacher master (see below) and the transmission of the title (lei-fa pi-chi 雷法秘旨). However, we cannot prove the identity of the extant texts in consideration and the allegedly transmitted text.

10 "free" or "unknowing".

11 Compare TT 1220: 56.4b, see below the translation of chapter 56. For this term see, P. Andersen: "The Practice of Bugang", in Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 5, p.28 (1989-1990).

12 The text Tao-miao (道妙; TT 1220: 84.2a-5b) extends this notion by identifying the "self" (wo 我) with the ancestral breaths (ch'i che sheng-i chih tsu 氣者生一之) and also with heaven (t'ien 天) implying all its potentials (p.3b). It is clear that the tract is written ages after the time of Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿). Also compare TT 1015 Chin-so liu-chu yin 5.1a-1b (t'ai-hsüan yüan-ch'i suo-sheng san-yüan yin 太玄元氣所生三元引), with a definition of the spiritual force (shen 神), which surfaces in the practices and convictions of Thunder Magic. For this text is attributed to Li Ch'un-feng (李淳風, 602-670), see

The subsequent explanation concerning this text says that the Fire Master, the perfect [teacher master] Wang (汪),¹³ personally transmitted it to Shih-ch'en, Wang Wen-ching (侍宸, 王文卿). This statement intends to show that the text itself was a secret transmission in the school of Thunder Magic (lei-t'ing chih pi-ch'uan 雷霆之秘傳).

The text Secret Instructions Concerning the Thunder Rituals (lei-fa pi-chih 雷法秘旨) brings us to consider the very nature of the relationship between the acting priest and the cosmic or absolute divine being that adopts the apparitions and potentials of Thunder deities. "The [Thunder] emissary, this is just me. I am the one who is the emissary and I shall act it out until the end of my life", says the theoretical tract Mysteries of Tao (tao-miao 道妙).¹⁴ Obviously, there is an osmotic relationship or even a special unity between man and the divine that Thunder deities identify.

We generally observe the Taoist inclination to think in terms of a grand unity, which surfaces in the chronologies of Taoist schools and affiliations. I remind of the hagiography of the Ch'ing-wei (清微) School (Ch'ing-wei hsien-p'u 清微仙譜) or the hagiographies of the Ch'üan-chen (全真) School (Chin-lien cheng-tsung-chi 金蓮正宗記 / Chin-lien cheng-tsung hsien-yüan hsiang-chuan 金蓮正宗仙源像傳).¹⁵ The hagiographies of T'ai-shang Lao-chün (太上老君) show this divinity to be the unifying body of the universe and the moving power of creation. T'ai-shang Lao-chün (太上老君) is the leading expression of that general Taoist notion.¹⁶ We certainly understand that scriptures and rituals

P.Andersen, in: Companion pp.1076- 1079.

13 TT 1220: 76.3a indicates the taboo name Tzu-hua (子華), the tzu-name Shih-mei (時美). See TT 1220: 83.1a, which is a later tradition. It says that the taboo name is Shou-chen (守真 "Guarding Perfection").

14 TT 1220: 84.4b-5a., and see below.

15 Concerning TT 171; 173; 174, see F.C.Reiter, pp. 1100, 1135-1136, 1136-1137, in: Companion. Also see F.C.Reiter: Grundlelemente und Tendenzen des religiösen Taoismus, pp.42-76.

16 See A.K.Scidel: La divinisation de Lao Tseu dans le taoïsme des Han, p. 84 sq., 92 sq. (Paris 1969). F.C.Reiter trl. ed.: Leben und Wirken Lao-Tzu's in Schrift und Bild (Lao-chün pa-shih-i hua t'u-shuo), pp.21-239 (Würzburg 1990). Also see, for example, TT 1220: 84.6a, explaining that the three "venerable divinities" of the Three Caves (san-tung 三洞) are to be identified with primordial forms of breath and the same time with the individual names of Thunder deities. "In fact, the three deities are in basically one deity, and the one entity is three deities" (san-shen pen i-shen i-t' i san-shen shih yeh 三神本一神一體三神是也). The statement also ascertains that Thunder Magic is a firm part of the established Taoism of the Heavenly Master (cheng-i tao 正一道 / t'ien-shih tao 天師道).

mirror this religious conviction of a cosmic unity of man and the divine, which Thunder Magic rituals set to use.

When we focus our study on Thunder Magic we find several tracts by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) that explain selected constituents of Thunder rituals. He also makes some statements about the spiritual conditions of the human nature that matter for any ritual performance. We come to understand the actual scope of the ritual profession in terms of intellectual and practical efforts.

Our first and most basic question that we formulate may refer to the individual standard and the quality of the Taoist. How does he summon and dispatch the divine forces that exist within his own human body and let them serve ritual purposes?

This sort of question came to the mind of the disciples of Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) who worked out appropriate texts to feature the conditions of Thunder Magic and in this way presented conclusive answers. We are fortunate to have the didactic collection Wang Shib-ch'en ch'i-tao pa-tuan chin (王侍宸祈禱八段錦). His otherwise unknown disciple Yüan Wu-chieh (袁無介) formulates a number of interesting questions. For example, the paragraph "Summoning and Uniting" begins with a question that Yüan Wu-chieh (袁無介) sets forth. Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) gives his explanation, and another unknown person with the name Yü-feng (御風) contributes additional commentaries.

Summoning and Uniting [the Thunder Divinities] (chao-ho 召合)¹⁷

Yüan Wu-chieh (袁無介) sets forth his question about the so-called summoning and uniting. He wishes to learn about the essential points of summoning and uniting.

[Wang] Shih-ch'en ([王]侍宸) says: The people of today, the gentlemen who practice Taoism only know that the general of the heart (hsin-chiang 心將) comes out of the heart, the general of the liver (kan-chiang 肝將) comes out of the liver and the general of the kidneys (shen-chiang 腎將) comes out of the kidneys. Any summoning and uniting that is done in this way, is not in accord with the right principles (cheng-li 正理). How does it come that people do not know that metal, wood, water, fire and earth, the generals of the five intestines all emerge from earth (t'u 土)? Earth is the leading force (chu 主) of the five elements (wu-hsing 五行), and the spleen (p'i 脾) belongs [to earth].¹⁸

The commentary by Yü-feng (御風) says: the theory of summoning and uniting relies on the spells (chou-yü 咒語) in rituals that are used to call out the summons. At the time of a union [with the divine], you first summon [the divinity]. When [the divinity] has arrived you inhale as to lead [the divinity] into the central palace (chung-kung 中宮) to realize the union.

As a case in point, (5b) Marshal Teng (鄧帥) belongs to [the element] fire and returns to the heart (hsin 心).

17 TT 1220: 69.5a-11a. Compare TT 1220: 124.2b-3a Chao-ho pi-fa (召合秘法), see F.C.Reiter: "A Preliminary Study of the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing (1093-1153) and his Thunder Magic (lei-fu)". In: ZDMG 152, p.172-173, note 54; p.179, note 82, cf. TT 1220: 85.7a-7b. The gist of this paragraph has been transmitted in later traditions, see TT 1220: 83.3a-3b Chao-he hsüan-chi (召合玄機). This text features the self-identification with the divinity T'ien-mu (天母). See TT 1220: 85.14a-18b (T'ien-mu 天母/Pei-tou chih mu 北斗之母). Ch. 83.2a-3a gives a grand description of the divine signs of the Heavenly Mother Mo-li-chih-t'ien ta-sheng (摩利支天大聖) who is Mārīci, a deity that unites Brahmanic mythology with Chinese Buddhist and Taoist notions, see W.E.Soothill and L. Hodous: A Dictionary of Chinese Buddhist Terms, p.435a. Rpr. Taipei 1972. TT 1220: 83.6a-6b (lien-fa 鍊法) shows how the internal and spiritual self-identification with and self-deification as Heavenly Mother is achieved in preparation for some Thunder rituals.

18 It literally says: "the repository/intestine spleen". See TT 1250 Ch'ung-hsi t'ung-miao Shib-ch'en Wang hsien-sheng chia-bua 5b, for the identification of the element "earth" as a spirit emissary ("The Will") and the "Comprehensively Inspecting Astral Agent of the Great Dipper". See below, TT 1220: 69.8a "the Divinity of the Will" (i-shen 意神).

Marshal Hsin (辛帥) belongs to [the element] wood and returns to the liver.¹⁹

The emissaries (shih-che 使者) belong to [the element] earth and return to the ancestral palace (tsu-kung 祖宮)²⁰ to realize the union.

[The divinity Chao] Hsüan-t'an (趙玄壇) belongs to the heart,²¹ and the Magic Agent Ma (馬靈官) belongs to the heart.

Marshal Wen (溫帥) belongs to [the trigram] chen 震. He returns to the liver and passes through (li 歷) the gall. The Magic Agent Wang (王靈官) belongs to the heart.²² Each of [the emissaries] follows the own [super ordinate] marshal and belongs to [one of] the five intestines.

19 Concerning these two names see, for example, TT 1220: 82. 28a: Lei-t'ing san-shuai hsin-lu, shih-hsi, shih-shih (雷霆三帥心錄世系事實). For an adaptation of astral realities to the human internal spheres, see e.g. TT 1220: 82. 18a-18b. Here we find the comparison of the heart of man with its seven holes and the Northern Dipper (seven stars). Also see Li Yüan-kuo: "Tao-chiao lei-fa jen-ko k'ao". In: Shih-chieh tsung-chiao yen-chiu 2002, 3, p. 95 (jen-shen hsiao t'ien-ti 人身小天地). Especially see p. 96. See, Liu Chung-yü: Tao-chiao fa-shu, p. 84 (i-shen wei i hsiao yü-chou 一身為一小宇宙); and also see F.C.Reiter: "The Discourse on the Thunders, by the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing (1093-1153), in: JRAS 14/3, pp.210., 224-225 (2004). Compare TT 1220: 81.1a-16.

20 "ancestral palace" most likely stands for the "central palace".

21 This is Chao Kung-ming (趙公明), a famous name in the Taoist history of the divine, see TT 1476 Son-shen chi 4.10a-11b. The title is Chao Yüan-shuai (趙元帥); abbreviating Cheng-i hsüan-t'an yüan-shuai (正一玄壇元帥). He is said to have avoided the Ch'in (秦) administration and retired to the mountains. See in this book Chapter II, concerning the Altar of Earth Thunder. As to TT 1476, see J.Lévi/F.Verellen, pp.897-989, in: Companion. The name of the divinity appears in many Taoist sources. See, for example, TT 1016 Chen-kao 10.17b which shows him to be a divinity of the five directions. Consequently see TT 1220: 135.19b (Wu-fang tu-mo shih che Chao Kung-ming 五方都魔使者趙公明). The name Chao Kung-ming meanders through Taoist sources of any epoch. Concerning TT 1016, see I.Robinet, pp.198-200, in: Companion. This is an example for the age of the tradition and the vast diffusion of the divine names in our texts. I do not intend to document all these names.

22 Concerning Wang, see F.C.Reiter: "Some Notices on the Magic Agent Wang (Wang ling-kuan) at Mt. Ch'ü-ch'ü in Tzu-t'ung District, Szechwan Province". In: ZDMG 148, 323-342 (1998). TT 1221 Shang-ch'ing ling-pao tu-fa 7.8a-9a offers a cosmic set of 81 Magic Agents, as part of a tradition of 81 amulets. The Agent poses in a prominent position (chu-shuai 主帥). He is second only to the perfected man and spirit patron (chu-fa 主法) Sa Shou-chien (薩守堅), in accordance with the ritual instructions Lei-t'ing san-wu huo-chü ling-kuan Wang yüan-shuai pi-fa (雷霆三五火車靈官王元帥秘法), in TT 1220: 241.1a-15b, and see ch. 242 and ch. 243 of TT 1220: 86.7a the deity has the title Hsien-t'ien san-wu huo-chü ling-kuan Wang Shan (先天三五火車靈官王善). In the same chapter (TT 1220) on p.7b we find the already familiar (see above note 21)

When you speak the spells by heart (nien-chou 念咒) to summon and unite [with the divinities], they first return to the respective intestine and enter then the central palace. [The orifices] above and below are blocked and they do not allow [divinities] to enter and take lodge. You use the nostrils to exhale noisily, or perhaps you use the sword-mudrâ (chien-chüeh 劍訣)²³ to lead them on to come forth. In front of the altar you can dispatch [the divinities] according to your will and purpose. The rituals of all grades definitely require to unite with and refine [the spiritual forces], or to refine them in meditation and visualizing them when they are present and the inside and the outside unite. You exert your mind and activate the meditation. What follows then are responses that come up like echoes.

The [element] earth is the head of the five elements. Earth lets the essences and the breaths circulate and thoroughly flow through the bones and the nine orifices.

The spleen (p'î 脾) is yin-earth (陰土). The stomach is yang-earth (陽土). The spleen digests the five cereals and connects them to become eminent blossoms (ying-hua 英華) that nourish the body.²⁴

The stomach (wei 胃) is the belly of the human body where all the strings are tightly bundled. It is for this reason (6a) that [the stomach] plays the leading part among the five intestines.

As to the character One (一) of the [character] centre (chung 中), there is a One (yi 一) [stroke] at the four sides, and the very centre of [the character] mouth (k'ou 口) shows yet another yi (一) that is set up in the vertical direction, emerging and reaching upwards. This is called, the divine radiance (shen-kuang 神光) rushes towards heaven. Protruding but reaching downwards, [the stroke yi 一] is said to be the divine radiance that opposes earth. Now, this means, "the four sides encircle the ultimate". Concerning the character One (一) of the [character] palace (kung 宮) that is above or on top of the [character], the One (yi

Lei-fu fa hsieh-wu chu-wei hsüan-t'an Chao Lang (雷府伐邪巫朱焯玄壇趙朗) who has a military capacity. Here we also find, for example, Wen Ch'üeng (溫瓊/溫帥). This late tradition (Hsien-t'ien lei-ching yin-shu 先天雷晶隱書) uses the fundamental concept of Anterior Heaven to lay a claim to names that we usually are inclined to combine with the notion of Posterior Heaven. Obviously, there are no exclusive categories.

23 See H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary. Nr.3225, p.395b. (Rpr. Taipei 1972).

24 Compare TT 432 Huang-t'ing nei-chang wu-tsang liu-fu pu-hsieh t'u 13a-14a, also speaking about the stomach. For this text (the preface is dated 848), see J.Lévi, in: Companion, pp. 348-349.

一) turns out to be the cover. The upper [character] mouth (口) is the tripod vessel (鼎 器) that keeps its orifice empty as to store inside the substance of the subtle shining of pure gold that is the ancestral breath (tsu-ch' i 祖 氣).

The one lower [character] mouth (口) [of the character kung (宮)] is the square stove that puts in order and accomplishes the tripod vessel. Its upper part is round and resembles heaven. Its lower part is square and resembles earth. Heaven is ch'ien (乾), and the earth is k'un (坤). This is called the orifice of the heavenly female (hsüan-p' in 玄 牝). [The word] heavenly (hsüan 玄) has the meaning of black and heaven. [The word] female (牝) has the meaning of yellow and earth.²⁵ Earth is the caldron (fu 釜), and the caldron is the valley. The valley is an empty vessel that holds inside the original breath (yüan-ch' i 元 氣)²⁶ and collects the essences and the spiritual forces. They are aroused by thunders and thunderclaps. They are fertilized by wind and rain.²⁷ Just everything is contained herein.

[Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) continues saying:] The elixir classics (tan-ching 丹經) say: "When the one yang (一 陽) agitated for the first time, where did the agitation occur? When the black crow soared up, from which spot did it arise?"²⁸

(6b) Now, it all came from the point of agitation of the one spark, which was the time of the absolute beginning of the greatest ultimate (t'ai-chi 太 極). When that one spark had not yet agitated, my own body and the breaths of heaven and earth mutually were the inside and the outside.

The commentary by Yü-feng (御 風) says: The one (一) is yang (陽); and the one is pure ch'ien (ch'un-ch'ien 純 乾). Ch'ien (乾) is the perfect yang (chen-yang 真 陽). Yang gives birth to offsprings (tsu 子). At the very beginning, the one yang is 25 Compare the explanation of the term hsüan-p' in (玄 牝) in the Ho-shang kung (河 上 公) commentary TT 682 Tao-te chen-ching chu 1.5a (ch'eng-hsiang 6/ku-shen pu ssu 成 象 / 谷 神 不 死), which may suggest that Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) carried on a certain line of tradition. A good example for the grossly diverging interpretation of the heavenly or mysterious female as the absolute essential basis that is beyond any wording, gives, for example, TT 263 Hsiu-chen shih-shu tsa-chu chih-hsüan p'ien 5.4a-4b; and ch.9.3a (Chin-tan ta-ch'eng chi/Hsüan-p' in t'u 金 丹 大 成 集 玄 牝 圖).

26 See TT 1250: 14a, the original breath is a bodily reality.

27 Chou-i 周 易 17, hsi-tz'u hsia 繫 辭 下 1, p.2. See, The I Ching or Book of Changes, the Richard Wilhelm Translation rendered into English, by C.F.Baynes. New York 1967. (Henceforth: Book of Changes). See, pp. 283, 284 where the word "lightning" is used instead of "thunderclap". Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) reverses the sequence of the phrases in the I-ching (易 經).

28 The black crow represents the sun.

most enduring and sound. There is just nothing that is mixed up with it. [The one yang] is entrusted to the womb at the centre of k' an (坎).²⁹ When the human being comes to life for the first time, the one yang (陽) had first been agitated. When father and mother wed their essences, then it is that heaven and the one (t' ien-i 天一)³⁰ give birth to water, and so it is that [the element] fire is born within water. The fire is yang. When yang agitates, then it is that the very being streams [forth] (hsing-liu 性流) to the female creatures (p' in-wu 牝物) that manifest their being. They definitely come to life due to heaven and the one. Water is goodness (jen 仁). Goodness means, "to be ripe" (shih 碩). The inside of a fruit produces a kernel, and what is stored inside the kernel, this is the goodness. Goodness, this is the perfect water (chen-shui 真水), and water was brought to life by heaven and the one (t' ien-i 天一). When [this] agitation (tung 動) occurs, the yang-breath (yang-ch' i 陽氣) ascends and rising up forms high above the blissful clouds (ch' ing-yün 慶雲) that open the door of life (sheng-men 生門) and let auspicious vapours flow down to block the window of death (ssu-hu 死戶). Such utmost subtle, such utmost mysterious (7a) principles they are! High above there is the bent chiang-river (江). See the moonflower that is flourishing and pure, and there is the black crow that soars high above. This is something that genuinely belongs to everybody. When amidst great tranquillity a [specific] sensation (hsiao-hsi 消息) arises, the one spark (i-t' ian 一點) [of agitation] comes forth, issuing from where the Anterior Heaven (hsien-t' ien 先天) has not yet started to bud. You must know the utmost beginning when father and mother had not yet come to life. There was the situation that the one yang (陽) first agitated. At that time when all creatures had not yet come to life, they were without the resources to grasp life. It is no wonder that the bodies received for the first time their vital breaths due to the initiating power of heaven (t' ien-chi 天機)³¹ that completely leaked out. These words say it all.

29 This refers to the trigram k' an that has one yang-stroke in its very centre; see Book of Changes, p.114 (hexagram k' an, The Abyssal/Water).

30 TT 1250: 11a, for the combination of t' ien-i (天一) with the element "water" and the gall-[department], see below. TT 1250: 11a-11b, gives the context of an internal practice, which is part of the process of creation that is spiritually realised within the human body.

31 TT 1250 Ch' ung-hsiu t' ung-miao Shih-ch' en Wang hsien-sheng chia-hua 7b-8a, for a definition and description of the "heavenly initiating (or moving) power" (t' ien-chi 天機) in terms of cyclic astronomic processes during the year, involving the 28 stellar mansions, the 24 phases of the breaths and the stimulation of the 36 shining elements. TT 1250: 6a shows how the "moving power" can be manipulated following to the application of appropriate amulets.

[Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) continues saying:] The spleen (p'í 脾) is [called] Furnace Crescent Moon (yen-yüeh lu 偃月爐).³² Its outer shape shows two horns (chiao 角) that are sharp and hang down. At the one spark of the first agitation, the two horns bend upwards. Between the two horns, there is one orifice, which has the size of a black corn of millet. When the one orifice is about to open, the time has come for the internal practice [of self-cultivation] (hsing-ch'ih 行持). You visualize befittingly the one spark of golden radiance that comes forth from the cave [that resembles] a black corn of millet.

In case that you summon the general of the kidneys, it is necessary that this one spark of gold radiance be properly attached to the kidneys. In case that you summon the generals of the heart and the gall, you should concentrate (ts'un 存) on this one spark and attach it to the heart and the gall. The accompanying [spiritual] forces can then be deployed (yun-hua 運化) when that [procedure is complete]. (7b) [The ritual of] summoning and uniting works just like that, and there will never be any failure.

The commentary by Yü-feng (御風) says: The spleen is the Furnace Crescent Moon that [resembles] an iron sickle. The head is big and the tail is sharp, being long five ts'un (寸). It is also called the Perfect Earth of the Five Directions. The spleen is tightly connected with the heart. The orifices of the heart irrigate the eyes and the eyebrows, and they irrigate [the element] earth of the spleen. All the ritual officers³³ who summon and dispatch the [Thunder] generals keep their two eyes looking upwards, and they force the two eyebrows to bend upwards. A sustaining force is thus raised high above across the heaven. Then it is that the heavenly orifices (hsüan-ch'iao 玄竅) issue spontaneously the apparition of a divine radiance, which supports heaven. The thunder divinities (lei-shen 雷神) can hardly afford not to respond. The ancestral breaths (tsu-ch'í 32 TT 1220: 69.25a, connecting the spirit force of the spleen (p'í-shen 脾神) with the will (i 意), the element earth (t'u 土) and the numbers five and ten. However, the image of the furnace does not appear again. TT 1402 Shang-ch'ing huang-t'ing wu-tsang liu-fu chen-jen yü-chou ching 6b-8a compares the spleen with an "overturned bowl". For this T'ang-Text see J. Lévi, in Companion pp.350-351. For a Furnace Crescent Moon" (yen-yüeh chih lu 偃月之爐) serving as a metaphor for the area of internal refinement being compared with the Tripod of Red Cinnabar (chu-sha chih ting 朱砂之鼎), see TT 263 Hsiu-ch'en shih-shu tsa-chu chih-hsüan p'ien 6.2b; also see ch.9,2b (i'ien-hsin t'u 天心圖). See TT 263 Hsiu-ch'en shih-shu wu-ch'en p'ien 26.7a, which shows a drawing of a Furnace Crescent Moon, which may suffice here as documentation.

33 Fa-kuan (法官) should refer to the acting priest (tao-shih). TT 1250: 13b has the combined term "ritual officers and Taoist priests" (fa-kuan tao-shih 法官道士) which in this case, however, should not point to persons of different rank and professional quality.

祖氣), however, are the golden radiance of the Anterior Heaven (hsien-t'ien 先天) that shines brightly and since antiquity was never extinguished. The Tu-jen ching says: "It was in the middle of the void heaven that [Yüan-shih (元始)] suspended one precious pearl as small as one grain of millet. It was separated five chang (丈) from the earth."³⁴ Earth belongs to the trigram li (li-kua 離卦). This trigram has three strokes. Two strokes, the upper one and the lower one are ch'ien (乾) and metal (chin 金). In the middle between the two strokes, there is k'un (坤). K'un is the earth (ti 地), and the earth (8a) is yin-earth (yin-t'u 陰土). [The element] earth (土) constitutes the earth (ti 地). Moving away from it five ts'un you touch the very centre (chung-huang 中黃). The upper orifices of the eight poles are ch'ien (乾) and the yellow of heaven (t'ien-huang 天黃). The yellow of heaven is exactly [identical with] the mysterious yellow (hsüan-huang 玄黃). The lower orifices are the earth and the yellow of the earth (ti-huang 地黃). Yellow, that is the yellow court (huang-t'ing 黃庭). The yellow court is a room (wu 屋) and its base does not move (tung 動). The three orifices of its right side [correspond with the trigrams] chen, k'an and ken (震坎艮), which are the three males (nan 男). The three orifices of its left side [correspond with the trigrams] sun, li and tui (巽離兌), which are the three females (nü 女). Ch'ien (乾) and k'un (坤) together give birth to six children. The six children circulate and move on day and night without any pause. The movements of the heavenly bodies are strong by themselves and go on without any pause. Humans and quadrupeds all possess [internally] this most subtle principle. As soon as the eyes, the ears, the mouth, the hands and feet rise and act, these orifices also move. The [related] subtle mysteries are subject to oral transmissions (ke'ou ch'uan 口傳). Only the quadrupeds carry their heart in a horizontal position, and therefore they are born as domestic animals. Birds, however, do not have these orifices. There are some most subtle oral instructions, and the mysteries refer to the heart. Keep them for you as a secret, keep them secret!

34 See TT 147 Ling-pao wu-liang tu-jen shang-p'in miao-ching fu-t'u 1.6b. See TT 1250: 4b, which correlates the Anterior Heaven with the Original Spiritual Force and the Prime Origin that "nowadays are venerated" (yüan-shen 元神 / yüan-shih 元始). For a Thunder ritual that completely is dedicated to the Anterior Heaven and its unified breaths, see TT 1220: 90 (Hsien-t'ien i-ch'ü lei-fa 先天一氣雷法) that incorporates the famous Song of the Heavenly Pearl by Wang Wen-ch'ing: Shih-ch'en hsüan-chu ke 侍宸玄珠歌; 90.15b-16b). Compare L.Skar: "Administering Thunder: A thirteenth Century Memorial Deliberating the Thunder Rites", in: Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 9, pp.159-202 (1996-1997). The Anterior Heaven matches the Anterior Earth (hsien-ti 先地) in Hsüan-chu ke (玄珠歌) by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿), see TT 1220: 70.4b. Also see, for example, TT 1221 Shang-ch'ing ling-pao ta-fa 40.19b (Pi-lo k'ung-ko fu 碧落空歌符), for the self-identification or self-divinisation of the acting priest with Yüan-shih [t'ien-tsun] (元始天尊). For the song Pi-lo k'ung-ko (碧落空歌) and the appropriate chart, see TT 147 Ling-pao wu-liang tu-jen shang-p'in miao-ching fu-t'u 1.3a-3b (the preface was done by Sung Hui-tsung 宋徽宗). Compare J.Lagerwey, in: Companion pp.1084-1085.

In case that you summon the [spirit] emissaries, you take the divinity of the will (i-shen 意神) to be the leading force that is lien-chen (康貞)³⁵ which is the internal kang (罍) –star. [The star] becomes apparent due to its (8b) golden radiance.

In case that you summon Marshal Teng (Teng shuai 鄧帥), you take the heart to be the fire official (huo-kuan 火官). The fire official is the heart, and the heart is the heavenly kang-star (t'ien-kang 天罍).³⁶ When the heavenly kang-star shakes, golden radiance concentrates and shoots forth from the [inner] central palace (chung-kung 中宮). How could it happen that Marshal Teng would not become magically efficient (pu-ling 不靈)?

In case that you summon Marshal Hsin (Hsin shuai 辛帥), you take the divinity of the breath (ch'i-shen 氣神) to be the leading force. It belongs to the liver, passes through the gall department (tan-fu 膽府) and flows into the central palace (中宮) where golden radiance gushes forth and scatters.³⁷

In case that you summon Marshal Wen (Wen shuai 溫帥), you make use of Wood Senior (mu-lao 木老). When [the element] fire is born for the first time it is based on the rage of the liver. It happens then that Marshal Wen makes his apparition.

Wood gives birth to the fire of the heart (hsin-huo 心火), and fire is the divinity ping-ting (丙丁)³⁸ that makes the heavenly kang-star (t'ien-kang 天罍) shake and move. The golden radiance in the central palace resembles the shape of flowing brass that is getting mixed and refined. The [related] mysteries will be exposed in 35 See F.C.Reiter: "The Discourse on the Thunders 雷說, by the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing 王文卿 (1093-1153)", in: JRAS 14/3, p. 220.

36 Compare TT 1220: 70.1b (Hsian-chu ko 玄珠歌, commentary by Bai Yü-ch'an 白玉蟾: "t'ien-kang hsin yeh 天罍心也"). TT 1220: 82.18a-18b features the t'ien-kang [star] (天罍) as an object of individual internal possession: "my heart is inside of me but outside of me it is the k'ang-chen [star] (康貞). See TT 1220: 151.3a-5a (t'ien-kang fa/t'ien-kang shuo 天罍法/天罍說), for asironomical interpretations.

37 Both Marshals (Teng shuai 鄧帥 and Hsin shuai 辛帥) patronize their own sets of rituals, see TT 1220: 80.1a-45b (Yen-huo lü-ling Teng t'ien-chün ta-fa 焱火律令鄧天君大法); TT 1220: 81.1a-16b (Fu-feng meng-li Hsin t'ien-chün ta-fa 負風猛吏辛天君大法).

38 This addresses most likely the heat [of the sun] (ping-ting [huo] 丙丁 [火]), see below the translation of TT 1220: 56.22b.

oral instructions, and each of them is to be applied in accordance with the [respective spirit] general or marshal.

[Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) continues saying:] The Hung-fan (洪範) says: "Perspicacity manifests itself in wisdom (sheng 聖)".³⁹ These words are exactly to the point and pertain to all ranks. In a ritual, you must desire to perform the internal self-cultivation (hsing-ch'ih 行持).⁴⁰ You should befittingly stop up your own complete breath (wu i ch' i 吾一氣), and then it is that all worldly causes (yiiian 緣) cease to be and any thoughts do not arise. (9a) This exactly is your great goal.

The commentary by Yü-feng (御風) explains: The Book of Documents says that perspicacity manifests itself in wisdom. These words are absolutely to the point. Accordingly, the breath of greatest purity within my body is kept in store at the heavenly joints (hsüan-kuan 玄關).⁴¹ The central breath of the Great Ultimate is the principle (li 理), and the principle gives birth to being (hsing 性). Being gives birth to the dragon of yang (陽龍), and the dragon of yang is able to transform (p'ien-hua 變化) and ascend (sheng-t'eng 昇騰). The cosmos is within your hands exactly at this moment, and all mutations come to life [within your own] body.⁴²

[Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) continues saying:] Now, coming to the actual site of [a ritual of] Summoning and Uniting, the [following] question may be put forth: At the very time of Summoning and Uniting, how can I find out whether the divine generals have arrived at the scene or not? The answer is that you must definitely know the coming or the going [of the divinities]. If you do not know whether the divine generals have arrived or not, this is called to perform a blind ritual (hsia-fa 瞎法).

The commentary by Yü-feng (御風) says: When the spiritual force agitates, the breath follows suit. [The term] spiritual force (神) means the original spiritual 39 Huang K' an ed.: Pai-wen shih-san ching, Shang-shu; Chou-shu hung-fan p. 34/4. Shanghai, Ku-chi Comp. 1983.

40 This term points to chapter three in this text that uses the phrase as its title, see TT 1220: 69.11a-14a.

41 This may well refer to the cinnabar fields. However, we do not get any conclusive annotation on this term by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) or his commentator. Concerning a combination of external cosmic and internal bodily dimensions of this term see, for example, the spell Shih-erh ching-lo fu-chou (十二經絡符咒), in TT 1221 Shang-ch'ing ling-pao ta-fu 51.13a.

42 Compare TT 31 Huang-ti yin-fu ching 1a (Shen-hsien pao -i, yen-tao 神仙抱一演道). The dragon of yang appears to be a pars pro toto representing the respective practitioner.

force (元神).⁴³ The original spiritual force is precisely the individually owned original yang (yuan-yang 元陽). The original yang is the breath and the same time the principle. The principle gives birth to being (性). Being gives birth to the dragon of yang. (9b) The dragon of yang is the torch of wisdom (hui-chu 慧燭). At the time of Summoning and Uniting the nostrils inhale the breath of pure yang (ch'ing-yang 清陽) of the Anterior Heaven (hsien-t'ien 先天), and you transfer that breath to return to the yellow court (huang-t'ing 黃庭) where [the breath] congeals. Being tranquil for a short moment [the breath] must then agitate, and the divine generals have arrived when [the breath] agitates.

[Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) continues saying:] As to the coming [of the divine generals], at the time when they are summoned and united you must be silent and tranquil.⁴⁴ Perhaps you sense [their presence] when both of your temples feel a cold as if a cold wind had arrived or as if [cold wind] had touched down on both of your temples. Perhaps it is that your eyes flicker or your nostrils ache or perhaps there is the sound of bells in your ears, or perhaps it is that wind and thunders drum and agitate. In all these cases, [we know that] the heavenly generals (t'ien-chiang 天將) have arrived.

The commentary by Yü-feng (御風) says: As to the coming [of the spirit generals] at the time of Summoning and Uniting, when in the state of tranquillity a sensation occurs you first speak the spell San-ching chou (三淨祝). You use the nostrils to inhale noisily breath to fill your mouth. Using the nostrils, you lead the breath gently into the central palace (chung-kung 中宮). Wait until there is a true sensation (chen hsiao-hsi 真消息) between the two kidneys. [You remain] in greatest tranquillity like being frozen and motionless, and so you quietly listen where the original spiritual force agitates on its own and where it stays at. Then it is that the heavenly generals (10a) have actually arrived. Never mind which general it is, they all start out to operate at the central palace.

[Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) continues saying:] At this moment, you make one loud cry, pull aside, and turn the handle of the dipper (hsien-fan tou-ping 掀翻斗柄). You most urgently press the mudrā Thunder Office (lei-ch'ü 雷局)⁴⁵ of your left hand into the hip. The left foot treads heavily on the ground. You concentrate [your vision] on the general that was summoned and right now stays above the window of earth (ti-hu 地戶).⁴⁶ Perhaps you draw an amulet and send (t'i 提) the general to enter the amulet, or you dispatch [the general] to execute your ritual orders (hsing-shih 行事). However, when you urgently speak a spell to dispatch [a spirit general] concerning any ritual task, you must not relax (fang 放) [the mudrā of] the left [Thunder] Office and you must not move away your left foot because [otherwise] the [divine] general is gone.⁴⁷ In case that you summon once but the [spirit] general does not respond, then it had happened that the heavenly general did not come. You must repeat the summoning. In case that after three summonses there is still not any response at all, the respective general just does not descend. In this case, however, any ritual performances will not have any magic results. My intentions incline to focus on this secret matter, which I must not put into words. Be cautious! Be cautious!

43 TT 1250: 3a identifies the original spiritual force with the very body and the very being of the thunders (lei chih t'ü-hsing yüan-shen yeh 雷之體性元神也).

44 Compare TT 1250: 10b.

45 See TT 1250: 3b, for an application of the Thunder Office. The word ch'ü (局) can mean a position that holds a potential. I always use Thunder Office in this sense as a name.

The commentary by Yü-feng (御風) says: Shouting out aloud at one time, you alert the generals and [their] emissaries to pull aside and turn the handle of the dipper, (10b) and then the Northern Dipper (pei-tou 北斗) faces southwards. Notice, the heart has seven orifices that are the Northern Dipper. The hair [of the eyebrows] is the Three Terraces [-stars] (san-t'ai 三台).⁴⁸ The nostrils inhale the breath of pure yang of the Anterior Heaven (hsien-t'ien 先天) and receive [the breath] to return [to your body]. The orifices of the heart are tightly shut down and do not allow the breath to be contained there but let it continue to flow up to the whole face with its seven apertures (ch'i-k'ung 七孔) until it flows 46 This is the direction of sun 巽, which points to the Southeast. Compare TT 1250: 4a.

47 ...and no longer is available for ritual service.

48 San-t'ai (三台), this is the "flower baldachin", the three stars above the dipper. See TT 1220: 58.1b, for a drawing of the Big Dipper, explicitly showing the stars San-t'ai (三台). Compare TT 1227 T'ai-shang chu-kuo chiu-min tsung-chen pi-yao 2.12b (san-t'ai hsing-hsing 三台星形). For another interpretation see P. Andersen: "The Practice of Bugang", in: Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 5, p.30 (1989-1990). The term mao (毛) is not very clear but may refer to the eyebrows. For a central function of the stars San-t'ai (三台) in a spell that is connected with a Huo-sha amulet (火煞符) see TT 1220: 139.4b; also see, for example, TT 1221 Shang-ch'ing ling-pao ta-fa 5.15b, for a very instructive spell that focuses on the creative capabilities of the stars San-t'ai (三台). TT 148 W'u-liang tu-chen shang-p' in miao-ching p'ang t'ung-t'u 2.1a refers to the astronomical monograph Shih-chi t'ien-kuan shu (史記天官書) as to explain the superb function of the Big Dipper ("carriage of the God-Emperors" ti-chü 帝車) in organising the circuit of the time and the seasons. Also see Liu Chung-yü: Tao-chiao fa-shu, p.183, with an alternative name (san-neng 三能) and a greatly differing description and identification of the term. Such terms are crystallisations of a vast array of regional and historical traditions that are beyond any certain identification. Today, the three dots that top many amulets are explained in present day Taiwan to be (from the left) the lower, middle and upper platform stars, suggesting the formation of a triangle.

down to the belly and the colon (ku-tao 谷道). The breath thus urges on for a long time.

The nostrils inhale the breaths that tightly bind up the two kidneys and ascend from the spine (chia-chi 夾脊). This exactly is [the meaning of] "pulling aside and turning the handle of the dipper" (hsien-fan tou-ping 掀翻斗柄). Urgently take [the mudrā] Thunder Office of the left hand and the sword [-mudrā] (chien-chüeh 劍訣) of the right hand and press them into your hips.⁴⁹ Your left foot treads heavily on the ground, and you meditate on the general and the emissaries that were summoned as they arrive at the window of earth. Perhaps you draw an amulet and dispatch a general. You use your mouth to inhale [him] and blow [him] out to enter the amulet, or you dispatch the [spirit] general to take care of ritual matters. You speak then the spell that suits the occasion. When you dispatch [generals and emissaries] in this way, you must definitely not release the mudrā Thunder Office of the left hand, and you must not move away the left foot, because otherwise the [divine] general would be gone. In case that you summon one time [but the divinity] does not come, and when the same happens a second time and a third time, the [divine] general just does not descend, and any application of amulets⁵⁰ in order to cure illness (chih-ping 治病) (11a) definitely does not have any magic result. ***

The text combines a welter of information about the connection and union of the priest with the divine entities that he may summon. Many thunder divinities go unnamed in our texts.⁵¹ However, in the text Summoning and Uniting [the Thunder Divinities] (chao-ho 召合) we see a selection of names of divine figures that often appear in texts that are attributed to Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿). We certainly notice that much of the extensive and detailed expositions in terms of internal alchemy (nei-tan 內丹) were phrased by Yü-feng (御風) who is an otherwise unknown disciple of Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿). The expositions of internal alchemy are as much specific as they are quite general. They represent a certain mode of theoretical approach. Sung-specialists of internal alchemy used 49 TT 1220: 69.25a (commentary by Yü-feng 御風 on Wang Wen-ch'ing's (王文卿) tract The Creative Impetus (Tsao-hua 造化) and see, for example, TT 1220: 85. 8b: "tread on and turn the handle of the dipper" (t'a-fan tou-ping 踏翻斗柄). Compare a later tradition in TT 263 Hsiu-chen shih-shu 3.5a (Yin-fu sui 陰符髓). Concerning the mudrā chien-chüeh (劍訣), see also TT 1220: 68.1b, in combination with the mudrā Thunder Office.

50 Concerning this important theme, see Chapter II, and also see, for example, Li Yüan-kuo: "Lang tao-fu te chieh-kon yü pi-fa" (論道符的結構與筆法), in: Tsung-chiao hsüeh yen-chü 1992, 2, pp.8-13.

51 See F.C.Reiter: "The Name of the Nameless and Thunder Magic", pp.97-116, in: AAS 20.

such and similar descriptions of energetic dispositions within the human body that seemed to mirror cosmic and astral spheres. Obviously, there is some deliberately cryptic imagination involved. On the other hand, we see clearly how internal alchemy is being applied in rituals of Taoist Thunder Magic.

Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) presents rather scarce and basic information, whereas his disciple Yü-feng (御風) rephrases and enlarges the frame of interpretation due to his understanding. It is rather seldom that this type of rhetoric appears in other sources of Thunder Magic. Obviously, different levels of rhetoric and presentation were used to explicate the fabric of Thunder Magic. We have many indications that the internal self-cultivation was understood to be crucial.⁵² We also find out that such explicit and extended information on Taoist self cultivation is usually contained in later texts that emerged in the school of Pai Yü-ch'an (白玉蟾 13th ct.) when the development of internal alchemy (nei-tan 內丹) peaked.

The very first text in this presentation, Secret Instructions Concerning the Rituals of the Thunders (lei-fa pi-chih 雷法秘旨), featured the self-identification and self-deification of the Taoist who in this way prepares himself to perform a Thunder ritual. The ritual task is the sole incentive for any self-cultivation. It is all about the purpose of preparing the human body and person to be fit and ready for the ritual performance. In fact, the self-deification is already a ritual in itself. We shall see that this is a great theme in Taoist canonical texts, which specialise on exorcist rituals and almost completely forgo any rhetoric or didactic explanations and justification.⁵³ However, to support the line of reasoning that we have seen so far I introduce another text by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) that shows how to employ self-cultivation for ritual purposes. This text substantiates the information that the Secret Instructions Concerning the Rituals of the Thunders (lei-fa pi-chih 雷法秘旨) already have conveyed.

52 See, for example, TT 1220: 76.39a-39b (Preface by Pai Yü-ch'an 白玉蟾).

53 See Chapter II: The Scope of Thunder Magic

Assembling the Divine Force (Lien-shen 鍊神)⁵⁴

(2a) Let your divine forces congeal and sit quietly in meditation. You concentrate on the one most shining point in the Kidney Palace (shen-kung 腎宮). Within a short moment, fire arises, gradually engulfing your body all around. You blow out one load of breath from your mouth, and the ashes will be blown away altogether. Then, you concentrate on the breaths in the five colours of the five directions, which mix and combine to shape one united aura of radiant shining in purple and golden colours, and this [aura] transforms itself into an infant (ying-erb 嬰兒) that gradually grows big. [This image] has the beak of a phoenix with silver teeth, red hair and a body like a quail. Both eyes let fiery shining penetrate [a distance] of ten thousand chang. Both wings also have [the shining of] fire. On both forelegs, a head with eyes emerges. Each of them also emits fiery shining. The belt has the colour of gold. The left hand clutches a fire auger and the right hand clutches a mallet with eight angles. A fiery dragon winds around the body.⁵⁵

Thereupon you concentrate and see yourself as this Divine General of the Five Thunders. His head touches the heaven, and he stands on the earth. Close around him there are fiery clouds that wrap him up with the divine and fierce might of blazing fire. This is "Blazing Fire", the Heavenly Lord Teng (Yen-huo

54 TT 1220: 124.1b-2a, for a translation with very few variants see F.C.Reiter: "A Preliminary Study of the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing (1093-1153) and his Thunder Magic (lei-fa)", in: ZDMG 152, p.172 (2002). This tract shows that Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) is embedded in the Taoist traditions of his time, quite apart from the specifications of Thunder Magic and the respective deities that Thunder Magic addresses. For example, compare TT 1221 Shang-ch'ing ling-pao ta-fa 54.20b-21b (lien-hsing hsing-ch'ih 煉形行持). TT 1220: 124.1b-2a contains the text as a preliminary instruction for the Thunder rituals Shang-ch'ing lei-t'ing huo-ch'iu wu-lei ta-fa (上清雷霆火車五雷大法), for which we also get a preface by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿). This proves that we have to deal with independent sets of rituals that partly were grouped around the name of Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿). For the same story see TT 1220: 56.14b-15b, and below Chapter II.

55 The text TT 1220: 80.1a-1b Yen-huo lü-ling Teng t'ien-chün ta-fa (焱火律令鄧天君大法) shows a very good example for later (probably 13th ct.) addenda and embellishments of the status symbols of this divinity. The divinity has, among some other characteristics, "three eyes", and below the two wings, there are "two heads. The left one is in charge of the wind, and the right one is in charge of the rain. The whole body of the divinity is engulfed in fierce fire, riding a red dragon". There is no exclusive canon of such marks of identity, which religious imagination freely moulds and enlarges on the basic pattern of the body of a quail.

Teng t'ien-chün 焱火鄧天君) who is the ruling and commanding divinity in the rituals of the fire chariots (Huo-chü fa 火車法)."

The priest transforms himself to be the Heavenly Lord Teng⁵⁶ to adopt the divine capacity of the divinity. The ensuing ritual action is not performed on behalf of that deity but, in other words, the deity is the performing agent. This is the crucial point, which generally is the very basis for any Thunder Magic rituals. In this case, the meditating priest creates out of his potentials the Heavenly Lord Teng. Here we have to make the point that the deity certainly does not come down from anywhere to possess the priest but is an innate spiritual potential.

The two preceding texts contain some very common and practical elements, for example, the hand-gesture (mudrā) Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局) and the meditative and internal visions that invoke Thunder divinities and the same time spiritually unite the human body with cosmic realities. We also learn about a few names of divinities that are important for the Thunder Magic of Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿).

The ritual traditions that we have seen so far surface again, for example, in the short commentary on a spell (chou 咒)⁵⁷ that has to be spoken within the sacred area, right after two other spells with the title Divine Spell for the Ritual Steps to Turn Divine (Pu-kang pien-shen chou 步罡變神咒) already had been spoken. The spell invites quite a number of divinities to descend namely the two Marshals Hsin and Chang (辛張二帥). There are the Thunder Lord and the Mother of Lightning (Lei-kung tien-mu 雷公電母),⁵⁸ the Wind Earl (feng-po 風伯) and the Master of Rain (yü-shih 雨師), the Savage Thunders of the Five Directions (wu-fang man-lei 五方蠻雷) and others.⁵⁹ Now, the commentary

56 Concerning this name, see also F.C.Reiter: „The Discourse on the Thunders“, p.224; and also TT 1220: 80.1a sq.

57 See TT 1220: 87.1b/column 4 sq.

58 Concerning Lei-kung (Lei-shen 雷神 / 雷公), see R.Mathieu: Étude sur la mythologie et l'ethnologie de la Chine ancienne, traduction annotée du Shanhai jing vol I, p.503, and also note 2 (Paris 1983). Especially see T'ai-p'ing kuang-chi (太平廣記) 394 (lei 雷 1-3), pp.1601-1612. See TT 263 Hsün-chen shih-shu shang-ch'ing chi 39a- 39b (Ch'ü-yü ko 祈雨歌) makes mention of Lei-kung and Tien-mu (雷公電母). See F.C.Reiter: „The Name of the Nameless And Thunder Magic“, p.101, in: AAS 20. Also see TT 1015 Chin-so liu-chu yin 4.10b-11a, naming Lei-kung (雷公) and referring to the story of Ch'ü-yü ko (蚩尤) that Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) used as a frame for his well known presentation of the superior Thunder deity Yen-huo ta-shen (焱火大神).

59 Concerning these names, see F.C.Reiter: „The Discourse on the Thunders“, pp.210, 224. The names appear again in the commentary that I translate, see below.

that I present shows the combination of ritual gestures and internal processes. Again, we understand that such processes and concepts were right at the basis of Thunder Magic rituals.⁶⁰ I present the commentary that refers to the second cryptic phrase of the spell that reads as follows:⁶¹

(3a) The red [colour] at the red season resembles ferocious blood (hung-shih hung ssu meng-meng hsüeh 紅時紅似猛猛血).

The anonymous commentary says: "Your two hands form the mudrâ Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局). You concentrate on your tongue as the Thunder Axe (lei-fu 雷斧). The gall is the rumbling [of Thunder] (p'î-li 霹靂). The heart is Marshal Teng (Teng shuai 鄧帥) (3b). The gall is Marshal Hsin (Hsin shuai 辛帥). The kidneys are Marshal Chang (Chang shuai 張帥). The five intestines are the Five Thunders. You concentrate then on Marshal Teng (Teng shuai 鄧帥) who mounts the red breaths and descends to the Palace of the Kidneys. This is called: the yang-breaths (陽) descend. Marshal Chang mounts the black breaths and ascends to the Palace of the Heart. This is called: the yin-breaths (陰) storm upwards. In case that such an ascent and a descent happen three times, yin and yang (陰陽) strike clashing and become the thunder that enters the spleen. You shut up the breaths and keep the sight of your eyes fixed on the top of your head. You spontaneously lead the breaths of the kidneys upwards into the heart. [Again,] you shut up the breaths and [close] your eyes, and you feel spontaneously how the breaths of the heart descend to the kidneys. At the next step, you concentrate on the Savage Thunders (man-lei 蠻雷) of the Five Directions. Each of them mounts the breaths of the five intestines and they flow altogether into the spleen. The Rumbling Great Divinity (p'î-li ta-shen 霹靂大神) together with the [Thunder] emissaries mounts the breaths of the gall. Furthermore, the breaths enter the centre of the spleen where they congeal and combine [as if they were in] a tub.⁶² [The breaths] revolve without cease and reach revolving the lower cinnabar field (hsia tan-t'ien 下丹田). This is called "to mix and unite with the Three Palaces".⁶³ Repeatedly revolving [the breaths] reach the central cinnabar field (chung tan-t'ien 中丹田), which is called "the centre organises the five breaths". The five breaths revolve and move on, 60 For the commentary, see TT 1220: 87.3a-4a. Also see F.C.Reiter: "The Discourse on the Thunders", pp.222, 224, 228.

61 TT 1220: 87.3a

62 The reading „tub“ is a guess on my part, compare H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr. 12289 (t'ung 桶). I could not clearly identify the character.

63 The three palaces most likely point to the cinnabar fields, including the Mud Pill (Palace).

forcing their way upwards to the Mud Pill [Palace] (ni-wan 泥丸). This is called (4a) "to mix and unite with all the spiritual forces".

It is necessary to use the mudrā Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局) and to move [the two hands with the mudrās] upwards firmly pressing [them]. You start out doing so from the hall of the two kidneys (shen-t'ang 腎堂), and following the two sides [of your body] you reach the two ears. Now, you press the [two Thunder] Offices onto your ears and let the breaths inside the ears produce the sounds that are the thunders (wei lei 為雷). Your eyes flash three times, which is the lightning. Grind your teeth with one sound, which is the rumbling [of thunder].

In case that there is not any result, you just [force the points of pressure on your palms] to shift from hai (亥) to ssu (巳), and you must not clap open (p'o-san 拍散) [the mudrās]. When the [desired] effects come about, you shift then [the hands with the mudrās Thunder] Office to the position of your breast and clap open [your hands to give up the mudrās]. You concentrate [your vision] on the Three Marshals (san-shuai 三帥) and the Great Rumbling Divinity of the Five Thunders (wu-lei p'i-li ta-shen 五雷霹靂大神), on the generals and emissaries of the sun-window (sun-hu jiang-li 巽戶將吏) and the Thunder Divinities of the Eight Trigrams (pa-kua lei-shen 八卦雷神). They force their way upwards to the window on the top of your head from where they leave. Thunder, lightning, rumbling, wind and fire join together and press forward as to mix with the heavenly thunder that was summoned, and they become one [unified] entity."

The religious side of Thunder magic deals with spirit generals and other divine charges that tend to have either personal or formalistic names. We sometimes find a combination of both elements.⁶⁴ Divine names may resemble common personal names that actually refer to deities of the Posterior Heaven (bou-t'ien 後天). Such names often go with the divine ranks of meritorious Taoists who post mortem received divine Thunder ranks as a reward. The formalistic names most likely refer to abstract divine entities of the Anterior Heaven (hsien-t'ien 先天). Thunder Magic unites them all.⁶⁵ It is a general conviction that the priest can summon and visualize all these divine entities as internal and cosmic realities.

Nevertheless, the sources of Thunder Magic frequently speak about spirit generals whom the priest may invite to descend (chiang 降) on himself and enter 64 See F.C.Reiter: „The Name of the Nameless and Thunder Magic“, pp.97-116.

65 See F.C.Reiter: „The Discourse on the Thunders“, p.222 sq.

(ju 入) some amulets. The spiritual and physical intermediation of the priest is instrumental to achieve this result. We may be tempted to speak of possession, which would claim some mediumistic or shaman features to matter.⁶⁶ On the other hand, we also know that divinities of the Posterior Heaven (bou-t'ien 後天) may potentially be present inside the human body where they were implanted when the practitioner received the respective registers. The registers constitute and specify the individual identity of the priest who in this way unites man-and-the-divine.

The compilation of ritual texts with the title Great Method of the Heavenly Lord Hsin, the Fierce Emissary who Carries the Wind on his Back (Fu-feng meng-li Hsin t'ien-chün ta-fa 負風猛吏辛天君大法) offers another telling description of how to activate the internal potentials and concentrate the divine forces (lien-shen 鍊神). In other words, we learn how the Taoist adopts a specific divine quality (pien-shen 變神). After the presentation of the pseudo-Sanskrit spell Departing from the Husk (ch'u-ku chou 出穀咒) we read the following words:⁶⁷

Inhale deeply the purple breaths of the sun-direction (巽) and expel them sighing across the altar. You make then use of the two orifices (ch'iao 竅) below your tongue, and from the left side you emit chuckling the green [breath], from the right side the purple [breath], just the two breaths. They mix up and assemble to become (chieh-ch'eng 結成) the Grand Marshal (ta-shuai 大帥). Now, you recite the Written Oath (shih-chang 誓章) and lead [the breaths] into the Palace of the Gall (tan-kung 膽宮) where they assemble and become the Generalissimo (yüan-shuai 元帥) who has here his home palace.

The Written Address (shih-chang 誓章) documents the process of an internal spiritual promotion, which takes its speaker to be the divine agent. In other words, the swearing priest is in the position of his spirit alter ego who is the Generalissimo and Heavenly Lord Hsin (Hsin t'ien-chün 辛天君).⁶⁸ These are the words of the address:

66 Liu Chung-yü: Tao-chiao fa-shu, pp.55-60.

67 See TT 1220: 81.2a. At the end of chapter 81 we find the name of Pai Yü-ch'an 白玉蟾 (fl. 1st half of 13th ct.), which points to a rather late date of the Great Method in TT 1220 Tao-fa hui-yuan. This example is quite in accord with the expositions by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿), which documents the continuity in the development of Thunder magic. Concerning the Fierce Emissary, see below the translation of chapter 56 of A Corpus of Taoist Ritual, TT 1220: 56.29a.

68 TT 1220: 81.2a-3a.

(2b) Fierce emissaries and divinities of Thunder and Thunderclaps, your might shakes the Nine Heavens and your thunderclaps are omnipresent in the Three Realms. You are loyal and diligent and support the god-emperors and lords (ti-chün 帝君) with your bodies that quickly rise up [to be as tall as] one million chang (丈). Your title of honour is Venerable of the Thunder Departments and Commander-in-Chief for All Thunder Departments (lei-pu tsun tu-tu chu-lei pu 雷部尊都督諸雷部).

Wind Earl, Master of the Rain, Mother of the Divine Sound of Thunderclaps and the Radiance of Lightning, legions of Night Demons of Grand Might on the left side and on the right side receive respectfully the heavenly order (t'ien-ling 天令) to assist and support the Venerable of the Five Thunders.

I have reverently received the decrees of the Jade Emperor (yü-ti 玉帝) and so can save the people in the world. In the case that there are people who have received and cultivated [the Taoist discipline],⁶⁹ I shall rapidly disclose to them my outer apparition. When [such people] ask me to ascend to the heavenly realms, I go to attend [the heavenly] audiences and submit [the petitions] to the god-emperors. When [such people] ask me to enter the Department of Earth (ti-fu 地府), I straightforward reach the Palace of the Dark Spheres (Yu-ching kung 幽冥宮). When [such people] ask me to enter the Water Department (shui-fu 水府) the waves of the four seas then open up [a throughway for me]. When [such people] ask me to support the realm of life (yang-chieh 陽界), I establish the means to save all living beings. When [such people] ask me to save them in times of a drought, I let heavy rain come down. When [such people] ask me to arrest spirits and monsters (ching-kuai 精怪) I destroy and shatter their battalions. When [such people] ask me to help [a woman] in childbed, mother and offspring shall quickly separate their bodies and together with me live to the end of our lives, and we will jointly be servants of the Jade Emperor (yü-ti 玉帝).⁷⁰

In the case that I, your minister (ch'en 臣), commit any offence against the heavenly laws (t'ien-lü 天律), my nine ancestors will suffer punishment by poison. (3a) In the case that I turn my back on you, the sun and the moon on the heaven above will dim and the wells and fountains will dry out in the earth down below. Grass and trees will no longer grow and for eternity I shall be a demon in the dark netherworld, not being able to ascend to pay a visit at [the Heaven of] Highest Purity (shang-ch'ing 上清).

69 The formulation shou-ch'ih che (受持者) could be an abbreviation of shou-lu hsing-ch'ih (受錄行持), compare TT 1220: 69.11a-14a.

70 This is fact is a great survey on possible fields of operation for the ritual specialist of Thunder Magic.

Jen and kuei (壬癸) mark the days when I descend. [The people] who have received and cultivated [the Taoist discipline]⁷¹ must essentially be diligent and pure. There are the mandatory offerings of tea, jujubes and soup, and peach-wood incense must be burnt. I show up on the left side and on the right side with a peaceful heart that must not get startled, and together with you⁷² I present the address to swear that I vow to save all living beings, all as ordered by the superior god-emperors.⁷³

After the text of the oath, we find the following practical instructions. They ascertain that the speaker in the oath is the Generalissimo who is the spirit alter ego of the practitioner:

You circulate the black breaths of the k'au-palace (坎宮) to let them pass upwards through the Jade Tower (yü-lou 玉樓). You expel (ho 呵) then [the black] breaths in front of the altar and concentrate in meditation on the Marshal, who now mounts the ten thousand folds of black clouds. You⁷⁴ flash your eyes that send off the Generalissimo (yüan-shuai 元帥) who eminently rises up. You form [the mudrás] Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局) and together with one clap [of your hands] you shout out: Rapidly exorcise the urgent trouble! – In other words, the Generalissimo, “my alter ego”, departs to fulfil the required ritual task.

The crucial point is the self-identification of the practitioner with the Thunder deity, the Generalissimo or Marshal Hsin (辛). He emerges out of the internal and bodily breaths and can be dispatched together with the black breaths. Sometimes it suffices to know the titles of the deities. This information is provided by the respective register (lu 錄) that the priest obtained from his teacher master. This is a most important aspect of Thunder rituals, which qualifies them as proper Taoist procedures. Taking into account the vast number of ritual methods (...ta-fa 大法) that A Corpus of Taoist Ritual contains; we consider that they all must be genuinely connected with registers (lu 錄). On 71 ...and arranged the ritual...

72 In this case, “you” refers to the addressees of the oath who were named at the very beginning of the text.

73 Or translate: “...all in accordance with the law of...” (一如上帝律令).

74 The text says literally “the ritual master” (shih 師).

the other hand, we also remember that the patriarch Chang Yü-ch'ü (張宇初) admonished his fellow Taoists to actualize (or respect) only one method, one register and one duty (chih p'ei i-fa i-lu i-chih 止佩一法一錄一職).⁷⁵ The message is clear – the Taoist must not change his appearances and spiritual functions ad libitum, because he jeopardizes his religious identity.

There is still some another point that deserves our consideration. The deity has an outer form and appearance that the practitioner can identify. Wang Weng-ch'ing (王文卿) gave us his description of the divine apparition of Yen-huo Teng t'ien-chün (焱火鄧天君).⁷⁶ In the case of Marshal Hsin (辛) the description is a bit more modest. We learn that Marshal Hsin (辛) “wears an ox-ear cap,⁷⁷ has red hair, an iron face and silver teeth like daggers [that sharp]. He is clad in green cloud-fur-garments (yün-ch'iu 雲裘) and black boots. His left hand holds the Thunder files (lei-pu 雷簿). His right hand holds the Thunder brush (lei-pi 雷筆). An abundant radiance of fire is seen above his apparition”.⁷⁸

Such marks of identity and status symbols (hsiang-hao p'in 相好品) help the Taoist in meditation and during rituals to link an apparition with a specific name that should accord with the register that he holds. This conviction is well established in Taoism, which much older canonical encyclopaedias and other descriptive texts document, for example, San-tung chu-nang (三洞珠囊) and T'ai-shang Lao-chün chung-ching (太上老君中經).⁷⁹

We may ask who actually is entitled to set to use the ritual program of Generalissimo Hsin (Hsin yüan-shuai 辛元帥). Any Taoist is entitled to do so if he holds the appropriate register (lu 籙) of the Marshal with the names of the divinities that are involved. I have already indicated that this is the precondition

75 See TT 1232 Tao-men shih-kuei 11b. Concerning this text see, F.C. Reiter, in: Companion p.975.

76 See above. See the following translation of chapter 56 of A Corpus of Taoist Ritual, TT 1220: 56.29a.

77 See H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr.9404.

78 See TT 1220: 81.1a, the introduction to the Marshal Class (shuai-pan 帥班).

79 See TT 1168 T'ai-shang Lao-chün chung-ching, see, K.Schipper, pp.92-94 in: Companion. K.Schipper tentatively dates the text to the Later Han Period, specifying his earlier assessment, following Ch'en Kuo-fu and in comparison with his “Le Calendrier de Jade, Note sur le Laozi zhongjing”, in: Nachrichten der Gesellschaft für Natur-und Völkerkunde Ostasiens 125, pp.75-80. As to San-tung chu-nang (三洞珠囊), see F.C.Reiter: Der Perlenbeutel aus den Drei Höhlen, pp.129-157 (concerning TT 1139 San-tung chu-nang 8.1a-24a).

for the realisation of all the great methods or rituals (ta-fa 大法) in A Corpus of Taoist Ritual. In the case of Generalissimo Hsin, the performing priest had received such registers (lu 錄). The spiritual might and presence of the spirit Generalissimo thus was implanted into the spiritual household of the priest. In other words, the priest who just addressed the deity with his "written oath" was able to activate this divine potential and adopt the identity of the Marshal/Generalissimo Hsin (辛帥). He is also in command of the subordinate divine charges, whose might derives from their cosmic dimension that their titles reveal:⁸⁰

(1a) The Savage Thunder Emissary of the East, Ma Yü-lin (Tung-fang man-lei shih-che 東方蠻雷使者馬鬱林);

The Savage Thunder Emissary of the South, Kuo Yüan-ching (Nan-fang man-lei shih-che 南方蠻雷使者郭元京);

(1b) The Savage Thunder Emissary of the West, Fang Chung-kao (Hsi-fang man-lei shih-che 西方蠻雷使者方仲高);

The Savage Thunder Emissary of the North, Teng Kung-ch'en (Pei-fang man-lei shih-che 北方蠻雷使者鄧拱辰);

The Savage Thunder Emissary of the Centre, T'ien Yüan-tsung (Chung-yang man-lei shih-che 中央蠻雷使者田元宗)

We see that Sung Thunder Magic unites a vast variety of Taoist concepts that develop in a new context. The actual presence of divine forces that have names and titles is an important aspect, which points to Thunder deities that either may descend from heaven or become apprehensible in a meditative visualisation that is based on the internal energies. This effort results in the spiritual formation of deities who actually become the spiritually acting agents in a ritual.

The writing of Thunder amulets is a great case in point. Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) presents a rather detailed didactic explanation about the writing of amulets. And again, we study the didactic dialogues of Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) and his disciple Yüan Wu-chieh (袁無介). We also study the subsequent commentaries by Yü-feng (御風).

80 TT 1220: 81.1a-1b.

The Basis for Writing Amulets (shu-fu 書符)

The biography of Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) in the introduction to this book already made mention of amulets. Heavenly amulets were a major element of initiation for the priest and exorcist Wu Meng (吳猛).⁸¹ Amulets are certainly outstanding and often eye-catching expressions of Thunder Magic. The collection A Corpus of Taoist Ritual provides fascinating evidence. Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) offers a very telling discussion of this theme:⁸²

(14a) Yüan Wu-chieh (袁無介) sets forth his question concerning the secret instructions for the writing of amulets. He wishes to learn something about this mystery.

[Wang] Shih-ch'en ([王] 侍宸) makes [the following] statement: When the one breath is present, it can be used above to reach the heavenly perfected ones, and down [on earth] it can be used to subdue the bewitching demons (yao-mei 妖魅). In the middle [the one breath] can be used to arouse and agitate wind and rain, thunder and lightning. At the time when an amulet has to be written you must first fix your breathing (hsi 息),⁸³ holding the writing brush [in your hand]. You lead on the pure breath with your nostrils, extending for long the one action of inhaling. [The breath] must not be turbid. It is most important that the breath is pure. Then, you shut up the breath and hold on to it without any breathing at all (hu-hsi 呼吸). You use speedily the writing brush to write down the amulet. Having done [the writing] you let the splendour of your heavenly eye (t'ien-mu 天目)⁸⁴ enter [the amulet], and all the generals and emissaries (chiang-li 將吏) that you summoned enter the centre of the amulet. Your mouth releases strongly coughing the breath right above the amulet, and golden radiance will cover [the amulet]. In your meditative vision you see the generals and emissaries who were summoned and are [now] inside the amulet that you wrote. (14b) You speedily take the three characters "vast", "clear" and "bright" (hung 泓 ch'eng 澄

81 See my Introduction.

82 TT 1220: 69.14a-16a. This text is a major source in my article "The Management of Nature: Convictions and Means in Daoist Thunder Magic (Daojiao leifa)", pp.193-210, in: AAS 29. The writing of amulets is a notorious theme in almost any compilation concerning specific Thunder rituals. They all involve similar elements; compare for example TT 1220: 219. 20a-20b (shu-fu nei-pi 書符內秘) in: Shen-hsiao tuan-wen ta-fu (神霄斷壙大法). Generally see C.Despeux: "Talismans and Sacred Diagrams", pp.498-540, in: L.Kohn ed.: Daoism Handbook. C.Despeux gives a general survey on the variety of amulets and graphic representations of spiritual potentials and elements.

83 This means the inhaling and the exhaling of breath.

84 For this term, see above p. 11b, and TT 1220 Tao-fa hui-yüan 56.31a.

ming 明)⁸⁵ and [mentally] stamp (ya 押) them onto the amulet. If the breath in your mouth leaks out, during the time when the amulet is being written, or if your mouth does not enclose the breath and an amulet is still being written, such an amulet does not have any divine force. Even if there should eventually be some divine result, this occurs [only] by chance once a time. Such an effect is not due to the force of the amulet.

The commentary by Yü-feng (御風) says: Amulets do not have an orthodox outer form (cheng-hsing 正形). They have their divine force (ling 靈) based on the breath (ch'i 氣). The divine force (ling 靈) is the ancestral breath (tsu-ch'i 祖氣). In case that the ancestral breath is not clearly present (ming 明), how can you still wait for its divine force (ling 靈) to become effective? When the divine force is present, you know where the ancestral breath stays at and when it comes and goes. You firmly guard the cinnabar fields (tan-t'ien 丹天)⁸⁶ and gently nourish that basis [of your body]. Generally, when the human hands, feet, eyes and ears, nostrils and tongue set out to move, [the same time] these orifices (ch'iao 竅) are also agitated.⁸⁷ Concerning these orifices, they are the locations that assemble and contain the original breath. They are the bags that collect and store the essences and spiritual forces. The hun- 魂 and p'o- 魄 souls are guarded at the purple window (tsu-hu 紫戶). The purple window is the gate of fate (ming-men 命門) and the location that connects [the embryo] with the womb. The three [cinnabar fields] must not desert each other.⁸⁸ This is what Meng-tzu (孟子) calls the breath that rears the natural greatness.⁸⁹

In any case, when amulets have to be written, you purify your mind, (15a) tranquilize your considerations, congeal your spiritual forces, fix your breathing and grasp the writing brush. You use the nostrils to lead on the pure breath and having completely inhaled it you let [the pure breath] return to the central bar (chung-kung 中扃)⁹⁰ that you firmly shut. You let the breath of pure-yang (ch'ing

85 The radical rain (yü 雨) tops the three characters. They are ritual devices that we do not find in official dictionaries. The pronunciation derives from the basic characters as indicated. They frequently appear in print on modern amulets (Taiwan). Here, however, the priest most likely deposits them mentally on the amulets.

86 TT 1250: 15b

87 This word is usually translated "orifice", but here ch'iao (竅) should refer to the cinnabar fields. Compare H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr.1426.

88 This points most likely to the interdependence of the three cinnabar fields.

89 Hao-jan chih ch'i (浩然之氣); see H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr. 3891 ("passion-nature").

90 The "central bar" seems to be identical with the "yellow court", see below the Commentary by Yü-feng (御風).

yang chih ch'i 清陽之氣) amass and flow into the central palace (chung-kung 中宮). Then, you shift to open the central bar, and the original breath (yüan-ch'i 元氣) comes forth. You blow it onto the tip of your writing brush, and so a golden radiance flashes brightly with all its splendour. You write the amulet on the paper, which is like the force of a dragon that crawls on. All the paper is filled with the killing breaths (sha-ch'i 煞氣) that form unseen barricades. Again, your nostrils breathe in pure breath. You let [the pure breath] straightforwardly pass through the heavenly joints (hsüan-kuan 玄關). The nine orifices above and below must all be shut up, and they must not allow any leakage to happen.⁹¹ The one breath completes the amulet. When [the writing of the] amulet is completed you release the breath and blow it onto the amulet. You take the three characters hung, ch'eng and ming and stamp them [mentally] on the amulet. Now, when the amulet is being written you must not let the original breath (yüan-ch'i 元氣) leak out, because otherwise the amulet will not be magically efficient (yen 驗).

[Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) continues saying:] At the moment you are writing an amulet you leak the breath from your mouth. You should a second time enclose the breath and [again] write down this amulet. In case that you leak the breath three times and the writing of the amulet is not identical at all (pu-i 不一), then you have the result that the heavenly generals do not respond and what had been done ritually will not be magically efficient. Generally, the essential [requirement] for writing amulets is the absolute (15b) enclosure of the one load of breath (pi-ch'i 閉氣) in the mouth. When one encloses this breath, the individual mind (wu-hsin 吾心)⁹² must not have any erratic thoughts. When the own will is concentrated, the source of perfection is thus secure and firm. When you blow [the breath] upon the amulet, you lend it (chieb 借) the divine might of the one breath. In case that you leak away the breath, what else is still at hand to be used? Those who practise rituals today do not know [the method concerning] the orifices, and it is for this reason that all their writing of amulets is ridiculous.

The commentary by Yü-feng (御風) says: Concerning the time when an amulet is being written, it is all about enclosing the breath (pi-ch'i 閉氣). It is essential that the nostrils first collect the pure breath that you transfer then to enter the yellow court (huang-t'ing 黃庭). You shut up the nine orifices and achieve that 91 Concerning the nine orifices (ch'iao 竅) in a context with the hun- and p'o-souls (魂魄), see below and compare TT 110 Huang-ti yin-fu ching shu 1.6b-7a.

92 Literally: „my mind“ the original breath is complete and present. You tip down the brush and write the amulet. One [stroke of the] brush sweeps and completes the golden radiance that flares up. If you perform in this way, you will get an echo and a response. In case that you leak the original breath and also do not use the nostrils to lead on the pure breath to be forcefully stimulating, how could you let it happen that the original breath comes forth? Anyway, when you enclose the breath your mind then does not shift, move, and harbour any mixed thoughts. Your whole will rely on the very centre. Breath and brush all revolve [together], and in this way your will definitely completes the amulet. Gentleman who practise rituals (16a) [but] do not attain the transmission [concerning] the heavenly joints (hsüan-kuan 玄關) and [furthermore] are not informed about the ancestral breath, practise in vain the writing of amulets and deserve to be greatly ridiculed.”

The text explains the internal involvement and the physical requirements for writing amulets. We understand that divine forces inhabit the amulet and its graphic design, which therefore carry divine potentials. We do not need to consider any theories about the value and meaning of symbols. We simply learn and accept that there are spirit generals and their entourage of spirit emissaries who populate the amulet. The Taoist has the privilege to visualize a transcendent reality that escapes the apprehension of a layperson. In short, the amulet is not so much a combination of graphic designs on paper, but it is an energetic and spiritual agent. Small wonder that some amulets may be drawn in the air, in empty space, and there is not any graphic trace at all.

We may well ask what can be done about amulets that are not magic and do not show any advantage for its owner. Many amulets, for example, were used to procure rain. Now, what do we do if it was all in vain?

The short tract The Soaring Sword Beheads the Heavenly Emperor (fei-chien chan t'ien-huang 飛劍斬天皇) is a good example. The text says that after two or three days when the amulet failed to procure rain, the priest could use the following method:⁹³

(16a) You take one leaf of strong yellow paper and write on it a Heavenly-Emperor amulet (t'ien-huang fu 天皇符). The head of it must point to the direction of Southeast (sun-fang 巽方) and the feet [of the amulet] to [the direction] of Northwest (ch'ien-fang 乾[方]). In the middle of the altar and below the flayers, at night around the time 11 p.m. until 1 a.m. (tsu-shih 子時), you take the blood of a cock and spit it onto the Heavenly-Emperor amulet (t'ien-huang fu 天皇符). The next day around noon (wu-shih 午時) when the sun stands in its zenith, you⁹⁴ form the mudrá Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局) with your left hand and your right hand holds the sword. Standing vis-à-vis the Heavenly-Emperor [amulet], you visualise the Heavenly Emperor with his human head and the body of a snake.⁹⁵ [You visualize] the waterwheel on the top of his head, and his feet tread on a waterwheel. [The Emperor] raises rapidly his body to be as tall as ten thousand chang (丈), and your own body (wu-shen 吾身) also rises to be as tall as ten thousand chang (丈), being in a great rage. You visualise that the heaven dims and the earth gets black [and dark]. In one moment, you speedily turn around your body and using your sword cut the Heavenly-Emperor amulet into (16b) two pieces. This is called the Soaring Sword Beheads the Heavenly Emperor (fei-chien chan t'ien-huang 飛劍斬天皇).

93 TT 1220: 68.16a-16b (Lei-t'ing san-san ch'i-tao pi-chieh 雷霆三司祈禱秘法).

In other words, the Taoist takes on the tall and awful apparition of the Heavenly Emperor himself, and having the same spiritual capacity he destroys the amulet that certainly did not house the Heavenly Emperor.

The text School Talks gives another informative report that may serve as a good documentation concerning amulets. It features the failure of the application of an amulet to alleviate the delivery of a child. We also learn why this effort failed:⁹⁶

(4a) ...Being once in a private home [I, your] disciple administered an amulet to save a woman who was about to deliver a child. When I summoned the [spirit] generals, my heart was greatly shaking and my left eye repeatedly flickered.⁹⁷ When I issued the amulet and dispatched the emissaries, my heart and my will were not pleased, and the Emissary of the Will (i-shih che 意使者) had not yet arrived at the scene. It worked just like that. The next morning the family bade me farewell and told me that the prospective mother had visualised a demon emissary with a green face and three eyes. (4b) Fire charged forth from the eyes of the demon engulfing the body of the woman in childbed, and she felt that her

94 It says literally: "the ritual master (fa-shih 法師)".

95 See, for example TT 1220: 67.10b, and 124.12a, which show the importance of the image of the snake, eventually representing the lightning in Thunder Magic. Also see TT 1220: 69.24a, for a commentary by Yü-feng (御風), who associates the snake (she 蛇) with lightning, fire and the trigram li (離). See F.C.Reiter: "A Preliminary Study of the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing (1093-1153)", in: ZDMG 152, pp.169-170.

96 TT 1250: 4a-4b. The participants in the conversation are Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) and Yüan T'ing-chih (袁庭植).

97 Lit. "jump" (t'iao 跳).

body became as hot as fire. After a short time, she delivered a dead born baby. Please, what is the meaning of this event?

[Wang Wen-ch'ing 王文卿] gives the following answer: This is a very clear result. How do you come to be that stupid? There was the great shaking in your heart, which means that the Emissary of Your Ancestral Palace (ju tsu-kung shih che 汝祖宮使者) was immediately transferred to your heart as soon as he had appeared, and this is why your heart was excited (chi 急). As to the green face and the three eyes, this was your own divine force (ju shen 汝神) that following the amulet underwent mutation and change. Your left eye flickered, this means that [the element] fire returned to wood-county (mu-hsiang 木鄉). The mother who under this condition gave birth to [a child] had to lose the child. This principle is clear. What need is there at all to have that many doubts and questions?"

The conversation seems to show that the disciple did not properly control his internal processes in a way that would have transferred to the amulet the required positive force. Obviously, the dispatch of the spirit Emissary the Will did not work. The vital wood-energies should have been transferred to the womb. However, the Taoist in vain consumed them with his beating heart and flickering eye. Anyway, we understand that the dispatch of spirit emissaries and generals goes with amulets, which seems to be a very demanding and responsible effort.

We know that all of this is but a small glimpse of the antique and yet steadily present traditions concerning the application of amulets. Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) and his fellow Thunder specialists participate in this stream of traditions that a text with the title On Writing Amulets (shu-fu shih 書符式) in the collection Great Shang-ch'ing and Ling-pao Rites (Shang-ch'ing ling-pao ta-fa 上清靈寶大法) testifies:⁹⁸

(2a) The ritual method says: In case that the time for writing an amulet has come, you face the East in a pure room (ching-shih 淨室). Pay your respects [to the divinities] and kneel down for long. Visualize your own body to be [the Heavenly Worthy] of Prime Origin (yüan-shih 元始).⁹⁹ There are 10.000

98 On this text, see J. Lagerwey: Companion pp.1021-1024. This corpus of Taoist texts was compiled by Wang Ch'ü-ch'en (王契真); transmitted by Ning Ch'üan-ch'en 寧全真, 1101-1181). As to the translation, see TT 1221 Shang-ch'ing ling-pao ta-fa 14.2a-2b.

99 For another example, see TT 1221: 40.19b.

divinities in attendance all around. Your body has a radiant shining. You breathe in the breaths in the five colours of the five directions, and your hands twist firmly the mudrā Jade Purity (yü-ch'ing chüeh 玉清訣). You use your nose to lead on the nine breaths to enter your mouth and swallow them nine times. You circulate the breaths in the cinnabar fields to ascend and push against the Mud Pill [Palace] (ni-wan [kung] 泥丸 [宮]). The breaths flow throughout the whole body. They evenly spread in all the joints¹⁰⁰ (2b) and release a great radiance that illuminates all around. You see (chien 見) all the heavens, the earth, the sun, the moon and the constellations. After this, you recite the secret spells twelve times, collect the breaths and lead them into the writing brush. You get up your body, pay again your respects [to the divinities], grasp the writing brush and grind your teeth thirty two times. You face then the East in order to write out the amulet. For its upper part, you take the stars and the dipper to top the structure [of the amulet]. You concentrate on the astral constellations, on sun and moon and all their radiance that links up with the breaths of the [secret spells] in Five Paragraphs (wu-p'ien 五篇)¹⁰¹ and illuminates the inside and the outside [of your body]. You collect and treasure [these breaths]. When the time of their application has come, you should visit the Gate of Heaven (t'ien-men 天門), burn incense, again pay your respects and kneel down for long. You silently memorialize to the [Heavenly Worthy] of Prime Origin and clearly state all the matters of concern. After that you can apply [this method], and there will always be the [appropriate] response. Keep the method secret and treasure it dearly.”

This text nicely summarizes the efforts that may lead to the composition of an amulet. The amulet appears to be a cosmic entity just like the acting priest himself who assumes the cosmic dimension of Prime Origin. Certainly, this is most remarkable.¹⁰²

Praying for Rain (tao-yü 禱雨)

A most spectacular and important application of Thunder Magic is certainly the ritual effort to procure rainfall. We must not forget that Taoists lived in an agrarian country, and harvests depended on fine weather conditions. In the case

100 or “orifices”

101 This refers most certainly to the following paragraph “writing five paragraphs of secret spells” (shu wu-p'ien mi-chou 書五篇密咒), TT 1221: 14.2b-3a.

102 For a modern and very conclusive description of Taoist amulets and the related practices as understood today, see Chang Chih-hsiung (張智雄) and Li Feng-mao (李豐楙): Cheng-i fa-fu yü tao-chiao wen-hua (正一法符與道教文化).

Does it not well enclose ch'ien and [the element] metal (乾 金)? Metal gives birth to water. Water has [the potential of] life of heaven and the One (t'ien-i 天一). Heaven and the One are connected with the River Chart (ho-t'u 河圖). The One and the Six lodge at k'an (坎). The [number] One stands for the western region and the region of pure metal. The [number] Four (ssu 四) gives birth to [the element] metal. The [number] Nine of [the element] metal is yang (陽), and the final stage is [reached] when yang (陽) at its zenith gives birth to yin (陰). Yin (陰) is k'un (坤), the [number] Six and the [element] earth (liu-t'u 六土). Does it not well enclose ch'ien and the [element] metal (乾 金)? The [element] metal is yang (陽), and yang (陽) is the dragon. The dragon (lung 龍) has a pool (t'an 潭), and the pool holds the water and the rain. Rain emerges from the breath of earth, and the clouds emerge from the breath of heaven. When the clouds steam, then it is that rainfalls occur. The nine strokes [of the writing brush] for the character yü (雨), "the rain", are connected with heaven, and this is the inherent mystery of yang (陽).

In the thunder department (lei-pu 雷部) there are the wind and the clouds, thunder and lightning, mist and hail, snow and rain (19a). These eight pure matters borrow the Nine, the inherent number of [the element] metal of the River Chart. When it is that yang (陽) finds its final stage, the ninth matter then is the rain.¹⁰⁹ Rain emerges from the breath of the earth. The earth (ti 地) is connected with [the trigram] k'un (坤), and k'un stands for [the element] earth (t'u 土) that dominates yin (陰), and yin (陰) [in turn] procures (sheng 生) the rain.¹¹⁰

You first concentrate [your internal vision] on the red lotus blossom in your heart. The yang-breath (陽氣) steams and descends to enter the one clear pool of water between the two kidneys. The one stroke in the middle of [the trigram] k'an (坎) is the minor-yang (shao-yang 少陽). When the minor-yang is born (sheng 生) for the first time, it is stored within [the element] earth (t'u 土), and then the yang-breath (陽氣) within [the element] earth gradually expands and exceeds. Generally, when the heavenly time has come to let it rain, the yang (陽) steams and [consequently] there is rainfall. The stones become shining (jun 潤) and emit water. When water comes forth [from the stones, we know that] the indicator of 109 The preceding list named nine matters, the last one being "rain". In other words, the preceding eight phenomena build up yang (陽) that culminates in [the number] Nine and in the natural phenomenon that is the rain.

110 Compare J. Blofeld: I Ching, The Chinese Book of Change, pp.216-217. London 1976.

rain has appeared. Yin (陰) encloses the yang-p'o [-souls] (陽魄) and the chill of the nine heavens (chiu-hsiao han 九霄寒).

You collect first the breath of complete yin (陰) that is contained within [the trigram] k'un (坎). You let the breath [of complete yin (陰)] ascend to the double pass of the spine and reach the windlass pass (lu-lu ta-kuan 轆轤關) where it enters as far as three ts'un deep into the window of the brain (nao-hu 腦戶), and [the location] there is called Bright Hall (ming-t'ang 明堂). [This procedure] is tantamount to the installation of the thunder altar (lei-t'an 雷壇) on the top of [Mount] K'un-lun (崑崙).

A second time you let ascend (sheng 陞) the breath of red-yang (hung-yang 紅陽) that is inside the li [-trigram] (離)¹¹¹. [Trigram] li (離) has two ch'ien (乾) [-strokes] that enclose one k'un (坤) [-stroke].¹¹² [The element] earth (t'u 土) is located (19b) inside. Pure yang (ch'un-yang 純陽) is on the outside, and pure yin (ch'un-yin 純陰) is on the inside.¹¹³ Yin (陰) is water.¹¹⁴ There is the saying: The Dipper of the South (nan-tou 南斗) moulds the hun- [souls] (魂). It is the water, which actually moulds.

The womb of [the element] water (shui-t'ai 水胎) is set up at the position of the trigram li (離). Li (離) is the sun. There is a black radiance within the sun, and this [black radiance] exactly is the water. The essence of yin (陰) is within yang (陽), and so the three worlds (san-chieh 三界) are clear and bright, which belongs to the theories for the prayers to attain a clear sky.

In the case of prayers for rain you must "boil the mountains and cook the sea" (p'eng-shan chu-hai 烹山煮海)¹¹⁵ to get rain. You just let the breath of red-yang

111 This is a name for the heart.

112 ch'ien (乾) and k'un (坤) represent yang (陽) and yin (陰).

113 This refers to the trigram li (離). Compare Book of Changes, p.li (Introduction).

114 Compare Hsü Chien (徐堅): Ch'u-hsueh chi (初學記) 6 (tsung-tsai shui 總載水) p.111, quoting Huai-nan tzu (淮南子) and Han-shu (漢書). Ed. Peking 1980.

115 The phrase describes some meditative practices and the appropriate symptoms, see TT 1220: 85.6b "first call upon the fire of the heart. Boil the water of the kidneys, and seemingly within a moment there is a painful heat within the belly, and that exactly is the cooking sea that spills over. Following this, you draw the water of the kidneys as to enter the top [of the head], the boiling mountain. Immediately your forehead transpires cold sweat. This means that the boiling mountain moves". This is said to be a secret internal method. However, in our text the correspondences and associations are different. This is a nice example for an emblematic phrase that everybody re-thinks or re-interprets following the own requirements.

(hung-yang 紅陽) ascend to reach the double pass of the spine, and then let it enter three ts'un deep into the window of the brain (nao-hu 腦戶). This is called the Appointment at the Bright Hall (ming-t'ang chu-cha 明堂駐劄).

You first grasp the yin (陰) of the k'an (坎) [-trigram]. Overflowing black breath covers and rests upon the top of your head. Heaven blurs and bends down on the pagoda, and the four mountains stand amidst blurring mist with drizzling rain [all around]. You let the breath of red-yang (hung-yang 紅陽) ascend and directly collide with¹¹⁶ the breath of yin (yin-ch'i 陰氣). When you see that the red breath arrives, you only see an abundant steaming. Again, you let ascend the yang of k'an (k'an-yang 坎陽) that is a perfectly black breath, which directly collides with the top of your head (ting-hsin 頂心). Two yin [-strokes of k'an (坎)] enclose one yang [-stroke] and, definitely, they produce the abundant steaming. Then it is that the stones moisten and emit water.

When a brilliant and steaming blaze of fire occurs in the middle of the sun, the fish tail then turns over the waves (yü-wei fan-p'o 魚尾翻波), the torpid insects (20a) struggle to get out of the window of earth (ti-hu 地戶) and the sound of thunder certainly shakes the night. When this happens, the radiance of lightning blazes,¹¹⁷ in the North black pigs (wu-chu 烏豬) cross the River¹¹⁸ and black clouds cover the dipper (chao-tou 單斗), [and so we know that] the indicators of rain have appeared.

When in the morning black breath ascends and black clouds cover the base (chiao 腳) [of the land] late in the evening, heavy rain will certainly come. The subtlety [of these instructions] is contained in the basic scriptures that the teacher-master transmits.¹¹⁹

You focus [your meditation] on your heart that resembles a lotus blossom that has not yet opened. [You visualize] the red breath that is inside and sinks straight down to the two kidneys. You see the one clear pool of perfect water (chen-shui 真水). The red breath of the heart sinks down, and this [perfect] water bubbles up enclosing the red breath. [Starting out] from the liver [the red breath]

116 ch'ung (衝) "collide with" or alternatively "forces its way to"

117 I suppose that shan (廟) stands for shan (煽), compare H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary nrs. 9669,9672.

118 The word River points to the Milky Way.

119 Actually, we cannot identify so far central scriptures in the Thunder Magic of that time. Taking the genre of this text into account, the teacher-master should be Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿).

passes the heart and exits from the base of the tongue. You only feel the cloudy breath (yün-ch'i 雲氣) in your mouth (wu-k'ou 吾口)¹²⁰ that suddenly exits and in front of your face revolves, passes the sun-window (sun-hu 巽戶) and gradually becomes as big as the wheel of a carriage to roll on. These clouds fill overflowing the cosmos (liu-ho 六合).

The commentary of Yü-feng (御風) says:¹²¹ Clouds are k'un (坤) and [belong to the element] earth (k'un t'u 坤土). The element earth dominates [the colour] black (hei 黑). However, k'un and earth (k'un t'u 坤土) are enclosed inside the trigram li (離). When yang (陽) reaches its zenith, it procures yin (陰) and yin (陰) is black. The colour black stands for [the elements] water and earth. (20b) The wind comes to life at the centre of [the trigram] li (離). When the wind rises, the fire burns. Heaven and [the number] Three give birth to [the element] wood that is stored in the trigram li (li-kua 離卦). Li (離) lodges at the position of the East. The third transmission after "heaven" procures [the element] wood and is called [trigram] chen (震). It is the eldest son (chang-nan 長男).¹²² [The element] wood is hidden inside the trigram li (li-kua 離卦). [The element] wood procures fire, wind and thunder. They are thus all born within [the trigram] li (離). Thunder and rain come to life on the inside of the trigram k'an (坎卦) at the right side.¹²³ Inside [the trigram] k'an (坎) there is the perfect yang (chen-yang 真陽). It has the designations yang-thunder (yang-lei 陽雷), joy of the heaven (t'ien-hsi 天喜), fire-thunder (huo-lei 火雷) and Six-and-One (liu-i 六一).¹²⁴ [The trigram] k'un (坤) stands for the [number] Six and the centre. Ch'ien (乾) and [the element] metal have the [number] One.¹²⁵ [The number] One gives birth to [the element] metal that [in turn] gives birth to [the element] water. Water makes 120 It says literally: "my mouth". In the commentaries, we generally could speak in the first person ("I"). However, I prefer the second person ("you") to convey the ideas of a didactic address.

121 I cannot exclude that some other unknown text by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) originally preceded the commentary.

122 This means that in the sequence of the trigrams the fourth position ("transmission") after "heaven" (ch'ien 乾) is the trigram chen (震) that therefore is associated with number 4. See Chou-i, 9 (ed. Kanbun taikui vol. 16, 1913). Compare J.Blofeld: I Ching, The Chinese Book of Change, pp.216-219.

123 Yü-yü-chih k'an (於右之坎). Studying the position of trigram li (離) we find that the trigram k'an (坎) is on the right side, compare J.Blofeld: I Ching, p.217 (King Wen's arrangement).

124 Compare TT 1220: 69.24b, for an interpretation of these terms by the commentator Yü-feng (御風), see below the chapter The Creative Impetus. The astronomical term t'ien-hsi (天喜) may refer to the calendar. I do not think this is the point in our text.

125 Concerning the number see, Book of Changes, p.741 (Key for Identifying the Hexagrams); and J.Blofeld: I Ching, The Chinese Book of Change, pp.216, 217.

pools, and pools hold water. It is the water, which makes the rain. This is a most celestial, a most secret and most subtle principle.

When the sound of wind and thunder becomes clearly discernible on the sides of your ears, you expel coughing the breaths nine times. The [number] nine is the old-yang (lao-yang 老陽). It is the principle that the zenith of yang (yang-chi 陽極) produces yin (陰). Now, you realise again nine times the internal practice as described above, and then you feel that the water of the two kidneys has actually ascended, and the water is the rain. When the urine becomes pressing, it is important that you must not release the water of the kidneys when the rain has not [yet] fallen. (21a) Just wait straightaway for the wind and the rain to become very strong, and then you [can] get up and slowly release the urine, but then it is that the big rainfall has already come.¹²⁶ Only this internal practice and conduct (hsing-ch'ih 行持) never result in even one failure. Can you really be careless about this matter?"

The text clearly presents an equation between the natural phenomenon "rain" in our visible world and internal processes within the body of the priest who guides and organises what we may call the internal rain. We can understand this internal practice as application of the general and familiar concept of using the human body as a microcosm that parallels the macrocosm of the visible world. However, they are knit together in an osmotic relationship that the formal symbols of the eight trigrams feature. The human body being a cosmic mirror functions the same time as an irresistible stimulus for nature. The systematic and rather intellectual approach that we find in these texts characterizes many sources of Thunder Magic that date from the Sung period.

Killing and Crusading (sha-fa 煞伐), the Martial Side of Thunder Magic Praying for rain, stopping inundations and other similar good deeds brought the Taoists fame and honours. They believed that natural disasters and deprivations were due to the unruly behaviour of baleful spirit forces that may inhabit official and unofficial shrines. The specialist of Thunder Magic is supposed to know how to handle the problem. Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) offers his insights 126 In other words, it rains as much as it rains within the body of the practitioner.

concerning the ways and means to tackle the difficult task in the chapter Killing and Crusading (sha-fu 煞伐). We read the following expositions: ¹²⁷

(21a) Please let me, [Yüan Wu-chieh (袁無介)], raise some questions about the essential requirements for killing and crusading.

[Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) gives the following answer:] It is all about the breath of rage (nu-ch'i 怒氣) of the own original spiritual force (tsu-chi yüan-shen 自己元神). Any summoning of [spirit] generals and any writing of amulets requires the breath of rage that goes with an urgent and enraged [demeanour]. When you write an amulet, you do it urgently and speedily. Having done the writing you take away the brush [moving the hand towards the direction of] the sun-window (巽 戶). ¹²⁸ At the same time the [spirit] generals and marshals that you summoned to come, all show an enraged apparition. When you dispatch the [spirit] generals, it is necessary that you are tranquil and firm and settle down sitting cross-legged. You concentrate in meditation on the one spark of golden radiance within the spleen that separates to be two sparks. One spark moves on revolving to enter the space between the two kidneys where it changes to become an agglomeration of black breath (hei-ch'i 黑氣). The agglomeration rapidly rushes straight upwards to exit from both eyes. On yang-days (yang-jih 陽日) [the agglomeration] exits from the left eye, and on yin-days (yin-jih 陰日) from the right eye and soars up (fei-shang 飛上) then towards the sun-window (巽 戶). After that, you concentrate in meditation on the [second] spark of golden radiance that revolving enters (21b) the heart where it changes to become red breath (hung-ch'i 紅氣). The red breath exits from the base of the tongue and soars [up] towards the sun-window (巽 戶).

It is the black [breath], which makes the black clouds and the black mist. It is the red [breath], which makes the fierce fire and the glowing-red shining. You only see the black clouds and the blazing fire that inundate heaven and densely fill the cosmos (lin-bo 六合). Black clouds and glowing-red fire are everywhere around and there is just nothing that they would not burn or cover. Divinities wail and demons cry, and there is no location at all where they could escape to and hide away. However, the black breath encloses the red breath and forms countless agglomerations beyond any limits (pai-ch'ien-wan t'wan 百千萬團). At this point of time, a great heat is inside the human body and sweat perspires. You definitely must not move a fan or open your shirt but keep on until the heat becomes very scorching. You use in a very gentle way lamp-wicks (teng-hsin 燈心 [草])¹²⁹ to push them into your nostrils (ch'u-pi 搐鼻). On yang-days (yang-jih 陽日) you push a lamp-wick into the left nostril, and on yin-days (yin-jih 陰日) you push it into the right nostril. You do sneeze once and loudly, and within a moment, just one sound of a thunderclap comes from the window of sun (sun-hu 巽戶). When you have a response like this, then you can dissolve the [Thunder] altar. Certainly, there will never be any failure at all.

127 TT 1220: 69.21a-23b

128 This always indicates the direction of Southeast.

The commentary of Yü-feng (御風) says: Killing and crusading necessarily require that you enrage your outer appearance, your original spiritual force, the fire of your heart (22a) and your internal disposition in order to make them utmost hard and enduring just like the movements of the heavenly bodies, which are strong by themselves and never take a rest.

Generally, when you write amulets you must enrage (fen-nu 奮怒) the essences and spiritual forces in a determined way, so that they leap up boldly. You must be urgent and quick when you are writing amulets. You use both hands to form the [mudrās] Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局) and thrust them onto [the amulet]. Quickly take off the writing brush [moving your hand towards the direction of] the sun-window (sun-hu 巽戶). The generals and marshals that you summoned to come all show an enraged appearance. Having dispatched the generals you conveniently sit down cross-legged and practice silent meditation. Your nostrils inhale the pure breaths of the Anterior Heaven (hsien-t'ien ch'ing-ch'i 先天清氣). [The pure breaths] force directly their way to the yellow court (huang-t'ing 黃庭). The nine orifices above and below are all closed and do not allow any breaths to be absorbed (jung 容). Being in a state of tranquillity you let the one spark of golden radiance that is within the spleen ascend and separate to be two [sparks of radiance].¹³⁰ One spark moves on to enter the two kidneys behind the naval, where it becomes an agglomeration of black breath (bei-ch'i 黑氣). The agglomeration forces its way upwards from the spine and the double pass to reach the two eyes where it exits. On yang-days (yang-jih 陽日) [the agglomeration of breath] exits from the left eye, and on yin-days (yin-jih 陰日) from the right eye in order to soar upwards to the window of sun (sun-hu 巽戶). You concentrate your mind on the one sound of thunderclap that [then] greatly shakes. After this and for a second time the nostrils inhale the pure breath that forces its way to enter the mysterious female (hsüan-p'in 玄牝).¹³¹ Do not allow 129 See Herbert A. Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr. 10864.

130 Literally: „into two parts“.

131 The statement concerning the nine orifices is omitted, compare above.

any breath to be absorbed (jung 容) and keep the colon (ku-tao 穀道) (22b) completely contracted (i-so 一縮). You let the [pure] breath directly ascend to enter revolving the orifices of the heart, where the [pure] breath becomes the red breath that [finally] exits from the base of the tongue and soars upwards to the sun-window (sun-hub 巽戶).¹³²

[The breath] that is black becomes the black clouds and the black mist. [The breath] that is red becomes the red shining and the blazing fire. You only see the black clouds and the shining of fire that collides with heaven and fills overflowing the cosmos. It burns all around the world-of-the-law (fa-chieh 法界) to clean away any poisonous atmosphere. The wicked spirits find their tracks cut off. Fiery clouds and killing breaths cover and stay at all the locations where wicked forces reside. The ritual officer (fa-kuan 法官) in his meditation directs [the fiery clouds and killing breaths] to all these places. Therefore, it is that the divinities wail and the demons cry in those wicked places. There is just no way for them to escape and hide away. The black breaths enclose the red breaths and form agglomerations. One [agglomeration] transforms to become two [agglomerations] and two of them become three [agglomerations] and the three [agglomerations] become countless agglomerations without any limits.

At this time, a great heat is within your body and sweat perspires. You must not move a fan or unbutton your shirt but keep on until the heat becomes scorching. Gently use lamp-wicks (teng-hsin 燈心 [草]) to push them into the nostrils. On yang-days (yang-jib 陽日) you use this method for the left nostril, and on yin-days (yin-jib 陰日) you use this method for the right nostril. You sneeze with one [strong] sound that [corresponds with] one shaking thunder. The wicked forces find their tracks cut off, which is such a subtle matter that I just cannot say it.

[The methods of] Killing and Crusading, Praying (23a) for Rain and [the methods of the] Creative Impetus (tsao-hua 造化) are identical.¹³³ You first concentrate your meditation on the red breath in your heart. The red breath forces its way downwards to the mysterious female (hsüan-p'ín 玄牝). The nostrils again inhale pure breath that you let expand and collide with the spiritual force of the spleen (p'í-shen 脾神). The one spark of golden radiance that is just below the spiritual force of the spleen makes its way directly to the two kidneys. You first contract [and keep closed] the colon, lift up the black breath of the right kidney and let it very slowly move directly upwards to reach the Mud Pill [Palace] (ni-wan 泥丸[宮]). The black breath thus fills overflowing the cosmos (liu-he 六合). The ascent and the absorption of the breaths (hsi 息) happen thirty-six times. Now, you let the red breath of the left kidney ascend to move upwards and reach the Mud Pill [Palace] (ni-wan 泥丸[宮]). When the black breath [there] faces the red breath, they enclose each other and soar up towards the sun-direction (sun-fang 巽方), and all the heaven is filled with black breaths and red breaths. A second time you let the black breath of the right kidney ascend, and [again] you breathe in [breath] (hsi 息) thirty-six [times] that forces its way up to the window of the brain (nao-hu 腦戶).

132 The SUN-[window] (巽) stands for the nostrils.

133 This statement refers to the chapters nrs. 6 and 8 of this text (TT 1220: 69).

Above in heaven and below on earth and absolutely everywhere, there are these black and red killing breaths. They cover and pin down the wicked divinities (hsieh-shen 邪神). Divinities wail and demons cry. They do not have any place where they could escape to with their [outer] apparitions. You grasp the killing breath of the heavenly kang [-star] (t'ien-kang sha-ch'i 天罡煞氣) that burning blazingly shoots forth from the black breaths. Moreover, your nostrils inhale pure breaths that rush to the Heavenly Kang [-star] of the Fire of the Heart (hsin-huo t'ien-kang 心火天罡).¹³⁴ They rush directly to the T'ai-i Cave (T'ai-i hsieh 太乙穴).¹³⁵ You use the nostrils (23b) to lead on these breaths. When you suddenly release a very heavy load of [these] killing breaths there will definitely be a [fitting] response. The mysteries are reserved for the oral transmission from the teacher master.

The last paragraph of the commentary by Yü-feng (御) contains quite a few terms that are very ambivalent, addressing astral names or elements, which obviously are also human properties. The associative method is a common feature in Taoist sources, and Thunder Magic is no exception at all. Sometimes the actual identification of specific terms must follow the explanations that the respective authors found necessary to give. Some Taoist authors reveal their own understanding of the terms they use. In other cases, we are not so fortunate. Any search for explanations in other and, very likely, later texts is a risky endeavour. It is for this reason, that I did not comment here on statements that explicitly rely on oral instructions to become intelligible. Yet, our texts tell us enough to figure out the basic conditions of Thunder Magic.

134 Concerning this phrase, see the following translation of a section of Hsien-t'ien i-ch'i buo-lei Chang shih-che ch'i-tao ta-fa (先天一氣火雷張使者祈禱大法). See above pp.8a-8b, and 6a (concerning "the mysterious female", albeit with a quite different application).

135 See below for a description of this term, following TT 1220: 82.18b-19a.

The collection A Corpus of Taoist Ritual contains quite a number of complete sets of ritual instructions that address individual divine patrons (chu-fa 主法). They usually include the respective pantheon of spirit-generals in a paragraph with the title General Class (chiang-pan 將班). Listings of the subordinate deities follow.¹³⁶ We also find varied instructions concerning ritual matters. For example, we find paragraphs that feature the writing of amulets or the construction of altars that involve the Thunder Divinities. The Great Method for Prayers to the Emissary Chang of the Fire Thunders of the One Breath of the Anterior Heaven (Hsien-t'ien i-ch'ü buo-lei Chang shih-che ch'ü-tao ta-fa 先天一氣火雷張使者祈禱大法)¹³⁷ is such a complete set of instructions concerning Thunder rituals under the patronage of Emissary Chang. Here we find a rather instructive tract concerning the Heavenly T'ien-kang [Stars] (t'ien-kang 天罡):¹³⁸

(18a) As to kang (罡)¹³⁹, the four Correct Ones (ssu-cheng 四正) constitute the bowl of the dipper (kang 罡) that occupies (ch'ü 取) the correct centre of the four directions, and this is my heart (wu-bsin 吾心). The North has the tou [-constellation] (斗) of yin and yang (陰陽).¹⁴⁰ Heaven uses the tou (斗) to manage the ten thousand transformations. Humans use their heart to dominate and display their affairs. It is for this reason that the heart has seven orifices to correspond (ying 應) to the Northern Dipper (北斗). I demonstrate why it is that [the star] p'o-chün (破軍)¹⁴¹ is a heavenly kang [-star] (天罡). In my heart, an orifice inside holds muddy blood. When I am enraged my face turns red, (18b) and this is so because this blood gets up to my face. The common phrase

136 For example, TT 1220: 82.1a-1b.

137 TT 1220: 82.1a-29b

138 TT 1220:82.18a-18b

139 H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr.5906 gives the translation "The name of certain stars", pointing to t'ien-kang (天罡). This means "four stars that form the bowl of the 斗 [nr.11427] constellation,...".

140 tou (斗) of course means "peck" or simply a dry measure, and indeed, we could understand the word in this sense: "The North has the measure of yin and yang". See H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr.11427. Generally see TT 629 T'ai-shang pei-tou erh-shih-pa chang ching, and see K.Schipper, in: Companion p.954, saying that is is a "comparatively late and popular text" that owes much to TT 622 T'ai-shang huan-ling pei-tou pen-ming yen-sheng chen-ching (possibly Sung period).

141 This is a name for the seventh star of the Northern (Big) Dipper. See TT 629 T'ai-shang pei-tou erh-shih-pa chang ching 18b-19b.

is: the fire of the heart rises. [The word] kang (剛) means kang (剛) hard¹⁴² and ch'iang (強) strong.¹⁴³ Rage then is kang (剛) [which means] hard.¹⁴⁴

As to the heavenly tau [-constellation] (斗), the sphere of yin (陰) ranges from the star shu-hsing (樞星) to the star k'uei-hsing (魁星). The sphere of yang (陽) ranges from the star shu-hsing (樞星) to the star p'iao-hsing (杓星). When the heart is tranquil, it is yin (陰). When the heart is excited, it is yang (陽). My heart then is inside [my body the star] lien-chen (廉貞), and on the outside my heart is [the star] p'o-chün (破軍). Now, in the state of tranquillity, I contain my heart inside, and any matters do not bud. [My heart] is in the highest state of being honest (lien 廉) and pure (ch'ing 清). Outside [of my body] my heart then is the [star] p'o-chün (破軍). When a rage develops, my heart is beating fast and is getting bold as if it were rushing in a hurry. Even if there were legions of armed forces (chün 軍), [my heart] could crush (p'o 破) them...¹⁴⁵

This paragraph shows nicely how the association of words and characters constructs the persuasive combination of external, astronomical and internal bodily realities. The ambiguity of many technical phrases that we encounter can also be shown for the term t'ai-i hsüeh (太乙穴). We already had some statement by Yü-feng (御風) that used the term. Yü-feng (御風) commented on Wang Wen-ch'ing's (王文卿) exposition Killing and Crusading (sha-fa 煞伐).¹⁴⁶ It is well known that the name T'ai-i (太乙) refers to a key astral position and stellar deity of antique provenance.¹⁴⁷ The chapter Great Method for Prayers of the Emissary Chang of the Fire Thunders of the One Breath of the Anterior Heaven (Hsien-t'ien i-ch'i huo-lei Chang shih-che ch'i-tao ta-fa 先天一氣火雷張使者祈禱大法) in A Corpus of Taoist Ritual has a telling tract concerning the term and name of T'ai-i (太乙), which goes with the taboo name Hun-ming (混明):¹⁴⁸

142 or „unyielding“

143 or „forceful“

144 See H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nrs.5895 and 5906 as interchangeable characters.

145 The name of the star means „to crush enemy forces“. See TT 629: 17b-19b.

146 See above, TT 1220: 69.21a-23b

147 See F.C.Reiter „The Discourse on the Thunders“, p.224. Concerning this theme, see W.Eichhorn: Die Religionen Chinas, pp.114-115, 124-127. Stuttgart 1973. Also see, H. Maspero: Le taoïsme et les religions chinoises, p.535 (Les procédés de nourrir le principe vital). Paris, rpr. 1971. I.Robinet: Méditation taoïste, pp.205-210. Paris 1979. Compare TT 1220: 76.22a.

148 TT 1220: 82.18b-19a. The name may mean either „United Luminescence“ or „Brightness in Chaos“.

(18b) Now, T'ai-i (太乙) is the cave (hsüeh 穴) where yin (陰) is all united. It is the breath of perfect yin (chih-yin 至陰). The cave is exactly in front of the colon (ku-tao 穀道) and behind the urinary organs where it sinks right into the centre [between them]. The [perfect] breath bends the head and stretches the belly. When you contract [and shut up] the two caves (hsüeh 穴),¹⁴⁹ (19a) the breath ascends spontaneously. This is the subtle function [that is called] to roll up the water and seize the dragon (chüan-shuei ch'in-lung 捲水擒龍)".

These cryptic lines demonstrate in a way that physical dispositions can be projected to identify implicitly astral positions. Thunder Magic rituals reflect outwardly, what the performing priest manages to evolve in his body, in his mind and in his hands. I remind of the plain connection between the urine that is withheld and the rain that has not yet come. The performing specialist of Thunder rituals is much more than an intermediary. He identifies himself in a practical way with the cosmos and creation, and thus becomes its transcendent body. A small portion of a commentary by Yü-feng (御風) can again illustrate this disposition of Thunder Magic:¹⁵⁰

(25a) Heaven has the sun, the moon and the stars that can shine upon all the surroundings. Man has the eyes, the ears and the nostrils and can hear, see and unite the essences, the vital energies and the spiritual forces (ching, ch'i, shen 精氣神) in his human body, in the middle between the two kidneys. The left one is the sun, the right one is the moon, and the central palace (chung-kung 中宮) is the heavenly stars t'ien-kang (天罡) that are the ancestral vital energy (tsu-ch'i 祖氣). The human body has the three rivers (san-chiang 三江), the five lakes, the four seas, the five holy mountains and the four marchlands that become apparent in the facial section [of the body]. My body then is great earth. Mountains and rivers are all completely present. Man is able to arrange the breathing and harmonize the vital energies to unite them in his body. He is able to respond to and unite with the mysteries of heaven and earth. Now, I use all my sincere will (ch'eng-i 誠意) to infuse it to my thoughts and so proceed to turn the handle of the dipper (t'a-fan tou-ping 踏翻斗柄).¹⁵¹ When heaven and earth become unexpectedly dark, this definitely is a response [to this action].

149 This obviously refers to the colon and the urinary organs.

150 TT 1220: 69. 25a

151 For this phrase, see above chapter 2 (chao-bo 召合).

The Creative Impetus (tsao-hua 造化)

The superb position and operational basis of the Thunder specialist becomes again clear when we read still another telling exposition by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿). The chapter Creative Impetus (tsao-hua 造化) fits perfectly well to the preceding expositions in this book that speaks a lot about the relationship between human nature and Thunder Magic. I present the first part of the text by the priest Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) that actually is the basis for the commentary by Yü-feng (御風). I used the commentary to conclude the preceding paragraph:¹⁵²

(23a) Yüan Wu-chieh (袁無介) says: Heaven and earth create and bring about thunder, lightning, wind and rain. What causes could make them occur?

[Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) gives the following answer:] Man is endowed with the breath of heaven and earth, and he lives on it. Heaven and earth are correct and selfless. Man, however, can snatch the creative impetus of heaven and earth. Now, the breaths of the three potentials (san-ts'ai 三才), heaven, earth and man are omnipresent and [the same time] they are individual breaths.¹⁵³ All causes are together with heaven and earth mutually inside and outside. As to wind and rain, thunder and lightning, why should it be difficult to make them occur?

Now, heaven has the sun, the moon and the stars. Their radiance is bright enough to shine on the world all around. Man has his eyes, ears and nostrils, and so he can hear, see and know all creatures between heaven and earth. Earth has the three chiang [-rivers] (江), the five lakes, the four seas, the five holy mountains and the four marshlands, and there are four limbs for all creatures. The [human] body accordingly is (24a) great earth, and the mountains and rivers are all completely present. I actually can put an end to the causes (hsi-yüan 息緣) and harmonize the breaths (t'iao-ch'i 調氣) in order to take the adequate responses from within my body and unite [myself] with the secrets of heaven and earth. Therefore, it is that using my own perfect will (chen-i 真意) I focus my thoughts on the ongoing [ritual] procedures (suo hsing chih shih 所行之事).

152 TT 1220: 69.23b-27a. In this section I skip the commentaries.

153 I do not think that p'ing-hsi (屏息) means "abstain from uttering any sound". See H.A. Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr.9319. Here, the term indicates the individual breaths of each of the three potentials. P'ing (屏) basically means "to set aside".

The perfect breaths of heaven and earth thus follow my will and action. I fix my [internal] vision and seize the response, which never fails in even one single case.

Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) continues his instructions on p. 25a:

"Now, what is born out of me, this is my will. Good and bad, they all emerge from my will. The will is the spiritual agent of the spleen (p'î-shen 脾神). The spleen belongs to [the element] earth. The number of its coming to life (sheng-shu 生數) is the Five, and the number of its completion (ch'eng-shu 成數) is the Ten. The outer shape of the spleen resembles the crescent moon (yen-yüeh 偃月) (25b). When there are no thoughts and calculations the two sharp points [of the spleen] hang downwards. When all the thinking (i-nien 一念) suddenly arises, the two [sharp] points consequently rise and point upwards. Any single spark of thought and calculation emerges at the centre of the spleen that in fact is the ancestral breath (tsu-ch'î 祖氣)¹⁵⁴ of heaven and earth. As soon as any single thought is born, it floats (ku 汩) into the heart. Now, the heart is the lodge of the spiritual agents. When the heart receives this one single spark of the will, which is good or bad, vile or killing, which may have [the quality of] an immortal or of a Buddha, the heart serves them all.

If I am able to know the source and the flow (yüan-liu 源流) of the ancestral breath, I must resolutely hold on to this one spark of perfect breath (chen-ch'î 真氣). I am (wo 我) then [in the position of] ruler (chu-tsai 主宰)¹⁵⁵ in heaven and on earth, which pertains to the employment of my heart. If I let my heart be enraged, cruel and bad, I lack the Tao of Heaven (t'ien-tao 天道) and shall eternally be a demon of the lowest class (hsia-kuei 下鬼). How could I still be able to seize the creative impetus of heaven and earth?"¹⁵⁶

These texts show clearly that the terminology of internal alchemy (nei-tan 內丹) describes the fundamental conviction of the existential identity of man and the cosmos. This notion implies the precondition of a human identity with those divine potentials that carry life. The external thunder and rain appear to be functions and expressions of thunder and rain within the human body, where they first have to be aroused. The cosmos inevitably will mirror and echo such internal processes.

154 Or say "ancestral vital energy", which I eventually use as alternative translation for the sake of convenience.

155 I notice that H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr.11490 offers the translation "god".

156 „...and act as a ritual specialist?" This is the implied question.

We find that the texts by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿), especially his Wang Shib-ch'en ch'i-tao pa-tuan chin (王侍宸祈禱八段錦) show a rather modest application of nei-tan (內丹) terminologies.¹⁵⁷ The commentaries on the other hand indulge in nei-tan (內丹) rhetoric, which was in tune with the culture of the time. Comparing the School Talks with this text "in eight paragraphs", we hardly can claim that those specialists of Thunder Magic fostered a common and mandatory set of nei-tan (內丹) terminologies. The terminology and rhetoric may have depended on the individual affiliation of the respective priest and his education. We know that many materials went through the hands of later compilers and editors, and Pai Yü-ch'an (白玉蟾 13th ct.) certainly was only one of them. It is risky to project later interpretations backwards and claim them for an interpretation of earlier works. I certainly want to repeat that there is no need to do so, although we may not be able to understand every coded indication.

Thunder Magic was a very practical matter. I continue to present a chapter of A Corpus of Taoist Ritual that we connect with some certainty with Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿). It contains theoretical and practical instructions that show the range of ritual approaches and methods in Thunder Magic. However, there is no connection with the cult and the ritual patronage of any specific Thunder divinity. The texts contain general and didactic instructions that serve us well.

I already said that A Corpus of Taoist Ritual contains many ritual programs that are based on the patronage of specific deities. The programs include the lists of the pantheon and instructions about ritual steps, amulets, mudrās, spirit hells and other ritual devices that may be used to control the spirit forces. I call to mind, for example, the Great Method for Prayers to the Emissary Chang of the Fire Thunders of the One Breath of the Anterior Heaven (Hsien-t'ien i-ch'i huo-lei Chang shib-che ch'i-tao ta-fa 先天一氣火雷張使者祈禱大法).¹⁵⁸

The following paragraphs in this book present the comprehensive and informative Divine Texts of the Great Methods of the Five Thunders at the Jade Department in the Heaven of Highest Purity (Shang-ch'ing yü-fu wu-lei ta-fa yü-shu ling-wen 上清玉府五雷大法玉樞靈文).¹⁵⁹ This text deals with many practical devices of Thunder Magic that all have transcendent foundations, which is well explained in the detailed preface by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿).

157 TT 1220: 69.1a-27b

158 TT 1220: 82.1a-29b, see above.

159 TT 1220: 56.1a-42a

He gives a survey on the divine potentials that condition the pantheon and the various means of the Thunder specialist. He adopts in his presentation the position and authority of the evasive figure of his teacher who allegedly was the Fire Master of Thunder and Thunderclaps. He displays the Arrangement of the Offices of Thunder and Thunderclaps together with an extended Thunder pantheon.¹⁶⁰ Some paragraphs of the text present the Precious Seals of Thunder Might and the methods to use them. Much attention is being paid to the Locations and Departments of the Five Thunders and their different types. We find again, in a way unexpected, the story of the Great Divinity of Law and Order who closely links Thunder Magic with the national legendary history.¹⁶¹ The application of Thunder breaths, the writing of amulets to cure illnesses, to raise dragons and produce rainfall, such activities are major themes in chapter 56. Spells, mudrās and ritual steps all matter greatly in these instructive texts. How to build thunder altars, how to construct hells to put away demonic forces and how to crusade against evil deities in their shrines, such questions and many more get fascinating answers in chapter 56 of A Corpus of Taoist Ritual. They always remind us of the explanations that we have just seen.

The priest moves within the solid frame of his religious career, receiving registers and oral secret instructions. In the case that he performs bravely his tasks, he can rise in the spirit administration up to divine functions and ranks. This seems to ascertain the basic conviction of the divine nature of the priest, which he can consciously employ in ritual.

Yet, some Thunder rituals are performed with "dishevelled hair and barefooted". There is no word about robes and ritual caps or an especially dignified demeanour. The demeanour of the Taoist Yeh Ch'ien-shao (葉千韶) reportedly was not always very dignified and in many ways may remind us of the modern exorcists whom we have seen in action in Taiwan.¹⁶² However, we have to accept, I believe, any Taoist self-identification. We also should accept what Taoists of any epoch tell us about the range of their theoretical and practical ways and means and the constituents of their religion and culture.

160 TT 1220: 56.5a-10a. The pantheon comprises more than one hundred abstract names that I do not list.

161 TT 1220:56.14b-15b. See above "Assembling the Divine Force", in: TT 1220: 124.1b-2a.

162 See above my Introduction. Compare P. Nickerson: "Attacking the Fortress, Prolegomenon to the Study of Ritual Efficacy in Vernacular Daoism", pp.117-179, in: AAS 20.

All our themes concerning the theoretical and practical elements of Thunder Magic reappear in the many other chapters of A Corpus of Taoist Ritual, albeit with many variants that are due to different historic and regional backgrounds. Due to the introduction by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) Chapter 56 shows a rather comprehensive and authoritative documentation of the historical and yet general conditions of Thunder Magic.

A Corpus of Taoist Ritual (Tao-fa hui-yüan 道法會元) contains quite a number of comprehensive sets of Thunder rituals. They often represent regional traditions and affiliations that we hardly can trace concerning their historic roots. Fortunately, chapter 56 in A Corpus of Taoist Ritual has a preface by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) that at least suggests that the chapter has his spiritual patronage. I present most of chapter 56 in translation to complement the preceding presentation in Chapter I. The title of chapter 56 in A Corpus of Taoist Ritual is promising:¹

Divine Texts of the Great Methods of the Five Thunders at the Jade Department in the Heaven of Highest Purity, (Shang-ch'ing yü-fu wu-lei ta-fa yü-shu ling-wen 上清玉府五雷大法玉樞靈文),

Preface by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿):

(1a) The Fire Master of Thunder and Thunderclaps (lei-t'ing huo-shih 雷霆火師) says: formerly when Heaven and Earth (hsüan-huang 玄黃) were not yet separated,² there was a phase of dimness with hardly any light at all. When the clear and the turbid then separated, the existence of the visible signs of the Vital Principle (hung-meng 鴻蒙)³ came first into being.

The Supreme God-Emperor of Prime Origin (Yüan-shih shang-ti 元始上帝) saw that there were no principles for symbols and signs, and so he initiated the great saintly beginning with his command to carve and define the opportune and clear cut rules and standards for the form of the characters. The precious books on flowery writing tablets, the dragon texts and phoenix seal characters thus became manifest in radiant light.

At that time, the Perfect King of Jade Purity (Yü-ch'ing chen-wang 玉清真王) of the exalted Shen-hsiao (神霄) [-Heaven] stayed at the Golden Palace of Congealed Spiritual Might (Ning-shen chin-ch'üeh 凝神金闕). He reflected on the saints and nobles who sympathised with the living beings in the regions beneath where they float drowning in the the sea of bitterness. They drift along in the waves of birth and death. In ten thousand kalpas, they experience injustice and error, and the bewitching spirits are able to destroy or harm [them]. The Perfect King felt sorrow and sympathy, and using the proper formal way he questioned whether any diligent attention was being paid [to the situation].

1 TT 1220: 56.1a-42a

2 Chou-i 1 (k'un 坤), p. 23, in: Kanbun taikēi (Tokyo 1913). See Book of Changes p. 391.

3 Chuang-tzu chi-chieh (莊子集解) 3 (tsai-yu 11 在宥), p. 66, in: Chu-tzu chi-ch'eng (諸子集成). (Peking 1986). Compare H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr.5269.

The Supreme God-Emperor of Prime Origin dwelling in the Golden House at the Jade Palace said to the Perfect King:

Those creatures are not yet (1b) enlightened and consequently concentrate in themselves the [karmic] causes (she-yin 攝因).⁴ If the creatures were enlightened about the fact that they concentrate the [karmic] causes in themselves, how could they [still] be in the Hell of Earth? As to the Halls of Heaven, would they then not be the befitting places for them?

The Perfect King kowtowed, repeatedly saluted, knelt down for a long time and looking up with respect stated his gratefulness for the heavenly mercy and expressed his vow to hold on to the essentials for perfection. The [God-Emperor of] Prime Origin felt sympathy with him, and was that not good?

Thereupon [the God-Emperor] ordered the Divine Favourite (ling-fei 靈妃), the Jade-girl of Cave Mystery (Dong-miao yü-nü 洞妙玉女) that she takes the gilded key that dragons adorn and open the lock with jade inlays of a whistling phoenix at the Temple Subtle Perfection of the Flowers of the West (Hsi-hua miao-chen tien 西華妙真殿). She was to take the chest made of shining jade and precious stones and confer the transmission of the Tao of Primordial Unity (hun-bo chih tao 混合之道) of the Purple Script of the Three Luminaries (san-kuang tzu-wen 三光紫文). She was to teach [the Perfect King] the mudrās (chüeh 訣) of the Five Thunders, which control wicked forces and behead bewitching demons. [The mudrās] have the designations Black Dragon, Red Horse, Blazing Fire and Prosperous Circuit. One uses them to dispatch the emissaries from the empyrean, which is a perfectly hidden and most secret essential [matter].

At that time, the Supreme God-Emperor of Prime Origin directed the great lot of complaisant saints of the ten regions to return, and he ordered the demons to ascend and enter the state of formlessness. The Perfect King was sent down to stop the evil world. The Perfect King thereupon took the amulets and seals, the dragon-tracts of the Five Thunders (2a) and the secret instructions of the astronomical calculations concerning the Northern Dipper as to transmit them to the Elder of the Five Holy Mountains (Wu-yüeh chang-jen 五嶽丈人)⁵ saying:

4 See W.E.Soothill and L.Hodous: A Dictionary of Chinese Buddhist Terms, p. 205a. (Rpr. Taipei 1972). Also compare Ting Fu-pao (丁福保): Fò-hsiieh ta tzu'u-tien (佛學大辭典) 984c-985a (shih-yin 攝因). Taipei 1974.

It is the Northern Constellation (pei-ch'en 北辰) of Heaven,⁶ which all the other stars salute.⁷ Below [the constellation] there are the two palaces that are named the Pivot and the Initiatory Force (shu-chi 樞機),⁸ and they are said to be the two poles of the East and the West. The Palace Pivot revolves and has the might that transforms life (hua-sheng 化生).⁹ The Palace Initiatory Force is the institution that on behalf of the god-emperors executes the commands and regulates the nine hundred and six [types of] disasters and calamities in the yang-[sphere] (陽). [The Palace Initiatory Force] is in charge of all affairs that pertain to happy and cruel [events] among people, to demons and divinities, disastrous and favourable events. It issues and brings to life all the beings with their categories and oscillating appearances. All of this is evidence for orders and commands, and it is for this reason why thunder divinities (lei-shen 雷神) exist.

There are five types of thunders, namely the Heavenly Thunder (t'ien-lei 天雷), the Divine Thunder (shen-lei 神雷), the Dragon Thunder (long-lei 龍雷), the Water Thunder (shui-lei 水雷) and the Earth-Altar Thunder (she-ling 社令).

5 Huang-ti (黃帝) is said to have bestowed this Taoist title on a Taoist who lived on Mount Ch'ing-ch'eng shan (青城山) in Szechwan, see TT 1032 Yün-chi ch'ü-ch'ien 120: 13a; 122.10b. However, in this text Wu-yüeh chang-jen most likely refers to a transcendent divinity who is linked with the very beginning of Taoist revelations. TT 599 Tung-t'ien fu-ti yüeh-tu ming-shan chi 4b also refers to a much later stage in Taoist history.

6 Pei-ch'en, Horus boreal, which is connected with the divinity T'ien-huang ta-ti. See G. Schlegel: Uranographie Chinoise, p. 815. (Leiden 1875).

7 Or translate: "encircle", see H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr. 6575 (kung 拱).

8 "Pivot and Initiatory (or "Moving") Force" is an ambivalent term. It can stand for crucial units of the (spirit) administration and military forces. I remind of the term shu-chi fang (樞機房) denoting a "Central Control Office" (T'ang), see Hucker, nr.5418. My translation of the term is meant to imply the function of a transcendent military office as indicated. F.C.Reiter: "Discourse on the Thunders", p. 213 (translating TT 1220: 67. 21a, Lei-shuo 雷說 by Wang Wen-ch'ing 王文卿), in: JRAS 14/3. Also see the same: "A Preliminary Study of the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing (1093-1153)", p.181, in: ZDMG 152. TT 1220: 67.3a explains that the term identifies Thunder and thunderclaps (Chang Shan-yuan 張善淵: Lei-t'ing hsüan-lun 雷霆玄論).

9 In Buddhism, this also is an important term, see W.E.Soothill and L.Hodus: A Dictionary of Chinese Buddhist Terms, p.142a (Anpāḍaka).

雷). Furthermore, there is the Thunder Wall (lei-ch'eng 雷城) that is located amidst the Brahma-breaths (fan-ch' i 梵氣) above the white and jade-like milky-way and the Prefecture of the Perfect King in [the Heaven of] Jade Purity. The Thunder Wall is 2300 miles away from the region of the Prefecture of Jade Purity. The Wall is high eighty-one chang (丈),¹⁰ and I¹¹ (wu 吾) have the Thunder Wall in control. Due to the resident officials, masters, emissaries, ministers and branch offices for distinct duties there is a leading force for the bestowal of (2b) life for all creatures that urges on and moves the sea and the mountains. Thus, the four seasons are pushed on and shifted, yin and yang are made to rise and descend, and [that leading force] registers the good and punishes the bad. The Five Thunders Headquarter Office is the very centre that right in time issues the orders. The Headquarter has its own Special Offices of the Five Thunders Emissaries that comprehensively assist the Five Thunders. Below, they control the three offices, [named] North Pole (pei-chi 北極), Jade Pivot (Yü-shu 玉樞) and P'eng-lai (蓬萊).

When in all the world wind and rain are untimely and excessive heat causes torching droughts, locusts bring calamity, armoured strive madly wages and famine happens often and severely, all of this is due to requests for [divine] commands. The god-emperors (ti-chün 帝君)¹² issue the orders and the Jade Pivot forwards the commands (hao-ling 號令) [for the execution of the orders]. The pivot itself operates three hundred officials in authorized positions who assist and support the control of the transformations of life (sheng-hua 生化).

All men, who strive for perfection, yearn for Tao (道) [but] do not discuss the essential mysteries they will have their outer form recede, deteriorate and decay. [In the case that] they do not use amulet water (fu-shui 符水) their efforts will not reach up to the Three Heavens (san-t'ien 三天). [In the case that] they do not rinse [their mouth with] the refined essences (ching-hua 精華), their spiritual forces are not pure and pleased. [In the case that] they do not help people in illness and distress, the success of Tao will be hard to achieve.

Concerning those who yearn for the immortals, study Tao and wish to be rapidly successful, nothing is better than the beheading of evil forces, the expulsion of 10 Concerning the Thunder Wall, see F.C.Reiter: "Discourse on the Thunders", p. 218, and note 90, in: JRAS 14/3.

11 Following the phrasing in TT 1220: 56.3b the [Perfect] King in the [Heaven] of Jade-Purity should be the speaker.

12 TT 1220: 56.4a has ti-ch'en (帝真) in a similar phrase. Also compare TT 1220: 84.9a "...all comes from orders by the god-emperors".

harm, the application of (3a) amulets, the consecration of water (chou-shui 祝水), the help for people and profiting the creatures, the ample collection of hidden merits and in subtle ways the support for religious veneration (hsiang-huo 香火). When [such persons] come together with creatures, they consider how to save them. They are correct and straight without any wickedness, and they behave themselves so all life long from its very beginning. Now, how should they ponder that the easy ascent [to heaven] could not be achieved?

Just be afraid that you are not able to meditate in a refined way and be afraid that you take resort to a superficial and shallow [demeanour]. [Be afraid that] the amulets and mudrās (fu-chüeh 符訣)¹³ are incomplete, that merits come late and effects are little. [Be afraid that ritual] engagements do not have any magic force [at all], and in the end your remissness is overwhelming. I am very much embarrassed about the situation, and therefore I take today the secret instructions and the divine texts of the Jade Pivot to hand them down to the world of man.

If the secret instructions and the divine texts of the Jade Pivot are internally applied, they can be used for the cultivation and control of the body. If they are externally applied, they can be used to pacify the people and help the country. [They can be used] to pray for rain, clear the sky, eliminate disasters and do away with unfortunate events. They can be used to drive away dragons and snakes that cause calamities in rivers and lakes and restrain scaly dragons and water monsters in pools and caves where they harm people. [The secret instructions and divine texts] save the living beings (sheng-ling 生靈) from the distress of great dangers and release the legions of hun-souls (hun 魂) that face the darkness of Hades. [The secret instructions and divine texts help] to crusade against temples, expel any wicked forces, eradicate evil spirits and heal sickness. They make the thunders and thunderclaps circulate [starting out] from your palms, and they cause wind and rain to come right before your eyes. [The secret instructions and divine texts help] to adjust the crimes and faults of seven generations of ancestors in the nine dark [regions]. They abolish (3b) the blood sacrifices of thousands of lives in hundreds of kalpas.

Keep close to the divine texts (ling-wen 靈文) and secret manuals and so have the cause to be in charge of the creatures and profit the living beings. The subtle instructions and divine recipes (shen-fang 神方) save all around from deadly disasters, from confusion and illness. Those who have received [these documents] must keep them safely. Those who come across them have the destination to do so. They have the [required] restraint and practice self-cultivation (hsing-ch'ih 行持).¹⁴ [Such persons] can wait to ascend soaring [to heaven]. Being diligent at the beginning and remiss in the end, [such persons] drown eternally in the sea of misery. Perfectly investigate [the magic texts and secret manuals] and set them to use. Echo and response will immediately occur.

13 Or translate: the "instructions for [the composition of] amulets".

T'ai-su ta-fu ning-shen tien shih-ch'en Wang Wen-ch'ing (太素大夫凝神殿侍宸王文卿) The Attendant Wang Wen-ch'ing, the Gentleman T'ai-su of the Temple Ning-shen, wrote this preface."

(3b) The Arrangement of the Offices of Thunder and Thunderclaps (lei-t'ing fen-ssu 雷霆分司)¹⁵

The Fire Master of Thunder and Thunderclaps (Lei-t'ing huo-shih 雷霆火師) says: when the Five Thunders is well understood, you should know all the departments of the thunder prefecture (lei-fu 雷府). When they all are known there will be immediate responses in the case that requests were made. Furthermore, the Thunder Wall is located amidst the Brahma-breaths (fan-ch'i 梵氣) above the white and jade-like milky-way and the Prefecture of the Perfect King in [the Heaven of] Jade Purity. The Thunder Wall is 2300 miles away from the sphere of the prefecture. The Wall is high eighty-one chang (丈). It is the location,¹⁶ which the King of the Heaven of Jade Purity has in control. His officials, masters, emissaries, ministers and branch offices for distinct duties rule over the bestowal of life for (4a) all creatures, urge on and move the sea and the mountains, push on and shift the four seasons, let yin and yang rise and descend and register the good and punish the bad. In the very centre, there are the rulers of the Five Thunders who right in time issue the orders to support the operations of the Perfect King.¹⁷ Furthermore, the emissaries of the Five Thunders are specialised officials at the Thunder Wall who comprehensively assist the Five Thunders and relate the orders with the individual offices.

14 Or: "internal cultivation". See above the chapter A First Approach to Thunder Magic.

15 This section very much reads like a later summary or even repetition of the preface by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿).

16 Or translate: "office" (ssu 所).

17 See above the translation of p. 2a-2b. This text closely parallels the introduction by Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿).

Whenever wind and rain do not accord with the season and torching heat becomes a burden, armoured strife madly wages and famine happens often and severely, all of this is due to requests for [divine] orders by the god-emperors and the perfected ones (ti-chen 帝真).¹⁸ There is just nothing, which does not come from the Jade Pivot, which in a great way covers the detachments of the regions (fen-yeh 分野). At the same time, it leads on the generals and emissaries of the Three Monitoring Offices (san-ssu 三司) to judge over and regulate the merits and failures of demons and divinities in the three realms (san-chieh 三界), and thus take care of the wellbeing of the black haired people.

Furthermore, in the tou-constellation (斗) there are divine prefectures (shen-fu 神府) and the [Palace] Pivot (shu 樞). The Pivot has administrators (hsiang 相), and therefore there is a Court of the Jade Pivot (yü-shu yüan 玉樞院) that is also called Court of the Pivot Constellation (tou-shu yüan 斗樞院). Officials in authorized positions have distinct duties. They are about two hundred officials who support the administration of the Perfect King and guide the duties of thunder and thunderclaps. Concerning the disaster of floods and drought, armoured strife and famine, they all come from corrective actions and thus [are bound to] happen.

(4b) The Headquarter Office of Thunder and Thunderclaps (lei-t'ing tu-ssu 雷霆都司) is the Special Control Office (chuan-ssu 專司) of the God-Emperor of the North (Pei-ti 北帝) that arranges the ranks of the officials, distributes the individual duties and assists the governance of the Jade Pivot.¹⁹ Whenever in the world floods cause inundations [or] drought-demons [operate], in all cases one asks the Court of the Jade Pivot (yü-shu yüan 玉樞院) that the respective reports [about the disasters] would be transferred to the higher echelons and that action would be taken. As to the battle-axes and halberds of thunder and thunderclaps, as to applause, rewards and punishments, they all have their regulations and are not in a state of confusion. There are officials who are in charge of all of them.

The Heart of Heaven (t'ien-hsin 天心) has the thunders but they are not only there. Furthermore, there is the P'eng-lai Office (P'eng-lai ssu 蓬萊司) that is controlled by the Capital Commissioner of the Waters. His generals and 18 See above p. 2b for a similar phrase, which uses the term ti-chün (帝君).

19 The text writes "Jade Initiatory Force" or perhaps "Jade Chi-[Military Office]" (yü-chi 玉機), which most certainly is a mistake. This phrase does not occur anywhere else. I suppose that we should read yü-shu chih cheng (玉樞之政).

品天官).²⁹ The following rank has the Seal of the Mercury Heaven of Purple Radiance. Those who receive the seal carry it on their belt. They rely on it for years to use it when there are the occasions to summon thunder divinities, move mountains, exhaust the sea, expel dragons and cause rainfall.

Now, there are hidden forms [of spirit forces] that [either] soar in the void [or] walk on earth. They are fierce and wicked demons and deities, and you just use the seal in order to attach it to the spot where they dwell. They shall spontaneously perish. When you should raise dragons and cause rainfall, you use the seal to seal the amulets and memoranda (fū tieh 符牒). However, you must not use the seal in any faulty way. Divine, indeed, is the seal.

The seal of the subsequent rank is the Seal of the Fire Script of Thunder Radiance. (11a) Those who happen to receive the seal can use it in order to employ and dispatch the Five Thunders, punish and behead wicked and malignant spirits, raise clouds, bring about rainfall and subdue water monsters (shui-kuai 水怪). If men who cultivate perfection and concoct the elixirs receive the seal, they can use it to secure the site of an altar (t'an-ch'ang 壇場). Demons and monsters see its red shining over a distance of ten thousand chang, all the fire and smoke that range across heaven. The demons and monsters cannot show up [at the site] as intruders and thieves. When you carry [the seal] on your belt and happen to find yourself amidst [fighting] troops, blank weapons cannot harm your body. Concerning amulets and memoranda, you also use the seal to seal them.

Formerly, Lord Mao (Mao-chün 茅君) carried the seal on his belt. His rank was promoted to be Superior Chamberlain³⁰ and Arbiter of Fate at the Holy Mountain of the East (Tung-yüeh shang-ch'ing ssu-ming 東嶽上卿司命). Having ascended to heaven, he later bequeathed the pattern of the seal (yin-uen 印文) to our world.

Then there is the Seal of the Cavern-Magic of Jade-Dawn (yü-ch'en tung-ling 玉晨洞靈) that is also called Seal Tou-k'uei (斗魁印). Formerly Lord Mao additionally carried the seal on his belt. Anyone who happens to get this seal can use it to shine on and behead scaly sea serpents and wicked dragons. He can use it to summon thunder and cause rainfall. The immediate responses happen right in time, and [the seal] never fails. In case that you should pray for a clear sky, for snow to fall, to transmit salvation (ch'uan-tu 傳度)³¹ and dispatch [divine forces], for all these activities, you use the seal to seal [the appropriate documents]. Perhaps you issue formal documents, memorialise petitions as well as all the other types of official memoranda, amulets and reports, they shall ascend and arrive in time [in the heavens]. Generally, (11b) when you have these seals on your belt and your way takes you to provinces and districts, where religious rites³² for the god of the city wall and moat take place (Ch'eng-buang 城隍) you are always respectfully received.

29 This is the divine title of the priest, who holds such seals.

30 See Hucker, p. 407, nr.4987.

(11b) Method of Consecrating Seals (chi-yin fa 祭印法)

For any consecration of thunder seals, you take six ping (丙) days when thunders had occurred. You arrange at night and beneath the pivot of the dipper an altar table that faces the kang-stars (罡). You put some fruits of the season on the table, but you must not use pomegranates, water chestnuts, the roots of lotus, ko-beans (葛), sweet cane, black cucumber (t'u-kua 土瓜) and the like. You properly take twelve portions of tee and wine, burn incense and look far out to the pivot of the dipper. You offer repeatedly your veneration to address above [in the heavens] the Commissioner at the Dipper and Secretarial Receptionist (tou-hsia shu-hsiang t'ung-shih she-jen 斗下樞相通事舍人)³³ and speak the [following] spell:

This evening your disciple burns incense and respectfully performs the Great Method of the Five Thunders in order to infuse [its might] into the divine seals to be jointly used to employ the [divine] emissaries. I do not dare to act alone on my own authority. I reverently submit my request to the Commissioner at the Dipper and Secretarial Receptionist, to the Commissioners of the Waterways³⁴ at the right and left sides, to the Lads of Jade-Perfection (yü-wan t'ung-tzu 玉完童子), to the Lower Memorial Processors (tson-shih [kuan] 奏事[官]) of the Five Thunders who attend to the amulets and to the Palace Guards (kung-ts'ao 功曹), who are in charge today.³⁵ I reverently submit my wish that you all descend riding your carriages as to receive and be pleased with my ample rites [of veneration].

31 Or translate: "transmit initiation and ordination".

32 T'ü-t'ien (祠典) has the meaning of ssu-t'ien (祀典).

33 Hucker, p. 435, nr. 5431; p. 556, nr. 7507. The divine title is possibly a mistake for tou-chung shu-hsiang (斗中樞相), see the pantheon IT 1220: 56.6a.

34 Hucker, p. 542, nr. 7282.

35 Hucker, p. 527, nr. 7042; p. 297, nr. 3489.

Again you salute three times, pour wine, burn incense and use (12a) [for the sacrifice] twelve pieces of gold currency and twelve cloud-horses (yün-ma 雲馬). The left hand and the right hand form twisting [the fingers] the mudrâ pattern-ch'en (辰文). You speak in silent meditation the [following] formula:

Heaven, help me to get the wood on a ping 丙 [-day].³⁶ Radiance of thunder, transform life. Pivot of the dipper (ton 斗), let your magic might descend. Change and let work the five phases (wu-hsing 五行). The eight trigrams (pa-kua 八卦) may be magically penetrating all around. The nine provinces may be in a state of awe. The Water Department may be the controlling agent, and the fire monsters must dissolve their outer forms. I wish to have the divine breaths descend and floating spread out everywhere in the nine [spheres] of purity. Act urgently as this is the law and order.

Having spoken the spell you concentrate on all the deities that descend and let the perfect breaths come close to you. You inhale [the perfect breaths and] lead them into the seal. You take [the seal] then back to a quiet room and must not allow women, chicken and dogs to see it. Do use [the seal] in accordance with the rules.

Spell for taking out the seal (ch'u-yin chou 出印呪): Fire bells in the palace, your scorching brightness combines and penetrates [all around]. Five Thunders of the five regions, let your radiance descend and arouse the wind. Might of heaven, terrify the four regions, and the evil forces will extinguish their tracks. Act urgently as this is the law and order.

(12b) Spell for using the seal (yung-yin chou 用印呪): August emperors of heaven do issue your orders to behead the wicked spirits and extinguish the cruel ones. The divine seal is stamped down right away, and wind and fire may thus become urgent and pressing. Act most urgently, as this is the law and order of the superior god-emperors.

Having spoken the spell you take the breath of thunder (lei-ch'i 雷氣) and blow it onto the seal. You concentrate your vision on the radiance of fire that extends over a distance of ten thousand feet. Above, it links up with the pivot of the ton-constellation (斗), and down here [on earth], it flows into the pattern (wen 文) of the seal. You concentrate on the radiance of the lightning of the Five Thunders that shakes and echoes in heaven and on earth. The Heaven of the Divine 36 See above p. 10b, which says that the wood for a seal has to be collected on special days.

Empyrean (shen-bsiao t'ien 神宵天) will be half-blue and half-red. You inhale these breaths into your mouth and blow them onto the seal.³⁷

Spell for taking back the seal (ju-yin chou 入印咒): Divine seal do return to the sun [-direction] (sun 巽). Jade lads do return to your [heavenly] palaces. All you functionaries do guard your positions. When you receive my summoning, you [must] follow suit. Act most urgently as this is law and order.

After speaking the spell, you wrap up the seal and let the Thunder officials and saints control it as before.³⁸ If you are not performing rituals, you must not take out and air the seal.

(13a) The Locations and Departments of the Five Thunders (wu-lei suo-pu 五雷所部)

The Fire Master says: In general, there are five [sorts of] thunders, namely the Heaven Thunder (t'ien-lei 天雷), the Divine Thunder (shen-lei 神雷), the Dragon Thunder (lung-lei 龍雷), the Water Thunder (shuei-lei 水雷) and the Altar of Earth Thunder (she-ling lei 社令雷).

A commentary in small print says: another name is Thunder of the Wicked-Spirits (yao-lei 妖雷). The Thunder of the Wicked-Spirits does not accept commands from the god-emperors and therefore its appellation is "wicked spirits".

What [the thunders] rule over is not at all the same, and their departments are to be distinguished. The men who study Tao and their disciples who receive the ritual methods all attain the means they can rely upon, and so they can issue memoranda, prayers and requests. However, in the case that one does not know these methods (fang 方), one exerts the mind in vain.

As to the Heaven Thunder (t'ien-lei 天雷), hundreds of officials and thousands of generals support above [in heaven] the Jade Emperor (yü-ti 玉帝) and below [on earth] they control yin and yang (陰陽). Their might and virtue weigh 37 Compare the paragraph shu-fu (書符) On Writing Amulets, in TT 1220: 69.14a-16a (Wang shih-ch'ên ch' i-tao pa-tuan chin 王侍宸祈禱八段錦) that echoes such statements.

38 This speaks of those divinities that the ritual addresses and involves. The formulation is opaque but we also find the formulation on TT 1220: 56.41b, where it should have the same meaning and application.

Again you salute three times, pour wine, burn incense and use (12a) [for the sacrifice] twelve pieces of gold currency and twelve cloud-horses (yün-ma 雲馬). The left hand and the right hand form twisting [the fingers] the mudrá pattern-ch'en (辰文). You speak in silent meditation the [following] formula:

Heaven, help me to get the wood on a ping 丙 [-day].³⁶ Radiance of thunder, transform life. Pivot of the dipper (tau 斗), let your magic might descend. Change and let work the five phases (wu-hsing 五行). The eight trigrams (pa-kua 八卦) may be magically penetrating all around. The nine provinces may be in a state of awe. The Water Department may be the controlling agent, and the fire monsters must dissolve their outer forms. I wish to have the divine breaths descend and floating spread out everywhere in the nine [spheres] of purity. Act urgently as this is the law and order.

Having spoken the spell you concentrate on all the deities that descend and let the perfect breaths come close to you. You inhale [the perfect breaths and] lead them into the seal. You take [the seal] then back to a quiet room and must not allow women, chicken and dogs to see it. Do use [the seal] in accordance with the rules.

Spell for taking out the seal (ch'u-yin chou 出印呪): Fire bells in the palace, your scorching brightness combines and penetrates [all around]. Five Thunders of the five regions, let your radiance descend and arouse the wind. Might of heaven, terrify the four regions, and the evil forces will extinguish their tracks. Act urgently as this is the law and order.

(12b) Spell for using the seal (yung-yin chou 用印呪): August emperors of heaven do issue your orders to behead the wicked spirits and extinguish the cruel ones. The divine seal is stamped down right away, and wind and fire may thus become urgent and pressing. Act most urgently, as this is the law and order of the superior god-emperors.

Having spoken the spell you take the breath of thunder (lei-ch'i 雷氣) and blow it onto the seal. You concentrate your vision on the radiance of fire that extends over a distance of ten thousand feet. Above, it links up with the pivot of the tau-constellation (斗), and down here [on earth], it flows into the pattern (wen 文) of the seal. You concentrate on the radiance of the lightning of the Five Thunders that shakes and echoes in heaven and on earth. The Heaven of the Divine

36 See above p. 10b, which says that the wood for a seal has to be collected on special days.

Empyrean (shen-hsiao t'ien 神霄天) will be half-blue and half-red. You inhale these breaths into your mouth and blow them onto the seal.³⁷

Spell for taking back the seal (ju-yin chou 入印咒): Divine seal do return to the sun [-direction] (sun 巽). Jade lads do return to your [heavenly] palaces. All you functionaries do guard your positions. When you receive my summoning, you [must] follow suit. Act most urgently as this is law and order.

After speaking the spell, you wrap up the seal and let the Thunder officials and saints control it as before.³⁸ If you are not performing rituals, you must not take out and air the seal.

(13a) The Locations and Departments of the Five Thunders (wu-lei suo-pu 五雷所部)

The Fire Master says: In general, there are five [sorts of] thunders, namely the Heaven Thunder (t'ien-lei 天雷), the Divine Thunder (shen-lei 神雷), the Dragon Thunder (lung-lei 龍雷), the Water Thunder (shuei-lei 水雷) and the Altar of Earth Thunder (she-ling lei 社令雷).

A commentary in small print says: another name is Thunder of the Wicked-Spirits (yao-lei 妖雷). The Thunder of the Wicked-Spirits does not accept commands from the god-emperors and therefore its appellation is "wicked spirits".

What [the thunders] rule over is not at all the same, and their departments are to be distinguished. The men who study Tao and their disciples who receive the ritual methods all attain the means they can rely upon, and so they can issue memoranda, prayers and requests. However, in the case that one does not know these methods (fang 方), one exerts the mind in vain.

As to the Heaven Thunder (t'ien-lei 天雷), hundreds of officials and thousands of generals support above [in heaven] the Jade Emperor (yu-ti 玉帝) and below [on earth] they control yin and yang (陰陽). Their might and virtue weigh 37 Compare the paragraph shu-fu (書符) On Writing Amulets, in TT 1220: 69.14a-16a (Wang shih-ch'ên ch'ü-tao pa-tuan chin 王侍宸祈禱八段錦) that echoes such statements.

38 This speaks of those divinities that the ritual addresses and involves. The formulation is opaque but we also find the formulation on TT 1220: 56.41b, where it should have the same meaning and application.

extremely heavy. At the turn of a kalpa the superior god-emperors dispatch by decree this thunder to descend down to the world of man in order to re-open heaven and re-examine earth, to drum and agitate ch'ien and k'un (乾坤), to install the sun and get the moon [into position]. [The Heaven Thunder] is exceedingly honourable, which is quite beyond any words.

In case that the country [experiences] excessive heat during a few years in a row and famine and devastation rage throughout the world, it is appropriate then that all the kings in the country expose tz'u-texts (詞). They memorialise and make [the situation] known to the heavens and extend the information to all the [Thunder] officials as to implore them to send down [the Heaven Thunder] to help and save the world. Then it is that you can (13b) effectively use altars and rituals in accordance with the standards, but you must not have any erratic intentions.

The Divine Thunder (shen-lei 神雷) also has hundreds of officials and thousands of generals who reside in the centre of the three realms (san-chieh 三界). They all are stationed (t'un-chu 屯駐) in accordance with the seasons and on behalf of heaven they operate and exert their transforming influences. In one year and within the four seasons [the Divine Thunder] issues the paroles (fa-hao 發號) and dispatches orders (shih-ling 施令) as to spread evenly the rain and the moisture. In case that [the people in] the lower regions were neither loyal nor pious, neither humanitarian nor faithful (chung/hsiao/jen/i 忠孝仁義)³⁹ and [either] in their former lives [or] in their present time harmed all the creatures in hideous ways and unjustly amassed plenty of properties, the Three Officials (san-kuan 三官) then hand in [appropriate] reports to the higher [institutions in heaven] and have the [respective] names registered in the Files of the Wicked (apu 惡簿). The superior god-emperors order then the Divine Thunder to crusade (fa 伐) against [the guilty ones]. Today perhaps, when wild winds and heavy rain occur and shaking sounds of thunder punish and kill men and creatures, this is just such an event.⁴⁰ If you desire to activate the Divine Thunder, you must send up a report to the Three Monitoring Offices (san-ssu 三司) and let memorials soar up to the nine pure [heavens] (ch'iu-ch'ing 九清). Then it is that you can employ the Divine Thunder.

As to the Dragon Thunder (lung-lei 龍雷), the superior god-emperors conferred upon it the Dragon Palaces (lung-kung 龍宮) with ten thousand generals and thousands of troops that support the Dragon Lord (龍君) who with his might and virtue preserves and protects the scriptures of the immortals (hsien-ching 仙經). In general, the Dragon Palaces in the sea store ten thousand chapters of scriptures of the immortals and immeasurable extraordinary treasures, which were also given by the heavenly emperors. The [Dragon] Thunder protects them. The Dragon Thunder rules over (14a) the help [that is required] for a whole region when droughts and inundations occur. If you desire to activate the [Dragon] Thunder, you send memorials that soar up to all the [spirit] officials and let them inform the superior god-emperors. [The superior god-emperors] hand down to the Chef of Dragon Thunder a warrant to proceed speedily and help. Definitely, there will be a response. Its winds are smooth and harmonious and its rain is subtle and widely spread, which is such an event.

39 This is the traditional set of Confucian ideals and virtues.

40 This proves the operations of the Divine Thunder.

As to the Water Thunder (shuei-lei 水雷), it is located at the Department of the Water Officials of the Lower Origin (Hsia-yüan shui-kuan 下元水官). The superior god-emperors conferred upon them the order to punish and behead the water monsters (shui-yao 水妖), to reward merits and crusade against faulty behaviour. Belonging to the ranks of the divinities, they also preside over the help for a whole region where disaster and drought occur. As to the officials and generals, it is all the same as with [the officials] of the Dragon Palaces. If you activate and dispatch them, you [first] must report to the officials and memorialise to the water department (shui-pu 水部). But after the memorials were heard, the responses will come within a certain [short] time.

Concerning the Altar of the Earth Thunder now, in the centre of a district or hamlet there were men who due to their loyalty and righteousness reprimanded the country. There were men who were pious and brave, ardent and fierce who reprimanded the rulers who deserted their battle lines. They retired then to their homes and died with anger. Their radiant, divine and magic nature assembled and formed the [Altar of the Earth] Thunder. The [Altar of the Earth] Thunder can arrest sea-monsters and dragons, arouse wild winds and fierce rainfall at unsuitable times, uproot trees and break down woods. [Such spirit-forces] regard it as fundamental to demand blood sacrifices (hsieh-shih 血食), but they can bring disaster and good luck for complete regions and their subtle affairs. (14b). When people offer sacrifices at the proper time, the wind and the rain will be harmonious. In the case that sacrifices and announcements (chi-kao 祭告) are neglected, [such spirit forces] cause fierce rainfall and wild winds, angry thunders and violent lightning that appear continuously. Great floods harm the people, the sprouts and the harvest, and thus hurt human life and existence (hsing-ming 性命). The people of today, be it in one province or in one territory, may well emperors the title of Lü-ling ta-shen (律令大神) and was officially part of the Divine Thunder (shen-lei 神雷).⁴⁶

(15b) In the 5th month on the 5th day at wu-time (11 a.m. to 1 p.m.) this thunder [divinity] ascends to and enters the Lodge of the Fire Bell (huo-ling chib chai 火鈴之宅) at the Palace of the South, and on that day you can draft (t'u 圖) his apparition in a room for meditation. You use the blood of a goat, a fowl and a goose, five goat heads, five [sorts of] fruit of the season and pure wine to offer veneration for this great divinity during one day and one night.⁴⁷

When the divinity descends, you can make him arouse immediately clouds and rain. Within a moment the [divinity can] make a clear sky, stop the wind, extinguish monsters, stop epidemics and discard pestilence. The divinity can swallow the demons [that cause] epidemics. At the time of the offering you write out two pieces of the Amulet of Blazing Fire (Yen-huo fu 焱火符)⁴⁸ and place them on the [altar] table. The next day you take them back. You can use them to control any epidemics and wicked illnesses. The mysteries [of this method] are reserved for the oral transmission.

The presentation of the Amulet of Blazing Fire (yen-huo fu 焱火符) follows on pp. 15b-16b together with the Spell in Veneration of the Divine Force (chi-shen chou 祭神咒):

Great Divinity of Law and Order, Venerable [Divinity] of Wind and Fire with a pair of armed and huge wings, you roam and soar through heaven and earth (ch'ien-k'un 乾坤), behead the bewitching spirits and swallow evil forces, bind up the demons and retain plagues, cause rain to fall suddenly [or] make presently 46 In other words, he belonged then to the position and function of Divine Thunder.

47 Compare TT 1220: 57.16a, for a similar arrangement (chi-fa 祭法), contained in Shang-ch'ing yü-shu wu-lei chen-wen (上清玉樞五雷真文), in: TT 1220: 57.1a sq.

48 For this amulet see TT 1220: 56.15b-16b. The following spell (Chi-shen chou 祭神咒) summarises the divine capabilities and influences that are featured in the preceding text. Also compare e.g. TT 1220: 57.16b-17a and 61.15b-17a which gives a superb dissection of the amulet (san-hsing 散形), featuring its parts and elements. See Yen-huo lü-ling T'eng t'ien-chün ta-fa (焱火律令鄧天君大法) which features Lord T'eng as "Leading Marshal" (chu-shuai 主帥), right after the overlord of the ritual, Chiu-t'ien lei-tsu ta-ti 九天雷祖大帝 in: TT 1220: 80. 1a sq. The chapter is dedicated to this Lord T'eng and his amulets, see e.g. pp. 6b-8a; pp. 22b-33b. This text also contains instructions on the composition of amulets and the performance of ritual steps, for example see TT 1220: 80.4b-6b.

a clear sky. Obey my spell, obey my summoning. Come and descend to the gate of sun (巽門)⁴⁹ and act urgently as this is law and order.

The Application of Thunder Breaths (fu lei-ch'ü 服雷氣)

This section of the text says (16b-17a): The men who receive the [Thunder] rituals⁵⁰ save people from illness and distress. They cut off the wicked spirits, chase away what is evil and heal illness (chih-ping 治病).⁵¹ They need attain the method "the Thunder Lord (lei-kung 雷公) invites the breaths", and then they can use the method [Application of Thunder Breaths]. After your initiation when the sound of thunder is suddenly heard, before or after the period Excited Insects (ching-che 驚蟄),⁵² you arrange properly an incense altar that faces the direction [of the thunder that you had heard]. (17a) Both of your hands form twisting the mudrâ Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局)⁵³ and with closed eyes you speak secretly the spell:

I received the manuals and rituals of the Five Thunders. Thunder and thunderclaps make mighty sounds. I internalize them to control thus my body and preserve my life (pao-ming 保命). I spit them out to bind up tightly the demons and punish evil forces. Divine breaths across a distance of ten thousand chang, do water the flowers of my stomach. Supreme and Fierce Emissary of Law and Order (lü-ling 律令), Silver Teeth, do act urgently as this is law and order.

After speaking the spell, you wait for the flash of lightning and the sound of thunder to occur. You look out for the direction and stare straight that way. You breathe in the breaths [of lightning and thunder] and swallow them twenty five times. There is shining in hiding (yin-yin ming-ming 隱隱明明). When the radiance comes down you swallow most hastily these breaths, which shall have the [desired] result.

49 The divinity enters at this point the ritual area.

50 Alternatively say "the rituals".

51 Or they „heal illness“.

52 See H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, p.26 ("March"). (Rpr. 1972 Taipei).

53 Compare F.C.Reiter: "The Discourse on the Thunders", p. 217, in: JRAS 14/3.

Writing out Amulets to Cure Illness, Raise Dragons and Produce Rainfall (shu-fu chih-ping ch' i-lung hsing-yü) 書符治病起龍行雨

The following section (17a-18a) starts out with a quotation of the Fire Master who says:

The great methods that were handed down by the Court of the Emissaries of the Five Thunders (Wu-lei shih-yüan 五雷使院) [enable to] write out amulets, cure illness, raise dragons, produce rainfall, drive back floods and beg for clear skies. There are ritual instructions (fa-chüeh 法訣) for all of this, which must not be used in unauthorised ways. In case that there are offences (17b) [the ritual] will not have any divine force (pu-shen 不神).

If you have to write out an amulet, you prepare the ritual performance (fa-i 法儀) and set up an altar. You twist [the fingers to show] the mudrā The Divine Empyrean Calls out the Summons (shen-hsiao hu-chao chüeh 神宵呼召訣). You perform the [ritual] steps (kang-pu 罡步) in the direction of Southeast and the sun- (巽) window, present incense and summon the divine generals (shen-chiang 神將) to attend to the matter of concern. You start to memorialise to the superior god-emperors, to the Court of the Emissaries of the Five Thunders, to the Three Monitoring Offices of Thunder and Thunderclaps (lei-i'ing san-ssu 雷霆三司) and [finally to] the Chef Stuarts of the Five Thunders (wu-lei chu-tsai 五雷主宰). After this procedure you form twisting [your fingers] the mudrā Transform to be Divine (p'ien-shen chüeh 變神訣) and so transform yourself (hua-shen 化身) to be the Emissary of the Five Thunders.⁵⁴ You walk the steps Crack the Earth and Summon the Thunders (p'o-ti chao-lei kang 破地召雷罡).⁵⁵ When you reach the front side of the altar, you apply the mudrā Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局) and speak in meditation the spell:

Divine Constellation of the Jade Pivot, receive the decree for the Perfect King to crack the earth and summon the thunders, to punish and crusade against the cruel and wicked forces. Emissaries of the Five Thunders, hurriedly come up to the site of the altar and complying with my spell and decree start to chase away what is unlucky. Report to the five [thunder] departments that they let greatly descend their divine radiance. [The divine radiance] may flow into my brush and ink slab to write out the heavenly tracts⁵⁶ (t'ien-chang 天章) in seal script. The water monsters may perish and any evil ways⁵⁷ (hsieh-tao 邪道) may get scattered and vanish. Do act urgently as this is the law and order of the god-emperors of Thunder and thunderclaps (lei-t'ing ti-chün 雷霆帝君).

54 Compare F.C.Reiter: "A Preliminary Study of the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing (1093-1153)", in: ZDMG 152/1, p. 172, translating "Assembling the Divine Force" (Lien-shen 鍊神); see TT 1220: 124.1b-2a. Again, the divine force is being created within the own body. In this sense, there is a clear identity of man and god. The concept of "spirit possession" (shamanism) most certainly does not apply.

55 Compare TT 1166 Fa-hai i-chu 6,23a-23b.

You speak the spell five times and concentrate [your vision] on the Emissaries of the Five Thunders, the Supreme Counsellors at the Jade Pivot, the P'eng-lai-Emissaries (蓬萊使者) of the god-emperor of the North (pei-ti 北帝). (18a) The thunder carriages together with the thunder divinities of the five departments, the officials, generals, servants and troops altogether descend down from heaven, come forth from the earth and hurry up to patrol. You reflect upon and visualize that the generals of the Five Thunders and their servants all transform their bodies (bua-shen 化身) and appear to be thick mist that together with the fire of the thunderclaps spread all around your brush, your ink slab, the red ink and also in the water and on the paper. After that, you grind your teeth (k'ou-ch'ib 叩齒) five times,⁵⁸ take the brush and shout out very loudly five times. You inhale the breaths five times (wu-k'ou 五口) and blow them onto the brush and the ink slab. You concentrate [your vision] on the radiance of fire that [shines] over a distance of ten thousand feet and combines a bright shining that projects on the person (she-jen 射人) who is responsible and commissioned to write the amulet.

A drawing of the Amulet of the Comprehensive Assistance of the Five Thunders (wu-lei tsung-she fu 五雷總攝符) follows. The amulet shows the character for thunder (lei 雷) that a curved line with five smaller circles on its inner periphery encircles. (18b) We learn "that the amulet on the right hand side represents the character thunder (lei 雷). After its completion the character or the drawing was enlarged with five [small] rings (ch'üan 圈) called Thunder One, Thunder Two, Thunder Three, Thunder Four and Thunder Five."⁵⁹ Twisting the hand to form the mudrá [pattern-] sun (巽) [you can use the amulet] to control the breaths of epidemics, illness and the wounds that were caused by cold and poison or any other wicked illness."

56 Or: „memorials for the heavens“

57 „evil ways“ is a rather opaque phrase which may point to competing ritual or exorcist specialists.

58 This is an established method, see F.C.Reiter: Der Perlenbeutel aus den Drei Höhlen, pp. 166-172, referring to TT 1139 San-tung chu-nang 10. 1a-11b.

59 See F.C.Reiter: "The Discourse on the Thunders", p.213.

Now we get the Amulet of the Five Locks (wu-so fu 五鎖符). The graphic design shows the character for the word well (ching 井) within a circle.

The spell [for this amulet] says: Thunder Deity of Heavenly Fire, Thunder Deity of Earthly Fire and Five Thunders let your magic might descend to lock up the demons and bar evil spirits.

The explanation states: The spell has to be spoken when you write the character ching (井). After this, you turn the brush around and smear (t'u 涂) seven times [seven circles on the character ching 井].⁶⁰ The same time you speak in your mind the spell: (19a) At the first turn [of my brush], the six spirits (liu-shen 六神) hide away. At the second turn [of my brush], the four killing forces (ssu-sha 四煞) perish. At the third turn [of my brush], the k'uei-star (k'uei-kang 魁罡)⁶¹ is agitated. At the fourth turn [of my brush], the fire of thunder rushes upwards. At the fifth turn [of my brush], the thunderclaps charge forth. At the sixth turn [of my brush] the mountain demons die. At the seventh turn [of my brush], what rebels against heaven and does not have Tao is collected and arrested to have the heads chopped off and the feet severed. The fifteen types of deities and demons that are not correct and cause misfortune rush altogether to surrender to my Five Thunders. They are not allowed to agitate and move. Act urgently as this is law and order.

The instruction says: After the spell was spoken, you take off the brush [with a quick movement of the hand] towards the direction of Southeast and exhale [noisily] the thunder breaths that enter the amulet. You concentrate on the sound of thunder that shakes the earth and on the radiance of fire within the amulet that reaches as far as ten thousand feet, and you bless then the dispatch [of the amulet].

Now we find the mudrās that go with the Amulet of the Five Locks (wu-so fu-chüeh 五鎖符訣): [When] heaven and earth are shaken by five sounds [of thunder] you write the character "well" (ching 井) and concentrate [your vision] on the fire of thunder and thunderclaps that enter the character ching (井). You form the mudrā [pattern-] wu (午), write the character ching (井) a second time and meditate on the Thunder Deity of the Fire of Heaven (t'ien-huo lei-shen 天火雷

60 I understand that in the end the amulet or character would be hidden under these circles in black ink.

61 The first star of the Big Dipper, compare F.C.Reiter: "The Discourse on the Thunders", p. 220.

神). After this, you form the mudrā [pattern-] ch'ou (丑) and meditate on the Thunder Deity of the Fire of Earth (ti-huo lei-shen 地火雷神), and then you meditate on the Thunder-Fire One, the Thunder-Fire Two, the Thunder-Fire Three, the Thunder-Fire Four (19b) and the Thunder-Fire Five. When you pass the twelve branches (chih 支) [pointing them out on your palm], the sequence starts out at the position of tzu (子) to pass [the position of] wu (午) and the twelve branches [altogether]. When you reach [again] the position of tzu (子), you form the [mudrā] Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局). You meditate then on the Five Thunders that send down their divine might, lock up the demons and bar the evil spirits. Now, you proceed as above and recite in meditation the spell on the seven circles [drawn by the writing brush] (ch'i-chuan chou 七轉咒). At the first turn [of the brush], you form the mudrā [pattern-] mao (卯).⁶² At the second turn [of the brush], you form the mudrā [pattern-] yin (寅). At the third turn [of the brush] you form the mudrā [-pattern] ch'ou 丑. At the fourth turn [of the brush], the middle finger (chung-chih 中指) points to the central line on the palm (chung-wen 中文). At the fifth turn, the fourth finger points to the upper line [on the palm]. At the sixth turn, the fourth finger points to the central pattern [on the palm]. At the seventh turn, you form the mudrā [pattern-] tzu (子)."⁶³ The concluding statement in this paragraph says that this [spell and method] rely on the above method of smearing circles of black ink on [the amulet] with the writing brush that finally must be taken off [with a quick movement of the hand] towards the direction of Southeast.

The result of the action is show on p.19b, which shows a fat and round black dot with a slim tail pointing upwards beyond its left upper part. This indicates the movement of the brush that was quickly taken off. The black dot hides the amulet.

The following amulet has the title Amulet of the Green Dragon of the Breath of Life (sheng-ch'i ch'ing-lung fu 生氣青龍符) that is good for gaining prosperity and keeping monsters under control (chao-ts'ai chen-kuai 招財鎮怪). The description says: First inhale the breath of life of the East and let it enter the palace of the liver. You blow then the breath onto the tip of the brush that 62 This most certainly means that the individual positions of the branches of earth on the palm are being pointed out (tien 點) or counted, which I call a mudrā.

63 See F.C.Reiter: "The Discourse on the Thunders", pp. 212-221, in: JRAS 14/3. These chronological and calendar elements are most important for Thunder Magic, at least in the perception of Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿). Obviously, any time some position on the palm is being pointed to or pressed upon, we have a specific pattern mudrā. In some statements, the word wen "pattern" (文) obviously means "lines".

together with your eyes shines radiantly, (20a) and write the amulet. You form the mudrá [pattern-] chen (震), grasp the breath of life and concentrate [your vision] on the green dragon that riding the breath enters the amulet.

The amulet is shown in a dispersed form (san-hsing 散形) that is used for learning and memorizing the composition and the internal meaning of the drawing. The amulet itself must be done in a fast and concentrated action that results in the assembled or complete form (chü-hsing 聚形) of the amulet. We see on p.20a the ideal form of the amulet. The meaning of the individual parts of the amulet is stated as follows: Shaking thunders rise fast, fire wheels display their abundance. Three-and-Five, the Iron Face, hurriedly rides on strong smelling smoke. Dragons speedily hurry on like lightning, riding rapidly on cloud carriages. They call in prosperity (chao-ts'ai 招財), keep guard on residences and assist to destroy the sources of wicked influences.⁶⁴

Another amulet follows. It is called the Amulet of the Soaring Sword that Arrests Dragons (fei-chien chuo-lung fu 飛劍捉龍符). The commentary explains that the amulet keeps guard on residences and sites (chai-lung 宅龍)⁶⁵ and brings security to men and creatures. It severs and subdues demons and all those spirit forces that kill. P. 20b shows a few small graphic designs that altogether constitute the amulet. The explanations for each single part of the drawing are telling: The military detachment on the left hand side and the military detachment on the right hand side, both of them shake roaring the three realms. Lord of Thunder and Mother of Lightning, arrest quickly the wicked spirits. Generals of the Thunder Lord of the Green God-Emperor; generals of the Thunder Lord of the Red God-Emperor; generals of the Thunder Lord of the White God-Emperor; generals of the Thunder Lord of the Black God-Emperor; generals of the Thunder Lord of the Yellow God-Emperor, do rise quickly, do rise quickly as to arrest the wicked and bewitching dragons.⁶⁶

P. 21a contains the Amulet Raise the Dragon and Cause Rainfall (ch'i-lung chib-yü fu 起龍致雨符).⁶⁷ The decree and spell for the amulet say: Black clouds, 64 Due to small printing, some of the characters are rather difficult to identify. The translation is tentative.

65 "dragon" could refer to promontories or hilly sites where houses are built, in accordance with the diction of feng-shui (風水). For example, see S.D.R. Feuchtwang: An Anthropological Analysis of Chinese Geomancy, p. 15. Vientiane 1974.

66 The colours represent the totality of the cosmos and its positive spirit forces. For the generals, see the pantheon TT 1220: 56.9b.

67 An alternative name is indicated in small print that is not clearly readable.

which is the auspicious sign may ascend. T'ai-i (太乙) may support [the rise of] the morning. Jade dawn and divine force of the cavern let the yin-[darkness] (陰) sink down to give reign to the dragons. The iron plate [with the amulet] was just now exposed.⁶⁸ Thunder masters (lei-shih 雷師) prop up [the shafts of the Thunder] carriage: Grand Senior T'ai-shang (T'ai-shang hao-weng 太上浩炁), most urgently receive [this] order from the Lord of Origin (Yüan-chün 元君).

The subsequent explanation gives the following information: When in commanderies and cities excessive droughts lasted a long time and any prayers for rain had not been answered, you then search out famous mountains (21b) and grotto-caves (tung-hsüeh 洞穴) that have sites with dragon-pools. You suitably set up an altar in accordance with the rules and recite the spells.⁶⁹ Consequently, you take a [square] iron plate that has a length of nine ts'un and a width of three ts'un and use red ink to write the precious amulet. You speak in meditation the spell forty nine times, and then you throw the plate with the memorial [and amulet] down into the pool. You dispatch all the [spirit] functionaries, officials and generals who pledge then to receive the city god and the god of the earth (ch'eng-huang she-ling 城隍社令) to raise together the thunders and cause rainfall. They will come down right in time. First, you must prepare and get in [proper] form the memorials and petitions, and then everything is just fine.

You use unwrought iron in order to cast the [iron] plate that is thick one ts'un and broad seven ts'un for the single ritual. The plate has a length of one ch'ih and two ts'un. When there is the occasion for prayers and requests, you also write out four pieces of the Amulet Raise the Dragon and Cause Rainfall [ch'i-lung chih-yü fu 起龍致雨符]. You put them together with an Amulet of Floating Mercury (liu-tan fu 流丹符) into the four jars (weng 瓮) that you place on the four corners of the altar.

Now we see a drawing of the just mentioned Amulet of Floating Mercury. (22a) The following description says that the amulet uses an iron leaf (t'ieh-yeh 鐵葉) that is long nine ts'un and broad three ts'un. You engrave the amulet using red [colour]. You do this a second time to fill in [the red colour] where it was deficient.

68 This most certainly refers to the practice known as the „exposure of dragon tablets" (t'ou lung-chien p'in 投龍簡品). See F.C.Reiter: Der Perlenbeutel aus den Drei Höhlen pp. 39-41. Compare TT 1139 San-tung chu-nang 2.8a-12a.

69 This is the preceding text.

The Amulet of the Great Divinity of Blazing Fire (yen-huo ta-shen fu 焱火大神符) is the following theme.⁷⁰ The amulet consists of a number of graphs for which we get some explanations: The left eye is the sun. The right eye is the moon. Open the eyes, and the shining of fire shines over a distance of ten thousand chang, illuminates heaven and earth, and extinguishes evil demons. Heaven is round and earth is square. There are six rules, nine paragraphs and eight trigrams (pa-kua 八卦).⁷¹ Emissary of Savage Thunder of the East, do most speedily rise up. Emissaries of the Five Directions just do the same. (22b) The supreme god-emperors (shang-ti 上帝) have the decree to sweep clean the nine provinces. Where the response is not compliant, [the perpetrator] is to be fixed below the five holy mountains. Act most urgently as this is law and order. Fire of thunder, do burn and destroy. Demons will be terrified and divinities will be grieving. On the right side you blaze [with flames]⁷² Mount K'un-ch'iu (崑丘) – and the four rivers (ssu-tse 四澤) stop their flow. On the left side you blaze [with flames] the five holy mountains – and the stars fall down from heaven. You drag the heaven and pull the earth. Your hands rout the clouds of fire. Soaring high you search the cosmos (liu-ho 六合) and let lightning stream through the great void. Dragons find themselves tied up. Demons and divinities extinguish their traces. Fire chariots approach hurriedly across [a distance of] ten thousand chang. The heat [of the sun] (ping-ting [huo] 丙丁 [火]) destroys any doubts, burns demons (fan-kuei 梵鬼) and extinguishes disasters,⁷³ urgently, most urgently!

(23a) The following decree and spell say: Generals and emissaries of the Three Monitoring Offices, today you attend to this amulet (chih-fu 直符) and following me urge the emissaries to accept respectfully and obey the heavenly amulet (t'ien-fu 天符) in order to collect and arrest the demoniac thieves, to push back illness and disperse annoyances. What dares to rebel against the command, 70 Despite the grand title, the amulet and its description are abbreviations of the Amulet of Blazing Fire in: TT 1220: 61.15a-17b. Concerning this amulet, see F.C.Reiter: "The Management of Nature: Convictions and Means in Daoist Thunder Magic (Daojiao leifa)", in: AAS 29, pp. 203-205, in: F.C.Reiter ed.: Purposes, Means and Convictions in Daoism. There are a few minor variants in the translation. Concerning the divinity Great Divinity of Blazing Fire, also see TT 1220: 56.6a of the pantheon.

71 "Six rules" may refer to the six upper musical pitchpipes of ancient music, and "nine paragraphs" may stand for the nine branches of mathematics, which together with the eight trigrams describes the totality of the cosmic order using antique and formal expressions.

72 I take the character shan (煽) to stand for shan (煽).

73 The three characters after ping-ting (丙丁) are almost unintelligible. This is a tentative translation.

thunder axes may speedily execute. The superior god-emperors issue this command to drive away and expel [all molestations].

Having spoken the spell you open [the hand with the mudrā] Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局) and let it enter (ju 入) the amulet. You burn [spirit] money, [spirit] horses and the memorial (cha-tzu 劄子). You dispatch the divine generals and palace guards (23b) that go along with the command of the amulet and disperse and control. The results will immediately become evident.

We learn that this amulet shows the true form (chen-hsing 真形) of the great divinity. It can immediately bring about a clear sky or rainfall, punishes and crusades against wicked forces, beheads evil spirits and expels bad influences, swallows and devours the demons of epidemics. All the divine effects [of the amulet] can hardly be reported. This is the supreme amulet in the centre of the thunder departments, which is available. Formerly, the Perfect Lords Wu [Meng] (吳猛) and Hsü [Sun] (許遜) and the followers of these masters all received this mystery.⁷⁴

Now we find the Amulet that Circulates Thunders and Hits Evil Spirits (yün-lei ta-shi fu 運雷打祟符). (24a) The ritual method for the amulet [works as follows:] [The fingers of] both hands start pressing (tien 點)⁷⁵ [the position of] mao (卯) [on the palm] and continue to press the [following] positions of ch'en (辰), wu (午), shen (申), bai (亥) and wei (未) except [the position of] tzu (子). Freeze [the hands] that clutch tightly the mudrā Five Thunders (wu-lei chüeh 五雷訣). You start out from the sides of both ears to move your hands [with the mudrā] around in a circle, and [at the same time] you recite in meditation the Spell Five Thunders (wu-lei chou 五雷咒). You perform then the ritual paces Cracking the Earth and Summoning the Thunders (p'o-ti chao-lei kang 破地召雷咒),⁷⁶ shout out to summon the Five Thunders and concentrate upon their arrival. You look out for the locality where the evil forces are, take the two hands with the mudrā Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局) and press them down on both ears that you strike as the Thunder drums (lei-ku 雷鼓). You let both eyes flash to be the radiance of lightning (tien-kuang 電光) and spit out water to be wind and rain. You release the *mudrā*s (fa-chüeh 發訣) and focus [your meditation] on the rumbling of thunder and thunderclaps (lei-t'ing pi-li 雷霆霹

74 Concerning the two Taoists, see J.M.Boltz: A Survey of Taoist Literature, Tenth to Seventeenth Centuries, pp. 70-72. Berkeley 1987. See F.C.Reiter: "A Preliminary Study of the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing", p. 159-160, in: ZDMG 152/1.

75 The following positions are all earthly branches.

76 See above and TT 1166: 6.23a-23b.

靈), that roaring evolves and proceeds to decapitate and extinguish the evil and wicked spirits.

The Spell Gather at the Kang-[Stars] (收罡斗咒) follows: All stars (hsing-tou 星斗) come back to the kang-[position] (罡).⁷⁷ I lead my steps back to the Pure Hall (ch'ing-t'ang 清堂).⁷⁸ Divine animals support me. All deities support me [as my spirit] generals. Whatever I ("my person" wu-shen 吾身) aim at, sun and moon are radiantly shining just as much. Act urgently as this is law and order.

The Establishment of Hells for Evil Demons (Chih-hsieh chien-yü fa 治邪建獄法)

(24b) The descriptive explanation of the ritual⁷⁹ refers to the Fire Master who says as follows: the great method of the Five Thunders (wu-lei ta-fa 五雷大法) especially sends down [to us] the secrets of the jade amulets that control evil forces and behead wicked spirits. In unusual circumstances they save the living beings from the dangers of heavy distress and calamities, cleanse all creatures from their dark and gloomy faults, exterminate shrines (lu-miao 戮廟), expel bad forces, punish wicked spirits and cure diseases. For all of this there are specialised offices [that are in charge]. In the case that such wicked spirits and evil forces (ching-hsieh 精邪) are around in the world you just take amulets and [consecrated] water (fu-shui 符水) that you provide either to be swallowed or to be carried [on the belt].⁸⁰ Peace and health will come in due time.

In case that those wicked forces have an outer shape and substance, they soar in the void or walk on earth. Some wicked divinities in the water and on earth cause calamities. Water monsters (shui-yao 水妖) cause misfortune (nieh 孽), and when they all do not yield to the control by amulets, there is the method of establishing hells (chien-yü fa 建獄法). You command the Three Monitoring Offices (san-ssu 三司) to arrest, bind up and transfer [such malignant elements] to the hell, where they are checked and brought under control. [In this way] you 77 This should refer to „...the bowl of the constellation the Big Dipper“.

78 This may be the heavenly sphere that is visited in meditation as to adopt the radiant might of the central cosmic sphere that stars define.

79 Alternatively translate simply: “method”. This theme is connected with rituals of healing, see, for example, TT 1220: 59.1a-10b.

80 Obviously t'un-p'ei (吞佩) are two different modes of application, otherwise the translation “amulet water” would have been fine.

eliminate forever their very roots and origin. After establishing a hell, you can use it according to the rules.

Now we find the title: Hell of thunder and lightning that check and control (lei-tien k'ao-chih yü 雷電考治獄). The square drawing of the hell is rather poor. However, we get the following information (25a): In the three realms (san-chieh 三界), the hell bars and arrests all those, who belong to [spirit] officers and generals, managers of sacrifices,⁸¹ to the immortal officers of the lower echelons and [other] officials who do not have Tao and belong to the demons and divinities who [wrongly] adopt personal names and attach themselves to people to commit any sorts of faults and insult and distort Taoist rituals (tao-fa 道法) and do not surrender to heavenly amulets (t'ien-fu 天符). You establish this hell [for them].

The following hell is called: Hell of the comets with the radiance of fire (huo-kuang liu-hsing yü 火光流星獄). We learn that this hell is made to put away and arrest scaly dragons, poisonous scorpions and any sorts of water monsters. When they have fully attained their capacity, they rise up to (25b) reach [the rank of] yin-officials (yin-kuan 陰官) in the Water Department (shui-fu 水府). Without any reason they harm people, [spoil] sprouts and the harvest, let water shoot forth, swell rivers, capsize passenger boats, swallow and devour living beings, and being without Tao they cause any disasters. You use this [hell] to bar and control [them].

The following hell is called: Hell of the poisonous and harmful metal spirits (chin-ching tu-bai chih yü 金精毒害之獄). This hell puts away and bars the mountain spirits and wood deities (shan-ching mu-shen 山精木神) in the world, the wicked spirits that have fully attained the capacity of the five elements. Only these monsters (ching-kuai 精怪) are wicked spirits. They have outer shapes and figures and attach themselves to the physical form of the human body. Sometimes [such elements] are in hiding and sometimes they become visible. You use this hell for all of them.

The hell is in charge of the trouble caused by the Nine Wells (chiu-ch'üan k'ü-nao chih yü 九泉苦惱之獄).⁸² This hell is said (26a) to put away and bar epidemics and any sorts of demons (mo-kuei 魔鬼) that cause trouble for the condition and outer appearance of temples and harm the natural disposition of people. [The hell puts away and bars] demons and divinities (kuei-shen 鬼神) that in the world operate as savage robbers and thieves who do not comply with Great Tao, harm the country and hurt the people. This hell bars them all.

81 See Hucker nrs. 1015,6650.

82 The name Nine Wells stands for the Hades or for death, see H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary nr.2263. Rpr. Taipei 1972.

The hell of the gloomy platform-tower and the long night (yu-t'ai ch'ang-yeh chih yü 幽臺長夜之獄) (26b) puts away and bars what is not connected with correct sacrifices (cheng-ssu 正祀). When clan members formerly were not in accord with Tao, they conceal themselves in corpses. As itinerant demons and wicked spirits (k'o-kuei hsieh-shen 客鬼邪神), they are dependent on outer [physical] forms. [In this way] they enter dreams, throw pebbles and strike with stones, rob and occupy men and creatures, debauch wives and usurp rooms and porches of the people. The five [social] relationships (wu-tao 五道) and everything are no longer in good order. These false divinities and pretentious immortals (wei-shen cha-hsien 偽神詐仙) eternally cut off the roots and sources [of the people].

As a response, you set up the hell. You deliberate in detail the big and small arrangements and principles, send soaring petitions to the Three Monitoring Offices (san-ssu 三司) and memorialise vis-à-vis the supreme god-emperors a complete report that explains the source of the wicked causes and where their presence can be spotted. You also state, which hell you established at a southeastern location.⁸³ You then beg that the Five Thunders of the Three Monitoring Offices (san-ssu wu-lei 三司五雷) may be sent down to a visit on earth, first of all to put away and arrest the lewd and malignant forces of any quality and to rush them down into the hell where they are barred and controlled.

When you have written the report in accordance with the [proper] style, you approach then the family where the wicked person lives. You choose and cleanse a room in the southeastern [part of the house]; using incense and water to wash away any faults. You take the ashes of the incense burner and establish the hell [laying out the ashes on the ground] according with the model.⁸⁴

Every hell [of this type] has a diameter of nine ts'un. You use one branch of a peach tree with a length of three ch'ih and fasten red silk [streamers] on its upper 83 This refers to the notorious sun-direction (巽).

84 The ashes are used to design or lay out the hell on the floor.

end. Each (27a) of them is long five ts'un. You stick [the branch] into the centre of the gate of every hell and attach its name [on the branch].

After this, you burn incense and invite the Chef Managers (chu-tien 主典) who investigate vicious demons and revise and correct [the archives of] the good ones and the bad ones. You invite the Chef Stewards (chu-tsai 主宰) of the Five Thunders⁸⁵ who are in control of the hells, the Emissaries who are in control of the ordinances and investigate by torture (tien-lu k'ao-chin shih che 典錄拷禁使者), the Emissaries who bind up the hun-souls and deport them under supervision (chuan-hun chien-sung shih-che 縛魂監送使者), the Emissaries of Law and Order (律令使者), the Emissaries who transmit the orders (ch'uan-ling shih-che 傳令使者) and the Thirty Six stalwarts of the thunder-drums (san-shih-liu lei-ku li-shih 三十六雷鼓力士),⁸⁶ and you implore them all to descend and form a guard for the hell to lock up its gates.

It does not take very long and their apparitions become visible. After their appearances became visible, they measure the weight of the crimes, whether they have to execute [the culprits] or imprison them. Perhaps they send them to the Office of Thunder and Thunderclaps of the Emperor of the North (Bei-ti lei-t'ing ssu 北帝雷霆司) and the P'eng-lai Office (蓬萊司), where their cases will be judged according with the law. Only the Court of the Jade Pivot (yü-shu yüan 玉樞院) does not correct crimes (chih-tsui 治罪).

85 See Hucker, p.514, nrs.6515, 6809.

86 For the emissaries see, TT 1220: 56.8b of the pantheon. For the thirty-six stalwarts, see p.9a. Many of the divinities in the pantheon do not appear in our texts. However, the names that we can identify in the pantheon are just enough to prove that the materials in chapter 56 are homogeneous. Concerning the method of "binding up" (arresting) souls, see TT 1220: 59.7a-7b, which involves the mudrā Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局) and a spell addressing the Five Thunder Emissaries (wu-lei shih-che 五雷使者).

Altars and Prayers for Rain or Clear Skies

The presentation first features the model for the altar that is used to pray for rain (ch' i-yü t'an-shih 祈雨壇式). The Fire Master says that the official administrators will have to expose tz'u-prayers (投詞) when droughts last long in all the territories of the country, when the provinces and commanderies lack rain.⁸⁷ The officials pray that relief and help would be brought about, and so it is that they record the prayer-texts for exposure to memorialise and make [the situation] known (27b) to the superior god-emperors. At the same time, they notify the Court of the Emissaries of the Five Thunders (wu-lei shih-yüan 五雷使院) and the Three Monitoring Offices of Thunders and Thunderclaps (lei-t'ing san-si 雷霆三司). They beg that [these institutions] especially send down instructions to direct the [spirit] officials at the lower echelons that an amnesty is granted for culprits among the people of the whole region. After this, [the local officials] implore that some specific Thunder may send down a lot of rain and moisture to save what got scorched and dried out. When the memorial dispatch for any specific thunder was made, asking that a lot of rain may quickly fall but obviously there is no response at all, [the officials] go then to a spot that corresponds above [on heaven] with the T'ai-sui [star] (太歲). They take good yellow clay and build an altar with three levels.

The upper level is broad two chang and four ch'ih. The middle level is broad two chang and eight ch'ih, and the lower level is broad three chang and two ch'ih. Each of them is high one ch'ih and three ts'un. The officials place new long-necked earthen jars holding four flourishing branches at the four corners of the altar. They use a dragon pool to immerse four elixir amulets (tan-fu 丹符). The incense table (hsiang-an 香案) must be placed in the centre [of the altar] in order to venerate the commissioners (shu-hsiang 樞相)⁸⁸ of the Three Monitoring Offices (san-ssu 三司). Altogether, there are four of them. Veneration is offered to all the officials and generals of the thunder departments⁸⁹ (lei-pu 雷部) at the four sides of the ground level of the altar. One employs seven priests (dao-shih 道士) to stand on the altar and present the notifications [about the matter of concern]. At three points of time, namely ch'en- (辰), wu- (午) and yu- (酉) the 87 The term "official" (kuan-ssu 官司) alludes to the official sphere of the administration. However, in this case the spirit official or Taoist priest should be addressed.

88 See Hucker, nr. 5431, p. 435.

89 Alternatively say "thunder categories".

ritual master (fa-shih 法師) grasps his sword. At the Window of Earth (ti-hu 地戶) of the altar he starts to perform the ritual paces "the soaring (28a) dragon brings rain" (fei-lung chih-yü kang 飛龍致雨罡), and so he ascends the altar.

A commentary in small print says that there is also the (alternative) name "paces to produce water and summon the thunders" (tso-shui chao-lei kang 作水召雷罡).

The ritual master ascends the altar and walks around it nine times, turning to the left hand side, and nine times he recites the spell "summoning the dragon to bring rain" (chao-lung chih-yü chou 召龍致雨咒). He says then in a loud voice: In this-or-that area, rain and moisture have failed to come in time. The Tao of Heaven was set for a long drought. I look up with respect to the Five Thunders and down here petition to have the service of the Emissary who Attends to the Amulet that he may quickly arouse the Three Monitoring Offices of Thunders and Thunderclaps to direct any thunder to send speedily a lot of rain in order to save what had been scorched and dried out. I have already memorialised [this problem] and made it known to the supreme god-emperors. Act most urgently and quickly without any offence against my order.

Having finished shouting aloud [these words the ritual master] descends again from the altar at its Window of Earth. It does not take longer than three days until thunder, thunderclaps and rain occur. Then again, the ritual master prepares memorials to make it known and express thanks vis-à-vis the supreme god-emperors. The ritual master arranges a chiao-ritual (醮),⁹⁰ returns the clay of the thunder altar and the earthen jars handing them over to the river Cb'ang-chiang (長江).⁹¹ A graphic design depicts the altar, reflecting the indications in the preceding text. The picture also shows the characters Gate of Heaven (t'ien-men 天門) above the top level of the altar and the characters Window of Earth below the first level of the altar. (28b) A short line above the sketchy drawing of the altar explains that the altar table is to be installed on the top level. Below the drawing, we read where the veneration has to be offered: Below the altar at its four sides.

90 This serves a thanksgiving festivity.

91 This is the sole indication that could suggest the origin of these materials in a specific geographic setting which is Chiang-hsi province from where Wang Wen-ch'ing (王文卿) hails (Chien-ch'ang [建昌] district).

The next theme is the model for an altar to pray for a clear sky (ch' i-ch'ing t'an shih 祈晴壇式). The Fire Master says: When in the territories of the country, in provinces and cities, rain pours down continuously for [many] months in a row, [the rivers] Chiang and Ho swell, and if this development is not due to heavenly orders (t'ian-ming 天命) then it is due to bewitching dragons and water monsters. They cause misfortune (nieh 孽) to harm the people and the creatures. If the rulers of the country and the regional wardens (shou-t'u chang-kuan 守土長官)⁹² wish to pray for a clear sky and for the rain and water to recede quickly, then it is necessary to inform (shen 申) the Court of the Emissaries of the Five Thunders and the Three Monitoring Offices of Thunders and Thunderclaps. The rulers of the country and the leading regional wardens altogether memorialise to the supreme god-emperors, present a tz'u-[complaint] to point out that it all looks like a proper heavenly disaster (t'ien-tsai 天災).⁹³ They will ask then for a basic amnesty for the culprits among the living beings, and that the rain would be put away and the floods be pushed back. As they fear that bewitching water [-spirits] (shui-yao 水妖) committed faults, they ask for the dispatch of the officials and generals of the Three Monitoring Offices (29a) and all the battalions of the Five Thunders (wu-lei pu 五雷部眾) to descend, put away and crusade [against such evil elements].

When on the second day there is no response at all, on the third day then you choose a high mountain or a place without any water. You take yellow clay and build at the site an altar with three levels that has the extensions of the type of altar [that has to be built to] pray for rain. However, [in this case] each level of the altar is only thick one ch'ih and two ts'un. When the construction of the altar is complete, you place the incense table on the upper level. You present then veneration for the Fierce Divinity that Carries the Wind on the Back (負風猛神), for the Great Divinity Earl of the Wind (feng-po ta-shen 風伯大神) and the Great Divinity of Blazing Fire (yen-huo ta-shen 焱火大神).⁹⁴ Veneration must be offered for the rulers of the four offices (ssu-ssu chu 四司主) on two sides [of the altar]. You place one empty long-necked jar in each of the four corners of the middle platform of the altar, all made of red iron ore. You put into each

92 Compare Hucker, nr. 143, p. 110.

93 Of course, the ritual presentation is the task of the Thunder specialist and priest, who is employed to perform the rituals. See below, the address is "you".

94 This is Teng Po-wen (鄧伯溫), see F.C.Reiter: "Preliminary Study of the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing", pp. 172-173, in: ZDMG 152/1; and the same: "The Discourse on the Thunders", pp. 222-225, in: JRAS 14/3. See the pantheon, TT 1220: 56.6a. Concerning the Fierce Divinity that Carries the Wind on the Back (fu-feng meng-shen 負風猛神), see TT 1220: 81.1a sq. and the preceding chapter in this book.

jar one Amulet of the True Shape of [the Great Divinity] of Blazing Fire (yen-huo chen-hsing fu 焱火真形符). All around on the four sides [of the altar] and on the ground level you receive respectfully the Thunder Departments (lei-pu 雷部). You employ Taoist priests (tao-shih 道士) as usual who invoke and display the ritual procedures.⁹⁵ The head priest (chu-fa 主法) chooses three points of time, namely yin (寅), wu (午) and hsü (戌) to grasp his sword and perform the [ritual] paces "urge the dragons to suck up the flood" (ch'ü-lung hsi-shui kang 驅龍吸水罡). He ascends the altar at the Window of Earth (ti-hu 地戶).⁹⁶ The priest walks forty-nine circuits around [the altar] towards the right hand side, and he recites "the spell to put away the flood and make a clear sky" (shou-shui tso-ch'ing chou 收水作晴咒). When the recitation of the spell has ended, [the head priest] burns an Amulet of the True Shape of [the Great Divinity] of Blazing Fire in the incense burner. There are oral instructions (k'ou-chüeh 口訣) for this. Consequently, [the priest] descends (29b) from the altar. When right in time the wind arises, the clouds are put away and the rainfall stops, then it is that you arrange a chiao-festivity (醮) to thank for the [divine] mercy and send up [an appropriate] documentation. All of this must accord with the rules. After ending these procedures, you bury the clay of the altar together with the long-necked jars in a location of a wu-position (wu 午). You must not disrespectfully dump the clay.⁹⁷

Spell to pray for rain (ch'ü-yü chou 祈雨咒): Grand Master of Prime Origin (T'ai-yüan hao-shih 太元浩師), Essence of Thunder and Fire, combine yin and gather yang (yin-yang 陰陽), keep guard on the Thunder Wall (lei-ch'eng 雷城)⁹⁸. Earl O (O-po 闕伯)⁹⁹ with wind and fire, do ascend to the Abyss-Hall (yüan-t'ing 淵庭), let the wind blow and lightning abound, arouse the magic forces out of darkness and let them whirl around [Mount] T'ai-hua (太華). Give commands to lords and retainers as the supreme god-emperors have the decree to act most urgently to put away the yang (陽) and let rain come down, which 95 This statement could make the impression that the preceding matters were administered by secular official. I think that this is not the case but all of this is a Taoist specialist matter that ritual masters take care of.

96 In the Southeast corner of the altar, see above.

97 Notice, these altars are temporarily set up. It takes some care and precautions to dismantle them after the ritual. Thunder Magic does not need the stage of temples or cloisters. The wu-position (wu 午) refers to a point on the geomantic compass.

98 See F.C.Reiter: "The Discourse on the Thunders", pp. 218-219, esp. note nr. 90, in: JRAS 14/3.

99 Concerning this name, see TT 1220 Tao-fa hui-yüan 133.13b, which shows the Earl to be a great general of the Fire Department of the South. His name, unfortunately, is barely readable.

[must] happen immediately. Send forth urgently the dragons and grasp tightly the lightning that they emerge from darkness and pools. Today I have the honour to speak the spell that must be realised speedily as this is a command by the Jade Emperor (Yü-ti 玉帝) for you. Whoever ventures to decline [commits] a crime that does not weigh lightly. Act urgently as this is law and order.

The following Spell of Lord Wood (mu-lang chou 木郎咒) says: Heaven of ch'ien, (ch'ien-t'ien 乾天) let your shining stream. Jade Pool of the East (yü-ch'ib 玉池) cast off your fire across a distance of ten thousand miles. In the K'an- and Chen-palaces (坎震宮) the Lord Wood, (30a) T'ai-i (太乙), the Hero Three- Mountains (san-shan hsiung 三山雄), the K'un- (坤) Divinity, the Grand Magic Lord of the Sun (巽) Region and the Most Supreme Lady of Purple Vacuity and Mysterious Magic Force, you all must arrive most urgently as this is the law and order.¹⁰⁰

The spell of the Great Cavern to ask for rain (Ta-tung ch'ing yü chou 大洞請雨咒) says: The shining of thunder, the shining of thunder, T'ai-i (太乙) is in hiding. T'ai-po Director of Wind (T'ai-po feng-ling 太伯風令) and Grand Old Lord with Four Eyes (Ssu-mu hao-weng 四目浩翁), Lord Yen (嚴君) you keep guard on the ice and fling away the yang (陽) -essences of fire. Director of Rain, for which reason are [your gates] closed? Director of Wind, why do you keep so calm (p'ing 平)?¹⁰¹ The divine might and flamboyance of the sun, gold-immortals awake it. Water and fire flow together in a common stream. Earl Han Po [-wen] (韓伯[文]) bears up his boat, and the three officials (san-kuan 三官) open up shining brightness.¹⁰² The five god-emperors (wu-ti 五帝) may entrust 100 It is not exactly clear what the spell is thought to bring about.

101 I remind of the most likely identity with the names of Feng-po and Yü-shih (風伯雨師) that identify star-divinities, namely Chi-hsing and Pi-hsing (箕星畢星) or numbers 7 and 19 of the 28 stellar divisions, see H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, pp.26,27; and Sou-shen chi 4,p.43, ed.: Ku hsiao-shuo ts'ung-k'an. Chung-hua Comp. Peking 1979.

102 Fu-chou (負舟) in this phrase parallels ke'ai-ming (開明). Possibly this is a reference to Han Po-wen (韓伯文) see TT 1220 Tao-fa hui-yüan 133. 12a, which shows the name to be the "radiant and great divinity in the department of lightning". TT 1220: 133 sq present a large and important set of Thunder rituals that have the patronage of T'ai-i (太乙/一). The origin of the phrase "to carry a big boat on the back" most certainly is Chuang-tzu, nei-p'ien: Hsiao-yao yu (莊子內篇逍遙遊), see TT 670 Nan-hua chen-ching 1.1b., or Chuang-tzu chi-chieh 1.1, in: Chu-tzu chi-ch'eng 3. See B.Watson: The Complete Works of Chuang-tzu, p.29 "If water is not piled up deep enough, it won't have the strength to bear up a big boat". New York 1968. The sentence features with symbolic expressions the unbearable situation of a drought.

to T'ai-shang the decree and order that the dragons [must] bring the rain to drip down. Act urgently as this is a decree by the Perfect Lord of Prime Existence (Yüan-ming chen-chün 元命真君).

The spell and prayer for a clear sky (Cb'i-ch'ing chou 祈晴咒)¹⁰³ says: Fire Carriage, Fire Carriage (huo-chü 火車), home of Thunder orders (lei-ling 雷令), Three-and-Five (san-wu 三五) are the marshals, shining radiantly without any limit.¹⁰⁴ Let (30b) fire speed across a distance of ten thousand miles that can clean away clouds and dawn. You have a bond (yüeh 約) to support the god-emperors with your radiant eyes, silver teeth and the water of wide clarity (huo-luo shui-lei 豁落水類).¹⁰⁵ Be quick and without any delay. The god-emperor [Teng] Po-wen (鄧伯溫)¹⁰⁶ commands to sweep off and annihilate the hidden evil forces (yin-hsieh 陰邪). Act most urgently and speedily and administer immediately the flamboyance of the sun, all like the assistance of the Director of Fire of the supreme god-emperors.

There is an alternative title for this spell. We see it in small print below the main title Spell and Prayer for a Clear Sky. It reads as follows: Spell to put away water and procure clear weather. One has to recite the spell in silent meditation eighty one times.

Subsequently there is still another spell that is used to achieve a clear sky. It says: Essences of metal and jade return,¹⁰⁷ the heavenly clouds may open up and scatter. [The astral constellation] Purple Subtlety (tzu-wei 紫微)¹⁰⁸ may send 103 The commentary in small print gives an alternative name: Spell to collect the water and make a clear sky that the priest should silently recite eighty one times. This spell actually addresses Teng Po-wen (鄧伯溫) who is a mighty thunder divinity, see below.

104 Concerning three names or titles of Thunder deities with the specification Three-and-Five, see TT 1220: 56.6b,9b of the pantheon.

105 Compare P.Andersen: "The Practice of Bugang", translating huo-luo 豁落 with "wide clarity", in: Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 5, p.36.

106 See F.C.Reiter: "A Preliminary Study of the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing", pp. 174-175. In: ZDMG 152/1. Teng Po-wen (鄧伯溫) is a most prominent name, also in later materials. Compare, for example, TT 1220: 133.13b (T'ai-i chen-lei p'i-li ta-fa 太乙真雷霹靂大法). Here he appears to be the „leading marshal of Thunder and thunderclaps“ (Lei-t'ing chu-shuai yen-huo lü-ling ta-shen Teng Po-wen 雷霆主帥焱火律令大神鄧伯溫).

107 The meaning is not quite clear. Possibly this is a reference to sacrificial offerings.

108 See G.Schlegel: Uranographie Chinoise, p.830, nr.699. See H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr.12329. See the titles TT 15 W'u-shang chiu-hsiao yü-ch'ing ta-fan tzu-wei hsüan-tu lei-t'ing yü-ching and TT 1485 Tzu-wei tou-shu. Concerning these titles see K.Schipper, p. 1091; and M.Kalinowski, pp.758-759, in: Companion.

down the ominous sign that rain clears off the dust. Earl of the Sea (hai-po 海伯), wind, rain and the radiance of thunder may descend and urge on the essences of yang (陽精) to be most luminous, and the shades of yin (陰) may be buried deeply. Urgently and respectfully receive the most exalted and supreme (t'ai-chi t'ai-shang 太極太上) fire-wheel-order (huo-lun lü-ling 火輪律令) of [the astral constellation] Purple Subtlety (tsu-wei 紫微) in [the heaven of] Jade Purity (yü-ch'ing 玉清).

At this point we find the description of still another amulet: Amulet that Brightens the Eyes with the Character Radiance (ming-mu kuang-tsu fu 明目光字符).¹⁰⁹ The text gives the following instruction: First, you freeze your spiritual forces and pause your breathing. You turn yourself towards the Southeast where the prosperous region is. You hold firmly the writing brush, grind your teeth, grasp and inhale (31a) the radiance of the heavenly eye (t'ien-mu 天目)¹¹⁰ that you expel [from your mouth], pooh, onto the tip of your writing brush. Then it is that you put down the brush to write the amulet.

We get some commentaries in small print concerning the individual elements of the amulet: I respectfully receive the decree from the ruler of the stars, the Great God-Emperor of Purple Subtlety.¹¹¹ The yang (陽) is the sun, and the yin (陰) is the moon. Day and night, they shine brightly. The Jade-Bar (yü-beng 玉衡)¹¹² revolves and all around there are birth and completion. The left eye flashes with lightning and the right eye has [the shining of] a meteor. The divine forces are pure, and the breaths are lively. They thoroughly penetrate Hades. Sun and moon link up their radiance. Heaven and earth are thus united.

After the text, we find again that fat round dot with a tail, most certainly pointing to the direction of Southeast as we had seen on p.19b. Actually, this is the appearance of the amulet after completion – it disappears under the black seal.

109 Concerning the practical importance of the title, see pp.31a-31b.

110 A description of the "heavenly eye" gives TT 1220: 69.11b (Wang Shichen qidao buduan jin 王侍宸祈禱八段錦), positioning the heavenly eye between the eyebrows as the magic third eye and focus that emits spiritual might. This refers to the magic deva-eye that the performing priest had obtained by meditation. He adopts, in other words, a heavenly identity when writing out the amulet. Compare t'ien-yen (天眼) as a Buddhist term, see Ting Fu-pao (丁福保): Fo-hsüeh ta-tz'ü-tien 佛學大辭典, p. 472b. Taipei 1974; see W.E.Soothill and L.Hodous: A Dictionary of Chinese Buddhist Terms, p. 146a.

111 In this case, Purple Subtlety refers to the respective star-divinity.

112 This most likely means the pei-tou (北斗) constellation.

There are some further technical instructions for the elaboration of the amulet. We learn that one has to use for the amulet thin and yellow paper and black ink (mo 墨). You do the writing on the morning of the first moon (shuo-jib 朔日) of each month. You burn incense and face the radiance of the sun in the direction of Southeast. You grasp then the breaths and [inhaling] take them in. Secondly, you write the character "light of the sun" (hsüan 烜), burn then [the paper] and put [the ashes] into purified (31b) water (ching-shui 淨水) [and use it] to wash your eyes. The shining of your eyes will be double as much as usual.

The following method deals with the consecration of incense and its inner application by swallowing (chou hsiang t'un-fu fa 咒香吞服法). The spell consists of the following words: Incense of the law,¹¹³ do enter my body (ch'ü 軀) and any illness will be expelled. The law abides, and the incense abides. The breaths abide, and the spiritual agents with their might abide. When they change (pian 變), they thus become white frost. When they transform (bua 化), they thus become sweet dew. The incense of the law may always be my ruling force for 36000 days. Act urgently as this is the law and order of T'ai-shang Lao-chün (太上老君).

At this point, the text gives us an instruction for the application of the spell. Each morning we have to take one portion of frankincense (ju-hsiang 乳香) and inhale grasping the radiant breath of the sun. Three times, we exhale the breath [loudly] coughing above the incense and use purified water to swallow it.¹¹⁴ We can preserve our body to be fine and without any illness for one full year, and our eyes will have the penetrating eyesight.

The next theme is a prayer for snow (ch'i-hsieh 祈雪): (32a) We read the following statement by the Fire Master (buo-shih 火師): Generally, the spring is warm in the world of man, the summer is hot, the autumn is cool and the winter is cold. Now, this is the constant principle of yin and yang (陰陽) that rise and descend. When the four seasons are in harmony, evil breaths (hsieh-ch'i 邪氣) do not come to life (pu-sheng 不生), and illnesses and epidemics do not arise. When one season is not quite in tune (pu-ying 不應), the people suffer from disasters as a response. When the winter is warm and there is no snow at all, this is called "yang battles" (yang-chan 陽戰), which causes people to be variously ill during springtime. When governors (kuo-wang 國王) and common locals (t'u-jen 113 Alternatively translate: „incense of the ritual“. The translation derives from my interpretation of the last sentence of the spell.

114 This may refer to the ashes of the incense.

土人) ask for snow [to fall] and for the expulsion of disaster, they report then the situation by means of t'ü (詞) [-prayers]. They are sent off as soaring memorials to the supreme god-emperors to notify the Court of the Emissaries of the Five Thunders and the Three Monitoring Offices of Thunder and Thunderclaps (Lei-t'ing san-ssu 雷霆三司). They also notify the Divine and Supreme Councillor of the East and the Immortal Master of Portentous Radiance (Tung-ling shang-hsiang Jui-kuang hsien-shih 東靈上相瑞光仙師).¹¹⁵ The memorial begs for pardon concerning the transgressions of the living beings (sheng-ling 生靈) and implores that portentous snow may be sent down earlier as to suppress the evil breaths. Then you go to a location that corresponds above [in heaven] with the T'ai-sui [star] (太歲), and exactly in that location you set up an altar with three levels in accordance with the model of the altar that is used to pray for rain. You order the Taoist priests (tao-shih 道士) to do everything just in the same way as for the rituals [described] before. It is, however, required that in the centre of the altar and above the incense table for the ritual veneration you paint two icons (liang-wei 兩位) in order to venerate the Divine and Supreme Councillor of the East and the Immortal Master of Portentous Radiance.¹¹⁶ (32b) Every time the ritual master comes to the three points of time, namely ch'en, wu and yu (辰午酉) he performs the [ritual] steps "produce water and summon thunders" (tso-shui chao-lei kang 作水召雷罡). He holds firmly his sword and ascends the altar. Turning to the right hand side, he walks around [the altar] thirty six times and recites silently (mo-nien 默念) thirty six times the Spell of the Eastern Divine Force (tung-ling chou 東靈咒). When he reaches the front side of the incense altar, he presents incense and makes his statement to the supreme god-emperors, to the Court of the Emissaries of the Five Thunders, to the Three Monitoring Offices of Thunder and Thunderclaps (lei-t'ing san-ssu 雷霆三司), to the Divine and Supreme Councillor of the East and the Immortal Master of Portentous Radiance (Tung-ling shang-hsiang Jui-kuang hsien-shih 東靈上相 / 瑞光仙師),¹¹⁷ that they may soon send down portentous snow.

115 These are two addressees. Compare TT 15 Wu-shang chiu-hsiao yü-ch'ing ta-fan tzu-wei hsüan-tu lei-t'ing yü-ching 17a, which at first sight suggests that this is just one name and title. However, see below the reference to the two icons that have to be set up. They stand for two identities. The pantheon in TT 1220: 56.5b has Tung-ling shang-shang yüan-chün (東靈上相元君) and p.6a has Jui-kuang hsien-shih (瑞光仙師).

116 A commentary in small print points out that the name Tung-ling (東靈) in some other text reads "the Eight Magic Forces of the Eastern Pole" (dong-chi pa-ling 東極八靈).

117 Concerning the two names, see above.

Now, following this and relying on the formal procedures you can descend from the altar. It will not take more than the time of one prostration and there will be a response. The ritual to thank for the snow follows the formal arrangements of the ritual for prayers for rain.

The Spell of the Eight Magic Forces of the Eastern Pole (tung-chi pa-ling chou 東極八靈咒) says: Divine Supreme Councillor of the East, home of portentous radiance, you secretly keep in control the heavenly flowers of green jasper of the superior god-emperors. You rule over the wide and clear fire and let the wind sweep severely in order to eliminate the evil [forces]. Your compassion and benevolence save the creatures, responding in time without failure. I desire that you send down portentous snow that may spread all over China (chung-hua 中華). Act urgently as this is law and order. (33a)

Another spell says: Gold-Essences, Great Ultimate, Jade Flowers that disperse their leaves, I [modestly] pray for snow and pray so to move away the warm atmosphere of wind and fire. Luminous Master, Fire Master (huo-shih 火師), do let portentous [signs] appear. Superior Perfected Ones in the Great Void, in [the Heaven of] Great Purity and at the Ultimate Poles (t'ai-hsü t'ai-ch'ing t'ai-chi 太虛太清太極), do assist [the execution of] this order.

The Crusade against Temples and the Eviction of Wicked Spirits (fa-miao ch'ü-ching 伐廟除精)

The Fire Master says: You respond to life among people when there are outrageous spirits, fierce demons, mountain spirits and monstrous demons (魃) that lead astray common wives and daughters, let their bodily appearances become visible and secretly rob properties of the people. Thus, they have shrines and sow the seeds to commit transgressions. Thunder and thunderclaps supervise the investigation of such elements, because they do not fear the laws of the immortals (hsien-fa 仙法). It is well permissible that people expose t'zu [-prayers] (t'ou-t'zu 投詞) to memorialize all the harm [they have suffered]. They rely then on these memorials to inform the superior god-emperors and send off soaring notifications to all the officials, using special documents for the Divine Thunder and the Water Thunder (shen-lei shui-lei 神雷水雷), which may convene and proceed [together], crusading against [such evil elements] within a certain time.

When the right time has come, you carry on your left forearm the Seal (yin 印) of Thunder Radiance and Fire Script (lei-kuang huo-wen 雷光火文) and the Seal (33b) of Mercury Heaven of Purple Radiance (tzu-kuang tan-t'ien 紫光丹天). You perform the [ritual] steps "the soaring dragon beheads the monsters" (fei-lung chan-kuai kang 飛龍斬怪罡). You do so to move the violent and evil forces (k'uang-hsieh 狂邪) and crusade against [the respective] temple gate. You attach first one Amulet of the Great Divinity of Blazing Fire (Yen-huo ta-shen fu 焱火大神符) at the gate. Having done so, you return to some high and exposed location on the right and left sides [of the temple in consideration]. You sacrifice in the open (yeh 野) to the thunder divinities (lei-shen 雷神), shout out for them to come forth and approach speedily that site in order to burn down and destroy the temple and to put away and arrest the demonic thieves. Responding right in time there will be extensive thunders and rainfall. Do not be afraid at all. When the ritual procedures are complete, you offer a feast (chi-ch'ou 祭酬) for the Thunder and thunderclaps. When you use this ritual for your performance, you must perform it publicly and correctly. You must not use this method for any erratic endeavours. You have to fear that you hurt creatures, but [in this case] the ritual officer (fa-kuan 法官) invokes all the blame to rest upon him.

The beheading of scaly dragons, sea-serpents and water monsters (chan chiaoch'en shui-kuai 斬蛟蜃水怪) is the following theme. When water-serpents, dragons and water monsters dwell in rivers, lakes, ponds and in dark caves with pools and fountains, when they devour the six [sorts of] domestic animals, suck the blood veins of men and eventually change to be huge serpents that bar the main roads in the area and harm the merchants, or when they attack untimely and cause great floods that inundate provinces and districts, you memorialise all of this precisely (34a) vis-à-vis the supreme god-emperors. You notify all officials and send documents to the Water Department (shui-fu 水府), asking for generals and emissaries to be sent down in order to crusade against [these plagues] within a certain time. Three days in advance, you must present warrants (chieh 牒) to the city god (Ch'eng-huang 城隍) in the [respective] province or district (chou-hsien 州縣), to the earth-god (t'u-ti 土地), to the village altars (li-she 里社) and the local shrines (miao-tzu 廟祠), that they group and lead on their [spirit] troops and generals to control the roads in the four directions and prevent the dragons, monsters and evil water spirits to pass through. When the specific time and day have come, you use flags that are made of dark red silk, seven ch'ih long, and write out seven pieces of the Amulet Heavenly Barrier (t'ien-kuan fu 天關符). You use the Seal of Cave Magic of the Jade Morning (yü-ch'en tung-ling 玉晨洞靈) to seal the amulets. Carrying the seal on the left upper arm, you form twisting [the fingers] the mudrá Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局). Your right hand grasps the sword and you perform the [ritual] steps "connect the heavenly iron barricade" (lien t'ien t'ieh-chang kang 連天鐵障罡). You approach the place where the sea serpents and dragons are in hiding and throw the amulets into the water. When you go to expose the amulets [in the water] you must instruct the [local] people to beat brass gongs and drums as to support the action. When the exposure of the amulets had been done, you must summon and invite with a very loud voice all the officials, generals and troops and the legions of the department of the Five Thunders that they speedily behead the water monsters. When [the water monsters] shrink back into the water, the thunders shake the waves that greatly boil up and make these monsters come up to drift on the surface of the water. You most urgently must (34b) take out then the Seal Cave-Magic (tung-ling 洞靈)¹¹⁸ and let it shine on the monsters.¹¹⁹ The blood of the monsters shall flow out of their two eyes and thus they perish. After this has been achieved you order your attendants (ti-tzu 弟子) to stab [the monsters] with their swords and bury the cadavers in a remote place that must be secured (chen 鎮) with [the help of] amulets. When this procedure is complete, you issue amulets in order to send back all the troops and generals to return to their original spheres of might [where they are stationed]. Later then and quite independently, you choose an auspicious day to present sacrificial offerings as thanksgiving.

A Corpus of Taoist Ritual now introduces seven heavenly characters that constitute the dispersed form of the Amulet of the Seven Killers of the Heavenly Barrier (t'ien-kuan ch'i-sha fu 天關七煞符). The description says: (35a): The seven amulets are extremely magic (chi-ling 極靈).¹²⁰ They dominate the water monsters of a whole region. In case that you want to bring peace and control to one region or one spot, you write the seal characters of the amulet in a compound structure (tieh-chuang 疊篆). You use iron ore (sheng-t'ieh 生鐵) to cast [the amulet]. When it is completed you place [the amulet] safely at pools and caves and for all future ages there will not be again any harm caused by any water monsters. [The amulet characters] present the decree to behead and eliminate poisonous dragons and water monsters "urgently as this is the law and order".

118 This most likely is the above mentioned seal Cave Magic of the Jade Morning (yü-ch'en tung-ling 玉晨洞靈)

119 This instructions seems to have a "historical" precedent, involving the two famous Taoists Hsü Sun (許遜) and Wu Meng (吳猛), compare above TT 1220: 56.10a- 10b.

120 Notice that each of the seven characters can count as one amulet.

The following subtitle reads: Multilayer seal character that assembles the outer form of the seven killers of the heavenly barrier (t'ien-kuan ch' i-sha chü-hsing tieh-chuan 天關七煞聚形疊篆). Below the seal character of the compound seal, we get the indication that we should add the religious rank, the surname and name [of the performing priest].

Ritual Steps and Mudrâs (pu-kang chüeh fa 步罡訣法)¹²¹

Concerning the theme there are quite a few subtitles: (35b) The Fire Master (huo-shih 火師) says that the men who cultivate perfection and receive the ritual methods have to encounter an enlightened master. He would instruct them concerning the pure amulets (fu-t'u 符圖) and the patterns of the precious seals (pao-yin wen 寶印文) of the Five Departments of Thunder Rituals (lei-fa wu-pu 雷法五部). Furthermore, the persons need to get the choreography for the ritual paces and the [proper] measures for the mudrâs (kang-pu chüeh-chieh 罡步訣節). Only then, it is that the men can attain the magic force [of amulets and seals]. It is for this reason that in correct rituals there are the [spirit] generals Chien-kang (建罡將軍) and Ch' i-kang (起罡將軍).¹²² All [correct rituals] document this matter. Today I transmit it for the posterity.

Now we see five titles and drawings of ritual choreographies that show the choreography of various ritual paces.

Ritual paces to produce water and summon the thunders (tso-shui chao-lei kang 作水召雷罡).¹²³

Ritual paces of the soaring dragon that brings rain (fei-lung chib-yü kang 飛龍致雨罡). (36a)

Ritual paces of the soaring dragon that beheads monsters (fei-lung chan-kuai kang 飛龍斬怪罡).

121 chüeh (訣) most certainly means "hand-gesture" (mudrâ), see below pp. 36b-37a.

122 The two spirit generals most likely represent the stars at the tail and the head of the Big Dipper. They point to the crucial orientation of proper Thunder rituals.

123 kang (罡) refers to the astral constellation of the Big Dipper that provides the standard orientation for the choreography of the ritual steps. The translation "ritual paces (or steps)" implies the astral orientation.

Ritual paces that drive on the dragons to suck up the flood (ch'ü-lung hsi-shui kang 驅龍吸水罡) (36b).

Ritual paces of the iron barricade that connects heaven (lien t'ien t'ieh-chang kang 連天鐵障罡).

All the drawings give a rather detailed mapping of the paces. The first drawing most clearly shows that the choreography follows the basic pattern of the Big Dipper.

The text continues to present a conclusive list of hand-gestures (mudrās/chüeh-mu 訣目) that contains the following items:

The mudrā k'uei-mu 魁目 is the hsü (戌) -pattern¹²⁴ that must be pressed with the thumb of the left hand.

The mudrā kang-mu 罡目 is the ch'en (辰) -pattern.

The mudrā shen-mu 神目 is the wu (午) -pattern.

The mudrā kuei-mu 鬼目 is the tui -pattern with mao on top of it (兌卯).

The mudrā "barring the wicked influences of the wind" (chin feng-hsieh 禁風邪) requires that the thumb of the left hand presses upon the second finger.

The mudrā "seal of comprehensive assistance" (tsung-she yin 總攝印) requires that [the thumbs of] both hands press upon the middle section of the [respective] middle fingers.

The mudrā "seal for the employment of emissaries" (i-shih yin 役使印) means that a position between the positions mao and ch'en (卯辰) [must be pressed upon].

(37a) The mudrā Thunder Office (lei-chü 雷局) means that the thumb presses the second and the third fingers and forms twisting the tzu (子) -pattern. [The same time] the fourth and fifth fingers press upon the centre of the palm (chang-hsin 掌心).

124 Alternatively "line" that has to be pressed upon, see below. Pattern translates the word wen (文).

The following Text on Transforming to be a Divine Entity (hua-shen wen 化神文) certainly makes some statements that have a top priority for Taoist Thunder rituals. The commentary in small print reveals the importance of the title. It points out that generally any writing of amulets, any dispatch of literary documents and any practice of self-cultivation (hsing-ch'ib 行持)¹²⁵ require to transform the own person to be a divine entity.

The Fire Master (huo-shih 火師) says that any gentleman who performs Thunder rituals (lei-fa 雷法) and, at any given time, has the task to expel [wicked elements], employ [divine forces], address and call out [for divine help], would have to use the mudrâ "transform to be a divine entity" (pien-shen ch'ieh 變神訣). He grinds his teeth five times (k'ou-ch'ib 叩齒) and visualises (ts'un 存) that he wears on the top of his head a liang-cap (liang-kuan 梁冠), is clad in red garment and wears red shoes. [He visualizes] immortals who on his left and right sides hold up streamers. There are [also] young lads who present respectfully the sword and keep the registers (lu 錄) at hand. Other young lads hold up banners. There are the judges, who keep the registers of evil deeds. There are the generals of the Thunder lords (Lei-kung 雷公) of the Five god-emperors (wu-ti 五帝), the Thunder Lord Shao-yang (Shao-yang lei-kung 劬陽雷公), the Generalissimo of the Fire Carriages (huo-ch'ü yüan-shuai 火車元帥) and the divine generals of all the [Thunder] offices. They altogether appear in front of me,¹²⁶ behind me and on my left and right sides. They listen to my orders and directives. After this, I start to perform the ritual [in consideration].

The following text presents a Spell for Dispatching Texts and Scripts (fa-ch'ien wen-t'zu chou 發遣文字咒) saying: I respectfully receive the command from the god-emperors and keep seals and amulets in tight control. Having the sole power of command over the Headquarters Offices¹²⁷ I command the affairs of demons (37b) and divinities who do not operate in the right order. The execution of my order must be as fast as the fire of the stars (hsing-huo 星火).

125 This is the title of the third paragraph in Wang Shih-ch'en ch' i-tao pa-tuan chin (王侍宸祈禱八段錦) in TT 1220: 69.11a-14a, where the term clearly points to the type of self-cultivation and meditation that has to precede any ritual action in the framework of Thunder Magic.

126 Explicitly wu (吾), representing the Thunder specialist. For the two divinities Thunder Lord Shao-yang (Shao-yang lei-kung 劬陽雷公), Generalissimo of the Fire Carriages (Huo-ch'ü yüan-shuai 火車元帥), see the pantheon in chapter 56, TT 1220: 56.9a-9b, where also the attendant lads are mentioned. P.6b gives a similar title, adding Three-and-Five.

127 See Hucker, p.542, nr.7285.

When the ritual [force] (fa 法) spreads out, it urgently leads wind and thunderclaps to victory. The three spheres (san-chieh 三界) must not let the slightest delay happen, and within shortest time there are bright responses. Obey and accept the respective commands and do not hastily delay or retain them (ch'ih-liu 遲留). Go quickly and return quickly. I attend.

Another spell says: Heavenly thunders, all in hiding, dragon and tiger interlock (lung-hu chiao-heng 龍虎交橫). Sun and moon spread out your radiance. Shine on me and give me a share of your brightness. Palace Guard Emissaries, attend to the amulet, accept and execute [my orders].

The subsequent text presents an instruction concerning sacrifices that are performed in open air (yeh-chi shen-chüeh 野祭神訣).¹²⁸ The Fire Master (huo-shih 火師) gives the following instruction: Generally, when prayers and requests are made in order to crusade against a temple (fa-miao 伐廟) to expel wicked and cruel [elements], and when a fast response is desired to come about it is necessary to use the method of sacrificing in open air. In just a moment, there will be an appropriate response by the lower generals of the Thunder department (lei-pu 雷部), who are wild and fierce. You have to offer them blood sacrifices (hsüeh-shih 血食). The suitable ritual sacrifice has to be staged in open air. You choose a spot on a high mountain (kao-shan 高山) (38a) that nobody else reaches. [If the ritual is performed] at a market place (shih 市) you must use a single [separate] room in the position of Southeast, lock the room and present the sacrifice [inside]. When you set up the altar you take white chalk and mark out the altar [on the floor] with its three terraces facing [the direction of] sun (巽). The upper platform [of the altar] is broad nine ch'ih, the one in the middle is broad one chang and two ch'ih, and the lower platform is broad one chang and five ch'ih. You take one cock and fix firmly the legs with a dark red string of silk. You take five big wine-cups and one bottle of wine, five thousand [pieces of] sacrificial money and five sacrificial flags, one sharp-edged sword and frankincense for one incense burner. You arrange the altar according to the rules.

When the time has come, the ritual master (fa-shih 法師) wearing his hair dishevelled and barefooted looks far out into the direction of Southeast and performs the ritual steps "crush the earth and summon the magic forces" (p'o-ti chao-ling kang 破地召靈罡). He ascends the altar and sacrifices incense (shang- bsiang 上香). His left hand forms twisting the mudrâ Employ-the-Emissaries (i-shih chüeh 役使訣), and his right hand holds the sword. Again, looking out into the direction of Southeast the ritual master declares with a loud voice: I respectfully receive the decree by the god-emperors to summon the Thunder Emissaries of Barbarian Thunder of the Five Directions (wu-fang man-lei shih-che 五方蠻雷使者), that they approach speedily to so-and-so location, to punish and behead the demonic thieves [at the location].

128 Most certainly, this does not just mean outdoors but points to a remote spot in the wilderness.

Perhaps the ritual master also says: Heaven, send down sweet rain and order wind and fire to be around quickly. Today I have prepared, heeding the rules, the blood of a cock, wine, sacrificial money, bright incense, sacrificial presents and other items. The time has come and nobody must offend against (38b) my orders. When the spell has ended, you stab the cock and let the blood drip into the wine-cups that stand for the five directions. You pour then wine into the five cups and use your sword to stir and mix the wine [with the blood] in the wine-cups. It is all the same as with the preceding spell. You burn (hua 化) the sacrificial money and take the sacrificial offerings to bury them three ch'ih [deep] in the earth [at a spot] in the direction of Southeast (sun 巽). The ritual master (fa-shih 法師) speaks again a spell saying: I am in front of the altar and my eminent sword is at avail. He takes his sword and sticks it upright into the earth where he had buried the sacrificial offerings, and then he retreats. Clouds will immediately come up and rain will start to fall. You must not often sacrifice [in this way] and hurt creatures. At the time of the sacrifice, you had one amulet fastened at the centre of the altar (t'an-hsin 壇心). When the ritual has come to its end, the amulet must be buried together with the [other] sacrificial objects. This method is extremely subtle and must not be leaked [to outsiders] because one has to be afraid that disaster may be caused to happen.

Now, we find a drawing that shows the altar with the flags as described in the text. There are two lines of Chinese characters in small print running down from the top to the bottom line on both sides of the square drawing. The lines indicate where the surname and name of the respective Emissary of the Barbarian Thunder can be inserted. The columns end with a statement saying, for example, "white garment and cap" (i-tse 衣幘), which speaks about the emissary of the West. The phrases black garment and cap, (39a) red garment and cap, green garment and cap point to the other three directions.

Conditions for the Ritual Transmission and [spirit] Promotion

(ch'uan-tu t'iao-p'in 傳度條品)

Here we read: generally, the salvation of several hundreds of people counts as one merit completed (i-kung 一功), also to pray for rain at one time counts as one merit completed. The achievement of [these] highest merits leads exactly to one promotion (chuan 轉).

At the start, the respective teacher master transfers the Shang-ch'ing Register that Preserves Clear Measures (pao ming-tui shang-ch'ing lu 保明兌上清錄)¹²⁹ to the disciple of Thunder Magic (lei-fa ti-tzu 雷法弟子), to let him serve as Judge on the Right Side at the Five Thunders Court (wu-lei yüan yu p'an-kuan 五雷院右判官). When the merit [on this position] is complete, the person¹³⁰ is promoted to [the rank of] Judge on the Left Side (tso p'an-kuan 左判官). Then the person is promoted to [the rank of] Great Judge on the Right Side (yu ta p'an-kuan 右大判官)¹³¹ and the same time Chief Corrector of the Proper Rituals and Lord of Origin for the [respective] day (cheng-fa chu-ko jih-chih yüan-chün 正法主格日直元君).

The following promotion is [the rank of] Great Judge on the Left Side (tso ta p'an-kuan 左大判官). When the merits [on the position] suffice, [the respective person] is promoted to [the rank of] Commissioner of the Capital Waters at the Dipper (tou-chung tu-shui shih-che 斗中都水使者). The commentary below in small print names still another title namely Commissioner that Controls the Waters (chang-shui shih-che 掌水使者). Furthermore, the person is promoted to [the rank of] Commissioner of the Capital Waters (tu-shui shih-che 都水使者).¹³²

Another commentary in small print indicates for this level the two alternative titles namely Judge on the Right Side for the Capital Waters and secondly Judge on the Left Side for the Capital Waters (tu-shui yu / tso p'an-kuan 都水右 / 左判官). When the merit on that position suffices, again the rank rises to be (39b)

129 Concerning tui 兌, see H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary, nr.12170. It is very unlikely that the character is used instead of nr.13776 "to be pleased" (悅). Lu (錄) certainly stands for "register" lu (錄).

130 This is the disciple of Thunder Magic, who rises to some remarkable spirit ranks.

131 Concerning the titles of these judges, see TT 1220: 56.6b of the pantheon.

132 As to these titles, compare TT 1220: 56.6b of the pantheon.

Arbiter of Fate in the Heaven of Supreme Purity [and] Councillor on the Right Side in the Jade Department (shang-ch'ing ssu-ming yü-fu yu-ch'ing 上清司命玉府右卿). The commentary in small print says that the title is identical with the Imperial Secretary in the Department of Fire (huo-pu shang-shu 火部尚書).

Again, the rank changes to be Arbiter of Fate in the Heaven of Supreme Purity, Councillor on the Left Side in the Jade Department (shang-ch'ing ssu-ming yü-fu tso-ch'ing 上清司命玉府左卿) that again the commentary says to be identical with the Imperial Secretary in the Department of Fire (huo-pu shang-shu 火部尚書).

The following promotions are the ranks: Superior Councillor at the Jade Department, Associated Emissary and Judge of the Five Thunders (yü-fu shang-ch'ing wu-lei fu-shih p'an 玉府上卿五雷副使判),¹³³ Supervisor of Public Affairs of Demons and Deities at the Headquarters Office of Thunder and Thunderclaps (lei-t'ing tu-ssu kuei-shen kung-shih 雷霆都司鬼神公事).

The next promotion confers the title Superior Councillor at the Jade Department, Emissary of the Five Thunders, Concurrent Supervisor of Public Affairs of Demons and Deities at the Headquarters Office of Thunder and Thunderclaps (yü-fu shang-ch'ing wu-lei shih ling lei-t'ing tu-ssu kuei-shen kung-shih 玉府上卿五雷使領雷霆都司鬼神公事). The commentary in small print says that the title is identical with the title [and function of] Censor at the Golden Palace in the Nine Heavens (chiu-t'ien chin-ch'ueh yü-shih 九天金闕御史) that also corresponds with the controlling function of the Judge on the Right Side and the Judge on the Left Side. The position may be called Joint Administrator and Supervisor, Manager of the Public Affairs of Demons and Deities at the Headquarters Office of Thunder and Thunderclaps (t'ung kuan-kan lei-t'ing tu-ssu kuei-shen kung-shih 同管幹雷霆都司鬼神公事). The official at the Jade Department (yü-fu ch'ing 玉府卿) may be called Supervisor and Administrator of the Public Affairs of Demons and Deities at the Headquarters Office of Thunder and Thunderclaps (chih lei-t'ing tu-ssu kuei-shen kung-shih 知雷霆都司鬼神公事).¹³⁴

The title Tablet of Declaration of Thunder and Thunderclaps (lei-t'ing pan-kaio 雷霆版誥) introduces the drawing of an amulet that has to be done in red ink on a plank made of the wood of pine trees (tzu-po 梓柏). We first see the front side of the plank that must be broad three ts'un and long five ts'un. We get the formulae for the two inscriptions on the front side and on the backside of the wooden plank. A text in small print below the drawing of the amulet says that so-and-so disciple can be entrusted with this or that task, which he will perform in accordance with the standards.

133 For this title, compare TT 1220: 56.5a of the pantheon.

134 We notice that these divine titles do not matter in the preceding texts.

(40a) The backside of the plank shows in the centre line the date of issue of the declaration. The right line names the [acting spirit] emissary who has so-and-so name and holds the rank of Emissary at the Court of the Jade Pivot (yü-shu yüan shih 玉樞院使).¹³⁵ The line on the left side of the central line with the date of issue indicates the street, the rank and the names of the respective teacher master.

A similar presentation of the Iron Bond of the Thunder Wall (lei-ch'eng t'ieh-ch'üan 雷城鐵券) follows. The central line of the text on the front side says: Decree, do guard the body and keep safe the life. Employ and dispatch the Five Thunders. This has to be done in red ink. On the right side, we get eight characters of dhārani spells that control the [spirit] palace guards of all departments who record the merits and the weight of transgressions. On the left side of the central line, we read two dhārani characters. The subsequent text says: Urgently! All divine forces may accept and act according to [the amulet]. As far as the teacher master is concerned, any crime report about him being remiss in ritual matters reaches the three officials (san-kuan 三官) for his impeachment. - The next line to the left belongs to the backside of this bond and again names the Emissary at the Court of the Jade Pivot (yü-shu yüan shih 玉樞院使), [who in fact is] so-and-so official with so-and-so surname. The formulae on the backside are identical with the respective text of the Tablet of Declaration of Thunder and Thunderclaps that we have just seen.

These rather formalistic presentations are very much in line with the preceding descriptions of spirit ranks that the successful Thunder specialist can hold. The administrative instructions round up and conclude chapter 56.

I only summarize briefly the two formal descriptions of memorials and administrative documents that follow (pp.40a-42a). The standard formulae enlist the help of the Court of the Emissaries of the Five Thunders in the Jade Department of the Heaven of Highest Purity (Shang-ch'ing yü-fu wu-lei shih-yüan 上清玉府五雷使院). All the available [spirit] military forces, the amulets, 135 This is the spirit position that the priest has adopted to work out the amulet.

seals, mudrās and emissaries are to forward the report or petition (shen 申) of the administering priest, who calls for the support of the highest spirit-authorities in heaven to help the country and save the people. Any support must be provided due to the orders of the supreme god-emperors, who receive the petition by the intermediaries of the Jade Department. There must be no offence against or suppression of the requests brought to the knowledge of the authorities at the Jade Department by means of the basic prayer tablets that the sincere followers of Taoism exposed. Individual protection and salvation is also asked for, and this extends to the salvation of the seven generations of ancestors in Hades, which again is a standard requirement in terms of filial piety.

The first document has the specific title: Form for Memorials (cha-tzu shih 劄子式). (40b) The second sketchy document gives the basic pattern for an address to the Court of the Heavenly Pivot (shen t'ien-shu yüan 申天樞院). First, there is an appeal to the subordinate Court of the Emissaries of the Five Thunders in the Jade Department of the Heaven of Highest Purity (Shang-ch'ing yü-fu wu-lei shih-yüan 上清玉府五雷使院). In each case, we learn how to date, sign or seal the documents. ***

Abbreviations

AAS: Asien- und Afrika-Studien der Humboldt Universität zu Berlin.
Harrassowitz/Wiesbaden

AF: Asiatische Forschungen. Harrassowitz/Wiesbaden

Book of Changes: The I Ching or Book of Changes, the Richard Wilhelm Translation rendered into English, by C.F.Baynes. New York 1967.

Companion:: K.Schipper and F.Verellen eds.: The Taoist Canon, A Historical Companion to the Daozang. 3 vols.Chicago 2004.

Hucker: A Dictionary of Official Titles in Imperial China. Stanford 1985.

JRAS: Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society

MOS: Münchener Ostasiatische Studien. Steiner/Stuttgart

TT: Taoistischer Kanon (Ta Ming Tao-tsang ching/ Cheng-t'ung tao-tsang). Ed. Taipei 1977, 61 vols.

ZDMG: Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft

Bibliography

- P.Andersen: "The Practice of Bugang", in: Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 5, pp.15-53 (1989-1990).
- P.Andersen and F.C.Reiter eds.: Scriptures, Schools and Forms of Practice in Daoism, A Berlin Symposium, in: AAS 20 (2005).
- J.M.Boltz: A Survey of Taoist Literature, Tenth to Seventeenth Centuries. Berkeley 1987.
- Chang Chih-hsiung/Li Feng-mao: Cheng-yi fu-fu yü tao-chiao wen-hua. Shou-chieh hai-hsia liang-an tao-chiao wen-hua lun-t'an. Chiang-hsi 2005.
- Kwang-Chih Chang: "China on the Eve of the Historical Period", pp.37-73. In: M.Loewe and E.L. Shaughnessy eds.: The Cambridge History of Ancient China, From the Origins of Civilization to 221 B.C. Cambridge 1999.
- Ch'en Kuo-fu: Tao-tsang yüan-liu k'ao. Rpr. Taipei 1975.
- Ch'en Shun-yü: Lu-shan chi, in: Pi-chi hsü-pien. Ed. Taipei 1969.
- Chou-i, ed.: Kanbun taikēi. Tokyo 1913.
- Chuang-tzu chi-chieh, in: Chu-tzu chi-ch'eng. Peking 1986.
- W.Eichhorn: Die Religionen Chinas. Stuttgart 1973.
- S.D.R.Feuchtwang: An Anthropological Analysis of Chinese Geomancy. Vientiane 1974.
- H.A.Giles: A Chinese-English Dictionary. Rpr.Taipei 1972.
- Hsiao T'ien-shih : Hsü-hsien chuan, in: Li-tai chen-hsien shih-chuan, Tao-tsang ching-hua 5/7. Taipei 1980.
- Hsü Chien: Ch'u-hsüeh chi. Ed. Peking 1980.
- Huang K'an ed.: Pai-wen shih-san ching, Shang-shu; Chou-shu hung-fan. Shanghai 1983.
- R.Hymes: Way and Byway. Taoism, Local Religion and Models of Divinity in Sung and Modern China. Berkeley 2002.
- Kan Pao: Sou-shen chi. Ed. Ku hsiao-shuo ts'ung-k'an. Chung-hua Comp. Peking 1978.
- L.Kohn ed.: Daoism Handbook. Leiden 2000.
- J.Lagerwey: Wu-shang pi-yao, somme taoïste du VI siècle. Paris 1981.
- . Taoist Ritual in Chinese Society and History. New York 1987.

- M.E.Lewis: "Warring States Political History", p.632, in: M.Loewe E.L.Shaughnessy eds.: The Cambridge History of Ancient China, From the Origins of Civilisation to 221 B.C. Cambridge 1999.
- Li Fang: T'ai-p'ing guang-chi. Ed. Kyoto 1972.
- Li Yüan-kuo: Shen-hsiao lei-fa. Chengdu 2003.
- : "Tao-chiao lei-fa yen-ko k' ao", in: Shih-chieh tsung-chiao yen-chiu. 2002, 3, pp.88-96.
- : "Lun tao-fu te chieh-kou yü pi-fa", in: Tsung-chiao hsiieh yen-chiu. 1998, 2, pp.8-13.
- Liu Chung-yü: Tao-chiao fa-shu. Shanghai 2002
- M.Loewe and E.L. Shaughnessy eds.: The Cambridge History of Ancient China, From the Origins of Civilization to 221 B.C. Cambridge 1999.
- P. van der Loon: "A Taoist Collection of the Fourteenth Century", in MOS 25: W.Bauer ed.: Studia Sino-Mongolica, pp.401-405 (1979).
- H.Maspero: Le taoïsme et les religions chinoises, p.535 (Les procédés de nourrir le principe vital). Paris. Rpr. 1971.
- R.Mathieu: Étude sur la mythologie et l'ethnologie de la Chine ancienne, traduction annotée du Shanhai jing. Paris 1983.
- P.Nickerson: "Attacking the Fortress, Prolegomenon to the Study of Ritual Efficacy in Vernacular Daoism", pp.117-179, in: AAS 20 (2005).
- P'ei-wen yüan-fu*, ed. Taiwan Shang-wu Comp. Taipei 1966.
- F.C.Reiter: The Aspirations and Standards of Taoist Priests in the Early T'ang Period, in: AAS 1 (1998).
- : The Management of Nature: Convictions and Means in Daoist Thunder Magic (Daojiao leifa), pp.193-210, in: AAS 29 (2007).
- : "The Name of the Nameless and Thunder Magic", pp.97-116, in: AAS 20 (2005).
- : Religionen in China, Geschichte, Alltag, Kultur. München 2002.
- : "The Discourse on the Thunders, by the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing (1093-1153)", in: JRAS 14/3, pp.207-229.
- : "A Preliminary Study of the Taoist Wang Wen-ch'ing (1093-1153) and his Thunder Magic (lei-fa)", in: ZDMG 152, pp.155-184.
- : "Some Notices on the Magic Agent Wang (Wang ling-kuan) at Mt. Ch'i-ch'ü in Tzu-t'ung District, Szechwan Province", in: ZDMG 148, 323-342 (1998)
- : trl., ed.: Leben und Wirken Lao-Tzu's in Schrift und Bild Lao-chün pa-shih-i bua t' u-shuo. Würzburg 1990.
- : Der Perlenbeutels aus den Drei Höhlen (San-tung chu-nang), Arbeitsmaterialien zum Taoismus der frühen T'ang Zeit, in: AF 112 (1990).
- : Kategorien und Realien im Shang-ch'ing Taoismus, (Shang-ch'ing tao lei-shih hsiang), Arbeitsmaterialien zum Taoismus der frühen T'ang Zeit, in: AF 119 (1992).
- : Grundelemente und Tendenzen des religiösen Taoismus, das Spannungsverhältnis von Integration und Individualität in seiner Geschichte zur Chin-,Yüan- und frühen Ming-Zeit, in: MOS 48 (1988).

- : "The Scripture of the Hidden Contracts (Yin-fu ching): a short survey on facts and findings", in: Nachrichten der Gesellschaft für Natur- und Völkerkunde Ostasiens 136, pp.75-83 (1984).
- : „Die Ausführungen Li Tao-yüans zur Geschichte und Geographie des Berges Lu (Chiang-hsi) im <Kommentar zum Wasserklassiker>, und ihre Bedeutung für die regionale Geschichtsschreibung, in: Oriens Extremus 28 (1981).
- : Der Bericht über den Berg Lu (Lu-shan chi) von Ch'en Shun-yü, ein historiographischer Beitrag aus der Sung Zeit zum Kulturraum des Lu Shan. München 1978.
- I. Robinet: Méditation taoïste. Paris 1979.

M.Saso: Taoism and the Rite of Cosmic Renewal. Washington 1972.

K.Schipper and F.Verellen eds.: The Taoist Canon, A Historical Companion to the Daozang. 3, vols. Chicago 2004.

K.Schipper: "Le Calendrier de Jade, Note sur le Laozi zhongjing", in: Nachrichten der Gesellschaft für Natur- und Völkerkunde Ostasiens 125, pp.75-80.

G. Schlegel: Uranographie Chinoise. Leiden 1875.

A.K.Seidel: La divinisation de Lao Tseu dans le taoïsme des Han. Paris 1969.

Shih-chi. Ed.: Tung-hua Comp. Taipei 1970.

L.Skar: "Administering Thunder: A thirteenth Century Memorial Deliberating the Thunder Rites", in: Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 9, pp.159-202. (1996-1997).

-: "Ritual Movements, Deity Cults, and the Transformation of Daoism in Song and Yuan Times", in: L.Kohn ed.: Daoism Handbook, pp.413-463. Leiden 2000.

W.E.Soothill and L. Hodous: A Dictionary of Chinese Buddhist Terms. Rpr. Taipei 1972.

Ting Fu-pao: Fo-hsüeh ta-tz'u-tien. Taipei 1974

B.Watson trl.: The Complete Works of Chuang Tzu. New York 1968.

Wang Ch'ung: Lun-heng. Ed. Shanghai 1974.

Wang Tsung-yü: Duo-chiao i-shu yen-chiu. Shanghai 2001.

The Sources in the Taoist Canon

TT 15 Wu-shang chiu-hsiao yü-ch'ing ta-fan tzu-wei hsüan-tu lei-t'ing yü-ching

TT 31 Huang-ti yin-fu ching

TT 110 Huang-ti yin-fu ching shu

TT 147 Ling-pao wu-liang tu-jen shang-p'in miao-ching fu-t'u

TT 148 Wu-liang tu-jen shang-p'in miao-ching p'ang t'ung-t'u

TT 171 Ch'ing-wei hsien-p'u

TT 173 Chin-lien cheng-tsung chi

TT 174 Chin-lien cheng-tsung hsien-yüan hsiang-chuan

TT 263 Hsiu-chen shih-shu tsa-chu chih-hsüan p'ien

TT 295 Hsü-hsien chuan

TT 296 Li-shih chen-hsien t'i-tao t'ung-chien

TT 599 Tung-t'ien fu-ti yueh-tu ming-shan chi

TT 622 T'ai-shang hsüan-ling pei-tou pen-ming yen-sheng chen-ching

TT 629 T'ai-shang pei-tou erb-shih-pa chang ching

TT 670 Nan-hua chen-ching

TT 682 Tao-te chen-ching chu

TT 1015 Chin-so liu-chu yin

TT 1016 Chen-kao

TT 1101 T'ai-p'ing ching

TT 1129 Tao-chiao i-shu

TT 1130 Tao-tien lun

- TT 1032 Yün-chi ch' i-ch' i'en
- TT 1139 San-tung chu-nang
- TT 1166 Fa-hai i-chu
- TT 1168 T'ai-shang Lao-chün chung-ching
- TT 1220 Tao-fa hui-yüan
- TT 1221 Ssang-ch'ing ling-pao ta-fa
- TT 1227 T'ai-shang chu-kuo chiu-min tsung-chen pi-yao
- TT 1232 Tao-men shih-kuei
- TT 1241 Ch'uan-shou san-tung ching-chieh fa-lu lüeh-shuo
- TT 1248 San-tung ch'ün-hsien-lu
- TT 1250 Ch'ung-bsü t'ung-miao Shih-ch'en Wang hsien-sheng chia-hua
- TT 1402 Ssang-ch'ing huang-t'ing wu-tsang liu-fu chen-jen yü-chou ching
- TT 1476 Sou-shen chi
- TT 1485 Tzu-wei tou-shu

Glossary

A Corpus of Taoist Ritual Tao-fa hui-yüan
道法會元 14, 38, 40, 41, 59, 60,
64-66, 69, 111

A Dictionary of Official Titles in Imperial China 4

Agrarian communities 4

Altar 7, 10, 21, 36, 38, 44, 48, 49, 51, 56, 59, 65, 78, 79, 82, 84, 87, 88, 93, 100-
102, 108, 115, 116

Amulet fu 符 7, 8, 10, 29, 30, 36, 40-44,
46-48, 55, 56, 59, 64, 65, 71, 73, 78, 79,
86, 88-92, 95, 96, 103, 106, 107, 111,
112, 114, 116, 118, 119

Amulet water fu-shui 符水 72, 96

Ancestral breath tsu-ch'i 祖氣 22, 24, 42,
44, 61, 63

Ancestral palace tsu-kung 祖宮 20

Ancestors 73

Anterior Heaven hsien-t'ien 先天 23, 25,
28, 29, 35, 56, 59, 60, 64

Barefooted 65, 115

Black crow 22

Body of a snake 45

Blood 45, 116

Blood sacrifices 73, 83, 115

Breathing techniques fu-ch'i 服氣 5, 9,
41, 42, 48, 49, 61, 106

Bright Hall ming-t'ang 明堂 48, 51, 52

Buddha 63

Central palace chung-kung 中宮 19, 21,
26, 28, 43, 61

Cha-tzu 劄子 95

chai 齋 9, 10, 13

Chang-shui shih-che 掌水使者 117

Chang Wan-fu 張萬福 3

Chang Yü-ch'ü 張宇初 15, 39

Ch'ang-chiang 長江 101

Chao Hsüan-t'an/Kung-ming 趙玄壇公
明 20, 84

Chao-lang chih-yü chou 召龍致雨咒 101

Cheung-fa chu-ko jih-chih yüan-chün 正法主格
日直元君 117

Cheung-i /Heavenly Master Taoism 正一 3, 13

Cheung/chen-hsing 正/真形 42, 95

Ch'eng-huang 城隍 79, 84, 93, 110

Chi-kao 祭告 83

Ch'i-lung chih-yü fu 起龍致雨符 92, 93

Chi-lü-ling ta-shen 祭律令大神 85

Chi-shen chou 祭神咒 86

Ch'i-ch'ing chou 祈晴咒 105

Ch'i-ch'ing t'an-shih 祈晴壇式 102

Ch'i-chuan chou 七轉咒 91

Ch'i-kang Chiang-chün 起罡將軍 112

Ch'i-shen 氣神 26

Ch'i-yü chou 祈雨咒 103

Ch'i-yü t'an-shih 祈雨壇式 100

Chiao 醮 4, 13, 101, 103

Chien-chüeh 劍訣 21, 30

Chien-kang Chiang-chün 建罡將軍 112

Chien-yü fa 建獄法 96

Ch'ih Yu 蚩尤 85

Chin-ching tu-hai chih-yü 金精毒害之獄
97

Chin-lien cheng-tsung chi 金蓮正宗記 17

Chin-lien cheng-tsung hsien-yüan hsiang-chuan 金
蓮正宗仙源像傳 17

Ching 井 90

Ch'ing-t'ang 清堂 96

Ch'ing-wei 清微 2, 14, 17

Ch'ing-wei hsien-p'u 清微仙譜 17

Chiu-ch'üan k'u-nao chih-yü 九泉苦惱之
獄 97

Chiu-t'ien chin-ch'üeh yü-shih 九天金闕御
史 118

Chou-hsiang t'u-fu fa 咒香吞服法 107

- Ch'u-ku chou* 出穀咒 36
Ch'u-yin chou 出印咒 80
Chuan-hun chien-sung shih-che 縛魂監送使者 99
Ch'uan-k'o 傳科 76
Ch'uan-ling shih-che 傳令使者 99
Ch'uan-tu 傳度 79, 117
Chung hsiao jen i 忠孝仁義 82
Chü-hsing 聚形 92
Ch'ü-lung hsi-shui kang 驅龍吸水咒 103, 113
Ch'üan-chen 全真 17
Chüan-shui ch'ün-lung 捲水擒龍 61
 Cinnabar field tan-t'ien 丹天 34, 42, 47
 Clear sky 7, 48, 51, 78, 86, 88, 95, 100, 102, 105
 Colon ku-tao 谷/穀道 30, 57, 58, 61
 Communal rituals 4
 Confucianism 1
 Consecration 73, 79, 107
 Cosmos 27, 48, 49, 55, 57, 58, 61, 63, 94
 Creation 17, 61
 Creative impetus 57
 Crusade fa 伐 82, 109, 110, 115
 Delivery (child) 45
 Dispersed form, see san-hsing
 Divination 1
 Divine nature 16
 Divine patrons chu-fa 主法 59
 Divine texts ling-wen 靈文 73
 Divine prefectures shen-fu 神府 75
 Divine recipes shen-fang 神方 73
 Door of life sheng-men 生門 23
 Dragons (and snakes) 73, 77, 78, 85, 94, 102, 103, 110, 111
 Dragon-and-tiger amulet lung-hu fu 龍虎符 6
 Dragon-pools 93, 100
 Eight trigrams see pa-kua 八卦
 Elixirs 78
 Elixir classics tan-ching 丹經 22
 Encyclopaedias 1, 39
 Exorcist rituals/exorcism/exorcist 2, 4, 7, 10, 13, 15, 31, 65
Fa-ch'ien wen-tzu chou 發遣文字咒 114
 Fang Chung-kao 方仲高 40
 Faith healer 13
Fei-chien chan t'ien-huang 飛劍斬天皇 44
Fei-chien chuo-lung fu 飛劍捉龍符 92
Fei-lung chan-kuai kang 飛龍斬怪咒 110, 112
Fei-lung chih-yü kang 飛龍致雨咒 101, 112
Feng-fa 奉法 76
 Feng-hou 風后 77
 Feng-po ta-shen 風伯大神 102
 Fire 46, 52, 55-57, 80, 89, 90, 94, 104, 109, 116
 Fire Master 17, 65, 69, 73, 81, 87, 96, 100, 102, 107, 109, 112, 114, 115
 Fire of the stars hsing-huo 星火 114
 Fire official huo-kuan 火官 26
 Fire-thunder huo-lei 火雷 53
 Five colours 47
 Five elements 19, 21
 Five intestines 19, 20, 21, 34
 Five Thunders wu-lei 五雷 34, 37, 65, 70, 74, 77-81, 87, 89, 90, 91, 95, 96, 98, 99, 100, 101, 108, 111, 119
 Fox spirits 14
Fu-chüeh 符訣 73
Fu-feng meng-li Hsin t'ien-chün ta-fa 負風靈吏辛天君大法 36
Fu-feng meng-shen 負風猛神 102
 Gall tan 膽 20, 24, 26, 34, 36
 Gate of heaven t'ien-men 天門 47, 101
 God-emperors 37, 71, 72, 80-82, 85, 88, 89, 94, 95, 100-103, 105, 108, 109, 110, 114, 116, 120
 Green face 45, 46
 Grind the teeth k'ou-ch'ih 叩齒 35, 47, 89, 106, 114
 Hades 73, 106, 120
 Handle of the dipper, see T'a-san tou-ping 28-30, 61
 Han Po-wen 韓伯文 104
 Heart/hsin 心 19, 20, 24, 26, 29, 34, 45, 46, 48-50, 52, 53, 55-57, 59, 60, 63

Heart of heaven t'ien-hsin 天心 16, 75
 Heavenly documents t'ien-shu 天書 6, 10
 Heavenly eye t'ien-mu 天目 41, 106
 Heavenly female hsüan-p'in 玄牝 22, 57
 Heavenly laws t'ien-lü 天律 37
 Hells, see spirit hells
Ho-t'u 河圖 50
Hsiang-hao p'in 相好品 39
Hsien-t'ien i-ch'i buo-lei Chang shih-che ch'i-tao ta-fa 先天一氣火雷張使者祈禱
 大法 60, 64
Hsin-huo 心火 26
Hsin shuai 辛帥 20, 33, 34, 36, 38, 40
Hsing-ming 性命 83
Hsü-hsien chuan 續仙傳 5
Hsü Sun 許遜 5, 9, 77, 95
Hsüan-huang 玄黃 25
Hsüan-kuan 玄關 43
Hua-shen 化身 88, 89
Hua-shen wen 化神文 114
Huang-ti 黃帝 77, 85
 Human body 16, 18, 21, 22, 31, 33, 36,
 45, 48, 54, 55, 57, 61, 62, 73
Hun- and/or p'o souls bun-p'o 魂魄 42,
 51, 73
Hun-ming 混明 60
Hung-fan 洪範 27
Huo-chü yüan-shuai 火車元帥 114
Huo-kuang liu-hsing yü 火光流星獄 97
Huo-ling chih chai 火鈴之宅 86
Huo-lun lü-ling 火輪律令 106
Huo-pu shang-shu 火部上書 118
 Icons 108
 Immortality/immortals 2, 6
 Incense burner/table 98, 102, 103, 108, 115
 Infant ying-erh 嬰兒 32
 Internal practice hsing-ch'i 行持 24, 27,
 49, 54, 73, 114
 Iron 93, 111
I-shih chüeh 役使訣 116
I-shih yin 役使印 113
 Jade Emperor yü-ti 玉帝 37, 81, 104
 Jade Pivot, see Yü-shu
Ju-yin chou 入印咒 81

Jui-kuang hsien-shih 瑞光仙師 108
Kalpa 82
Kang-mu 罌目 113
Kang-pu 罌步 88
 Kidneys/shen 腎 19, 24, 30, 32, 34, 35,
 48-50, 52, 54-56, 58, 61
 Killing breaths shu-ch'i 煞氣 43, 57, 58
K'ou-ch'ib 叩齒, see grind the teeth
Kuei-mu 鬼目 113
K'uei-hsing/ kang 魁星/罌 60, 90
K'uei-mu 魁目 113
K'un-lun 崑崙 51, 94
Kung-ts'ao 功曹 79
Kuo Yüan-ching 郭元京 40
 Lamp-wick teng-hsin [ts'ao] 燈心[草] 56, 57
Lei-ch'eng t'ieh-ch'üan 雷城鐵券 119
Lei-ch'i 雷氣 80, 90
Lei-chü 雷局 28, 29, 30, 33-35, 38, 45, 56,
 87, 88, 91, 95, 111, 113
Lei-fa pi-chih 雷法秘旨 31
Lei-fa ti-tzu 雷法弟子 117
Lei-ku 雷鼓 95, 99
Lei-kung, see Thunder Lord
Lei-tien k'ao-chih yü 雷電考治獄 97
Lei-t'ing ti-chün 雷霆帝君 89
Lei-t'ing pan-ko 雷霆版誥 118
Lei-t'ing shen-wei 雷霆神位 85
Lei-t'ing tu-szu kuei-shen kung-shih 雷霆都
 司鬼神公事 118
Lien-chen 廉貞 26, 60
Lien-t'ien t'ieh-chang kang 連天鐵障罌
 111, 113
Liu Fang 劉昉 8, 9
Liu-tan fu 流丹符 93
Liver/kan 肝 19, 20, 26, 49, 52, 91
 Locusts 72
 Lotus flower 48, 50, 52
Lung-chün 龍君 83
Lun-heng 論衡 3
Lung-kung 龍宮 82, 83
Lung-lei 龍雷 71, 81, 82
Lü-ling ta-shen 律令大神 85, 86
Ma Ling-kuan 馬靈官 20
Ma Yü-lin 馬鬱林 40
Mao-chün 茅君 78

Martial spirit forces 2
 Memoranda/memorialise 76, 78, 79, 81-83, 88, 98, 100-102, 110
 Meng-tzu 孟子 42
 Ming-men 命門 42
 Ming-mu kuang-tzu fu 明目光字符 106
 Mouth 49, 53
 Mudrās 64, 65, 70
 Mu-lang chou 木郎咒 104
 Mu-lao 木老 26
 Mysterious female, see heavenly female

 Nan-tou/Dipper of the South 南斗 51
 Naval 56
 Ni-wan/Mud Pill 泥丸 35, 47, 58
 Nei-tan/internal alchemy 內丹 30, 31, 63, 64
 Northern Dipper/Big Dipper pei-ton 北斗 29, 47, 52, 59-61, 71, 75, 79, 80, 113
 Nostrils 21, 28-30, 41, 42, 43, 44, 56-58, 61, 62

 Open air 115
 O-po 闕伯 103
 Oral transmission k'ou-ch'uan/chüeh 口傳/訣 25, 27, 58, 65, 86, 103
 Original breath yüan-ch'i 元氣 22, 42-44

 Pa-kua/eight trigrams 八卦 48, 54, 80, 94
 Pa-kua lei-shen 八卦雷神 35
 Pai Yü-ch'an 白玉蟾 31, 64
 Pantheon 65
 Pao ming-yüeh shang-ch'ing lu 保明兌上清錄 117
 Pei-chi 北極 72
 Pei-ti 北帝 75, 89, 99
 Perfect King, see Yü-ch'ing chen-wang
 P'eng-lai (Office) 蓬萊 72, 75, 89, 99
 P'eng-shan chu-bai 烹山煮海 51
 Peitons 3, 37, 79, 93, 98
 P'iao-hsing 鰲星 60
 Pien-shen 變神 36
 Pien-shen chüeh 變神訣 88, 114
 P'o-chün 破軍 59, 60
 Possession 36
 Posterior Heaven hou-t'ien 後天 35, 36

P'o-ti chao-lei kang 破地召雷罡 88, 95, 115
 Promotion 117
 Pu-kang pien-shen chou 步罡變神咒 33

 Quail 32

 Red hair 32, 39, 85
 Register lu 錄 9, 10, 36, 38-40, 65, 114
 Ritual steps 64, 65, 88, 110-112

 San-chieh/three realms 三界 82, 92, 97, 115
 San-ching chou 三淨咒 28
 San-hsing 散形 92, 111
 San-kuan 三官 82, 119
 San-wu 三五 105
 Sanskrit 36
 San-tung chu-nang 三洞珠囊 13, 39
 School Talks 45, 64
 Seals 71, 76-81, 110, 112, 114, 120
 Self tzu-chi 自己 16
 Self-cultivation 2, 24, 27, 31, 49, 73, 85, 114
 Seven apertures 29
 Shaman/mediumistic culture 2, 36
 Shang-ch'ing 上清 38, 117
 Shang-ch'ing ling-pao ta-fu 上清靈寶大法 46
 Shang-ch'ing ssu-ming yü-fu yu-ch'ing 上清司命玉府右卿 118
 Shang-ch'ing yü-fu wu-lei shih-yüan 上清玉府五雷使院 119, 120
 Shang-ch'ing yü-fu wu-lei ta-fa yü-shu ling-wen 上清玉府五雷大法玉樞靈文 64
 Shang-yüan i-p'ien t'ien-kuan 上元一品天官 77
 Shao-yang lei-kung 劬陽雷公 114
 She-ling lei 社令雷 71, 81, 83, 84
 Shen Fen 沈汾 5
 Shen-hsiao bu-chao chüeh 神霄呼召訣 88
 Shen-hsiao tao/t'ien 神霄道/天 2, 69, 81
 Shen-lei 神雷 71, 81, 82, 86, 109
 Shen-mu 神目 113
 Sheng-ch'i ch'ing-lung fu 生氣青龍符 91
 Shou kang-tou chou 收罡斗咒 96

Shou-shui tso-ch'ing chou 收水作晴咒
103

Shrine/temple 54, 65, 73, 84, 96, 98, 109, 110, 115

Shu-chi 樞機 71

Shu-fu shih 書符式 46

Shu-hsing 樞星 60

Shui-lei 水雷 71, 81, 83, 109

Silver teeth 32, 39, 85, 87, 105

Six-and-One liu-i 六一 53

Snow 107, 108, 109

Spell 7, 19, 21, 28, 29, 30, 33, 34, 47, 65,
79, 81, 86-88, 90-94, 101, 104, 105,
107, 109, 114-116

Spine chia-chi 夾脊 30, 51, 52, 56

Spirit hells 64, 65, 96, 97

Spiritual/divine forces 18, 22, 24, 27, 28,
35, 36, 42, 44, 55, 56, 61, 63, 78, 106

Spleen/p'i 脾 21, 24, 34, 55, 56, 57, 58, 63

Ssu-yüan 四院 76

Ssu-sha 四煞 90

State rituals 14

Stomach 21

Stones 50, 52

Sung Hui-tsung 宋徽宗 4, 14, 48

Sung-period 2, 3, 4, 14, 40, 54

Sweat 55, 57

Sword 45, 101, 103, 108, 111, 114-116

T'a-fan tou-ping 踏翻斗柄 61

Ta-tung ch'ing-yü chou 大洞請雨咒 104

T'ai-i 太乙 60, 61, 93, 104

T'ai-i Cave t'ai-i hsüeh 太一 58, 60

T'ai-p'ing ching 太平經 13

T'ai-po feng-ling 太伯風令 104

T'ai-shang Lao-chün 太上老君 17, 107

T'ai-shang Lao-chün chung-ching 太上老君
中經 39

T'ai-sui 太歲 100, 108

Taiwan 2, 65

Tan-fu 丹符 100

Taoist Canon 10, 15

Tao-chiao i-shu 道教義樞 13

Tao-miao 道妙 17

Tao-shu 道術 5, 8

Tao-tian lun 道典論 13

Teng Kung-ch'en 鄧拱辰 40

Teng Shuai Po-wen 鄧帥伯溫 19, 26,
32-34, 39, 85, 105

Three eyes 45, 46

Three Heavens san-t'ien 三天 72

Three Marshals san-shuai 三帥 35

Three Monitoring Offices san-ssu 三司
75, 82, 88, 94, 96, 98, 100-102, 108

Three potentials san-ts'ai 三才 62

Three Terraces san-t'ai 三台 29

Thunder altar lei-t'an 雷壇 51, 56

Thunder breaths see lei-ch'i

Thunder deities/divinities lei-shen 雷神 9, 16, 17, 24, 30, 33, 35, 40, 59, 64, 71, 89,
110

Thunder department lei-pu 雷部 50, 85,
95, 100, 103, 115

Thunder drums. See lei-ku

Thunder files lei-pu 雷簿 39

Thunder Lord/Lei-kung 雷公 3, 33, 77,
87, 92, 114

Thunder Magic/Rituals wu-lei fa 五雷法
2, 3, 4, 10, 13-18, 31, 33-35, 38, 40, 41,
47, 48, 54, 58, 59, 61, 62, 64-66, 114,
117

Thunder Office, see lei-chü 雷局

Thunder prefecture lei-fu 雷府 74

Thunder ranks 35

Thunder Wall lei-ch'eng 雷城 72, 74, 103, 119

Three worlds san-chieh 三界 51

Ti-huo lei-shen 地火雷神 91

Tien-lu k'ao-chün shih che 典錄拷禁使者
99

T'ien-chang 天章 89

T'ien-fu 天符 94, 97

T'ien-hsi 天熹 53

T'ien-hsin cheng-fa 天心正法 2

T'ien-huo lei-shen 天火雷神 90

T'ien-huang fu 天皇符 44, 45

T'ien-i 天一 50

T'ien-kang 天罡 26, 59, 61, 79

T'ien-kuan ch'i-sha fu 天關七煞符 111

T'ien-kuan fu 天關符 110

T'ien-lei 天雷 71, 81, 82

T'ien-ming 天命 102

T'ien-mu/mother of lightning 電母 33, 92

- T'ien-shu yüan* 天樞院 120
T'ien Yüan-tsung 田元宗 40
 Tongue 34, 36, 49, 53, 55, 57
Tou-chung tu-shui shih-che 斗中都水使者 117
Tou-chung/hsia t'ung-shih she-jen 斗中/下通事舍人 77, 79
Tou-k'uei yin 斗魁印 78
Tou-shu yüan 斗樞院 75
 Tripod vessel 22
Tso-shui chao-lei kang 作水召雷罡 101, 108, 112
Tsung-she yin 總攝印 113
Tu-jen ching 度人經 25
Tu-shui yu/tso p'an-kuan 都水右左判官 117
T'u-ti 土地 110
 Tung Feng 董奉 8
Tung-chi pa-hing chou 東極八靈咒 109
Tung-ling chou 東靈咒 108
Tung-ling shang-hsiang 東靈上相 108
Tzu-hu 紫戶 42
Tzu-kuang t'ung-tzu 紫光童子 77
Tzu-wei 紫微 105, 106
Tzu'u 詞 82, 100, 102, 108, 109
 Urinary organs 61
 Urinate/urine hsiao-i 小遺 49, 54, 61
 Wang Ch'ung 王充 3
Wang Shih-ch'ên ch'î-tao pa-tuan chin 王侍宸祈禱八段錦 18
 Wang Tzu-hua 汪子華 17
 Wang Shan Ling-kuan 王善靈官 20
 Wang Wen-ch'ing/Shih-ch'ên 王文卿侍宸 14, 15, 17-19, 22, 24, 28, 30, 31, 33, 39-41, 43, 46, 48, 54, 55, 60, 62-64, 66, 69
 Water Department shui-fu 水府 97, 110
 Water monsters shui-yao 水妖 78, 83, 89, 91, 96, 97, 102, 110, 111
 Wen-shuai 溫帥 20, 26
 Windlass pass lu-lu kuan 轆轤關 51
 Window of Death ssu-hu 死戶 23
 Window of Earth ti-hu 地戶 29, 30, 52, 101, 103
 Window of the brain nao-hu 腦戶 51, 52, 58
 Womb 42, 46, 51
Wu-fang man-lei [shih che] 五方蠻雷[使者] 33, 34, 116
Wu-lei chu-tsai 五雷主宰 88
W'u-lei chüeh 五雷訣 95
W'u-lei chou 五雷咒 95
W'u-lei tsung-she fu 五雷總攝符 89
W'u-lei yüan 五雷院 76
W'u-lei yüan yu p'an-kuan 五雷院右判官 117
 Wu Meng 吳猛 5, 9, 41, 77, 95
Wu-so fu(-chüeh) 五鎖符(訣) 90
 Wu-tang shan 武當山 85
Wu-ti 五帝 114
 Wu-yüeh chang-jen 五嶽丈人 71
 Wu-yüeh wu-chün chang-jen 五岳五君丈人 77
W'u-shang pi-yao 無上祕要 1
W'u-tao 五道 98
 Yeh Ch'ien-shao 葉千劭 4-10, 41, 65
 Yellow court huang-t'ing 黃庭 25, 28, 43, 56
Yen-huo chen-hsing fu 焱火真形符 103
Yen-huo fu 焱火符 86
 Yen-huo ta-shen 焱火大神 85, 102
Yen-huo ta-shen fu 焱火大神符 94, 110
Yu-t'ai ch'ang-yeh chih yü 幽臺長夜之獄 98
 Yung-yin chou 用印咒 80
Yü-ch'ên tung-ling chih yin 玉晨洞靈之印 78, 110, 111
 Yü-ch'ing chen-wang 玉清真王 69, 70, 71, 72, 74, 88
Yü-ch'ing chüeh 玉清訣 47
 Yü-feng 御風 18, 19, 22, 24, 27, 29-31, 40, 42, 43, 49, 53, 56, 58, 60-62
 Yü-fu shang-ch'ing wu-lei fu shih-p'an 玉府上卿五雷副使判 118
Yü-shu 玉樞 72, 73, 75-77, 88, 89, 99, 119
Yü-shu yüan shih 玉樞院使 119
Yü-wan t'ung-tzu 玉完童子 79
Yü-wei fan-p'o 魚尾翻波 52
 Yüan-chün 元君 93

Yüan-ming chen-chün 元命真君 105
Yüan-shih t'ien-tsun/Heavenly Worthy of Prime Origin 元始天尊 25, 46, 47

Yüan Wu-chieh 袁無介 18, 19, 40, 41,
48, 55, 62
Yün-lei ta-sui fu 運雷打祟符 95

The Sword Scripture: Recovering and Interpreting a Lost 4th-Century Daoist Method for Cheating Death*

Robert Ford Campany

Abstract

This article undertakes a new interpretation of the Shangqing text known as the Sword Scripture, which has survived in fragments. It argues that the scripture prescribed a classic sort of method of shijie or “escape by means of a simulated corpse.” It also presents a theory as to why such a method would have been recommended to the earliest recipients of the Shangqing revelations despite the fact that the scripture does not promise that the practice it teaches would lead to Perfected status for practitioners.

Keywords: Daoism, Sword Scripture, Shangqing, shijie, performance

Robert Ford Campany is Professor of Asian Studies and Religious Studies, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee, USA.

* My thanks to Terry Kleeman for inviting me to the Erlangen workshop in which this paper was first presented and for helpful suggestions on its content; to the Internationales Kolleg für Geisteswissenschaftliche Forschung at the Universität Erlangen-Nuremberg and its excellent faculty and staff for hosting the workshop; and to colleagues there and at Vanderbilt University who commented on the paper in its early stages. Special, heartfelt thanks to Steve Bokenkamp for patiently and generously discussing with me many difficult matters concerning Shangqing texts as well as for his many suggestions.

The Lingbao Scripture of the Three Primordials

The Lingbao Scripture of the Three Primordials (Lingbao Sanhua Juding Jing, 灵宝三花聚顶经) is a foundational Taoist text within the Lingbao (Numinous Treasure) tradition, which emerged in the 5th century CE. This scripture is pivotal in the development of neidan (内丹, internal alchemy), particularly in its emphasis on the cultivation and unification of the Three Treasures: jing (精, essence), qi (气, breath), and shen (神, spirit).

Core Concepts in the Scripture

Three Flowers Condensing onto the Head

A central metaphor in the scripture is the concept of the "Three Flowers Condensing onto the Head" (Sanhua Juding 三花聚顶). This refers to the unification of the Three Treasures at the Aperture of the Mysterious Gate (Xuanguan Yiqiao 玄关一窍), symbolizing the convergence of essence, breath, and spirit at the crown of the head. This process is considered a significant step in the attainment of spiritual transcendence and immortality.

en.daoinfo.org

Role of the Three Purities

The scripture underscores the importance of the Three Purities (Sanqing 三清) — the Celestial Worthy of the Way and Its Power (Taishang Laojun), the Celestial Worthy of Numinous Treasure (Lingbao Tianzun), and the Celestial Worthy of the Numinous Origin (Yuanshi Tianzun). These deities are revered as embodiments of the primordial principles and are invoked for guidance in the alchemical process.

www2.kenyon.edu

Neidan Practices Derived from the Scripture:

While the Lingbao Sanhua Juding Jing is primarily a liturgical text, it lays the groundwork for several neidan practices:

Circulation of Qi: The scripture describes methods for circulating qi through the body, particularly focusing on the microcosmic orbit, which is essential in neidan practices.

Breathing Techniques: It introduces specific breathing exercises aimed at refining and harmonizing the body's energy.

Visualization: The text employs visualization techniques to aid in the condensation of the Three Flowers and their ascent to the head.

Practise manual - AI generated based on the chinese text:

Breathing Techniques in the Lingbao Sanhua Juding Jing

1. Embryonic Breathing (胎息, Tāixī)

The scripture emphasizes the importance of quiet, deep breathing to cultivate and refine the body's energy:

"Inhale and exhale gently, without sound; let the breath be smooth and continuous, like the flow of water."

2. Circulating Qi (行气, Xíngqì)

The scripture describes methods to guide and circulate the breath through the body's energy channels:

"Guide the breath through the body, from the lower dantian to the crown of the head, and back down the spine. Visualize the breath moving like a serpent, coiling and uncoiling, nourishing each part of the body."

3. Condensing the Three Flowers onto the Head

The scripture outlines the practice of unifying the Three Treasures—jing (essence), qi (vital energy), and shen (spirit)—at the crown of the head:

"Focus the mind on the crown, drawing the Three Flowers upward. Let the essence rise like smoke, the energy like mist, and the spirit like light. When they converge, the body becomes luminous, and the spirit ascends."

WikipediaL'enciclopedia libera

Cerca in Wikipedia

Ricerca

Fai una donazione

registrati

entra

Banner logo

Questo novembre c'è il Wikipedia Asian Month.

Partecipa al concorso e vinci una cartolina dall'Asia.

[Dai una mano con le traduzioni!]Riduci

Indice nascondi

Inizio

Altri progetti

Collegamenti esterni

Fengshen Yanyi

Voce

Discussione

Leggi

Modifica

Modifica wikitesto

Cronologia

Strumenti

Aspetto nascondi

Testo

Piccolo

Standard

Grande

Larghezza

Standard

Largo

Colore (beta)

Automatico

Chiaro

Scuro

Niente fonti!

Questa voce o sezione sull'argomento romanzi non cita le fonti necessarie o quelle presenti sono insufficienti.

Puoi migliorare questa voce aggiungendo citazioni da fonti attendibili secondo le linee guida sull'uso delle fonti. Segui i suggerimenti del progetto di riferimento.

Fengshen Yanyi

Titolo originale

Altri titoli Fengshen Bang

Autore Xu Zhonglin e Lu Xixing

1ª ed. originale XVI secolo

Genere Romanzo

Lingua originale cinese

Ambientazione dinastia Shang

Modifica dati su Wikidata · Manuale

Fengshen Yanyi (封神榜), noto anche come Fengshen Bang, traducibile come "la canonizzazione degli dei", è un romanzo cinese del sedicesimo secolo, scritto durante la dinastia Ming (1368–1644). È una tra le più importanti opere in cinese vernacolare, del genere degli dei e demoni.

È composto di 100 capitoli, e combina elementi di storia, folklore, mitologia, leggende e fantasia. Viene attribuito a Xu Zhonglin.

La storia è ambientata nel periodo di declino della dinastia Shang (1600–1046 a.C.) e l'inizio della dinastia Zhou (1046–256 a.C.). Intreccia numerosi elementi della mitologia cinese, come divinità, immortali e spiriti.

Altri progetti

Collabora a Wikimedia Commons Wikimedia Commons contiene immagini o altri file su Fengshen Yanyi

Collegamenti esterni

(EN) Fengshen Yanyi, su Enciclopedia Britannica, Encyclopædia Britannica, Inc. Modifica su Wikidata

Portale Letteratura

Portale Mitologia

Categorie: Romanzi in cineseOpere letterarie del XVI secolo[altre]

Questa pagina è stata modificata per l'ultima volta il 3 ott 2023 alle 10:41.

Il testo è disponibile secondo la licenza Creative Commons Attribuzione-Condividi allo stesso modo; possono applicarsi condizioni ulteriori. Vedi le condizioni d'uso per i dettagli.

Informativa sulla privacyInformazioni su WikipediaAvvertenzeCodice di condottaSviluppatoriStatisticheDichiarazione sui cookieVersione mobile

Wikimedia Foundation

Powered by MediaWiki

La dinastia Ming fu la dinastia che assunse il controllo assoluto della Cina dal 1368 al 1644, dopo aver determinato il crollo della precedente dinastia Yuan di origine mongola. Dopo la conquista da parte dell'emergente dinastia Shun della capitale Pechino nel 1644, gli aristocratici fedeli alla causa dei Ming si organizzarono nelle loro roccaforti nelle province meridionali del paese. Nel 1645 la dinastia Qing di etnia manciù sconfisse l'esercito Shun e si impadronì del potere. La resistenza dei cosiddetti Ming meridionali sarebbe stata progressivamente distrutta dai Qing e dopo il 1662 sarebbero rimasti soltanto dei gruppi isolati di Ming che avrebbero continuato le loro attività antigovernative fino all'istituzione della Repubblica di Cina nel 1912. L'impero Ming era uno dei più vasti della storia, con una superficie di 10,4 milioni di kmq all'apice, nel XVII secolo.

Follow Golden Elixir Press on TwitterFind Golden Elixir Press on Facebook

Golden Elixir PressTaoismTaoist AlchemyBlogContact

Elixir

The Golden Elixir

TAOISM □

Introduction

Articles

Texts

Pictures and Tables

Shangqing

Highest Clarity

The Encyclopedia of Taoism

Reproduced from:

Isabelle Robinet, "Shangqing

In The Encyclopedia of Taoism, vol. 2, pp. 858-66

Edited by Fabrizio Pregadio

Routledge, 2008

The Encyclopedia of Taoism

□ Table of Contents and List of Contributors

□ Introduction

Sample Entries

□ Daode jing (Scripture of the Dao and Its Virtue)

□ daoja (Taoism; "Lineage[s] of the Way")

□ daojiao (Taoism; Taoist teaching; "Teaching[s] of the Way")

□ Daozang (Daoist Canon) and Subsidiary Compilations

□ jiao (Offering)

□ jindan (Golden Elixir)

□ Lingbao (Numinous Treasure)

□ Quanzhen (Completion of Authenticity)

□ Shangqing (Highest Clarity)

□ Tianshi dao (Way of the Celestial Masters)

The term Shangqing initially denoted a corpus of scriptures revealed to Yang Xi (330-86) between 364 and 370 (see table 21). With later "apocryphal" texts, these scriptures were adopted by the southern Chinese aristocracy in the fifth and sixth centuries and were assigned the highest rank within the Three Caverns (sandong) of the Taoist Canon. Later, the same term also designated a religious movement, whose actual founder was Tao Hongjing (456-536), with its own patriarchs (see table 22), holy places, liturgy, and a large number of other texts.

As a body of doctrines and practices, Shangqing developed in southeastern China after the imperial court and the upper classes fled from the north, which had been invaded by non-Chinese peoples, and settled in the Jiangnan region. Here they were confronted by a local Chinese aristocracy of long standing that sought to reaffirm its own traditions over those imported from the north. Shangqing thus marked a revival of the religious legacy of southern China. Claiming to be on a higher level than its forerunners, it consists of a synthesis of the native ecstatic tradition, the late-Zhou and Han traditions of immortality seekers, and the religion of the Celestial Masters (Tianshi dao) imported from the north. Besides a few local cults, Shangqing also incorporated — in a superficial way, but for the first time in Taoism — some features borrowed from Buddhism, and its sources show traces of the debates on wu and you (Non-being and Being) that had engaged the Xuanxue (Arcane Learning) thinkers. All these elements were blended into a coherent whole, imbued with reminiscences of old Chinese myths and of the literary tradition represented by the Chuci (Songs of Chu; trans. Hawkes, The Songs of the South) and by Sima Xiangru (ca. 179-117 BCE; Hervouet, Le chapitre 117 du Che-ki). This gave the Shangqing texts a remarkable poetic and literary quality, and secured them success among the Chinese intelligentsia.

History

The revelations received by Yang Xi were addressed to the Xu family, especially Xu Mi (303-76) and his son Xu Hui (341-ca. 370), of whom Yang Xi was a client. The Xus, who had been related for many generations to Ge Hong's family, were based in Jurong (near Nanjing, Jiangsu). Xu Mi's grandson, Xu Huangmin (361-429), disseminated the Shangqing manuscripts when he moved further south to Zhejiang, and upon his death bequeathed them to the Ma and Du families. These events marked the first dispersion of the original manuscripts, which was to be followed by several others. In the early 5th century, Wang Lingqi and Xu Huangmin's son, Xu Rongdi (fl. 431-32), produced many forgeries.

Before Tao Hongjing, several medieval Taoists — notably Lu Xiuqing (406-77) and Gu Huan (420/428-483/491) — tried to reassemble the original texts, but Tao's effort was by far the most successful. Also thanks to his work, the school became the foremost Taoist tradition between the sixth and tenth centuries. Emperors interested in the Shangqing scriptures bestowed their favors upon the patriarchs of the school, including Sun Youyue (399-489), Tao Hongjing, Wang Yanzhi (528-635), Pan Shizheng (585-682), Sima Chengzhen (646-735), and Li Hanguang (683-769). Shangqing texts were the main sources of Taoist encyclopedias of that time (especially the Wushang biyao and the Sandong zhunang), and served as inspiration to Wu Yun (?-778), Li Bai (Li Bo, 701-62), and many other poets. In Song times, patriarchs like Zhu Ziyi (976-1029) and Liu Hunkang (1035-1108) initiated emperors and their families into the Shangqing mysteries. The Taoist section of the Taiping yulan (Imperial Readings of the Taiping Xingguo Reign Period), a major encyclopedia published in 983, and the ritual collections compiled in that period, such as the Wushang xuanyuan santian Yutang dafa (Great Rites of the Jade Hall of the Three Heavens, of the Supreme Mysterious Origin; CT 220), contain significant portions of Shangqing materials. From the 13th century, the Shangqing school lost much of its authority as the Celestial Masters gained ascendancy. The Shangqing registers (lu), however, still ranked above all others.

Table 21. The Shangqing textual corpus. See Robinet, La révélation du Shangqing dans l'histoire du taoïsme, 2: 15-22 and passim. Some titles are given in abbreviated form, and some translations are tentative. The received Santian zhengfa jing (CT 1203; cf. no. 7 below) is not a Shangqing text.

NO. RECEIVED TEXT TITLE

- 1 CT 5, 6, 7, 103 Dadong zhenjing (Authentic Scripture of the Great Cavern)
- 2 CT 1378 Jinzhen yuguang bajing feijing (Winged Scripture of the Jade Radiance of Golden Truth and of the Eight Effulgences)
- 3 CT 426, 1323 Basu jing (Scripture of the Eight Pure Ladies)
- 4 CT 1316 Bu tiangang niexing qiyuan jing (Scripture of the Seven Primes on Pacing the Celestial Guideline and Treading the Stars)
- 5 CT 1376, 1377 Jiuzhen zhongjing (Central Scripture of the Nine Real Men)
- 6 lost Bianhua qishisi fang jing (Scripture on the Methods of the Seventy-four Transformations)
- 7 lost Santian zhengfa jing (Scripture of the Orthodox Law of the Three Heavens)
- 8 CT 33 Huangqi yangjing sandao shunxing jing (Scripture on Following the Course of the Three Paths of the Yellow Pneuma [=Moon] and the Yang Essence [=Sun])
- 9 CT 1373 Waiguo fangpin Qingtong neiwen (Inner Script of the Azure Lad on the Distribution of the Outer Realms)
- 10 CT 179, 255, 442, 639 Lingshu ziwen (Numinous Writings in Purple Script)
- 11 CT 1332 Zidu yanguang shenyuan bian jing (Scripture on the Transformation of the Fiery Radiant Divine Origin, Written on Purple [Tablets])
- 12 CT 1315 Qingyao zishu jingen zhongjing (Collected Scriptures of the [Lord of?] Qingyao on the Golden Root, Written on Purple [Tablets])
- 13 CT 1327 Sanjiu suyu yujing zhenjue (Authentic Instructions on the Jade Scripture of the Pure Words of the Three [Primes] and the Nine [Old Lords])
- 14 CT 354 Sanyuan yujian sanyuan bujing (Scripture on the Distribution of the Three Primes, Jade

Seal of the Three Primes)

- 15 lost Shijing jinguang cangjing lu [recte: lian?] xing jing (Scripture on the Essence of Stone and the Radiance of Metal for Hiding One's Shape and Refining [?] One's Form)
- 16 CT 1359 Danjing daojing yindi bashu jing (Scripture on the Effulgence of Cinnabar and the Essence of the Dao and on the Eight Arts to Conceal Onself within the Earth)
- 17 CT 1331 Shenzhou qizhuan qibian wutian jing (Scripture of the Divine Continent on the Dance in Heaven in Seven Revolutions and Seven Transformations)
- 18 CT 1330 Taidan yinshu (Concealed Writ of the Great Cinnabar [Palace])
- 19 CT 1317 Kaitian santu qixing yidu jing (Scripture on Crossing through the Three [Celestial] Passes and the Seven Stars to the Opening of Heaven)
- 20 CT 1382 Jiudan shanghua taijing zhongji (Central Records of the Essence of the Embryo and the Upper Transformation of the Ninefold Elixir)
- 21 CT 1329 Jiuchi banfu wudi nei zhenjing (Scripture of the Nine Red Bundled Talismans and the Inner Authenticity of the Five Emperors)
- 22 CT 1334 (?) Shenhu shangfu xiaomo zhihui jing (Scripture of Wisdom on the Superior Talismans of the Divine Tigers and on [the Drugs for] Subduing the Minor Demons)
- 23 CT 1372 Gaoshang yuchen fengtai qusu shangjing (Superior Scripture of the Most Exalted Jade Dawn and the [Eight] Pure [Ladies] of the Palace of the Phoenix Terrace)
- 24 CT 83, 1351 Baihu heihe feixing yujing (Winged Scripture on Flying with the White-Winged and the Black-Feathered [Phoenixes])
- 25 CT 84, 1391 Qionggong lingfei liujia zuoyou shangfu (Superior Talismans of the Left and the Right of the Six Jia for the Numinous Flight to Exquisite Palace)
- 26 CT 56 Yupei jindang Taiji jinshu shangjing (Superior Scripture of the Jade Pendant and the Golden Ring Written on Golden [Tablets] in the Great Ultimate)
- 27 CT 1393 Jiuling taimiao Guishan xuanlu (Mysterious Register of the Turtle Mountain from the Great Wonder of [the Palace of] the Nine Numina)
- 28 CT 1361, 1369 Qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing (Scripture of the Mysterious Records of the Seven Saints for the Return to the Nine Celestial Empyreans)
- 29 CT 1380 Taishang huangsu sishisi fang jing (Most High Scripture of the Forty-four Methods Written on Yellow Silk)
- 30 CT 55 Taixiao langshu qiongwen dizhang (Precious Writ of the Great Empyrean on the Exquisite Text of the Imperial Statement)
- 31 CT 1357 Gaoshang miemo dongjing jinxuan yuqing yinshu (Most Exalted Concealed Writ of the Jade Clarity of Cavernous Effulgence and Golden Mystery for the Extermination of Demons)
- 32 CT 1336, 1337 Taiwei tian dijun jinhu zhenfu (Authentic Talismans of the Golden Tigers of the Imperial Lord of the Heaven of Great Tenuity)

33 CT 1333 Taiwei tian dijun shenhu yujing zhenfu (Authentic Talismans of the Jade Scripture of the Divine Tigers of the Imperial Lord of the Heaven of Great Tenuity)

34 --- Taishang huangting neijing yujing Taidi neishu (Most High Jade Scripture of the Inner Effulgences of the Yellow Court, Inner Writ of the Great Emperor) [see Huangting jing]

Salvation and Immortality

As a religion, Shangqing reconciles different ideas about salvation based on a threefold conception of the human being:

1. A human being is a complex individual: immortality implies the unification of the spirits and entities that compose and animate the person.
2. A human being is linked to his ancestors whose sins and merits fall on him, and his salvation cannot be separated from theirs.
3. Salvation involves a cosmicization and is thus universal, in the sense that the adept inwardly becomes one with the universe.

In Shangqing, immortality is a private pursuit, without the intervention of human intermediaries. The ultimate goal of the adept's quest is illustrated by the image of the cosmic saint (shengren), which is rooted in the Zhuangzi, the Liezi, and the Huainan zi, and integrates features drawn from popular imagery. Once an adept has obtained immortality, he will dwell in Emptiness and his body will emanate a supernatural radiance. He will enjoy eternal youth, have supernatural powers, and become one with the great forces of the universe. The terms used to describe this state indicate a transcendence of the dualism of life and death; for instance, the adept asks to "take his pleasure far away, where there is no round or square, deeply beyond phenomena, where Non-being and Being blend in Darkness," and to be born and die with the Void.

Immortality is no longer as evidently physical as it was in Ge Hong's tradition; if it is a bodily immortality, it involves the achievement of a spiritual body through meditation. Shangqing adepts aim at having their names written in the registers of life (shengji) held by divinities, or at unraveling the mortal knots that human beings are born with (Robinet, Taoist Meditation, 139-43). Salvation can also be obtained after death: an adept can ascend from the state of an "underworld governor" (dixia zhu, an immortal of inferior rank) to that of a celestial immortal. The Shangqing idea of rebirth as a way of salvation is very different from the Buddhist notion of reincarnation, and is an innovation that heralds Neidan.

Human beings have three main possibilities for rebirth. One of them is based on a new view of shijie (release from the corpse) as a stage of Taoist asceticism: when purification during life has remained incomplete, the body awaits purification in an intermediary realm such as the Great Yin (Taiyin). The adept may also be reborn in paradises where he undergoes purification by fire and is revived as an immortal. Finally, rebirth can also occur during one's lifetime, through experiencing again one's embryonic development. The latter method is called "nine transmutations" (jiuzhuan) or "ninefold elixir" (jiudan), two terms that relate rebirth to alchemy but on a purely spiritual level.

Gods and Spirits

In their relationships with divine beings, adepts strive to become one with them, sometimes with a touch of chaste love. Divinities are intercessors who appear to the believer and help him on his way to salvation, giving him the keys to celestial palaces, revealing their names and toponymy to him, and nourishing him with cosmic or celestial effluvia. The gods descend into the adept and guide him to the celestial kingdoms, hand in hand, where they share their pastimes with him. This relationship is remarkably different from the one described in the scriptures of the Celestial Masters. It is expressed in numerous hymns blending bliss, exaltation, and mystical joy that appear for the first time in a Taoist movement.

The various gods are all different forms of the Primordial Beginning, and can take many appearances. Among the highest are the Celestial King of Original Commencement (Yuanshi tianwang, see sanqing); the Most High Lord of the Dao (Taishang daojun); the Imperial Lord (Dijun); the Imperial Lord of the Golden Portal (Jinque dijun), who is also known as the Saint of the Latter Age (housheng) and is identified with Li Hong (Laozi's appellation as the messiah); the Queen Mother of the West (Xiwang mu); and her companion Qingtong (Azure Lad). Their primary role is to serve as mediators, and they are at the source of major revealed texts.

Shangqing inherits the Taoist vision of humanity as embodying many spirits, which is first found in the Han "weft texts" or weishu (the names of several spirits are the same or similar in both corpora). Cosmic deities, including the gods of the stars, the planets, and the five sectors of space, play a fundamental role in visualizations. They descend into the believer's body to make it luminous. Many live simultaneously in the heavens and within the human being, regularly inspecting the lives of adepts and updating the registers of life and death. Shangqing also maintains the earlier notions of the three 三 Cinnabar Fields (dantian) and the Three Corpses (sanshi; see sanshi and jiuchong). In contrast to the Three Palaces of earlier times, however, Shangqing texts imagine that the brain is divided into Nine Palaces (jiugong), which became a standard feature of Taoist subtle physiology. In addition, twenty-four effulgent gods dwell in the body, divided into three groups of eight known as the bajing (Eight Effulgements), each of which is governed by one of the Three Pure Ladies (Sansu). These spirits play a key role in unraveling the mortal knots of the body. The Five Gods (wushen) of the registers of life, who live in the brain, lungs, liver, heart, and lower abdomen, are directed by the Great One (Taiyi) in the brain (see Taidan yinshu).

Table 22. The forty-five Shangqing patriarchs. Source: Maoshan zhi (Monograph of Mount Mao; CT 304), j. 11-12.

- | | |
|-----------------------------|----------------------------|
| 1 Wei Huacun (251-334) | 24 Mao Fengrou |
| 2 Yang Xi (330-86) | 25 Liu Hunkang (1035-1108) |
| 3 Xu Mi (303-76) | 26 Da Jingzhi (1068-1113) |
| 4 Xu Hui (341-ca. 370) | 27 Xu Xihe (?-1127) |
| 5 Ma Lang | 28 Jiang Jingche (?-1146) |
| 6 Ma Han | 29 Li Jinghe (?-1150) |
| 7 Lu Xiujing (406-77) | 30 Li Jingying (?-1164) |
| 8 Sun Youyue (399-489) | 31 Xu Shoujing (?-1195) |
| 9 Tao Hongjing (456-536) | 32 Qin Ruda (?-1195) |
| 10 Wang Yuanzhi (528-635) | 33 Xing Rujia (?-1209) |
| 11 Pan Shizheng (585-682) | 34 Xue Ruji (?-1214) |
| 12 Sima Chengzhen (647-735) | 35 Ren Yuanfu (1176-1239) |
| 13 Li Hanguang (683-769) | 36 Bao Zhizhen (?-1251) |
| 14 Wei Jingzhao (694-785) | 37 Tang Zhidao (?-1258) |
| 15 Huang Dongyuan (698-792) | 38 Jiang Zongying (?-1281) |
| 16 Sun Zhiqing | 39 Jing Yuanfan |
| 17 Wu Fatong (825-907) | 40 Liu Zongchang |
| 18 Liu Dechang | 41 Wang Zhixin (?-1273) |
| 19 Wang Qixia (882-943) | 42 Zhai Zhiying (?-1276) |
| 20 Cheng Yanzhao (912-90) | 43 Xu Daoqi (1236-1291) |

21 Jiang Yuanji (?-998) 44 Wang Daomeng (1242-1314)

22 Wan Baochong 45 Liu Dabin (fl. 1317-28)

23 Zhu Ziying (976-1029)

Cosmology and Cosmography

Shangqing cosmology follows the traditional Chinese pattern based on the numbers 3 and 5 (see *sanwu): a vertical threefold division into Heaven, Earth, and Humanity corresponds to a horizontal fivefold division into the *wuxing. There are Nine Great Primordial Heavens created from pure cosmic pneuma, each of which in turn gives rise to three heavens for a total of thirty-six heavens (*sanshiliu tian). Another series is formed by eight heavens arranged horizontally. The Heavens of the Three Clarities (*sanqing 三 pictures) are superior stages in the adept's progress. Other paradises are the stations of the sun, moon, and other astral bodies (planets, constellations, and the Northern Dipper or *beidou), as well as the far ends of the earth, sometimes designated after ancient myths. The Southern Paradise is a place of purification and rebirth.

Besides the traditional Five Peaks (*wuyue), Shangqing cosmography includes other sacred mountains corresponding to the Grotto-Heavens and the Blissful Lands (*dongtian and fudi). The axis of the world is Mount *Kunlun, also called Xigui shan (Turtle Mountain of the West) or Longshan (Dragon Mountain). Other mountains, such as the Renniao shan (Mountain of the Bird-Men), play an analogous role.

The underworld is a counterpart of the Dipper. Located in the mountain-city of *Fengdu, its administration is governed by the Northern Emperor (*Beidi) and is organized into six courts that judge the dead (six is a Yin number, related to obscurity and death). The end of the world, often evoked in Shangqing scriptures, is described in the Santian zhengfa jing (Scripture of the Orthodox Law of the Three Heavens; CT 1203; Ozaki Masaharu, "Taijō santen seihō kyō seiritsu kō"), in a way reminiscent of ideas already found in the Hanshu (History of the Former Han). The end of a cosmic cycle comes when the Yin and Yang pneumas reach their point of exhaustion. A lesser cycle ends after 3,600 celestial Yang or 3,300 terrestrial Yin revolutions, while a greater cycle ends after 9,900 celestial Yang or 9,300 terrestrial Yin revolutions. The Mother of Water (Shuimu), a "celestial horse" (tianma), a "great bird" (daniao), and Li Hong are the judges who, at that time, descend to earth to judge humanity.

Practices

Unlike the communal rites of the Celestial Masters, the Shangqing practices are individual and emphasize *meditation and visualization. The bureaucratic and theurgic aspects of the Celestial Masters' relationship to their gods are ignored: the celestial beings are not summoned with petitions but are invoked with prayers or chants, and there are no warlike struggles with demonic spirits. Physiological techniques and the ingestion of drugs and herbs are considered as minor; sexual practices are condemned or are interiorized and sublimated. The ritual aspect of the practices is flexible, and one is not impelled to observe the formal rules if it is impossible to do so.

The great variety of Shangqing practices can be categorized as follows:

1. Charms, recitations (*songjing), and hymns, usually accompanied by visualizations (*cun), whose purpose is to exterminate demons, summon spirits, or obtain salvation.
2. Visualization of spirits, some celestial and some corporeal (often both), who come to animate and spiritualize the body (see *Huangting jing and *Dadong zhenjing). The adept blends them all into one, and unites himself with them. Often at the end of these visualizations everything in the world and outside of it becomes effulgent. This group also includes the method of the Three Ones (*sanyi) described in the *Ciyi jing, the *Suling jing, and the *Jiuzhen zhongjing.
3. Ecstatic metamorphoses (see *bianhua).
4. Methods aiming at having one's name inscribed in the "registers of life" (Ciyi jing, *Basu jing, and Taidan yinshu).
5. Methods for loosening the mortal knots of the embryo (Basu jing, Jiuzhen zhongjing, and Taidan yinshu).
6. Ecstatic excursions (*yuanyou) and absorption of astral efflorescences (Basu jing and Jiuzhen zhongjing).

Interiorization is the major innovative feature of Shangqing, and its main legacy for Taoism. It consists of actualizing (cun), i.e., giving existence to entities pertaining to an imaginative and mystical world that lies between spiritual and physical existence (see *xiang). The adept has direct access to the sacred: the role of intermediary is not played by priests or other ritual officiants but by the scriptures themselves, which organize and codify relations between humanity and the gods, and between ordinary and sacred life. The importance of the written texts is emphasized to such a degree that the master's role consists only in certifying their legitimate transmission. The Shangqing scriptures are divine and precosmic, a token bestowed by the deities that promises salvation.

Isabelle ROBINET

New from Golden Elixir Press

Neidan Dictionary. Twenty-five key terms of Taoist Internal Alchemy, with definitions and examples.

Taoist Internal Alchemy: An Anthology of Neidan Texts. Complete or partial translations of sixteen major Neidan works. The selections are representative of the main Neidan lineages and branches. Read more on this new book.

Four Hundred Words on the Golden Elixir: A Poetical Classic of Taoist Internal Alchemy. A translation of the Jindan sibaizi, attributed to Zhang Boduan (the author of the Awakening to Reality), with commentary by Peng Haogu (16th century).

The Way of the Golden Elixir: An Introduction to Taoist Alchemy. A survey of the history, lineages, and main doctrines and practices of Taoist alchemy.

The Encyclopedia of Taoism

Routledge

The Encyclopedia of Taoism

The World Upside Down: Four Articles by Isabelle Robinet

Golden Elixir Press

Also available in Kindle and PDF editions

The World Upside Down

Other Amazon Stores

Amazon Canada Amazon France Amazon Germany Amazon Italy Amazon Japan Amazon Spain Amazon
United Kingdom

Golden Elixir Press

Catalogue

Download the current Golden Elixir Press Catalogue

Download the latest Golden Elixir Press catalogue. Contains book samples and discount codes.

Cultivating the Tao

Cultivating the Tao

Teachings on the principles of Taoism and Taoist Alchemy, by the great Taoist master Liu Yiming (1734-1821).

The Seal of the Unity of the Three

The Seal of the Unity of the Three

A translation of the Cantong qi, the text at the origins of Taoist Internal Alchemy. With explanations of sections and verses.

Bibliographic Studies on the Cantong qi

Bibliographic Studies on the 'Cantong qi'

A detailed catalogue of commentaries and related works, followed by a survey of about 40 major texts.

Foundations of Internal Alchemy

Foundations of Internal Alchemy

By Wang Mu. A clear description of the Taoist practice of Internal Alchemy, or Neidan.

Awakening to Reality

Awakening to Reality

Written in the 11th century, this famous work describes Neidan (Internal Alchemy) in poetry.

The World Upside Down

The World Upside Down

By Isabelle Robinet. Four essays on Taoist Internal Alchemy, translated for the first time into English.

The Book of the Nine Elixirs

The Book of the Nine Elixirs

Translation of an early Chinese alchemical text, with comment and notes.

Bibliography of Chinese Alchemy

Bibliography of Chinese Alchemy

Contains about 300 annotated entries on works in Western languages published through 2009.

The Way of the Golden Elixir

The Way of the Golden Elixir

An introduction to Taoist Alchemy, from Waidan to Neidan. PDF, free download.

Index of Zhonghua Daozang

Index of Zhonghua Daozang

Based on the modern edition of the Taoist Canon, published in 2003, with references to the 1445 edition.

From the Cantong qi

Cantong qi

Golden Elixir Blog: Latest Posts

Visit the Golden Elixir Blog

taoism

Main PageIntroductionArticlesTextsPictures and Tables taoist alchemy

Main PageIntroductionArticlesMasters and TextsPictures golden elixir books

Paperback editionsKindle & iBooks editionsPDF editions

golden elixir press

CatalogueGolden Elixir BlogContactEmail

© 2023 Golden Elixir PressSkip to main contentAccessibility help

Discover Content

Products and Services

Register

Log In

\(0\) Cart

Browse

Services

Open research

Institution Login

Search

Home>Books>Religion and Poetry in Medieval China>Shangqing Scriptures as Performative Texts

Religion and Poetry in Medieval China

The Way and the Words

Book contents

Frontmatter

Contents

Conventions for Frequently Cited Works

Introduction

1 Brushing Past Rainbows: Religion and Poetry in the Xu Mi Stele

2 Li Bo and Hu Ziyang: Companions of the Way

3 The Vicarious Angler: Gao Pian's Daoist Poetry

4 Traces of the Way : The Poetry of "Divine Transcendence" in the Northern Song Anthology Literature's
Finest (Wen cui 文粹)

5 A Re-examination of the Second Juan of the Array of the Five Talismans of the Numinous Treasure 五符圖 卷二

6 "True Forms" and "True Faces": Daoist and Buddhist Discourse on Images

7 After the Apocalypse: The Evolving Ethos of the Celestial Master Daoists

8 Shangqing Scriptures as Performative Texts

9 My Back Pages: The Sūtra in Forty-Two Chapters Revisited

10 Taking Stock

Epilogue: Traversing the Golden Porte—The Problem with Daoist Studies

Index

This chapter is part of a book that is no longer available to purchase from Cambridge Core

8 - Shangqing Scriptures as Performative Texts

By

Robert Ford Campany

Edited by

Gil Raz

and

Anna Shields

Show author details

Chapter

Accessibility

Get access

Share

Cite

Summary

Introduction

Between 364 and 370 CE, deities known as Perfected Ones 仙 were said to have appeared in visions to the medium Yang Xi 楊羲 and others in what is now southeastern China to give instruction on a wide range of topics. Deigning to descend from a hitherto unknown zone of the heavens called Supreme Purity or Shangqing 上清, they dictated to the recipient, who wrote down their words, or else they arrived bearing written scrolls, some of which they allowed to be copied. The resulting texts were shared with patrons, notably members of the southeastern clan Xu 許. Within a few generations the texts circulated more widely, sometimes imitated and forged by aristocrats seeking the religious and social cachet that simply owning the scriptures could convey. This scriptural profusion prompted the Daoist master Tao Hongjing 陶弘景 around 499 (and another figure named Gu Huan 顧歡 a bit earlier) to cull what he considered the apocryphal from the thirty-odd authentic scriptures that had survived and to compile other documents, including diary-like records of the Perfected Ones' appearances in visions and dreams. The larger of these compilations that survives was titled Zhen'gao 真經 or Declarations of the Perfected. All this is of course well known to scholars of Daoist religion, but few of these writings have been carefully studied or translated in non-Asian-language publications. Yet they constitute one of the most fascinating textual dossiers of world religious history.

Here I want to pose the following question: What were Shangqing scriptures for? These texts prescribe a great many practices. The prescriptions certainly do not skimp on detail.

Information

Type

Chapter

Information

Religion and Poetry in Medieval China The Way and the Words , pp. 175 - 196

DOI: <https://doi.org/10.1017/9789048555260.009>[Opens in a new window]

Publisher: Amsterdam University Press

Print publication year: 2023

Access options

Get access to the full version of this content by using one of the access options below. (Log in options will check for institutional or personal access. Content may require purchase if you do not have access.)

Related content

Empires and Exchanges in Eurasian Late Antiquity

Type

Book

Title

Empires and Exchanges in Eurasian Late Antiquity

Authors

Journal

Empires and Exchanges in Eurasian Late Antiquity: Rome, China, Iran, and the Steppe, ca. 250 – 750

Published online: 13 April 2018

Religious Culture and Violence in Traditional China

Type

Element

Title

Religious Culture and Violence in Traditional China

Authors

Barend ter Haar

Published online: 11 May 2019

Introduction

Type

Chapter

Title

Introduction

Authors

Scott Pacey

Journal

Buddhist Responses to Christianity in Postwar Taiwan

Published online: 21 November 2020

Introduction

Type

Article

Title

Introduction

Authors

Daniel L. Overmyer

Journal

The Journal of Asian Studies

Published online: 26 March 2010

The Religious Situation in East Asia

Type

Chapter

Title

The Religious Situation in East Asia

Authors

Joachim Gentz

Journal

Secularization and the World Religions

Published online: 5 June 2015

Seals as Conceptual and Ritual Tools in Chinese Buddhism, ca. 600– 1000 CE

Type

Chapter

Title

Seals as Conceptual and Ritual Tools in Chinese Buddhism, ca. 600– 1000 CE

Authors

Paul Copp

Journal

Seals - Making and Marking Connections across the Medieval World

Published online: 20 November 2020

‘Hinduism’ and ‘Taoism’ in Singapore: Seeing points of convergence

Type

Article

Title

‘Hinduism’ and ‘Taoism’ in Singapore: Seeing points of convergence

Authors

Vineeta Sinha

Journal

Journal of Southeast Asian Studies

Published online: 11 December 2007

Describing the Elephant: Buddhism in America

Type

Article

Title

Describing the Elephant: Buddhism in America

Authors

Peter N. Gregory

Journal

Religion and American Culture

Published online: 18 June 2018

Chinese Buddhism

Type

Chapter

Title

Chinese Buddhism

Authors

Karyn L. Lai

Journal

An Introduction to Chinese Philosophy

Published online: 5 June 2012

Dialogical and radical transcendence

Type

Chapter

Title

Dialogical and radical transcendence

Authors

Prasenjit Duara

Journal

The Crisis of Global Modernity

Published online: 5 January 2015

Cambridge University Press

Our Site

Accessibility

Contact & Help

Legal Notices

Cookie Settings

Quick Links

Cambridge Core

Cambridge Open Engage

Cambridge Aspire website

Our Products

Journals

Books

Elements

Textbooks

Courseware

Join us online

Location

USA

Update

Rights & Permissions

Copyright

Privacy Notice

Terms of Use

Cookies Policy

Bible > Sermons > Revelation 21:27

The Heavenly Register

Homilist

Revelation 21:27

And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defiles, neither whatever works abomination, or makes a lie...

I. THE BOOK referred to —

1. The book of life.

2. The Lamb's book.

(1) As the author of life.

(2) As the Head of the Church.

(3) As the final Judge.

II. The names recorded —

1. Repentant sinners.

2. Living believers.

3. Sanctified disciples. Of all ages — countries — dispensations — conditions.

III. THE PRIVILEGES of the registered.

1. Divine honour.

2. Divine riches.

3. Every good.

4. Heavenly glory. Conclusion: The subject should produce —

1. Unspeakable joy.

2. Entire confidence.

3. Holy circumspection.

4. Fidelity and obedient perseverance.

(Homilist.).

Parallel Verses

KJV: And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life.

WEB: There will in no way enter into it anything profane, or one who causes an abomination or a lie, but only those who are written in the Lamb's book of life.

The Heavenly Church BookThe Impassable GulfTop of PageTop of Page

Skip to content

Journey to the West Research

A repository for research on the great 16th-century Chinese Classic

Primary Menu

Home

About

Contact

Archive #17 – PDFs of Creation of the Gods Library of Chinese Classics Chinese-English Bilingual Edition \(Vols. 1-4\)

May 5, 2020Jim R. McClanahan

Note #1: See update 11-28-21 for a PDF of a doctoral thesis analyzing the historical sources for FSYY.

Note #2: See update 03-14-23 for a PDF of circa 1620 FSYY woodblock prints.

Last updated: 11-03-2024

Here I present a PDF of the Library of Chinese Classics bilingual edition of Creation of the Gods (Fengshen yanyi, 封神榜, c. 1620 CE), sometimes translated as Investiture of the Gods or Enfeoffment of the Gods.

Here is a summary.

I. Description

This 100 chapter shenmo novel tells of the great struggle between the declining Shang (c. 1600–1046 BCE) and ascending Zhou (c. 1046–256 BCE) dynasties. In the beginning, King Zhou of Shang offends the primordial goddess Nuwa by leaving a lewd poem in her temple, and in response, the devi summons a trio of spirits (a fox, a pheasant, and a lute) to bring about the dynasty's downfall. The fox spirit takes the place of the king's concubine Daji and, over the course of nearly 30 years, leads him down a path of imperial neglect, decadence, and sadism. This causes many of the kingdom's dukes, marquis, and generals to later rebel in favor of King Wu of Zhou, the monarch destined by heaven to rule China.

The majority of the story follows the countless battles between the forces of Shang and Zhou. Along the way, the latter are aided by immortals of the Chan (阐) sect (an analogy for Quanzhen Daoism), which favors spiritual cultivation, while the former are aided by the Jie (截) sect (an analogy for Zhengyi), which favors charms and incantations. [1] Each transcendent wields any number of swords, fans, hooks, staves, axes, halberds, scissors, hammers, rings, sashes, nails, dippers, pennants, pearls, gourds (etc.), each with not only the power to take the lives of thousands of humans but also immobilize other immortals and even kill them. These celestial battles escalate to the point that Laozi and the Buddha must fight side-by-side to defeat a trap designed to kill 10,000 immortals.

A story line present throughout the novel is the fate of Jiang Ziya, a Daoist adept and the military strategist and stalwart commander of the Zhou army. He is destined to deify the souls of the humans and immortals who die in battle using the “List of Creation” (Fengshen bang, 封神榜), an index of preordained names agreed upon at the beginning of time by the heads of the three religions. This list is housed in the “Terrace of Creation” (Fengshen tai, 封神台), a reed pavilion in which the souls of the dead are gathered to await their apotheosis. In the end, after defeating the Shang forces, Jiang deifies a total of 365 major gods, along with thousands of lesser gods, ranging from holy mountains, weather, and plagues to constellations, the time cycle, and the five elements.

Fig. 1 – A detail of Nezha striking at an enemy during battle. Image from The Newly Printed, Zhong Bojing Annotated, Investiture of the Gods (Xinke Zhong Bojing xiansheng piping Fengshen yanyi, 新刻中 國封神榜, c. 1620) (larger version).

Considering the story takes place a millennia prior to the arrival of Buddhism in China, the novel portrays the religion having no presence in the east. There are several times in the narrative when a Buddhist deity travels from the western paradise to halt the execution of a powerful immortal or demon as they are fated to submit to Buddhism. Furthermore, when the Buddha intervenes in the great battle towards the end, he does so to find talented disciples who will help him spread the religion in the east. In fact, Bodhisattvas like Guanyin and Manjusri are depicted as former Chan sect immortals who later become disciples of Buddhism.

II. Relationship to JTTW

For the purposes of this blog, several characters from Journey to the West (Xiyouji, 西遊記, 1592) appear in the novel, including Laozi, the Buddha, Nezha (fig. 1), Muzha, and Li Jing, Ao Guang, Erlang (called Yang Jian, 楊戩) and his hound, etc. Journey to the West also had a number of clear influences on the book, one being the ape spirit Yuan Hong (孫悟空) from later chapters who wields a staff and 72 transformations in a fight with Yang Jian. Sound familiar?

III. The Translation

This edition of the novel was originally translated by Gu Zhizhong (顧志中, 1898–1995) in 1992. Dr. Barbara Witt notes the translation has its pros and cons:

The positive: It is the only complete translation of Fengshen yanyi into a Western language that I am aware of. The edition I read (from 1992 I think), was also nicely done with interesting woodcut illustrations throughout the novel.

The negative: Firstly, it is not a very faithful translation. Poems are generally left untranslated and sentences often paraphrased. [2] I think, when ever the translator found something difficult, he just skipped it. Secondly, I think Gu Zhizhong was not an English native speaker and not very familiar with Western mythology and some of his translations are really off. For example Taiyi zhenren 太一真人 (“True Man Primordial”), a powerful Daoist immortal, becomes “Fairy Primordial” in his translation, which conjures up a very different image.

While the translation may not be perfect, I think it is a must read as many of the gods mentioned therein are worshiped in modern temples throughout China, Taiwan, Malaysia, and Singapore. It is a lens into modern folk religion.

IV. PDF File

The following PDF is a combination of all four volumes making up Gu (2000):

<https://journeytothewestresearch.com/wp-content/uploads/2020/05/fsyy-en-cn.pdf>

Update: 11-28-21

I’ve added Wan (1987), a doctoral thesis analyzing the historical sources and micro/macro structure of the story. It also provides a summary of the tale in the end.

PDF File

Click to access Investiture-of-the-gods-Fengshen-yanyi-Sources-narrative-structure-and-mythical-significance.pdf

Update: 03-14-23

Here is a PDF for volume one of The Newly Printed, Zhong Bojing Annotated, Investiture of the Gods (Xinke Zhong Bojing xiansheng piping Fengshen yanyi, 新刻鐘馗百鬼集, c. 1620), the oldest known edition of the novel. It is full of lovely woodblock prints (fig. 2).

PDF File

Click to access Investiture-of-the-Gods-1620-prints.pdf

Fig. 2 – A random page from vol. 1 of The Newly Printed, Zhong Bojing Annotated, Investiture of the Gods (larger version).

Thank you to the National Archives of Japan for offering the complete 1620 edition of FSYY. It can be downloaded here.

Update: 09-13-23

Tumblr user digitalagepulao has drawn an amazing Nezha (fig. 3). The theme is based on the feud between the prince and his father, which leads to the former's suicide and divine resurrection. The artist describe a tense scene from the novel:

Li Jing in a fury grabbed his halberd, leapt on his horse and galloped out of the headquarters. He was astonished to see Nezha with his Wind-Fire Wheels and Fire-Tipped Spear. He swore loudly, "You damned beast! You caused us endless suffering before your death, and now that you've been reborn, you're troubling us again!"

"Li Jing! I've returned my flesh and bones to you [via suicide], and there's no longer any relation between us. Why did you smash my golden idol with your whip and burn down my temple? Today I must take my revenge!"

The drawing is part of digitalagepulao's "Expedition to the West au" (JTTW alternate universe) storyline based on this article.

Fig. 3 – Digitalagepulao's Nezha (larger version).

Update: 09-08-24

@ryin-silverfish of Tumblr (author of this guest post) has made a catalog of the fantastic pets from the novel.

https://docs.google.com/document/d/1NozJF8nbhy8t6Jta7AZ5WKbyCmEMYtgFM_akcSt9D-Y/edit?usp=drivesdk

They have also made a catalog of Nezha's powers.

<https://docs.google.com/document/d/1FjHQPXmEalChk7PNiw9ljAJ8Cq66-AjevgEfdEa6wgl/edit?usp=sharing>

A very big thank you to them. I'll add more later if or when new lists are available.

Disclaimer:

These have been posted for educational purposes. No malicious copyright infringement is intended. Please support the official release.

Update: 11-03-24

My friend Dario Virga (Onibotokemaru on Instagram) (fig. 4) has completed an Italian translation of the novel titled L'investitura degli Dei: Romanzo cinese di epoca Ming (2024). This 1,120 page, two-volume edition can be purchased here for € 50,00:

<https://www.libraccio.it/libro/9788879847049/xu-zhonglin/investitura-degli-dei-romanzo-cinese-di-epoca-ming.html?tr=C3137>

Fig. 4 – Dario and his translation (larger version).

Notes:

1) Prof. Shi Changyu notes in his preface to this translation that the friction between the fictional Chan and Jie sects serves as an analogy for that of Quanzhen and Zhengyi during the Ming, for the former was marginalized, while the latter was held in high esteem and fell prey to decadence, naturally hindering its ability to contribute anything of value to the development of Daoism at this time (Gu, 2000, pp. 50-53).

2) Those interested in reading some of the poetry from the novel should consult Koss (1979), which compares them with those from Journey to the West.

Sources:

Gu, Z. (2000). Creation of the Gods (Vols. 1-4). Beijing: New World Press.

Koss, N. (1979). The Relationship of Hsi-yu chi and Feng-shen yen-i: An Analysis of Poems Found in Both Novels. T'oung Pao, 65(4/5), second series, 143-165. Retrieved May 5, 2020, from <http://www.jstor.org/stable/4528175>

Wan, P. (1987). Investiture of the Gods ("Fengshen yanyi"): Sources, Narrative Structure, and Mythical Significance (UMI No. 8810607) [Doctoral dissertation, University of Washington]. Available from ProQuest Dissertations and Theses database.

Wu, C., & Yu, A. C. (2012). The Journey to the West (Vols. 1-4) (Rev. ed.). Chicago, Illinois: University of Chicago Press.

Share this:

X Facebook

Like this:

Categories: Archive, Buddhism, Daoism, Han Dynasty, Lord Erlang, Weapons Tags: Ao Guang, ape spirit, Archive, book pdf, Buddha, Buddhism, Chan, Creation of the Gods, Daji, Daoism, digitalagepulao, Enfeoffment of the Gods, Erlang, Fengshen yanyi, Fengshen zhenxing tu, folk religion, fox spirit, Gu Zhizhong, Guanyin, Investiture of the Gods, Jiang Ziyua, Jie, Jinzha, Journey to the West, King Wu of Zhou, King Zhou of Shang, Laozi, Manjushri, Manjusri, Muzha, Nezha, Quanzhen, Shang dynasty, shenmo, Taoism, The Newly Printed Zhong Bojing Annotated Investiture of the Gods, Xinke Zhong Bojing xiansheng piping Fengshen yanyi, Xiyouji, Yang Jian, Yuan Hong, Zhengyi, Zhou dynasty, 西游记

Post navigation

◀ Generals Thousand-Mile Eye and Fair-Wind EarSun Wukong and Births From Stone in World Mythology
◀

8 thoughts on "Archive #17 – PDFs of Creation of the Gods Library of Chinese Classics Chinese-English Bilingual Edition (Vols. 1-4)"

Soe Htet Aung says:

September 8, 2020 at 2:53 pm

THANKS FOR THIS!!

Loading...

Reply

Casey says:

August 17, 2023 at 12:15 am

These books are egregiously rare and expensive to buy so it's a great resource. Thanks

Loading...

Reply

Jim R. McClanahan says:

August 17, 2023 at 10:34 am

You're welcome. I'm happy to make it more accessible to people.

Loading...

Reply

Jack says:

March 14, 2024 at 2:43 am

Just want to thank you for the PDF! I've read it in another language before, but now that I've moved countries, I couldn't find it again. So I'm really happy to have an easy accessible version here!

Loading...

Reply

Jim R. McClanahan says:

March 14, 2024 at 12:48 pm

You're welcome.

Loading...

Reply

Crystal says:

February 2, 2025 at 11:56 am

I know the Tales of the Teahouse Retold: Investiture of the Gods translation by Katherine Liang is incomplete but I am curious about your thoughts on it in comparison to Gu Zhizhong's translation.

Loading...

Reply

Jim R. McClanahan says:

February 2, 2025 at 2:28 pm

I haven't read the series yet. I'll add it to my reading list.

Loading...

Reply

PearlSpirit says:

March 7, 2025 at 10:21 pm

Goodness, I am so annoyed because I had a longer post written out, but the site deleted it! I'm not the person you were asking, but I've read Teahouse. To be blunt, the translation has the same problem that many translations of Chinese literature into Indo-European languages seem to run into: inconsistent translation of the names of people, places, and things. It would be one thing if translators made a consensus, for example, 玉皇大帝 (Yùhuángdàdì) as Jade Emperor and stuck with it. But Katherine Liang Chew decides to render 太乙真人 (Taiyi Zhenren) as Paragon, meanwhile, Gu Zhizhong calls him Fairy Primordial. Also, for some reason, she decided to transliterate Li Gen, the name of the yaksha whom Nezha killed, as Night Face, which feels a tad unnecessary given that his Chinese name isn't exactly hard for Westerners to pronounce (but maybe she thought people would confuse it with Li Jing?). She decided to translate 灵珠 (Língzhū) as "Magical Pearl" instead of Spirit Pearl, and to be honest, I am questioning that decision. Doesn't Líng refer to "a departed soul" or "a spirit"? Ghost Pearl might be a more accurate translation if she didn't want to say "spirit" for some reason. Also, Língzhū wasn't a literal magical pearl or a pearl with ghost powers or whatever. "Língzhū" is a dharma name, like Golden Cicada in Journey to the West. Língzhū is said in some sources to have been an Immortal who reincarnated in the human realm.

Loading...

Reply

Leave a Reply

Search

Search for:

Search ...

Follow Blog via Email

Enter your email address to follow this blog and receive notifications of new posts by email.

Email Address

Email Address

Follow

Social Media

X

Instagram

Recent Posts

Story Idea: Sun Wukong vs Heracles / Hercules

Origin of the White Turtle River Crossing Accident From Journey to the West Chapters 98 and 99

Archive #53 – PDFs of the Three Kingdoms Foreign Language Press English Translation (Vols. 1-4)

Archive #52 – Animating Sun Wukong: Shanghai Animation Film Studio’s Havoc in Heaven and Symbolic Transformation on the Eve of the Cultural Revolution

Archive #51 – Shi Pantuo, an Influence on Sun Wukong

Can Sun Wukong Copy the Strength and Magic of an Opponent?

The Crow’s Nest Chan Master of Journey to the West

Archive #50 – Heracles as Vajrapani

The “Immortal Register” of Journey to the West

Archive #49: Journey to the West (西游记): A 60-Volume Lianhuanhua Comic Archive #48: The Eighteen Arhats Battle Wukong (八十一难): A 7-Volume Lianhuanhua Comic

Archive #47: The Newly Annotated Journey to the West With Illustrations (Xinshuo Xiyouji (tuxiang), 1749/1888)

Journey to the West Fanfiction Writer Spotlight #1: DarkscytheDrake

Story Idea: Sun Wukong vs Juggernaut

The Past Life Biography of Zhu Bajie

Why Did the White Dragon Horse Burn His Father’s Pearls in Journey to the West?

Review: The Second Journey (2024) by Joel Bigman

Parallels Between Sun Wukong and Hercules

Why was Sun Wukong Able to Live 342 Years Prior to his Immortality?

A Possible Origin for the Term “Handsome Monkey King”

Sun Wukong Dough Figurines from Quanzhou, Fujian

Story Idea: Firearms and the Journey to the West Universe

Journey to the West Artist Spotlight #3: NingadudeXx

Archive #46 – A Catalog of the Monkey King’s Magic Powers and Skills

Origin of the Immortal Peach-Stealing Episode from Journey to the West

What Does Red Boy Look Like? A Resource for Artists and Cosplayers

Archive #45 – Tripitaka Seeks the Scriptures: A Rare Journey to the West Puppet Play from Quanzhou, Fujian

Archive #44 – The God Erlang Captures the Great Sage Equaling Heaven (Erlang shen suo Qitian dasheng) Zaju Play

Buddhist Deities Exiled From the Western Heaven in Chinese Vernacular Literature

Laozi's Diamond Cutter Treasure-Weapon from Journey to the West

How to Kill Sun Wukong

Sun Wukong's Four Mighty Commanders

Sun Wukong's Names and Titles

Archive #43: The 72 and 36 Taoist Skills of the Lidai Shenxian Tongjian

Archive #42 – PDFs of Journey to the West Translations

A Brief Study of the Term Mihou (彌猴) in Journey to the West

Archive #41 – PDFs of The Illustrated Journey to the West (Ehon Saiyuki, 1835)

Archive #40 – Journey to the South (Nanyouji) English Translation PDF

The Tang Monk Tripitaka and the Buddha Candana Merit

Is Sun Wukong FTM Trans?

How Tall are the Main Characters from Journey to the West?

Archive #39 – Journey to the West Adaptations

Laozi's Realm in Journey to the West

The Buddha's Vulture Peak and Journey to the West

How Many Humans Does Sun Wukong Kill in Journey to the West?

Yuebei xing, Daughter of the Monkey King

Journey to the West Artist Spotlight #2: NinjaHaku21

Archive #38 – Books on Learning Taiwanese Hokkien

A Realistic Retelling of Journey to the West?

Archive #37 – The 13th-Century Version of Journey to the West

My Great Sage Monkey King Statue from Thailand

What is the Oldest Known Media of Sun Wukong the Monkey King?

Does the Buddha Lie in Journey to the West?

Interesting Facts about the Monkey King

The Monkey King's Crescent-Style Headband

A Survey of Sun Wukong's Magic "Immortal Breath" and Its Abilities

Hercules vs Sun Wukong Death Battle Analysis

The Patriarch Subodhi: Sun Wukong's First Master

Story Idea: The REAL Reason Sun Wukong is Expelled from Subodhi's School

The Monkey King's Worship in Thailand

Archive #36 – Sun Wukong and Battles of Magical Transformations

Archive #35 – The Tang Monk Tripitaka as a Confucian in Journey to the West

The Monkey King and the “Three-Teachings” (三教) Trinity of Southeast Asia

Archive #34 – Understanding Reality: A Taoist Alchemical Classic

Archive #33 – The Hsi-yu chi: A Study of Antecedents to the Sixteenth-Century Chinese Novel (1970)

Archive #32 – The Precious Scroll of Erlang (Erlang baojuan) (1562)

How Tall is the Monkey King? – A Debate

Archive #31 – The Original 1592 Edition of Journey to the West, Complete with Pictures

A Study of the Four Celestial Primates from Journey to the West

Archive #30 – The “Great Sage Equaling Heaven” Story from Liaozhai zhiyi (1740)

Archive #29 – Ruthless Compassion: Wrathful Deities in Early Indo-Tibetan Esoteric Buddhist Art (1999)

The Monkey King's Magic Staff: A Complete Guide

The Tightening Spell of Sun Wukong's Golden Headband

Review of DC Comics' Monkey Prince #0 to #6

The White Ape Perfected Man: Sun Wukong's Divine Double

Archive #28 – Tripitaka's Reincarnation and its Connection to Ancient Greek and Egyptian Philosophy

Archive #27 – The Journey to the West Japsang Effigies of Korean Royal Palaces

Archive #26 – Bimawen, Heavenly Horses, and Dragon Horses in Chinese Literature and History

Dragon Ball and Journey to the West

Journey to the West Artist Spotlight #1: Dario Virga

The Monkey King's Children

Watch Your Step: The Influence of Journey to the West on the “Ashiarai Yashiki” Yokai Story of Edo-Period Japan

What Does Zhu Bajie Look Like? A Resource for Artists and Cosplayers

Archive #25 – The Gibbon in China: An Essay in Chinese Animal Lore (1967) by Robert van Gulik

The Weight of the Monkey King's Staff: A Literary Origin

Story Idea: The Reason for Sun Wukong's Rebellion

Review of Marvel Comics' Sun Wukong

Review of DC Comics' “The Monkey Prince Hates Superheroes”

The Worship of Sun Wukong the Monkey King: An Overview

Archive #24 – Chinese Gods: The Unseen World of Spirits and Demons (1997) by Keith Stevens

Archive #23 – “Pagan Temples in San Francisco” (1892)

Review of Imagin8 Press' Bilingual Edition of Journey to the West for Chinese Language Learners

The Great Sage Monkey King Scripture: A Brief Analysis

Archive #22 – The Monkey King's Scripture

Sun Wukong and the Buddha's Past Life as a Monkey King
Qitian Dasheng Monkey King Temples in Taiwan
Archive #21 – Qing-Period Color-Illustrated Complete Edition of Journey to the West
The Magic Powers of the Monkey King's Iron Staff
The Book of Xian and Shen (BOXS), a Catalog of Chinese Gods
My Qitian Dasheng Monkey King Talisman Block
Archive #20 – The Xiyou ji in Its Formative Stages: The Late Ming Editions (1981)
Archive #19 – Transforming Monkey: Adaptation and Representation of a Chinese Epic (2018)
Origin of the Pregnancy Episode in Chapter 53
Origin of the Six-Eared Macaque and the Character's Influence on Black Myth: Wukong Parallels Between the Monkey King and the Buddha
The Monkey King and The Buddha Victorious in Strife (a.k.a. Victorious Fighting Buddha)
Archive #18 – Demons, Gods, and Pilgrims: The Demonology of the Hsi-yu Chi (1985)
Sun Wukong's Curlicue-Style Headband
The Great Sage Detecting "Ping-Pong" Bottle
When was the Monkey King Born?
Sun Wukong and Births From Stone in World Mythology
Archive #17 – PDFs of Creation of the Gods Library of Chinese Classics Chinese-English Bilingual Edition (Vols. 1-4)
Generals Thousand-Mile Eye and Fair-Wind Ear
Taiwanese Religious Humor: The Epidemic Prevention Conference
Idea: Sun Wukong Animated Music Short
Archive #16 – Sun Wukong and Chinese Medicine
The Monkey King Temples of Fujian Province, China
Archive #15 – Narrative Structure and the Problem of Chapter Nine in the "Hsi-Yu Chi"
Archive #14 – Alchemy and Journey to the West: The Cart-Slow Kingdom Episode
The Alchemical Metaphor of Subodhi's Mountain Home
The Origin of Sun Wukong's Cloud Somersault
Archive #13 – Huineng, Subhuti, and Monkey's Religion in "Xiyou ji" (2006)
Archive # 12 – The Origin of Sun Wukong's 72 Transformations
Dragon Ball's Senzu Bean and Journey to the West
Sun Wukong and the Buddhist Saint Mulian
Book Covers for Vintage Editions of Arthur Waley's Monkey
Monkey Boxing: The Connection Between Primates and Martial Arts in Ancient China
Archive #11 – PDFs of the Journey to the West 2012 Revised Edition
Parallels between Sun Wukong and Wu Song

Archive #10 – The Magic White Ape of the Tang Dynasty

The Worship of Sun Wukong in 19th-century America

Bin Steel: The Magic Metal of Journey to the West

Origin of the White Bone Spirit

Sun Wukong and Miao Folklore

Sun Wukong and the Qiang Ethnic Group of China

Zhu Bajie's Earliest Known Depictions and the Gyeongcheonsa Pagoda

The Great Sage Purple Cloud Temple of Yilan, Taiwan: A Photo Essay

Story Idea: The Origin of Sun Wukong

Archive #9 – PDF of Hanuman's Tale: The Messages of a Divine Monkey

The Monkey King's Cosmic Body

Archive #8 – The Pig and the Prostitute: The Cult of Zhu Bajie in Modern Taiwan

Musings on Journey to the West and my new Great Sage Tattoo

Sun Wukong's Strength-Bestowing Ritual

Story Idea: Master Subodhi's Curriculum II – Immortal Warriors and Shaolin Monks – Some Fun Monkey

King Fanfiction Speculation

My Sun Wukong Art – “The Buddha has Awakened”

Master Subodhi's Curriculum

Journey to the West and World History

The Story of the Original Golden Headband in the Great Sage Treasure Temple, Kowloon, Hong Kong

Sun Wukong's Hellish Punishment

Monkey and the Summoners of Hell: The Story and Origins of the Heibai Wuchang Categories

Archive

Art

Buddhism

Comics

Daoism

Ethnic Groups

Fanfiction

Fujian

Geography

Greek

Han Dynasty

Hinduism

Japan

Korea
Lianhuanhua comic
Lord Erlang
Martial arts
Ming Dynasty
Popular Media popular religion
PRC China
Prequels
Qing Dynasty
Sequels
Sha Wujing
Song Dynasty
Story Ideas
Sun Wukong
Tang Dynasty
Thailand
Tripitaka Weapons
White Dragon Horse
Yu the Great
Yuan Dynasty
Zhu Bajie
Archives
October 2025
August 2025
July 2025
June 2025
May 2025
April 2025
March 2025
February 2025
January 2025
December 2024
October 2024
September 2024

August 2024
April 2024
March 2024
February 2024
January 2024
December 2023
September 2023
August 2023
July 2023
June 2023
May 2023
April 2023
March 2023
February 2023
January 2023
December 2022
October 2022
September 2022
August 2022
July 2022
June 2022
May 2022
April 2022
March 2022
February 2022
January 2022
December 2021
November 2021
October 2021
August 2021
July 2021
June 2021
May 2021
April 2021
March 2021
February 2021

January 2021
December 2020
November 2020
October 2020
September 2020
August 2020
June 2020
May 2020
April 2020
March 2020
February 2020
January 2020
December 2019
October 2019
September 2019
July 2019
June 2019
May 2019
April 2019
March 2019
February 2019
January 2019
December 2018
November 2018
October 2018
September 2018
August 2018
July 2018
June 2018
May 2018
April 2018
March 2018
February 2018
December 2017
November 2017
October 2017

September 2017

July 2017

June 2017

May 2017

February 2017

January 2017

December 2016

October 2016

December 2014

June 2014

February 2014

September 2013

November 2012

Powered by WordPress.com. Foreword: this is not a comprehensive catalog. I have chosen to exclude three things:

All the horses with fancy names, unless they have supernatural power.

Fancy carriages. Even the ones pulled by dragons.

Nezha's Wind-Fire Wheel.

On top of that, I have chosen to include:

Fantastic beasts that aren't steeds (as in, animals you ride on), and more like weaponized pets.

Yaoguai characters that are subdued and become steeds or pets. Which is why Ma Shan the lamp spirit doesn't count; despite being subdued, Randeng doesn't use him for anything afterwards, unlike the Peng eagle.

Many characters share the same species of steeds. The chapter title behind each name is the first chapter their steed appears in.

Steeds

☐☐/Blue Luan bird - Nvwa (Chapter 1), Lady Shiji (Chapter 13), Yunxiao (Chapter 49), Princess Longji (Chapter 66)

-As you can see, this species seems to be favored by female immortals.

-In the Book of Mountains and Seas, the Luan is described as a bird with five-colored feather patterns, whose sighting shall bring peace to the realms.

-The description is very similar to the phoenix's.

☐☐☐☐/Fiery-eyed, Golden-pupiled Beast - Chong Heihu (Chapter 3), Zheng Lun (Chapter 3), Yu Hua (Chapter 33), Cheng Qi (Chapter 73)

Deer - the Ten Lords of Golden Turtle Island (Chapter 43), Randeng (Chapter 45), Wenshu (Chapter 61)

-They divide those deers into subcategories of “Sika Deer” (☐☐☐), “Yellow-spotted Deer” (☐☐☐), and “Eight-forked Deer” (☐☐☐) too, but honestly, that's just semantics.

-Randeng's deer got cut in half by the Golden Dragon Scissor in Chapter 48, but in later chapters, he's also described as riding a deer. I guess he just has more than one deer.

-Wenshu's steed was a deer before he switched to a new one in the Ten Thousand Immortal Formation Arc.

☐☐☐/Golden-eyed Camel - Lv Yue (Chapter 58), Holy Mother of Flame Spirit (Chapter 71), Yu Yuan (Chapter 75)

-Yu Yuan's case is a bit complicated, because the chapter uses both “Golden Eyed Camel” and “Golden-pupiled Five Cloud Camel” (☐☐☐☐☐) for his steed. Whether it's semantics again, or his camel is actually a fancier, better version of your run-of-the-mill ones remains unclear.

Tiger - Shen Gongbao (Chapter 37), Zhao Gongming (Chapter 46).

-Shen Gongbao's tiger is a "White-foreheaded Tiger" (白额虎), while Zhao Gongming's one is black-furred.

Crane - Huanglong (Chapter 45), Old Man of the South Pole (Chapter 65)

Qilin - Grand Tutor Wen (Chapter 27), Huang Tianhua (Chapter 40)

-Wen Zhong's Qilin is called the "Ink Qilin" (墨麒麟), and Huang Tianhua, the "Jade Qilin" (玉麒麟).

五色牛/Five-colored Bull - Huang Feihu (Chapter 8)

水兽/Water-forcing Beast - Ao Bing (Chapter 14)

辟邪/Bi An - Wang Mo (Chapter 38)

-Said to be the seventh of the Nine Sons of the Dragons, it is a tiger-like beast that's often used to decorate jail doors and courts.

狻猊/Suan Ni - Yang Sen (Chapter 38)

-Also an offspring of dragons, it's a lion-like beast that enjoys sitting still and fire and smoke. As such, it's often used to decorate incense burners.

白额虎/Spotted Leopard - Gao Youqian (Chapter 38)

𪛗/Zheng Ning - Li Xingba (Chapter 38)

-Like many fantastic beasts in this catalog, it's probably made up by the author. However, the Book of Mountains and Seas does feature a strange beast named “Zheng”, which looks like a red leopard with five tails and a single horn.

𪛗/Four-Not-Like - Jiang Ziya (Chapter 38)

-It used to be Yuanshi's steed, and was given to Jiang Ziya to help him face the 4 aforementioned monstrous steeds of the Nine Dragon Island Sages, because regular horses would become terrified in their presence.

-Might be based on an elaphure, a.k.a. Père David's deer.

𪛗/Hong Hu - Qiong Xiao (Chapter 49)

-Literally “Goose-Swan”. Apart from being a name for actual swans, it can also be a generic name for large birds, as well as a name specifically referring to white-colored Chinese phoenix.

𪛗/Flower-plumed Bird - Bixiao (Chapter 49)

𪛗/Horned Azure Bull - Lao Tzu (Chapter 50)

𪛗/Red Smoke Foal - Luo Xuan (Chapter 64)

-I originally counted it out because, despite its unusual color, it seems to still be a horse. Then I noticed the description of flames coming out of its four hooves upon a reread. Princess Longji takes it out with her

Twin Dragon Sword.

鯨/Whale-Dragon - Hong Jin (Chapter 66)

龍魚/Divine Fish - Princess Longji (Chapter 66)

-The second character has multiple pronunciations (Liu, Nai, Wei). It's a needlessly complicated name for some kind of fish.

-However, both the Ming illustration of FSYY and the modern Lianhuanhua adaptation seem to portray it as a fish-bird hybrid thing.

-It is also the natural counter to Hong Jin's Whale Dragon.

夔/Kui Bull - Patriarch Tongtian (Chapter 77)

-Might be related to the "Kui Bull" (夔) of Book of Mountains and Seas, a one-legged, hornless, bull-like beast. It will bring wind and storm whenever it enters and exits water bodies, and emits a glow that's like the sun and moon.

白???/White ??? - Lao Tzu's "Three in One Breath" clones (Chapter 77)

-Much like Longji's fish-bird, that last character is nearly untypable, and I can't even find a pronunciation. It might be an alternate character for 白, which would mean that Lao Tzu's first clone is just riding a Baize, the mythical all-knowing beast.

天馬/Heavenly Horse - Lao Tzu's "Three in One Breath" clones (Chapter 77)

☐☐/Earthly Hou - Lao Tzu's "Three in One Breath" clones (Chapter 77)

-Likely based on a lion, the Hou is also a mythical beast. Here, it is written as ☐, but the more well-known version is ☐, which is used in JTTW for Guanyin's escaped steed, the Golden-haired Hou.

-FSYY seems to favor ☐ over ☐, though.

☐☐☐/Cloudray Beast - Yang Ren (Chapter 80)

-Daode Zhenjun's steed, which he gives to Yang Ren. When slapped on the horn, clouds form around its four hooves, allowing it to take flight.

☐☐☐☐/One-horned Blacksmoke Beast - Zhang Kui (Chapter 86)

-Basically a horse with one horn. It can travel at supernatural speed, turning into a blur of black smoke in the process. Yang Jian tricked him into decapitating it in the very same chapter.

☐☐☐/One-horned Beast - Jin Dasheng (Chapter 92)

-No idea what its relation is to the other magical one-horned steed above.

-Speaking of...can you call all horses with an additional horn a unicorn, or is it limited to the European folklore incarnation alone?

Pets

☐☐☐☐/Iron-beaked Divine Eagle - Chong Heihu (Chapter 3)

-Kept in a gourd when not in use. Maaaaaybe a spell, since when Heihu unleashes it, the eagles just appear out of nowhere in a cloud of smoke. Natural counter to Gao Jineng's wasps.

White-faced Ape - Bo Yikao (Chapter 19)

-Is an amazing singer, because it has cultivated to a level where the bone in its throat is no longer there, unlike regular animals. Can also perceive Daji's true form and tried to claw her in the face as a result.

-King Zhou ordered the execution of the ape, but spared it on Bo Yikao's pleading...immediately before Bo Yikao himself yeeted his instrument at Daji and got executed as a result. Nothing is said about what happened to the ape after Bo Yikao's death.

𪛗𪛗𪛗/Golden-eyed Divine Warbler - Huang Feihu (Chapter 28)

-Technically not Huang Feihu's pet, but a tribune from the North Sea that was released on his order to go after Daji in fox form (he didn't know that, though), and succeeded in clawing her in the face.

-Because of this, Daji develops a grudge against him.

𪛗𪛗/Fox-Ferret - Mo Lishou (Chapter 40)

-Giant monster ferret that looks like a white rat, and is said to be "as large as a white elephant". Swallowed Yang Jian whole, before he squeezed its heart and burst out of its body, tearing the beast in half in the process.

-Likely based on Devaraja Vaisravana's iconography, where he's often depicted with a rat/mongoose in his hand. This might be a result of syncretism of Vaisravana and Kubera the wealthgod. It's also known as the "Treasure-spewing Rat", and can throw up treasures when squeezed.

☾/Celestial Howling Hound - Yang Jian (Chapter 47)

-Giant monster dog that's "as large as a white elephant and as swift as an owl". Is also referred to as an "immortal hound" (天狗) during the Plum Mountain Demons Arc. A true MVP in fights.

-While Erlang's hound companion has been part of his iconography since the Yuan dynasty, FSYY is the work that gives the doggo its most iconic and popular name.

Dog - Ji Kang (Chapter 66)

-It's unclear whether the dog is a spell, or an actual beast, since Ji Kang unleashes it by reciting a mantra, at which point a black cloud appears and a dog pokes its head out of the cloud to bite people. I lean more towards the former.

-This dog attack thing is likely related to the stellar deity Ji Kang is deified as—the Heavenly Dog Star (天狗星), a star of ill omens.

☾/Centipede Wasp - Gao Jineng (Chapter 69)

-Kept in a sack when not in use. The first time we see the wasp swarm in action, it stings Huang Tianhua's Qilin in the eyes, causing him to fall off his saddle and be killed.

-However, when Gao Jineng tried to use it a second time, Chong Heihu unleashed his Iron-beaked Eagles in return, which devoured all the wasps and led to his subsequent demise at the hand of Huang Feihu.

Subdued yaoguai turned steed/pet

Winged Immortal, a Golden Winged Peng eagle - Randeng (Chapter 63)

-One of THE memetic losers of FSYY. Upon shifting to his true form, the wind created by his wing flaps can whisk away tremendous amounts of seawater, exposing the seabed and allowing him to feast on the fishes.

-He tried to use that move to drown the city of Xi Qi after getting beaten up by Jiang Ziya and the Chan juniors, which doesn't work thanks to Yuanshi's magical water barrier.

-After several hours of futile work, he got tired and was too embarrassed to go back to camp. Then he got directed to a feast by Randeng in disguise, ate 108 prayer beads disguised as snacks, and was subdued via nasty stomach cramps.

-Later sent out as a scout against Kong Xuan, got punted out of the air, and the best description he can manage is "Guy has wings".

Kong Xuan, a peacock - Zhunti (Chapter 71)

-A giant roadblock. Has the super OP Five-colored Divine Light (五光) attack, which can suck up treasures, divine beasts, and people alike.

-When Yang Jian uses the Demon-revealing Mirror on him, he can only see a glowy, agate-like ball of light inside. Upon being overpowered by Zhunti, he reverts to his true form—a narrow-eyed, red-crowned peacock, and is taken away as a steed.

-Later, he becomes Mahamayuri the Wisdom King, literally "Great Peacock".

Black Cloud Immortal, a softshell turtle - Zhunti (Chapter 83)

-A disciple of the Jie Sect. He fights Zhunti, only to be defeated via a bamboo fishing pole, at which point he reverts to his true form and is led away by an acolyte to live as a pet turtle in the Eight Virtues Pool of the Western Pure Land.

Dragon-headed Immortal, an azure Lion - Wenshu (Chapter 83)

-Disciple of the Jie Sect. He is in charge of the Taiji Formation during the Ten Thousand Immortal Formation Arc. Subdued by Wenshu, and was led out on a leash to be paraded before Patriarch Tongtian on Lao Tzu's order as extra insults.

Spirit Tusk Immortal, a white elephant - Puxian (Chapter 83)

-Disciple of the Jie Sect. In charge of the Twin Polarity Formation (阴阳阵). Subdued by Puxian.

Golden Light Immortal, a Hou - Cihang (Chapter 83)

-Disciple of the Jie Sect. In charge of the Four Bearings Formation (四方阵). Subdued by Cihang, FSYY's Daoist-ized version of Guanyin.

Disclaimer: I'm not counting powers from his treasures, such as the Wind-Fire Wheels giving him super speed and allowing him to take flight.

I'm also excluding the invisibility talisman Taiyi drew on him in Chapter 12, since, unlike his Three-headed Eight-Armed Form, it's not a skill or permanent alteration.

Pre-resurrection:

Advanced physical maturity - I don't know what to call "A newborn baby being able to jump and run around right after emerging from a ball of flesh", but this is probably it. (Chapter 12)

Unusual height - 6ft tall 7 years old kid, though this might just be a result of FSYY's weird sense of scale. (Chapter 12)

Super strength - A 7 years old kid killing Li Gen the Yaksha with a Qiankun Ring to the head should count as super strength. In Ao Bing's case, he drags him off the steed with the Huntian Sash first before the bonking. (Chapter 12)

Still, his later beatdown of Ao Guang and being able to draw the Qiankun Bow no one else could lift? Yeah, definitely super strength. (Chapter 13)

Five Elements Travel: Earth - After Ao Guang storms off to make a complaint to JE, Nezha uses Earth Travel to go to Taiyi's abode and ask for help. It's activated by grabbing a handful of dirt and tossing it into the air. (Chapter 12)

Travel to the Celestial Realm - After Taiyi puts an invisibility talisman on him, he goes to wait for Ao Guang under the Celestial Realm's gates. (Chapter 12)

Dream Communication - Talking to Lady Yin in her dream after his suicide. (Chapter 14)

A generic ghost power, as shown by later instances of Wen Zhong and Yin Jiao's souls warning King Zhou in his dreams, before they go into the Terrace of Investiture. (Chapter 52, Chapter 66)

Efficiency at granting prayers - After Lady Yin builds a temple for him, he is said to be able to fulfill all the wishes of his worshippers, from granting blessings to warding off disasters. (Chapter 14)

Materialization - After Li Jing's destruction of his temple, Nezha goes to protest to Taiyi, and the narration says that "After receiving incense and worship for half a year, Nezha is able to take a form and voice himself to some extent." (□□□□□□□□□□□□)

It is implied here that ghosts can become corporeal again via people's worship, though, from the looks of it, Nezha has only become visible and audible, and doesn't have a physical body yet at the point of the temple's destruction. (Chapter 14)

Post-Resurrection:

Unusual height (Again) - He grows from 6ft to "1 Zhang 6 Chi" after his resurrection, which is about 15-18 ft. (Chapter 14)

Spear arts - Taught by Taiyi. (Chapter 14)

Samadhi Fire - When Wenshu ties him to the Flying Dragon Pillar and orders Jinzha to whip him, he is described as "blowing out Samadhi Fire from his seven orifices" (七窍喷火). This may or may not be metaphorical. (Chapter 14)

It must also be noted that FSYY's Samadhi Fire is not the Red Boy-exclusive special attack of JTTW, and multiple Daoists from both Chan and Jie Sects are able to use it.

The best example is when Nezha and his brothers, Lei Zhenzi, Huang Tianhua, and Weihu try to burn Ma Shan with the Samadhi Fire on Jiang Ziya's orders, which doesn't work because he's a lampwick spirit, who proceeds to escape through the flames. (Chapter 63)

Lotus Body: Immunity to soul-based attacks - In Chapter 37, the narration then explains that all beings of flesh and blood possess the Three Souls and Seven Spirits, and Zhang Guifang's spell works by forcefully scattering them.

Nezha, because of his Lotus Body, does not have souls, thus granting him immunity to the attack.

This will become a recurrent thing. Here's a list of all the soul-based treasures and spells that fail against Nezha:

Zhang Guifang's Unhorsing Spell (Chapter 37)

Zheng Lun's nose beams (Chapter 57)

Chijing Zi/Yin Hong's Yin-Yang Mirror (Chapter 60)

Guangcheng Zi/Yin Jiao's Soulfell Bell (Chapter 65)

Qiu Yin's Red Pearl (Chapter 74)

Fa Jie's banner (Chapter 79)

Long Anji's Paralyzing Ring (Chapter 79)

Bian Ji's Spectral White Bone Banner (Chapter 84)

And here's a collection of his sassy responses:

"Bastard, I'm staying on these wheels and you ain't calling me off them!" (Against Zhang Guifang)

"Dude, are you sick or something, blowing your nose like that?" (Against Zheng Lun)

"Idiot, it's just a red orb. What's so special about it, huh?" (When Qiu Yin tells him to take a look at the pearl)

"Your ring sucks, check out mine!" (To Long Anji, right before bonking him with the Qiankun Ring and killing him)

Lotus Body: Resistance to physical attacks - Spells don't knock Nezha off his wheels, but physical weapons like Yang Sen's Sky-opening Pearl, Wen Zhong and Zhao Gongming's whips, and Guangcheng Zi/Yin Jiao's Heaven-turning Sealstone can. (Chapter 38, Chapter 42, Chapter 47, 63)

However, he doesn't seem to suffer any lasting injuries afterwards. The only non-magical/poisonous injury that sticks for a while is some bruises, from getting hit in the face by Deng Chanyu's Five Light Stones. (Chapter 53)

Lotus Body: Immunity to diseases - When Lv Yue puts his plague pills into Xi Qi's water supply, the entire city falls victim to the sorcerous plague, save for Nezha and Yang Jian, because of the former's lotus body and the latter's Ninefold Mystic Arts. (Chapter 58)

Later, Yu Hualong's five sons create five bushels of poisonous poxes, which are spilled all over the Zhou camp from the air, giving everyone magical, five-colored smallpox.

Once again, Nezha is immune, and Yang Jian, knowing that the Yu brothers are up to something, gets the hell out of dodge before the pox spell is unleashed. Cue Nezha complaining of them “Pulling a Lv Yue again”. (Chapter 81)

Immunity to the Soul-Killing Banner (魂魄) - The treasure in question belongs to Yu Hua: when raised, it unleashes/turns into multiple streams of black smoke that covers the victim and whisks them away. (Chapter 32)

Subsequently, he tries to use it against Nezha, but Nezha just grabs the smokes, seizes the treasure, and stuffs it into his Leopard Skin Sack. This may or may not fall under the umbrella of “Immunity to Soul-based Attacks”. (Chapter 33)

Counterspell: Pearl Attack - Feng Lin can blow a cloud of smoke out of his mouth, which contains a bowl-sized red pearl that functions as a projectile weapon. Nezha just points his finger at the smoke, and it fizzles out. (Chapter 36)

Supernatural endurance: Red Sand Formation - One of the Ten Formations, it contains three bushels of red sand, which can create a giant sandstorm that reduces any humans and immortals who enter the formation to powder. (Chapter 44)

Nezha and Lei Zhenzi are assigned to protect King Wu, the only person who can break the formation... because Fate Says So, but is also Fated to get trapped in there for 100 days. So naturally, Nezha and Lei Zhenzi get stuck in there alongside him. (Chapter 49)

When Old Man of the South Pole breaks the formation, Nezha and Lei Zhenzi are fine, but King Wu is already dead and has to be resurrected via a magical pill. (Chapter 51)

I'm not putting this under Resistance to Physical Attacks because, unlike the weapons, I'm unsure as to whether the red sand is magical in nature.

Resistance to poison: Blood-melting Knife (血魔刀) - Limited, since Nezha is still severely injured and incapacitated by Yu Hua's new treasure (made by his master Yu Yuan). However, for mortals, a wound from the knife is pretty much an insta-kill. (Chapter 74)

Three-headed, Eight-Armed Form - After Nezha is injured by Yu Hua's knife, he's taken back to Taiyi's abode to recover. When he's ready to leave, Taiyi offers him three cups of wine and three "fire jujubes", which gives him his iconic multi-headed and armed transformation.

Unlike in JTTW, FSYY's Nezha has 8 arms instead of 6. Presumably, the 2 extra ones are used to wield the Yin-Yang Swords, the pair of weapons Taiyi gives to him alongside the Nine Fire Dragon Bell Cover... which never get used afterwards.

Upon switching to the multi-headed and limbed form, his appearance also changes into a blue-faced, red-haired, fanged monstrosity, which is not too dissimilar to the fierce guardian deities of esoteric Buddhism. (Chapter 76, Chapter 79)

Also, amusing reaction to his new transformation: "Dangit master, how am I supposed to use all these arms? They are like ugly branches on a tree." (Chapter 76)

Sagehood in Flesh (肉身成圣) - Nezha is said to attain the status post-war, alongside his brothers, Li Jing, Lei Zhenzi, Wei Hu, and Yang Jian.

Basically, immortality and godhood, but it doesn't require you to die in ancient China's bloodiest bureaucracy recruitment program first. (Chapter 100)

Appendix: a detailed description of all the soul-based stuff

Immunity to soul-based attacks: White Light Spell - Zheng Lun's special attack, taught by Sage Du'e of West Kunlun, has him shoot two beams of white light out of his nose, which can seize people's souls and basically incapacitate them via sudden dizziness. (Chapter 3)

Immunity to soul-based attacks: Yin-Yang Mirror - Given to Yin Hong by his master, Chijing Zi, the Yin-Yang Mirror is half red and half white; the white half can kill anyone he shines it at, while the red half can revive anyone who have been killed by the white half. (Chapter 59)

After Shen Gongbao turns Yin Hong against the Zhou, he uses the white half on Nezha, and it does nothing because again, lotus body. (Chapter 60)

It is ambiguous whether the Yin-Yang Mirror fails because the white half only works on beings of flesh and blood, or because it kills people by ripping their souls out of their bodies—both of which do not apply to Nezha.

Immunity to soul-based attacks: Soulfell Bell (响铃) - One of Yin Jiao's treasures, given to him by Guangcheng Zi. It works just like Zheng Lun's nose beams and the Unhorsing Spell—making people fall off their steeds. (Chapter 63)

And it doesn't work on Nezha either, who hits the bell with his golden brick, sending sparks flying everywhere. (Chapter 65)

Immunity to soul-based attacks: Red Pearl - A treasure cultivated by Qiu Yin the earthworm yaoguai, it is a bowl-sized red pearl that rises up from his head in a beam of white light, and can put anyone who look at it into a fugue state.

Immunity to soul-based attacks: Fa Jie's banner - The treasure causes Lei Zhenzi to fall down from the air, but doesn't work on Nezha, and Fa Jie gets knocked down by the Qiankun Ring for his troubles. (Chapter 79)

Immunity to soul-based attacks: Paralyzing Ring (珊珊) - Long Anji's treasure. Made of two interlocking rings, anyone who hears them tinkling in the air will be paralyzed and fall to the ground. (Chapter 79)

Immunity to soul-based attacks: Spectral White Bone Banner (白骨旗) - Unlike all the other soul-based spells and magical items, Bian Ji's banner of human bones is an AOE treasure; anyone who enters its range will instantly fall unconscious. (Chapter 84)

Although the narration states that the banner will not work on Nezha, after seeing Lei Zhenzi getting caught in its aura in mid-air, and Wei Hu's vajra club failing to damage it (he tries to use it as a projectile, but the weapon just falls down the moment it enters the banner's range), he is understandably cautious and does not pursue Bian Ji past the banner. (Chapter 85)

道藏通考

The Taoist Canon

A Historical Companion to the Daozang

VOLUME I

Antiquity through the Middle Ages

Edited by Kristofer Schipper and
Franciscus Verellen

The University of Chicago Press
Chicago & London

KRISTOFER SCHIPPER was, until his retirement in 2003, professor of Chinese Religions at the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes and professor of Chinese History at Leiden University; he currently is director of the Library of the Western Belvedere at the University of Fuzhou.

FRANCISCUS VERELLEN is director of the Ecole Française d'Extrême-Orient, where he holds the chair in History of Taoism.

The University of Chicago Press, Chicago 60637

The University of Chicago Press, Ltd., London

© 2004 by The University of Chicago

All rights reserved. Published 2004

Printed in the United States of America

13 12 11 10 09 08 07 06 05 04 5 4 3 2 1

ISBN (cloth, vol. 1): 0-226-73811-6

ISBN (the set): 0-226-73817-5

Published with the generous assistance of the Chiang Ching-Kuo Foundation for International Scholarly Exchange.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Dao Zang.

The Taoist canon : a historical companion to the Daozang = [Dao zang tong kao]

3 v. ; cm.

Parallel title in Chinese characters.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

Contents: vol. 1. Antiquity through the Middle Ages / edited by Kristofer Schipper and Franciscus Verellen—vol. 2. The modern period / edited by Kristofer Schipper and Franciscus Verellen—vol. 3. Biographies, bibliography, indexes / edited by Kristofer Schipper and Franciscus Verellen.

ISBN 0-226-73817-5 (set : alk. paper) — ISBN 0-226-73811-6 (v. 1 : alk. paper) —

ISBN 0-226-73813-2 (v. 2 : alk. paper) — ISBN 0-226-73815-9 (v. 3 : alk. paper)

1. Dao Zang. 2. Taoism. I. Title: Dao zang tong kao. II. Schipper, Kristofer Marinus. III. Verellen, Franciscus. IV. Title

BL1900.A1D359 2004

299.5'1482—dc22

2004047959

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

CONTENTS

VOLUME I

List of Illustrations ix

Summary Contents of Volumes 2 and 3 xi

Preface xiii

User's Guide xvii

List of Contributors xxi

General Introduction 1

The History of the Taoist Canon before the Ming Dynasty 5

Wang Chong's Daozang 7

Ge Hong's Catalogue of Taoist Books 8

The Canon of the Early Taoist Ecclesia (Zhengyi fawen) 9

The Books of the Three Caverns (Sandong jing) 11

Lu Xiuqing and the Canon of the Three Caverns 14

The Seven Parts 17

The Twelve Categories and the Thirty-Six Divisions 21

The Liturgical Organization of the Tang 22

The Canon of the Kaiyuan Era 24

The Song and Yuan Canons 26

The Destruction of the Old Canon 29

The Ming Canon and Its Supplement 32

The Compilation of the Zhengtong daoza 32

The Supplement of 1607 37

Destruction and Rebirth 39

The Tao-tsang Project 41

Daozang Studies after 1926 41

The Beginning of the Tao-tsang Project 45

The Final Stage 48

New Perspectives 50

PART I: Eastern Zhou to Six Dynasties

1.A Texts in General Circulation 55

1.A.1 Philosophy 56

1.A.1.a Texts 56

1.A.1.b Commentaries 72

- 1.A.2 Divination 79
- 1.A.3 Medicine and Pharmacology 87
- 1.A.4 Yangsheng 92
- 1.A.5 Alchemy 99
- 1.A.6 Sacred History and Geography 107
 - 1.A.6.a Cosmogony and the Pantheon 107
 - 1.A.6.b Mythology and Hagiography 111
- 1.A.7 Collected Works 117
- 1.A.8 Compendiums and Encyclopedias 118
- 1.B Texts in Internal Circulation 120
 - 1.B.1 The Way of the Heavenly Master 120
 - 1.B.1.a Didactic and Doctrinal Treatises 120
 - 1.B.1.b Rituals and Rules 127
 - 1.B.2 Shangqing 137
 - 1.B.2.a The Canonical Shangqing Scriptures 139
 - 1.B.2.b Other Early Shangqing Scriptures 185
 - 1.B.2.c Early Shangqing Hagiographies 196
 - 1.B.2.d Anthologies 198
 - 1.B.2.e Rituals and Rules 207
 - 1.B.3 Lingbao 212
 - 1.B.3.a The Canonical Lingbao Scriptures 214
 - 1.B.3.b Other Early Lingbao Scriptures 240
 - 1.B.3.c Doctrinal and Liturgical Works 252
 - 1.B.4 Texts of the Dongshen Division 260
 - 1.B.5 Other Revealed Scriptures 269
 - 1.B.6 The Taiping jing 277

PART 2: Sui, Tang, and Five Dynasties

2.A Texts in General Circulation 283

2.A.1 Philosophy 283

- 2.A.1.a Commentaries on Ancient Philosophers 283
- 2.A.1.b Tang Philosophical Texts (General) 298
- 2.A.1.c The Yinfu jing and Its Commentaries 319
- 2.A.1.d Commentaries on the Zhouyi cantong qi and Related Scriptures 323
- 2.A.1.e Commentaries on Lingbao Scriptures 331

2.A.2 Divination and Numerology 333

2.A.3 Medicine and Pharmacology 338

2.A.4 Yangsheng 344

- 2.A.4.a Miscellaneous Practices 345
- 2.A.4.b Respiratory Techniques 366
- 2.A.5 Alchemy 377
 - 2.A.5.a Laboratory Alchemy 378
 - 2.A.5.b Inner Alchemy 401
- 2.A.6 Sacred History and Geography 413
 - 2.A.6.a Sacred Annals and Records 413
 - 2.A.6.b Hagiographies 424
 - 2.A.6.c Mountain and Temple Monographs; Epigraphy 432
- 2.A.7 Collected Works 436
- 2.A.8 Handbooks and Encyclopedias 439
- 2.B Texts in Internal Circulation 448
 - 2.B.1 The General Liturgical Organization of the Tang 448
 - 2.B.2 The Orthodox One Way of the Heavenly Master 467
 - 2.B.2.a Liturgical Organization 468
 - 2.B.2.b Rituals 476
 - 2.B.2.c Miscellaneous 486
 - 2.B.3 The Taiping Division 493
 - 2.B.4 The Taixuan Division 495
 - 2.B.5 Sanhuang Scriptures and Rituals 501
 - 2.B.6 Dongyuan and Shengxuan Scriptures and Rituals 509
 - 2.B.6.a The Dongyuan shenzhou jing 509
 - 2.B.6.b The Shengxuan neijiao jing 515
 - 2.B.7 Lingbao 516
 - 2.B.7.a Scriptures 516
 - 2.B.7.a.1 The Long Treatises 518
 - 2.B.7.a.2 Medium-Length Scriptures 530
 - 2.B.7.a.3 Short Doctrinal and Prophylactic Texts 554
 - 2.B.7.b Litanies 566
 - 2.B.7.c Rituals and Rules 574
 - 2.B.8 The Dongzhen Division 587
 - 2.B.8.a Scriptures 587
 - 2.B.8.b The Shangqing Registers 599
 - 2.B.8.c Manuals, Anthologies, and Encyclopedias 610
 - 2.B.8.c.1 Practices 610
 - 2.B.8.c.2 Liturgy 623
 - 2.B.8.c.3 Encyclopedias 628

ILLUSTRATIONS

1. Liezi (668 1a) 62
2. The Three Deities guarding against the Three Afflictions of lust, greed, and ambition (1207 10b-11a) 98
3. The Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning and his court (167 1a-b) 110
4. Diagram showing the order of the Nine Palaces (1343 8b) 129
5. Diagram of the altar (1288 1.1a-2a) 136
6. Nurturing the immortal embryo by untying the strings of death (1384 2a-b) 161
7. Deities of the Twenty-four Knots (1384 7a-b) 161
8. Meditating when reclining (1384 13b) 162
9. The transmission of the method (1384 14a-b) 162
10. Choreography for the Dance of the Dipper Stars (876 5b-6a) 173
11. The Jade Maiden of the jiashen period (84 9a) 174
12. Stages of the huai Feng meditation (254 7a-b) 187
13. Vision of the Dipper stars in spring (765 1a-b) 189
14. The transmission of the scriptures (765 17b) 190
15. The True Writs of the East (22 1.7b-8a) 216
16. The fu of the Western direction (671 1.6b-7a) 221
17. The Memory Palace for meditating on the Tao (325 6a-b) 226
18. Four of the Eight Superior Effulgences of the vital energies (1407 6b-8b) 232
19. The Lingbao talisman of the north (388 3.11b) 233
20. Fu of the Eight Archivists (767 3b) 264
21. Gengsang zi (669 1a) 302
22. The spatial orientation and siting of yang dwellings (282 2.1a-b) 335
23. The constellations of the Four Auxiliaries (sifu), the Six Periods (liujia), and the Gouchen pole (287 1.1a-b) 336
24. Imaginary herbs for medical meditation (932 17a-b) 342
25. The Green Dragon of the liver (432 10a) 349
26. The Red Bird, spirit of the heart (1402 3b) 351
27. The spirit of the lungs (766 12a-b) 353
28. The spirit of the spleen (YJQQ 14.9a) 360
29. The seven po-spirits (871 3a-b) 365
30. The Three Corpses (871 7a-b, 8b) 365
31. Pathogenic agents in the body (871 14a) 365
32. Man and the universe (152 15b) 402

33. The map of Man-Bird Mountain (434 5a) 422
34. Wangzi Jin descends to Tongbo shan (612 14a-b, scene 8) 425
35. Wangzi Jin descends from Heaven to reveal scriptures to Yang Xi
(612 18a-19a, scene 11) 426
36. Ritual vestments for male and female priests of different grades
(1125 5.4b, 6b) 453
37. Diagram of the altar (1212 4a-5a) 461
38. Seal for use in exorcism (1270 19b) 488
39. Visualization of the Three Pure Ones (875 21a-b) 498
40. Visualization of the gods while ascending the altar (875 21b-22b) 498
41. Vision after ten thousand recitations of the Daode jing (875 23b-24b) 499
42. How to meditate before sleeping (875 12b) 499
43. Vision after emerging from meditation at night (875 14a-b) 499
44. Visualization before ascending the chair for giving a sermon (875 18b) 499
45. Choreography for the paces of the Kongchang stars (1385 1.18b-19a) 605
46. Mandala-like diagram (1386 2b-3a) 606
47. Talisman of the Register of the Nine Phoenix Ladies (1392 3a) 607
48. Cosmic diagram showing the emblematic animals of the four quarters, the sun and the moon, with a character for dragon in the center (1392 10b) 608
49. Illustration of the Shangqing register for marshaling the dragons of the Ten Heavens (1392 7a-b) 609
50. The chariot of the final return (1392 24a-b) 609
51. The Palace of the Mysterious Elixir in the body (156 3a-b, detail) 613
52. Ascending to Heaven for an audience in midsummer (430 4a-b) 617
53. Magic swords (431 5a-6b) 618
54. Magic mirrors (429 1a-2a) 619

SUMMARY CONTENTS OF VOLUMES 2 AND 3

VOLUME 2

PART 3: The Song, Yuan, and Ming

3.A Texts in General Circulation

3.B Texts in Internal Circulation

VOLUME 3

Biographical Notices: Frequently Mentioned Taoists

Bibliography

Abbreviations

Primary Sources

Secondary Sources

About the Contributors

Indexes

Classified Title Index

Work Number Index

Pinyin Title Index

Finding List for Other Daozang Editions

General Index

PREFACE

The Daozang, or Taoist canon, is a vast collection of texts in a wide variety of genres that comprehensively define Taoism and its scriptural development through the ages. Along with revealed books, ritual texts, inspired poetry, and other religious documents, this library of the Tao contains works on subjects of broad interest to students of Chinese thought—philosophy, cosmology, medicine—as well as encyclopedic compendia, literary anthologies, and collected works of individual authors. At every turn, the Daozang holds new and significant discoveries in store that are transforming our perceptions of Chinese religion and society.

The exploration of this neglected treasure house of information has been held back by its apparent impenetrability. To some extent, this is due to the esoteric or ahistorical nature of certain Taoist writings. In large part, however, generations of scholars have come to regard the Taoist canon as inaccessible as a result of the manner by which the Daozang was assembled and organized over the centuries. As Taoism evolved through history, the Taoist canon outgrew its original rationale.

The first organizational structure, dating from the fifth century, separated the canon into three divisions named the Three Caverns. This structure and its subsequent additions relate sets of scriptures to grades of Taoist initiation. Subordinate to this system, a twelve-fold generic organization indicates the types of writings represented in each division. Beside scripture, exegesis, and ritual, we find categories comprising historical annals and lives of saints, precepts, graphic materials, and works on miscellaneous Taoist arts and techniques. The Daozang thus charts the path for an adept's initiation, while simultaneously functioning as a library for all branches of Taoist learning.

Successive editions of the Taoist canon were compiled under imperial auspices and distributed to selected temples. Clergy close to the court generally supervised the editorial work. But Taoism at no time knew a determinant ecclesiastical authority. The Taoist canon is, rather, the fruit of a prolonged negotiation. The "Repository of Taoist Scriptures of the Great Ming" (Da Ming daoze jing 大明道藏經), the basis of the work presented here, was completed in the Zhengtong reign (1436–1450), a thousand years after the fundamental organization of the Three Caverns had been laid down. It still stands as the provisional conclusion to the drawn-out process of constituting a canonized corpus for Taoism.

The Three Caverns initially served to channel a flood of new, fourth-century texts and to integrate them with existing Taoist traditions. A comparable reconfiguration of the canon took place in early modern China, beginning in the tenth century, when local medium cults generated a new upsurge of texts claiming canonization. Many of their scriptures and rituals found a place in the Daozang. At one level, therefore, the question of whether or not a work belongs in the canon reflects the give and take over the integration of distinct cults and text traditions into the liturgical system of Taoism. From the Taoist perspective, the object of this negotiation was the evolving corporate identity of Taoism in Chinese society.

The changing contents of the Daozang provide, on another level, a key to the historical self-definition of the Taoist tradition within China's religious and intellectual landscapes. Some borderline inclusions are controversial: works from several Warring States (475–221 B.C.) schools of thought were adopted alongside the Laozi 老子 and the Zhuangzi 莊子. At the other extreme, the Daozang preserves and transmits a significant number of works of Chinese popular religion from all periods. The original Three Caverns accommodated far-reaching assimilations of Buddhist thought and practices that were gaining ground in the fourth and fifth centuries. Whereas the Buddhist canon (Dazang jing 大藏經) upheld the non-Chinese origin of a work as a criterion for canonicity, the Daozang was looked upon as a bastion of Chinese indigenous tradition. Yet just as Buddhist writings of Chinese origin soon found their way into the Buddhist canon, the Daozang also incorporated Buddhist-style sutras, Tantric rituals, and hymns boasting the sanctity of Brahmanism. The history of the Taoist canon, set out in the general introduction below, can be read as a core history of Taoism itself in its continuous interaction with the rest of the Chinese religious system.

The concept “canon” is implicit in the Chinese designations jing 經, meaning “classic” or “scripture,” and zang 藏, “repository.” The fundamental Taoist scripture, Laozi's “Classic of the Way and its Power” (Daode jing 道德經), was a jing in the received canon of early Chinese philosophy. Later, the Buddhist and Taoist canons were referred to as the “aggregate scriptures” (yiqie jing 一切經) in their respective domains. The first deliberate canon formation in China, the “Five Classics” (Wujing 五經) made up of the ancient writings revered by Confucius, was undertaken in the reign of Han Wudi (140–87 B.C.) with a view to defining the values of China's emerging state orthodoxy. The Daozang, by contrast, reveals the unofficial face of China. It constitutes perhaps the richest, and still scarcely explored mine of primary sources on all aspects of the history, thought, and organization of the various strata of China's civil society that were labeled as “Taoist.” Over the past century, a growing number of specialists have discovered the rewards of investigating this unexpected virgin territory in the midst of a civilization as prestigious and well studied as China's. It is the editors' hope that the present Companion will stimulate wider circles of China scholars and nonspecialists alike to participate in this discovery.

The pioneering work of the original Tao-tsang Project is described in the general introduction. The task of shaping the inchoate materials inherited from the early research phase into the present book raised equally demanding challenges. An organization of the material on historical principles had been envisaged by Kristofer Schipper from his inception of the project. The long editorial phase, meanwhile, spanning the period 1991 to 2003, brought the benefit of new insights that enabled us to sharpen the historical focus of this Companion. The format finally adopted invites the reader to explore, for the first time, the whole of the Taoist canon in a historically meaningful chronological framework and by categories corresponding to the needs of modern scholarship.

The funding and institutional organization of the Tao-tsang Project were coordinated by the European Science Foundation. The editors wish to express their deep appreciation of the Foundation's decisive role in this multinational undertaking. At different stages, we were generously helped by the many colleagues and collaborators named in the introduction. Here I would like to acknowledge my personal debt to Mrs. Shum Wing Fong 岑詠芳 of the library of the Institut des Hautes Etudes Chinoises, Collège de France, for her painstaking assistance provided over the years. The Institute for Advanced Study of the Royal Netherlands Academy of Arts and Sciences opened its resourceful and congenial facilities to both editors to work on this project, myself as fellow-in-residence in 1996–97. Finally, I am honored to record in this place our gratitude to Mrs. Monique Cohen, curator of oriental books and manuscripts, for permission to reproduce the illustrations from the Ming edition of the Daozang in the Bibliothèque nationale de France. Our special thanks go to Mr. Alan Thomas, editorial director for humanities and sciences at the University of Chicago Press, with his expert staff, and to Professor Anthony C. Yu of the Divinity School, University of Chicago, for their unfailing support in seeing this work into print.

Franciscus Verellen

USER'S GUIDE

STRUCTURE AND CONTENT

The Companion assigns an entry to each work in the Daozang. The works are identified by their full titles and by "work numbers" in the sequential order of their original appearance in the Ming canon.

For the intents of this Companion, the works in the Ming canon are grouped here in categories based on historical principles. In the first place, all works are assigned to one of three periods: (1) Eastern Zhou to Six Dynasties; (2) Sui, Tang, and Five Dynasties; or (3) Song, Yuan, and Ming.

Within these chronological divisions, the classification follows a typological scheme that applies roughly the same structural pattern across the different periods. For each period, a first distinction is made between texts in general circulation (A), and texts in internal circulation (B). Within the category A, the texts are classified according to subject, whereas in category B the framework is determined by the orders, schools, or textual traditions to which the works belong. The principles for the grouping of the texts by major categories is further explained in the chapter and section introductions. For an overview, see the tables of contents for volumes 1 and 2 and the classified title index in volume 3. For further information on the historical and thematic arrangement of the contents of the Ming canon for the purposes of this Companion, the reader is referred to the general introduction, pp. 48–50.

In addition to the works included in the canon, a number of titles that are not or no longer found as integral entities in the Daozang form the subject of separate entries. These fall into two categories: (1) canonical works missing from the Ming canon that can be recovered among the manuscripts from Dunhuang, identified according to manuscript numbers in the respective collections Stein, Pelliot, and DX; and (2) major works that are anthologized in two collections contained within the Daozang (1032 Yunji qiqian and 263 Xiuzhen shishu) but do not feature as separate titles in the canon. These are numbered by a combination of the work and first chapter numbers of the anthology in which they occur (e.g., 263.26 Wuzhen pian denotes the edition of that work preserved in 263 Xiuzhen shishu 26–30).

The Companion can be read as a historical guide to Taoist literature or as a classified and annotated bibliography of individual works. To find the entry for an individual work, the user is referred to the indexes described below under the heading Accessory Materials.

ENTRIES

Each entry consists of a heading, an article and, if applicable, a bibliography.

Heading. Set off from the main body of the entry, the heading comprises several lines containing the following categories of bibliographic information:

1. The complete title as given at the beginning of the work
2. The length of the work in chapters (juan) or folios (fols.)
3. Attribution and date: the proper names of authors, commentators, and preface writers mentioned at the beginning of the work (information on authorship established by research in other sources is found in the main body of the article), followed by courtesy names (zi 字), styles (hao 號), and posthumous titles (shi 諡) as applicable. This is followed by the date of compilation of the work or its prefaces, if known, or the best available approximation in the form of authors' dates or historical period. Exceptionally, lacking all of these criteria, the work's placement within the chronological plan of the Companion indicates the editors' best estimation as to its date.
4. The work number according to the title concordance by Shi Zhouren [Kristofer Schipper] and Chen Yaoting, Daozang suoyin, followed by the serial number of the fascicles in parentheses (fasc.) in the Commercial Press edition of 1926. Users of the Yiwen yinshu and Xin wenfeng reprints of 1977 or the Sanjia edition of 1988 may obtain corresponding volume and page numbers from the Finding List for Other Daozang Editions in volume 3.

Article. The main body of each entry focuses on the following items: translation or paraphrase of the work's title; details of provenance, authorship, and transmission, based on factual evidence from prefaces, postfaces, colophons, or bibliographic sources; important independent editions outside the Ming Daozang; internal evidence bearing on chronological relationships and affiliations with other works in the canon; description of the nature and the purpose of the work, including a characterization or brief summary of its contents.

Bibliography. Here are included only references to studies that are exclusively or substantially concerned with the subject of the entry. References concerning points of detail appear in the text of the entry. All references are given in abbreviated form. For full details, the reader is referred to the main bibliography in volume 3.

ACCESSORY MATERIALS

In addition to the general index, the materials in volume 3 include:

Biographical notices. This section features short biographies of frequently mentioned Taoists. In the main body of the work, their names are typographically set off in small capitals (e.g., TAO HONGJING, whose biography is found in volume 3, on page 1277).

Bibliography. This is a list of the complete references to primary and secondary sources cited in abbreviated form throughout the Companion. In addition, selected titles of general interest concerning the Daozang and the historical bibliography of Taoist literature are included here.

Work indexes. The classified title index, work number index, and pinyin title index each permit the localization of a work's main entry in the Companion. The latter two indexes list in addition all cross-references to works outside their main entries. For the entries on Dunhuang manuscripts, the work indexes give the corresponding manuscript numbers in the Pelliot (P.), Stein (S.), and St. Petersburg (DX) collections in the place of Daozang work numbers.

CONTRIBUTORS

The list of contributors is found at the beginning of each volume. The authors of the entries are indicated at the end of each article. The editors have endeavored to preserve individual contributor's translations and vocabulary to the extent that demands for consistency and standardization throughout the Companion permitted. Biographical notes on the contributors are found in volume 3, followed by lists of their respective contributions identified by work number in the Daozang for articles and by section number in the Companion for introductions.

OTHER CONVENTIONS

Selected Chinese terms have been left untranslated to allow for multiple meanings in different contexts (e.g., qi) or, occasionally, for lack of a corresponding concept or satisfactory translation (e.g., zhenren, fu). As terms adopted into the English vocabulary of the Companion, these are printed in roman type.

All references to works in the Daozang, other than the title given in the main entry, are in the form of the complete or abbreviated title in pinyin romanization, preceded by the work number in italics (e.g., 690 Daode zhenjing zhu).

CONTRIBUTORS

Kristofer Schipper

Denis Allistone	Caroline Gyss-Vermande	Fabrizio Pregadio
Poul Andersen	Marc Kalinowski	Florian C. Reiter
Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein	Terry Kleeman	†Isabelle Robinet
Lidia Bonomi	Pauline Bentley Koffler	Kristofer Schipper
Alfredo Cadonna	†Kwong Hing Foon	Hans-Hermann Schmidt
Ursula-Angelika Cedzich	John Lagerwey	Nathan Sivin
Catherine Despeux	Alessandra Lavagnino	Franciscus Verellen
Adrianus Dudink	Jean Lévi	Giovanni Vitiello
Fang Ling	Jan A. M. De Meyer	Yuan Bingling
Vincent Goossaert	Christine Mollier

As soon as Zhang Yuchun received the Yongle emperor's request, he started to collect the works he deemed fit to be included. He may have found many of these works in the library of his own temple on the Longshu shan 龍書山 in Jiangxi.¹ Some works may have come from the imperial library, as for instance, the imperial commentaries of the Daxue jing 大學經 (The Book of the Way and Its Power). The Yongle edition also contained a great number of Daoist texts. The editing work took place in the palace. The works were presented to the throne, examined by the appointed officials,

1. 1462 Huang Ming renzheng shi 1: 44-5 and 1732 Daomiao shimo 28.

2. See Zhang's biography by Sun Kaixuan 孫克寬, "Mingchu daoshi Zhang Yuchun ji qi Xianquan 明初天師張宇初及其先賢墓," in Huayang shidian, 373-47. On Zhang's activity with respect to the Daomiao, see below.

3. The Longshu shan Shuangying zhongguo gong 上清宮宮廟 was rebuilt in 1366, and a revolving library for the Daomiao was installed in it. According to the Longshu shan Daomiao 龍書山道廟碑 (Chen Yuan, Daomiao wen 16, 907) by Yu Li 俞利 (1372-1381), this collection was much larger than the old one, the latter being, in all likelihood, the Zhongle daomiao 中和道廟, destroyed in 1181.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

In addition to the general index, the following are included:

Biographical notes. This section features short biographical notes on the authors of the works. In the main text, the names are typographically set out in

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

Kristofer Schipper

In the summer of 1406, ZHANG YUCHU, forty-third successor to the hereditary office of Heavenly Master, received an imperial prescript asking him to edit a complete collection of Taoist scriptures and to present them to the throne.¹ Zhang, then forty-five years old, was not only the most eminent among the Taoists of his time, but also a recognized scholar and calligrapher.² Zhu Di 朱棣 (1360–1424), who issued the prescript for this collection, had only recently become emperor. From the beginning of his reign (1403), he had ordered all the existing literature of his day to be collected and copied out, in order that it might be preserved as the Great Compendium of the Yongle Period (Yongle dadian 永樂大典). His desire to have a complete collection of Taoist books may well have been inspired by this preoccupation.

Similar Daozang 道藏 (Repositories of the Tao) had been compiled by earlier Chinese dynasties, always under the authority of the Son of Heaven himself. As such, these successive collections served not only to preserve the spiritual inheritance of Taoism, but also to define and sanction the place that Taoism occupied within the context of Chinese civilization. That the West referred to these repositories with the term canon is, therefore, well justified. Today, only the above-mentioned Ming Daozang has survived. All the earlier canons have fallen victim to the vicissitudes of Chinese history.

As soon as ZHANG YUCHU received the Yongle emperor's request, he started to collect the works he deemed fit to be included. He may have found many of these works in the library of his own temple on the Longhu shan 龍虎山 in Jiangxi.³ Some works may have come from the imperial library, as, for instance, the imperial commentaries of the Daode jing 道德經 (The Book of the Way and Its Power). The Yongle dadian also contained a great number of Taoist texts. The editing work took place in the palace. The works were presented to the throne, examined by the appointed officials,

1. 1462 Huang Ming enming shilu 3.4a–b and 1232 Daomen shigui 2a.

2. See Zhang's biography by Sun Kekuan 孫克寬, "Mingchu tianshi Zhang Yuchu ji qi Xianquan ji 明初天師張宇初及其峴泉集," in Hanyuan daolun, 313–47. On Zhang's activity with respect to the Daozang, see below.

3. The Longhu shan Shangqing zhengyi gong 上清正一宮 temple was rebuilt in 1299, and a revolving library for the Daozang was installed in it. According to the Longhu shan Daozang bei 龍虎山道藏碑 (Chen Yuan, Daojia jinshi lue, 967) by Yu Ji 虞集 (1272–1348), this collection was much larger than the old one, the latter being, in all likelihood, the Zhenghe daoza 政和道藏, destroyed in 1281.

and then either authorized to “enter into the canon” (ruzang 入藏) or discarded. It took almost forty years, until 1445, for the canon to be completed. By that time, the Yongle emperor had died and it was his successor, the Zhengtong emperor, who had the collection printed in 1447. The canon, which bore the official name Repository of Taoist Scriptures of the Great Ming (Da Ming daoze jing 大明朝藏經), was thereupon distributed to major Taoist centers, as the emperor’s gift.⁴

The Ming Daoze remains the last. The Qing dynasty (1644–1912) did not undertake any endeavor of this kind. Instead, it sought to reduce the status of Taoism in Chinese culture. The repressive measures instigated by the Manchu rulers and continued by their successors were so effective that in the 1920s only two or three copies of the Ming canon remained extant. From these copies it was luckily reprinted in 1926 by photolithographic facsimile process, allowing it to be preserved and making it available for the first time to a wider public.

The Ming canon comprises some 1,500 different works.⁵ These works vary from only a few pages to several hundreds of scrolls (juan 卷) in length.⁶ The texts vary not only in size, but also in form and subject matter. The Ming canon contains many different categories of writings. One would expect these categories to cover mostly mystical or scholastic works, but in fact these writings are in the minority. Although the philosophical texts of Laozi 老子, Zhuangzi 莊子, and others, together with their numerous commentaries, figure prominently in the Daoze, they do not amount to more than some 200 titles. Other subjects that readily come to mind when one thinks of Taoism, such as alchemy and Tending Life (yangsheng 養生) practices, including medicine and dietetics, are also represented by many hundreds of texts. Yet these texts also do not constitute the most important part of the canon, and neither do the works on cosmology and hagiography. The place of preeminence, in terms of ranking and volume, is given to liturgy. This vast category comprises the scriptures to be ritually recited, the hymns to be chanted, the memorials to be read, as well as the instructions for meditation and visualization to be performed within the framework of the Retreat (zhai 齋) and Offering (jiao 醮) services. All in all, these works account for some 800 texts, more than half of the Ming canon. As to volume, these texts take up not less than

4. See VDL 38, 46, 58.

5. The exact number of texts depends on the method of separating certain works. In this study we have 1,487, but this figure is open to revision. Some texts have separate numbers for the table of contents and for the main text. These texts should normally be assigned a single number. Others are in fact collections (congshu 叢書) and should have multiple numbering. See also below.

6. On the more or less standard length of the juan, see VDL 60–61. A juan in the Ming canon averages approximately 7,000 Chinese characters.

3,000 juan, out of a total of 4,551. Ritual is as central to the canon as it is to Taoism itself. A strong link ties scriptures to ritual in Taoist history, and this relationship has influenced the way Taoism thinks about texts, as well as about writing in general.

Scriptures are essential to the transmission of the Tao, as shown in the founding myth of Laozi, the keeper of the books, who on his departure from this world transmitted the Daode jing to the guardian of the Pass. This revelation marks, for Taoism, a beginning or a renewal, a new covenant with the Tao and with all beings. The Daode jing, like many other Taoist texts that were to follow, does not contain any personal names, place names, or dates that would allow it to be reduced to a temporal context. The message of these writings is meant to be universal, yet it is considered accessible only to those apt to receive it. As the Daode jing (chapter 41) states so forcefully: when inferior people laugh at the Tao, they prove thereby its very value; only superior people can understand it and put it into practice.

That the transmission of the Tao is a matter of initiation is clearly perceptible in the Zhuangzi. A great many of its stories concern the passage of the true Tao from master to disciple. These roles are played by a great variety of historical, semihistorical, mythical, and allegorical persons.⁷ These stories of transmission make important distinctions, between those who are apt to be initiated and those who are not,⁸ between Taoism and shamanism,⁹ between Zhou sacrificial religion and the initiates of the search for Long Life,¹⁰ between those bound by the outer values of human society and those who have chosen freedom by realizing that the entire universe is within themselves.¹¹ As a fundamental paradox, that which holds “those who love the Tao” together and founds their institutions is each person’s individual relationship to the Tao.¹²

In the hagiography of the immortals that developed along with their worship in the late Warring States (475–221 B.C.) and early Han periods (206 B.C.–A.D. 220), initiation is again a central theme. There is also growing evidence that the places of worship of a given immortal saint became organized in regional or even national networks.¹³

7. One of the main themes of the Zhuangzi is the conversion of Confucius by Taoist sages, and the conversion by Confucius of his own disciples.

8. See, for instance, the story of Nüyu 女偶 and Nanbo Zikui 南伯子葵 in chapter 6.

9. This is one of the meanings expressed in the story of Liezi 列子, his master Huzi 壺子, and the shaman in chapter 7.

10. This is a recurrent theme in stories about animals that would rather not be used for sacrifice and about ancient trees that survive because they are useless.

11. See, for instance, the dialogue between Jianwu 肩吾 and Madman Jieyu 狂接輿 in chapter 7.

12. See Schipper, “Dao yu wu 道與吾,” in Daojia wenhua yanjiu 道教文化研究 15 (1999): 399–403.

13. On the worship of Tang Gongfang, see Schipper, “Le culte de l’immortel Tang Gong

There is no evidence, as yet, that the adhesion to these communities entailed specific rites of passage. Future discoveries, especially through archaeology, may yet contribute to our knowledge in this field. After all, most of what we know from the religious associations of the ancient Mediterranean world comes from dedicatory inscriptions and tesserae.¹⁴

In the institutionalized Taoism of medieval times, adepts were initiated and ordained through the ritual of the transmission of scriptures. As we shall see, the very way in which the Taoist canon became organized bears witness to this fact. Its later division into seven parts, called the Three Caverns and the Four Supplements (sandong sifu 三洞四輔), was originally conceived to correspond to the successive stages on the way to the ultimate union with the Tao or, to put it otherwise, to establish the grades of the Taoist hierarchy. We will return to this question later. The vast majority of the books in the Daozang are those that in principle should be transmitted only within the framework of initiation and ordination. This method of transmission is a typically Taoist institution called ke 科 (literally, "classification"), and the liturgical tradition through which it is enacted is the keyi 科儀 (literally, "the ritual of classification"). The texts that are transmitted in this way can be found only in the Taoist canon or, mostly in manuscript form, in the private possession of Taoist masters who, as a rule, do not transmit them to outsiders. Before the commercial reproduction of the Ming canon of 1926, these texts were normally not available in general libraries.¹⁵ Not all works contained in the canon were, however, subject to ritually prescribed transmission. Most writings by philosophers, doctors, historians, and the like, were intended for everybody and thus circulated freely. These texts can therefore also be found outside the canon.

The distinction between books in general circulation and those whose distribution was ritually restricted is of great importance for the study of Taoist literature. In the present work these books have therefore been separated into different categories. The bibliographical problems for the two categories are not at all the same. Research on ancient catalogues and early editions, which constitute the main tools of sinological bibliography, is feasible only for those books in the Taoist canon that were in general circulation. This traditional approach based on external criteria is of little help for the identification and dating of scriptures in restricted circulation. For these texts, we developed a methodology that corresponds to what may be called "internal textual criticism." This method traces quotations and identical text passages and searches for fang," in Cultes populaires et sociétés asiatiques, ed. Alain Forest, Yoshiaki Ishizawa, and Léon Vandermeersch (Paris: L'Harmattan, 1991) 59–72.

14. See, for instance, J. T. Milik, Dédicaces faites par les dieux (Palmyre, Hatra, Tyr) et des thèses sémitiques à l'époque romaine (Beirut: Institut français d'archéologie de Beyrouth, 1972).

15. This fact is strikingly illustrated by the VDL bibliography.

datable elements such as specific names and terms and—with due precautions—the use of stylistic and linguistic criteria. These internal criteria can be used to construct relative chronologies consisting of dates terminus ante quem and terminus post quem, which then, whenever they can be linked to some clearly datable source, may be transformed into a fairly accurate absolute chronology.

Between the two categories of texts, there is some inevitable overlap: the Daode jing, always a book in general circulation, became subject to ritual transmission in the early medieval Taoist ecclesia. The Yinfu jing 陰符經, although no doubt originally intended as a text for initiates, became a work in general circulation. These instances of overlap, however, remain limited, and we may say that, by and large, the two categories are mutually exclusive. A work in general circulation normally does not even quote a work in restricted distribution, and vice versa.

The distinction between these two categories of texts is important not only for bibliographical reasons but also because of the particular nature of the works in limited circulation. It is the liturgical institution of the keyi that has regulated the transmission of Taoist writings and that has been the primary factor in setting them apart from the mainstream of Chinese literature and creating a separate canon for them. Other historical developments, such as the "parting of the Way" between Confucianism and Taoism in early imperial China, as well as the influence of Buddhism, have been equally instrumental. Many of these factors have yet to be studied in detail, and a number of questions that could be raised in this respect remain, for the time being, unanswered. Yet the enduring presence and virtually uninterrupted development of an independent Taoist canon is a fact of such magnitude and importance within the general context of Chinese culture that we have to make an attempt to explain how this canon came about, even if the account we can give here is necessarily tentative and incomplete.

THE HISTORY OF THE TAOIST CANON BEFORE THE MING DYNASTY

Many questions related to the origins of what we now call Taoism—the search for personal salvation and the lore of the transcendent xian 仙 (immortals); the exact nature of the Huang-Lao 黃老 (Huangdi and Laozi) persuasion of the Warring States; the fangshi 方士 religion of the early imperial period—remain basically unanswered. For all we know, these forms of thought and practice, which evoke the mystery religions of ancient Greece and the Hellenistic world, did not originally constitute a separate entity within Chinese society, although the ritual practice of adepts may well have been distinct from the public religion of the Zhou dynasty and its blood sacrifices. In the "Tianxia 天下" chapter of the Zhuangzi, which presumably dates from the late Warring States period and contains a survey of different schools, the term daoshu 道

術 (the arts of the Tao) is used not just for the thought of Laozi, but for all schools. The teachings of Lao Dan 老聃 (Old Long Ears) and his disciple Yin Xi 尹喜, the guardian of the Pass, are singled out as representing the most mystical of all ways of thought and are listed alongside other teachings, including those of the Confucians (Rujia 儒家).

The term Daojia 道家 itself does not occur in pre-imperial times for any school of thought then current, like Mojia 墨家, Fajia 法家, and so on. We encounter it only at the time of Han Wudi (r. 140–87 B.C.). Its appearance coincides with the emergence of the new syncretistic Confucianism as the imperial orthodoxy. It should be noted that the term Huang-Lao, which until then was generally used in the context of the mysteries of Laozi and the worship of the immortals, tends to disappear at about the same time that the term Daojia appears, and it may be that the latter was intended to replace the former. In Taoist literature from the Han period until the Tang (618–907), however, the term Huang-Lao continues to occur frequently in all kinds of contexts. More research needs to be done on this question.

Sima Qian 司馬遷 (145–86 B.C.) uses the term Daojia in his biography of Laozi.¹⁶ He stresses the mystical and esoteric nature of the teachings of the Old Master but does not give any information on any institutions of the “school” (literally, “family”) of the Tao. As for Liu Xin’s 劉歆 Qiliu 七略, the earliest bibliography in Chinese history (6 B.C.), it also lists the Daojia philosophical works alongside those of other schools as a part of the literature of the time, without giving to Taoist texts any special status.

Many misunderstandings persist concerning the term Daojia, and this may be a good place to attempt a clarification. It has become a sinological dogma to distinguish between the so-called Taoist school (Daojia 道家), said to have produced the classical mystical texts (although the term, as we have seen, occurs only later), and the so-called Taoist religion (Daojiao 道教), often said to have begun in the Later Han period. The successive Daozang never made this distinction. When we look at the way the terms Daojia and Daojiao occur in the texts preserved in the Ming canon, we see that they are practically synonymous and interchangeable. There are instances when philosophical texts are considered part of Daojiao and when religious movements—for example, the ecclesia of the Heavenly Master (Tianshi dao 天師道) of the Later Han period—call themselves Daojia. The distinction between Daojia and Daojiao that we find today in sinological literature did not originate within Taoism itself and cannot be related to the difference between texts in general and texts in restricted circulation. The distinction originated with outsiders¹⁷ and is flawed by the erroneous assumption that jia

16. Shiji 63. The mythological antecedents of Sima Qian’s narrative are clear.

17. The theory was propagated by Zhu Xi 朱熹 (1130–1200). See his “Lun daojiao 論道教,” Zhuzi yulei 125.3005.

necessarily means “philosophy” and jiao, “religion.” The distinction has no taxonomic value and serves no other purpose than to divide Taoism into an acceptable and a disdained form—to fundamentalist Confucians. It is therefore tainted by prejudice. Every religion has the right to define itself without outside interference, and Taoism should be no exception. As long as Taoism itself does not distinguish between the Daojia and Daojiao, and moreover considers that its mystical thought and its liturgical practice belong together, we should follow suit. That Taoism did evolve in time and that new forms did appear is only natural. It is to this historical dimension that we now return.

Wang Chong’s Daozang

According to our present state of knowledge, it does not seem that in ancient China the teachings of Lao Dan and the tenets of the Huang-Lao persuasion were in some way marginalized and their followers given a place apart in society. Only in the Later Han period do we find forms of polarization and separation, which appear in the context of the emergence of syncretistic Confucianism as the dominating orthodoxy. Later Han Confucianism successfully absorbed and integrated all other ways of thought—such as that of the Mohists, the Legalists, and the Cosmologists—with the exception of Taoism. That the new imperial orthodoxy borrowed much from Taoism is well known, yet the Confucian search for universal legitimacy is one of the major factors in its own hostile stand toward, and therefore gradual estrangement from, the living religion of its times.

This growing Confucian partisanship is noticeable in the Lunheng 論衡 of Wang Chong 王充 (27–ca. 100). Much of the argumentation of the Lunheng centers on the questions whether the supernatural existed and whether the beliefs current at the time had any value. Wang Chong’s aim is to distinguish Confucianism from the beliefs and practices of the fangshi 方士 and daoren 道人, which he assimilates explicitly with Daojia. Nowhere is this assimilation clearer than in chapter 24 of the Lunheng, on “The Spuriousness of the Tao” (daoxu 道虛). Wang begins by quoting “the works of the literati” (rushu 儒書) that contain stories about Long Life and immortality that are completely irrational and do not agree with the tenets of Confucianism but belong to the teachings of Taoism. He criticizes the search for salvation through physical practices and alchemy and declares that the Way of Lao Dan for transcending the world is unworthy of credence.¹⁸ Wang Chong wishes to remove everything related to Daojia from the true Confucian tradition as he understands it, which suggests that at the time the two traditions were still intimately intertwined and that Wang Chong wanted them separated.

18. Lunheng 7.313–38.

That is not to say, however, that Wang Chong wished to do away with Taoism altogether and exclude it from the culture of scholars. During the Later Han period, the palace library was situated in a building called the Eastern Belvedere (Dongguan 東觀). Tradition had it that this building once housed Laozi, when he was keeper of the archives (zhuxia shi 柱下史) under the Zhou. Hence the place was sometimes called "Mr. Lao's library" or "The Mount Penglai [i.e., paradise] of the Daojia."¹⁹ Wang Chong concurs by saying that although the post of librarian was a minor one, this library was nevertheless a state-sponsored Taoist repository (dianguo Daozang 典國道藏) and was useful to allow superior scholars (tongren 通人) to acquaint themselves with it.²⁰ Here we have, to my knowledge, the first occurrence of the term Daozang in Chinese literature. Moreover, the definition given here to the expression resembles that of the Daozang of later times: a repository of books that, while part of Chinese culture as a whole and placed under the aegis of the state, nevertheless belonged to a special domain and formed a separate body of literature.

Ge Hong's Catalogue of Taoist Books

The Baopu zi neipian 抱朴子內篇 of GE HONG (283–343), and its ardent plea that the search for immortality of the Daojia be taken seriously, must be seen in the context of the above-mentioned Confucian and Taoist controversy. Ge describes his work as "speaking of things like divine immortals and their drugs, demonic beings and their tricks, Tending Life and longevity, expelling evil and averting calamities; it [therefore] belongs to Daojia."²¹ Although Ge's treatise postdates the institutionalization of the Tianshi dao, it is based on a form of Taoism that is in fact more ancient.²² When he wrote it in the years around 310, the Tianshi dao had not yet penetrated, it seems, to southern China where Ge lived. The practices Ge describes in such great detail are in fact closer to the Han Taoism criticized by Wang Chong, whose Lunheng Ge had read.²³ GE HONG's arguments in favor of the Taoist search for immortality mainly through alchemy are very much directed at countering skeptics like Wang and his followers.

GE HONG devotes a whole chapter (19) of his book to the bibliography of Taoism as he knew it. As for the books listed in his catalogue, Ge claims that his master, ZHENG YIN, had originally obtained them from Ge's own ancestor GE XUAN (traditional dates, 164–244). The bibliography lists approximately 300 different works

19. See Schipper, "Le monachisme taoïste."

20. Lunheng 13.604–5.

21. 1187 Baopu zi waipian 50.3a.

22. This point has been made by Strickmann in "The Mao Shan revelations," 135.

23. See 1187 Baopu zi waipian 43.4b.

amounting to some 670 juan. In addition to these works, Ge lists some fifty-five talismans or collections of talismans. How many of these he had actually copied or knew only by title remains uncertain.

GE HONG's list is the first extant catalogue exclusively devoted to Taoist books. Yet it would seem that it did not result from the wish to create a canon but proceeded from the opposition between Taoism and Confucianism. Ge's other work, the Baopu zi waipian 抱朴子外篇, is entirely devoted to Confucianism. As regards the ritual transmission of the Taoist texts, Ge gives us some important details. Apart from emphasizing time and again that they should be given only to those who are worthy, Ge tells us, for instance, that his master ZHENG YIN said to him:

Among the Taoist books, none are more important than the Inner Writs of the Three Sovereigns and the Image of the True Form of the Five Sacred Peaks.²⁴ The immortal officials and superior persons of old treasured their methods; those who did not have their names inscribed among the immortals were unable to obtain them. They can be transmitted only once in forty years, and at the moment of the transmission, after having daubed one's lips with [sacrificial] blood, an oath [of secrecy] should be sworn and pledges given for the covenant.²⁵

There are a number of similar passages in the Baopu zi neipian, some giving concrete information about the kind of pledges to be offered, the oaths to be proffered, and so on. They constitute the first references we have of what may have been a much older ritual tradition of initiation.²⁶ However, while publishing a catalogue of Taoist books, GE HONG did not yet make distinctions among these texts as to which were "canonical" and which were not. In fact, concerning the many handbooks and methods for meditation, GE HONG writes that there were thousands of different kinds, "yet all have their efficacy!"²⁷

The Canon of the Early Taoist Ecclesia (Zhengyi fawen 正一法文)

In the preceding paragraphs, we have seen that it was the Han Confucian rejection of Taoism that provoked the separation between the two traditions. Taoism did, however, also have a natural tendency to exclusiveness owing to the esoteric nature of its initiation, and this tendency certainly was reinforced by its relationship to Confucianism. One of the cornerstones of the Tianshi dao is the rejection of the worship of the

24. On these texts, see Schipper, "Gogaku shinkei zu."

25. BPZ 19.308.

26. On the ritual for transmission of these texts, see Dunhuang manuscripts Stein 3750 and Pelliot 2559 and 1281 Wuyue zhenxing xulun.

27. BPZ 18.297.

Six Heavens (liutian 六天), a term that, in Han Confucianism, denoted the pantheon of saints and gods of the state religion. These figures were branded as abominable demons, filthy and treacherous powers, whose reign had come to an end with the new covenant that Lord Lao 老君 had made with his vicar on earth, Zhang Daoling 張道陵, in A.D. 142.²⁸ The proscription of Confucian divination text and their related practices is documented in the early set of precepts for libationers, the Taishang Laojun yibai bashi jie 太上老君一百八十戒.²⁹ Also within Taoist literature, certain distinctions appear between books that adepts should read and those they should not. The Rules Governing the Family of the Tao (Dadao jialing jie 大道家令戒, in 789 Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie kejing, a document that can be dated A.D. 255), has the Heavenly Master say to his followers:

None of you, who should apply yourselves entirely to what is good, accept the words of the scriptures. Instead you transmit to one another what is heterodox; you are familiar with falsehoods and reject the truth. I formerly made a list of unprincipled and heterodox writings, and ordered them all to be destroyed. But the libationers lacked [moral] strength, and hid these writings in secret places, so that they continue to exist until the present day. The students of these latter days revel in superficial words; they point to the false and call it true. All this contravenes the interdictions of Heaven. Those who do this shall suffer and never obtain grace.³⁰

The scriptures that were transmitted within the Tianshi dao were, as far as we know, the Daode jing and the Taiping jing 太平經. The ecclesia also had its own writings. These writings appear to have been, for the most part, purely ritual in nature and linked to the initiation of the members of the communities, at different stages in their life.³¹ These writings consisted mainly of cosmic diagrams and signs (tu 圖, fu 符) symbolizing divine powers.³² The graphic representations were accompanied by texts that identified the transcendent powers, giving their names and sometimes their appearance, in order to guide the adept in invoking them mentally. These documents were called registers (lu 錄), and the sacred texts thus transmitted were called tulu 圖錄 or fulu 符錄. To these texts could be added the ritual for transmission, the rules to be observed by the adepts who received the text, the story of its origins, its transmission, and its efficacy. Other materials, such as instructions for meditation, rules to be observed, and models for the petitions (zhang 章) to be presented to the divine agents, 28. See the introduction to part I.B.1.

29. Preserved in 786 Taishang laojun jinglü (third century?).

30. Dadao jialing jie 17a.

31. See Schipper, "Taoist ordination ranks."

32. Such as the above-mentioned Wuyue zhenxing tu.

could also be added. So, from the core of the cosmic diagrams or the revealed text whole scriptures developed, which, for the Taoists, retained the sacred quality of a lu. As mentioned, the Tianshi dao used and transmitted not only its own holy writings of the One and Orthodox Covenant with the Powers (zhengyi mengwei 正一盟威), but also the Daode jing. This fundamental book of Taoism had been made into the Text in Five Thousand Characters, giving it the status of a cosmic writing expanded from the symbolic number five.

The early Heavenly Master ecclesia united its own texts under the title of Zhengyi fawen 正一法文 (Statutory Texts of the One and Orthodox [Ecclesia]). When exactly this unification took place we do not know, but it is certain that this Heavenly Master canon existed in the Six Dynasties period, because a text from the Zhengyi fawen is quoted in the Wushang biyao 無上秘要 (ca. 563).³³ It is thought that the Zhengyi fawen at one time counted no less than 100 different texts. As shown by the status given to the Zhengyi Statutory Texts in the later Daozang, this collection represents the core liturgical tradition of Taoism.

The Books of the Three Caverns (Sandong jing 三洞經)

Many of the prominent families that fled from the north to South China following the invasions of the nomadic Central Asian peoples in the early fourth century belonged to the ecclesia of the Heavenly Master.³⁴ These families spread the new form of liturgical Taoism also in the south, where, as we have seen, it was still unknown to GE HONG a few decades earlier. That this endeavor was successful is borne out by the fact that the aristocratic Xu 許 family of Jiankang 建康 (Nanjing), the main recipient of the revelation of the Shangqing 上清 scriptures by YANG XI, around 360 adhered to the Tianshi dao. As to the legendary matriarch who was at the origin of the Shangqing revelation, WEI HUACUN, she was reputed to have been a libationer (jijin 祭酒) of the Heavenly Master ecclesia. Moreover, the liturgical Lingbao scriptures that were revealed a quarter of a century later to GE HONG's grandnephew GE CHAOFU contain many elements from the rituals of the Way of the Heavenly Master.³⁵ As for LU XIUJING (406–477), who made the first inventory of the canonical scriptures of the Three Caverns (see below), we know from his writings that he belonged to the Tianshi dao.³⁶

At the same time, these scions of aristocratic families in the south were heirs to the 33. WSBY 46.16b–18a.

34. See Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao Chan, 34ff.

35. Such as the rites for the consecration of the incense burner and the presentation of memorials, etc.

36. See 1127 Lu xiansheng daomen keliu.

no doubt older and perhaps more refined Taoism of the “arts of immortality” transmitted by GE HONG. It may well be that this xian Taoism was at first rejected by the new masters who came from the north.³⁷ If that is so, this old form of Taoism may have experienced some kind of rehabilitation through the new revelations.

Best known are the texts of the Shangqing jing 上清經 revealed to YANG XI in the years 364–370.³⁸ They amount to some forty complete books and many fragments that were collected into such famous compilations as the Zhen’gao 真誥. Also important and most influential are the texts of the Lingbao jing 靈寶經, received by GE HONG’s grandnephew GE CHAOFU around 400.³⁹ Soon YANG XI and GE CHAOFU found many epigones who added similar works to those they had received, thus greatly increasing the stock of newly revealed texts. It is in this corpus that the hypothesis of the “rehabilitation” of southern Taoism is most easily verified. It has been shown that many Shangqing and Lingbao scriptures were inspired by books that were mentioned by GE HONG.⁴⁰ Most of these scriptures, especially the Shangqing, were beautifully written, in contrast to the texts of the Zhengyi fawen. As a result, they have exerted a great influence on Six Dynasties and Tang literature. They were also given a prominent place in the Taoist canon.

The wave of revelations was by no means limited to these famous works. Other works of a different kind but certainly no less important had appeared at the turn of the century in the Jiangnan area. These works were, in the first place, the Dongyuan shenzhou jing 洞淵神咒經⁴¹ and the similarly influential but now partly lost Shengxuan neijiao jing 昇玄內教經. The Dongyuan shenzhou jing is a vast apocalyptic prophecy anchored solidly in the Heavenly Master tradition. Here the charisma of the newly revealed books is expressed most explicitly. The newly revealed books are called the Scriptures of the Three Caverns (Sandong jing 三洞經), or often simply The Three Caverns. These texts, the Dongyuan shenzhou jing says, “circulate from now on; all true adepts receive them” (2.4b), in the Middle Kingdom (7.1a). These texts were to be kept and recited in the dioceses (zhi 治) so that the people could be healed and protected against the onslaught of the demon armies that would come to exterminate evil persons in this world. The Scriptures of the Three Caverns comprise the Shangqing, the Lingbao, and the Sanmei 三昧 (i.e., samādhi) scriptures, the latter being a different name for the Dongyuan shenzhou jing itself (see 5.4a and 8b).

37. See Strickman, “The Mao Shan revelations,” 131–39.

38. See the introduction to part 1.B.2.

39. See the introduction to part 1.B.3.

40. See Bokenkamp, “Sources of the Ling-pao scriptures,” and Schipper, introduction to Concordance du Houang-t’ing king.

41. At least the original ten juan. See Mollier, Une apocalypse taoïste.

From the term Sanmei, as well as from many other textual elements, both in the Lingbao and in the Dongyuan texts, Buddhist influences are manifest.⁴² Ōfuchi has rightly pointed out that the period of the revelation of these new scriptures coincides with that of the massive introduction and translation of Buddhist texts in North China, notably by such scholars as Kumārajīva (350–409).⁴³ Like the Buddhist sūtra, the Sandong scriptures were supposed to come “from the West.” At that time, many Chinese considered Buddhism to be a foreign form of Taoism, and there was a belief that the Buddhist texts introduced by the śramaṇa had been originally written by Laozi after his departure for the West.⁴⁴ When these texts were instead found to be quite different and not Taoist at all, and were claimed by the Buddhists as their own, a “nativist” reaction ensued, resulting in the creation of a comparable Taoist literature of true scriptures (zhenjing 真經). As for the methods by which this was effected, we know that trance techniques played an important role.

Ōfuchi has also shown that, contrary to a commonly held view, the term sandong 三洞 (Three Caverns) did not derive from the Buddhist Tripitaka (three receptacles), but had quite a different signification. The concept was in the first place cosmological. One of the most important and influential definitions of sandong occurs in an early Lingbao text.⁴⁵ It starts out by describing the cosmic eras that preceded our present world and that were governed in succession by the Three Treasures: Tianbao 天寶, Lingbao 靈寶, and Shenbao 神寶. These treasures represented the Three Primordial qi (pneumata). They originated in the Three Caverns and the Three Pure Ones (sangqing 三清). From this fundamental triad, the whole universe (the ten thousand beings) was created.⁴⁶ Here, then, we see that the Three Caverns correspond to the primordial chaos that engendered the three original pneumata.⁴⁷ The idea that writing appeared spontaneously with the creation of the universe as the beginning of all phenomena is a traditional Taoist belief. It was further elaborated in the Lingbao scriptures. These primordial characters were considered to be the True Writs (zhenwen 真文), and their manifestation at the beginning of time is recalled until today, each time a Taoist ritual area is installed:

42. See Zürcher, “Buddhist influence on early Taoism.” Buddhist influence is remarkably absent in the Shangqing jing.

43. Ōfuchi Ninji, “The formation of the Taoist canon,” 253–57.

44. We cannot enter into the important issue of the “conversion of the barbarians” (huahu 化胡) controversy here. See Zürcher, The Buddhist conquest of China, 288–320.

45. 318 Dongxuan lingbao ziran jiutian shengshen zhangjing 1a.

46. Ōfuchi’s conclusion that the Three Caverns were assimilated with the Three Vehicles of Buddhism is based on sources of a later date (see below).

47. On this cosmogony, see the introduction to part 1.B.1.

The True Writings,
 Heavenly treasures in vermilion writing on jade tablets,
 Were born before the Original Beginning,
 In the middle of the Void Caverns.
 The universe had not yet taken root,
 Sun and moon did not yet shed their radiance.
 Obscure! Dark!
 No originator!
 No lineage!
 When the marvelous writings appeared, they gathered and mingled,
 Now present, now absent.
 Yin and yang nurtured them into distinctness,
 The great yang assisted them in obtaining brightness.⁴⁸

The appearance of all these new texts during the fourth and fifth centuries was a major turning point in the history of Taoism. The nature of the writings is complex. On the one hand, the fact that they are all, or nearly all, of mediumistic origin may reduce their importance in our eyes. However, once we study them carefully, we see that they combine different and sometimes contradictory elements: the old Taoism of the south with the liturgical institutions of the Tianshi dao from the north; the doctrines of Buddhism that conquered China during that time and the most traditional and ancient cosmology of China proper. In elaborating this multiple synthesis, the books of the Three Caverns recentered Taoism and at the same time created the conditions for the development of its canon.

Lu Xiuji and the Canon of the Three Caverns

LU XIUJING served as Taoist master at the court of the Liu-Song dynasty (420–479). In 437 he presented, at the request of the emperor, a list of “genuine” Taoist scriptures.⁴⁹ Indeed, since the appearance of the new texts, not only the true heirs to the legacy of GE HONG had “received” holy texts, but many others as well. Hence the necessity that someone knowledgeable and of undisputed religious authority establish an inventory of scriptures to be considered as canonical. This Catalogue of the Scriptures of the Three Caverns (Sandong jing mulu 三洞經目錄) comprised, apart from the above-mentioned Shangqing and Lingbao texts, also a book, or more probably a set of talismans, called the Writ of the Three Sovereigns (Sanhuang wen 三皇文). This document, originally the pride of the library of GE HONG (see above), had been

48. Lingbao ritual for the consecration of the altar. See Schipper, The Taoist body, 87ff.

49. This is the date of the preface to the Catalogue of Lingbao Scriptures (Lingbao jingmu 靈寶經目序), preserved in YJQQ 4.4a–6a.

“rediscovered” by BAO JING (260–330?) during the Yuankang era (291–299) of the Jin dynasty in a cave on the Song shan 嵩山. BAO JING was the governor of Nanhai 南海 (modern Canton), as well as GE HONG’s father-in-law.⁵⁰ He was also the master of the famous hermit XU MAI, the elder brother of XU MI, the main recipient of the Shangqing jing. Thus, BAO JING’s “discovery” of a “new” version of the Sanhuang wen may in several respects be considered the forerunner of the wave of “revealed” rewriting of ancient texts that produced the Shangqing and Lingbao scriptures. This is the reason LU XIUJING attributed one of the divisions of his Catalogue of the Three Caverns to BAO JING’s scripture. The catalogue therefore looked like this:

1. Dongzhen 洞真 (the Cavern [Penetrating] Truth),⁵¹ containing the texts of the Shangqing jing.
2. Dongxuan 洞玄 (the Cavern [Penetrating] Mystery), containing the texts of the Lingbao jing.
3. Dongshen 洞神 (the Cavern [Penetrating] Divinity), containing the texts of the Sanhuang wen.

How many works were listed in each category is not entirely clear. According to the extant fragments of Lu’s catalogue, the Dongzhen division comprised thirty-four works totaling forty-one juan, and the Dongxuan division twenty-seven works, possibly with later additions by Lu’s disciple and successor SONG WENMING (ca. 550).⁵² As for the Dongshen division, it appears to have been quite small, comprising only four scrolls (juan) of what must have been essentially talismans and invocations.

More important, however, is the fact that in LU XIUJING’s scheme, each of the primordial caverns is associated with the revelation not just of cosmic writings but of a particular group of texts. Each of these groups, moreover, had not only, as we have seen, its particular history, but also its own characteristics.

The Shangqing texts concern almost exclusively Tending Life techniques, including meditation, visualization, and (spiritual) alchemy. The practices they contain were intended to be performed by the individual adept, as the highest and purest form of self-cultivation, in the search of immortality.

The Lingbao texts were meant to be recited in a liturgical context. They are linked to the Retreat (zhai 齋) and Offering (jiao 醮) rituals and contain many instructions for the performance of these essentially collective religious services.

50. See the introduction to part I.B.4. This story is independent from the tradition represented by GE HONG, so there is no reason to suppose that the Sanhuang jing mentioned by him (see above) is the same text as that “discovered” by BAO JING.

51. In Taoist scholarship, the concept of dong, cavern, is defined as tong 通, “to penetrate.” See Daomen dalun 道門大論 in YJQQ 6.1a.

52. See Ōfuchi Ninji, “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” and Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 222ff.

The Dongshen writings were used for "calling upon the gods of Heaven and Earth and making them obey one's orders. Their efficacy is fathomless; hence they were given the name of shen (god, divine)."⁵³

In other words, the first division is concerned with the individual's search for the ultimate truth (zhen 真), the second with the mystery (xuan 玄) of Taoist liturgy, and the third is dedicated to intercourse with the gods (shen 神) as practiced by groups united in the worship of a particular deity. The texts that compose this part of the canon bear this out. They contain not only talismans and spells, but also divination techniques for predicting the future, at all times an important aspect of these cults. Indeed, the Three Sovereigns, to whom the third (or Dongshen) division was devoted, were the most important deities of ancient China, and their veneration was widespread even in the imperial period. As such they stand here for all these forms of veneration, such as, for instance, the worship of the Five Sacred Peaks (wuyue 五嶽).

LU XIUJING's categorization goes much beyond a mere bibliographical classification. It aims at bringing together in one coherent structure the three main aspects of any religious tradition: (1) the individual mystical search for transcendence, (2) the liturgical celebration of the mystery, and (3) the worship of the deities, saints, and ancestors. LU XIUJING's categorization provides a scriptural legitimization for each of these. If we compare this canon with those of other great religious traditions, we readily see that few of them have accomplished such a perfect integration. LU XIUJING's three-tiered canon is a work of genius that allowed Taoism to develop and remain a single tradition. Its multiple forms of practice did not result in any schisms. Its great flexibility enabled it to survive many persecutions.

Yet LU XIUJING did not include all the newly revealed scriptures of his time. As we have seen, he left out the apocalypse of the Taishang dongyuan shenzhou jing and other major texts. A reason for these omissions is suggested by the fact that all the works he did include were in some way or another linked to the texts of GE HONG's bibliography. In this way, through the filiation with this undisputed patriarch of southern Taoism, Lu established the canonicity of the new revelations.

Other texts not included in LU XIUJING's catalogue are those of the Heavenly Master ecclesia. These texts were not excluded because Lu considered them uncanonical, but, on the contrary, because the Tianshi dao, to which Lu himself belonged, already had its Zhengyi fawen.⁵⁴ Later, when the successors of LU XIUJING compiled a new canon, including not only the newly revealed texts classified according to the Three Caverns system but also the older groups of texts, they gave the Zhengyi scriptures of the Heavenly Masters the seventh division. As the last, and uneven, division, it served as the single and universal foundation of the entire structure.

53. Preface to the Three Caverns, in YJQQ 6.1b: 洞神者召敕鬼神, 其功不測, 故得名神。

54. Compare Ōfuchi Ninji, "The formation of the Taoist canon," 265.

The Seven Parts

In the course of several centuries during the early middle ages, North and South China underwent quite separate developments. As we have seen, only in the fourth century did the Tianshi dao penetrate to the south. As for the newly revealed scriptures of the Three Caverns, there is no evidence that they became known in North China before the sixth century. Yet, in an ironical shift in ideology, the north, which had been forcibly converted to state Buddhism in the early phase of the period of division (fourth century), turned to Taoism in the middle of the fifth century, right at the time LU XIUJING compiled his Sandong jing mulu.⁵⁵ Thereafter, in the south it was Buddhism that in turn established itself among the higher strata of society, which led to the first official persecution of Taoism, during the Liang dynasty (502–557).

In the later half of the sixth century, the Northern Zhou dynasty (561–580) began its drive for the unification of the empire. Searching for a faith that would assist him in this ambition, Emperor Wu ultimately chose a form of state Taoism. Around 574, against a background of anti-Buddhist measures, the emperor founded an academy, named Tongdao guan 通道觀, purportedly for the study of the Three Religions (sanjiao 三教) in order to show the fundamental unity of all doctrines, old and new. For the first time, the equality of the Three Religions became official policy.⁵⁶ Such a policy agreed with Taoism.⁵⁷ The daoshi of the Tongdao guan, under the direction of WANG YAN (d. 604), were asked to make a critical appraisal of all Taoist texts. At the same time, a vast summa theologica of Taoism was compiled with the title of Wushang biyao in one hundred juan.⁵⁸ It mainly consists of citations taken from the Sandong scriptures as codified by LU XIUJING. It also refers to the Daode jing, the Zhengyi canon, and the Shengxuan neijiao jing. There are four degrees of initiation and transmission: (1) the Daode jing, (2) the Sanhuang jing, (3) the Lingbao jing, and (4) the Shangqing jing, the last three stages being those of the Three Caverns of LU XIUJING. The Zhengyi ordination degrees are notably absent from this scheme, probably, as 55. This is related to the famous patriarch KOU QIANZHI (365–448). See 78s Laojun yinsong jiejing.

56. See Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 10–13. There is much confusion surrounding this episode in Chinese history, making it difficult to give a more circumstantial account here.

57. Taoism formerly maintained that Confucius was Laozi's disciple, and the Buddha the latter's avatar. Hence the Three Religions had a common origin in Laozi.

58. The WSBY and the history of its compilation are studied in detail in Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao.

Lagerwey has pointed out, for political reasons.⁵⁹ There is as yet no trace of any other ordination degree or classification system.

The work of collecting and collating the texts continued after the fall of the Zhou under the Sui dynasty. The name of the Tongdao guan was changed into Xuandu guan 玄都觀. A manuscript of the Laozi bianhua jing 老子變化經 discovered at Dunhuang has a colophon indicating that it was copied in 612 under the supervision of a master of the Xuandu guan, in order to be included in the imperial library.⁶⁰ This work must have been part of the general editorial effort undertaken at the Xuandu guan. Moreover, this evidence shows that the work by WANG YAN and his colleagues was no longer limited to the scriptures of the Three Caverns and the Zhengyi canon, but had been extended to encompass such works as this popular text from the Later Han period. The editors treated the primitive messianic text with much respect, as all ancient and corrupt characters were copied verbatim.

According to the Buddhist polemical work Xiaodao lun 笑道論, by Zhen Luan 甄鸞, which was presented to the court in 570, the Taoists of the Xuandu guan produced a catalogue of the texts they had copied and edited. The entire collection amounted to 2,040 juan made from 40,000 sheets of paper.⁶¹

We have seen that WANG YAN and his colleagues pursued their work under the Northern Zhou in an imperial foundation called the Tongdao guan 通道觀 and that this foundation was perpetuated by the Sui dynasty after the fall of the Northern Zhou (in 581), when the Tongdao guan was renamed Xuandu guan. At some time, perhaps during the Sui, Wang produced a new catalogue of the collection he had assembled, called Sandong zhunang 三洞珠囊, in seven juan.⁶² This catalogue is reputed to have listed all Taoist works and books by the classical philosophers, but we do not know how many juan it comprised.⁶³

We may speculate on the possibility that WANG YAN's catalogue was divided into seven parts because it had seven juan, but there is no proof of this. The first time we find reliable evidence of the way the enlarged canon was organized is in a work named The Order of Succession of The Taoist Scriptural Legacy (1128 Daomen jingfa xiangcheng cixu), written by the patriarch PAN SHIZHENG around 680. After having

59. See Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 32 and passim.

60. See Seidel, La divinisation de Lao Tseu, 59–60, and Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Moku-rokuhen, 325.

61. Xiaodao lun in Guang hongming ji 9. See also the discussion in CGF 108–9.

62. Now lost. To be distinguished from the encyclopedia SDZN.

63. See CGF 108. Chen's reconstruction, stating that the entire collection amounted to 8,030 juan, is confusing, and more so because titles of scriptures "not yet revealed" (weichu 未出) but still hidden in the Three Caverns were included in the catalogues.

introduced the cosmogony and the spontaneous birth of the primordial scriptures, he says:

The first, the Cavern [Penetrating] Truth, is the Great Vehicle; the second, the Cavern [Penetrating] Mystery, is the Middle Vehicle; the third, the Cavern [Penetrating] Divinity, is the Lesser Vehicle. From all of the Three Caverns came the Seven Parts: as Dongzhen, Dongxuan, and Dongshen [are the Three Caverns], so Taixuan 太玄, Taiping 太平, and Taiqing 太清 contain the auxiliary scriptures (fujing 輔經). Taixuan is auxiliary to Dongzhen, Taiping to Dongxuan, and Taiqing to Dongshen. The Three Auxiliaries together with [the Three Caverns] form the Thirty-six Divisions (sanshiliu bu 三十六部).⁶⁴ The Zhengyi [One and Orthodox] Covenant with the Powers (mengwei 盟威) is pertinent to all [the canon]. Together, [all these divisions] form the Seven Parts.⁶⁵

Thus, at some time during the Sui or the beginning of the Tang, the two canons, the Zhengyi fawen of the Tianshi dao and the Sandong jing of LU XIUJING, were brought together. All the surviving ancient texts were also brought into the Daozang, and these were given the status of "auxiliary scriptures." This expression should be qualified. The word fu 輔 literally means "support pole," but the expression "four supports" has the special meaning of the four ministers of state who surround the supreme ruler.⁶⁶

The contents of these "auxiliaries" were as follows:

- the Taixuan bu 太玄部, being the highest class, contained the Daode jing, its commentaries, and the works of later Taoist philosophers
- the Taiping bu 太平部 was made up by the only recently "rediscovered" Taiping jing in 170 juan)
- the Taiqing bu 太清部 preserved all the old literature on alchemy, physical exercises, and other Tending Life techniques, these being considered the Lesser Vehicle of Taoism
- the seventh division of the Zhengyi bu 正一部 contained the Zhengyi fawen, (Statutory Texts of the One and Orthodox [Ecclesia]). These, during the Tang, amounted to 100 juan. The texts of the Heavenly Master ecclesia, "founded on the Daode [jing], supportive of the Three Caverns, and encompassing the Three Vehicles,"⁶⁷ were considered to be relevant (tongguan 通貫) to the teachings of the six other divisions.

64. On the Thirty-six Divisions, see Chen Guofu (CGF 252–57).

65. 1128 Daomen jingfa xiangcheng cixu 1.1b–2a.

66. This meaning also has a precedent in Taoism, where the Three Officials are supported by Four Ministers. See 1016 Zhen'gao 19.12b: Sanguan sifu 三官四輔.

67. Zhengyi jingtu kejie pin 正一經圖科戒品, in 1129 Daojiao yishu 2. 11a–b.

The evidence that these seven divisions had the contents mentioned here can still be deduced from the arrangement of 1430 Daozang quejing mulu (q.v.).

Much information about the initial composition of the Seven Parts, and especially, the Four Supplements can be obtained from a cluster of related handbooks, called either Daomen dalun 道門大論,⁶⁸ Xuanmen [da] lun 玄門[大]論,⁶⁹ [Dongxuan lingbao] Xuanmen dayi [洞玄靈寶] 玄門大義,⁷⁰ or Daojiao yishu 道教義樞.⁷¹ All of these texts are interrelated and date from the early Tang, around 700. All quote, or are attributed to, a certain Master Meng (Meng fashi 孟法師), who, in one instance, is identified as MENG ANPAI, a well-known court Taoist from the time of the empress Wu Zetian (r. 684–704). One of these texts, the Daojiao yishu, twice quotes a catalogue of Taoist works titled Yuwei qibu jing shumu 玉緯七部經書目, attributed to the same Meng fashi.

There have been many discussions about the identity of MENG ANPAI, author of the Daojiao yishu and the above-named catalogue. He has erroneously been taken for a daoshi of the Liang dynasty (502–557).⁷² This error has in turn induced many authors to date the introduction of the seven-part classification system of the Taoist canon to that same period, that is, about two centuries before it actually came into existence. As a result, the history of the Taoist canon has been rendered so confused as to make it almost unintelligible.

From the title of MENG ANPAI's catalogue we can see that it was organized according to the seven parts system. Not much else is known about this catalogue, but the above set of texts give detailed information about the composition of each part and its place within the structure of the entire canon. Interestingly, the texts in question continuously quote the Zhengyi scriptures, or Zhengyi fawen, as the authority on which this classification system was based. In some cases the complete title of the text concerned is given as "The Chapter on Ordination Rites and Precepts Related to [the Transmission] of Scriptures and Diagrams of the Statutory Texts of the One and Orthodox [Ecclesia]" (Zhengyi fawen jingtu kejie pin 正一法文經圖科戒品).⁷³

68. This text is partially preserved in YJQQ 6.

69. Quoted in the encyclopedia SDZN 7.23a.

70. 1124 Dongxuan lingbao xuanmen dayi.

71. 1129 Daojiao yishu; according to its preface, derived from the original version of 1124 Dongxuan lingbao xuanmen dayi.

72. The error derives from a faulty reference by DU GUANGTING in his preface to his 725 Daode zhenjing guangsheng yi as to the identity of "Da Meng." This mistake has been taken over by Chen Guofu (CGF 1–4).

73. See 1129 Daojiao yishu 2.11b.

The Twelve Categories and the Thirty-Six Divisions

Patriarch PAN SHIZHENG, in the above-quoted text, mentions not only the organization of the canon into seven parts, but also the Thirty-six Divisions (sanshiliu bu 三十六部).⁷⁴ Here he refers to a further and more elaborate classification of the books in the Daozang. That such an additional subdivision was necessary is evident when we think of the bulk of different texts that now make up the Taoist canon. Indeed, above-mentioned treatises such as the Daomen dalun, the Xuanmen dayi, and the Daojiao yishu all give the additional classification system of the Twelve Categories of texts (shier lei 十二類), also called the Twelve Sections (shier bu 十二部). When applied to each of the Three Caverns, the Twelve Categories result in a total of thirty-six subdivisions (whether this was actually the system PAN SHIZHENG had in mind remains to be seen; we will return to this question later).

The Twelve Categories as defined by the Daojiao yishu and countless other sources are as follows:

1. Fundamental Scriptures, Benwen 本文
2. Sacred Symbols, Shenfu 神符
3. Exegeses, Yujue 玉訣
4. Diagrams, Lingtu 靈圖
5. Annals, Pulu 譜錄
6. Precepts, Jielü 戒律
7. Solemn Rites, Weiyi 威儀
8. Techniques, Fangfa 方法
9. Miscellaneous Arts, Zhongshu 衆術
10. Hagiography, Jizhuan 記傳
11. Hymns, Zansong 讚頌
12. Memorials, Biaozou 表奏

Many titles speak for themselves. The "Fundamental Scriptures" are the original revelations of the Tao. "Symbols" are the kind of cosmic writings that often constitute the core revelation of a scripture. These writings can be used in ritual and as talismans. Category 3 holds the commentaries on the scriptures, and "Diagrams" contains the graphic representations of divine and cosmic forces such as the Eight Trigrams. These representations are also the basis of the registers. The "Miscellaneous Arts" cover the whole group of alchemical, Tending Life, medical, and other manuals, and also texts used for prognostication.

We have found a few indications that this system may indeed have been applied.

74. On the Thirty-six Divisions, see Chen Guofu (CGF 252–57).

1. The "Rites of Girding with the True Writ of the Imperial Lord of Supreme Trinity" by LU XIUJING refers to the "thirty-first juan of the fourth section of the Dongzhen [division] (Dongzhen disi bu di sanshiyi juan 洞真部第四部第三十一卷)."⁷⁵ This small work concerns the method of using a register, and the "fourth section," that of "Diagrams," corresponds indeed to this kind of text.

2. An ancient commentary to LU XIUJING's famous Pacing the Void stanzas refers to the "eighth juan of the third section of the Lingbao texts of the Dongxuan [division] (Dongxuan disan bu, Lingbao diba juan 洞玄第三部靈寶第八卷)."⁷⁶ Here also, the evidence is conclusive, as the third category is devoted to exegeses.

3. The Dunhuang manuscript Stein 4226, which contains the table of contents of the Taiping jing,⁷⁷ refers to the "second juan of the Taiping division" (Taiping bu dier juan 太平部第二卷), which would indicate that, as in the later Ming canon, only the texts of Three Caverns, not those of the Four Supplements, were subdivided into twelve categories.

4. This last point is also borne out by the "Record of Truthful Transmission of the Divine Flying Powder," transmitted by Qi Tui 齊推 and dated 812.⁷⁸ This text is also found in YJQQ 74. The recipe for Lingfei powder is there stated to have been transcribed "from juan 153 of the Taiping division."

The taxonomy of the Twelve Categories certainly deserves further study. As to the matter of the Thirty-six Divisions, it is further complicated by the fact that at about the same time the twelve-categories system came into being, several other texts speak of an organization of the canon into thirty-six divisions of an entirely different nature. Here we find not a bibliographical classification, but a list of thirty-six titles of texts, some known, others entirely new, which were seen as an ideal canon of cosmic dimensions, integrating all currents and schools. This "Sanshiliu bu zunjing 三十六部尊經" became an important theological concept, without ever, so it seems, having actually been realized.⁷⁹

The Liturgical Organization of the Tang

The aim of Taoist scholars of the early Tang period (618–907) was clearly to integrate all schools and traditions within the canon according to a hierarchical order.

75. 1293 Shangqing taiwei dijun jiedai zhenwen fa 1a.

76. 614 Dongxuan lingbao shengxuan buxu zhang xushu 1b.

77. See the article on 1101 Taiping jing.

78. 943 Lingfei san chuanxin lu.

79. For more information, see 336 Taishang dongxuan lingbao yebao yinyuan jing, 337 Taoshang dongxuan lingbao shibao gongde yinyuan miaojing and 8 Taishang sanshiliu bu zunjing. The problem of the Thirty-six Divisions is discussed by Chen Guofu (CGF 252–58).

These scholars included not only the major scriptural bodies that made up the Seven Parts, but also lesser groups and sects. Thus the followers of the millenarian prophecies of the Dongyuan shenzhou jing, who had formed an independent sect since the early Six Dynasties period, were now recognized and given a place as a subsidiary group within the Dongshen division.⁸⁰ Each group of scriptures was subject to a special transmission and ordination ritual. A Taoist adept could thus follow his or her individual path to union with the Tao by going through the successive stages as laid down in the canon and institutionalized in the liturgical organization of the religion. At each stage, the adept had to accept certain precepts and rules of conduct. These sets of rules, progressively more numerous and detailed, were attached to the scriptures to be transmitted at each level. To each stage corresponded also a particular ordination title, as well as corresponding ritual vestments (fafu 法服), liturgical empowerment, and so on. Also, for each initiation and ordination, offerings of various kinds had to be presented as tokens of the disciple's sincerity (xinwu 信物). In some cases, such as for the attainment of the highest rank of transmission of the Shangqing scriptures, the xinwu consisted of precious objects of silver and gold.

A number of Tang sources give detailed descriptions of the system and how it worked.⁸¹ It was well unified, despite a number of minor discrepancies. In general, the aim of creating a unity between the religious organization (the body of the ecclesia) and the scriptural corpus (the body of writings) was fully accomplished. This was a remarkable achievement. The different textual traditions no longer represented different schools (as may have previously been the case) but had become integrated into an overall system in which the adept could make his or her way from the first religious instruction during childhood to the highest levels in the divine office. None has better captured the spirit of this process than WU YUN (d. 778):

Although for [obtaining] the Tao there is no recipe, its study has to proceed gradually. Thus one begins with the Zhengyi; then follow the Dongshen; one gets established in the Lingbao (i.e. the Dongxuan), and finally rests in the Dongzhen. Ultimate peace is the foundation, perfect concentration is the means, through the observance of abstinence and precepts we work at it; compassionate benevolence is the most advanced stage.⁸²

The four mental conditions match the four stages of learning. WU YUN does not mention the Taixuan stage for the transmission of the Daode jing and related texts, but this may be, as we can see from the Dunhuang manuscripts, because it was closely 80. See ZHANG WANFU, 1240 Dongxuan lingbao daoshi shou sandong jingjie falu zeri li.

81. See the introduction to part 2.B, "The general liturgical system of the Tang."

82. See 1052 Zongxuan xiansheng xuangang lun 9b.

linked to the Zhengyi stage. "One gets established in the Lingbao" probably refers to the fact that the previous grades were also for laymen, but the transmission of the Sandong initiation conferred the qualifications of a master. The idea that one "rests in the Dongzhen" may be related to the fact that in Tang times the highest stages of the Shangqing initiation corresponded to the final stages of one's life.⁸³

Many members of the Tang establishment were initiated and ordained. The solemn ordination of one of the imperial princesses, first in the intermediate grade corresponding to the Dongxuan bu 洞玄部 and then in the highest grade of the Shangqing jing in the year 711, has been described.⁸⁴ Evidence yielded by the manuscript sources found in Dunhuang allow us to understand how all the ordination system was applied on a far lower level. It is evident, if not from actual scriptures then from lists of texts pertaining to each division, that all degrees of the Tang Taoist ecclesia were present at Dunhuang. Indeed, in a remote place like Dunhuang, the adepts did not always, when acceding to a certain rank, receive all the texts they were entitled to own. Sometimes they received only the lists that came as part of their ordination documents. These lists may have enabled adepts, whenever they came to a center where the texts were available, to prove that they were entitled to read and perhaps copy the works in question.⁸⁵

The Canon of the Kaiyuan Era

We have seen that at the Tongdao guan of the Northern Zhou dynasty, Taoist texts were transcribed in order to be included in the imperial library, which implies that the texts were not destined to be united into a separate Taoist canon. Only special catalogues were made, such as the Yuwei jingmu 玉緯經目 by YIN WENCAO (d. 688).⁸⁶ Under the Tang, Taoism was officially considered equal if not superior to Buddhism, and Taoist texts continued to be collected for inclusion into the imperial library. At the same time, a variety of encyclopedias and handbooks were published, some of which have survived.⁸⁷ The work of redaction and study culminated in the period of Tang

83. See Schipper, "L'építaphe pour une grue (Yiheming) et son auteur," in A Festschrift in honour of Professor Jao Tsung-i on the occasion of his seventy-fifth anniversary (Hong Kong: The Chinese University of Hong Kong, 1993), 409–21.

84. ZHANG WANFU, 1241 Chuanshou sandong jingjie falu lüeshuo 2.18a ff.

85. See Schipper, "Taoist ordination ranks in the Tunhuang manuscripts." ZHANG WANFU, in his 1240 Dongxuan lingbao daoshi shou sandong jingjie falu zeri li 4b, also states that the ordinants received the catalogue of the books they were entitled to read and copy (in this case those related to the Daode jing).

86. Now lost. It should have listed Taoist texts of a total volume of 7,300 juan, again including, no doubt, many still unrevealed scriptures.

87. See part 2.A.8 on handbooks and encyclopedias.

Xuanzong (712–756), especially in the later part of this celebrated epoch. During the Kaiyuan period, the emperor ordered the most eminent Taoists of the capital to collect and edit all the texts with a view to publishing a Daozang.

A similar undertaking was launched with respect to the Buddhist canon. The Buddhist catalogue was compiled by Zhisheng 智升. It bore the title Kaiyuan shijiao lu 開元釋教錄 and was presented in 730. It contained all existing works. Editions and translations of the same text were listed chronologically. The listed scriptures amounted 5,048 juan. This catalogue laid the groundwork of all subsequent editions of the Buddhist Tripitaka. The same can be said for the Daozang. The Taoists presented their catalogue probably somewhat later. It was called the Sandong qionggang 三洞瓊綱, and the volume of the entered books amounted to 3,477 juan.⁸⁸ In the seventh year of the Tianbao era (748), Xuanzong ordered that an unknown number of copies of the texts listed in the catalogue be made, and that the collections of scriptures thus compiled be distributed to all major Taoist centers. This, then, was the first true Taoist canon.⁸⁹

The Kaiyuan Daozang was to be the model for all subsequent Daozang until the Yuan dynasty. Although not a scrap of it survives, we know not only how it was organized, but also something about its contents. Not only ancient canonical texts, but also new, even contemporary, scriptures were included, for instance, the anti-Buddhist "Scripture of the Jade Purity of the Great Tao of the Most High (1312 Taishang dadao yuqing jing)⁹⁰ or the notorious Huahu jing 化胡經 by Wang Fu 王浮, written around 300 and no longer extant. The inclusion of such works paved the way for later controversies. It also demonstrates the rapprochement between Taoism and Confucianism in Xuanzong's times. For the same reason, the Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契 became popular under Xuanzong, and we may suppose that it was incorporated into the Daozang, probably in the section Taiqing bu.⁹¹

The Dongxuan bu certainly had become an important part of the canon. Since the early Tang, many new Lingbao scriptures had been written, some having a regular length of ten juan, others being shorter or even very short, aiming at expressing the essential wisdom of the Tao in one or two pages (daoyao 道要). Although in later periods the bulk of these scriptures would no longer enjoy the popularity they held during the Tang, they continued to be transmitted and are still prominent in the Ming canon.

88. Different numbers have been advanced. Here we follow the Sanchao guoshi 三朝國史 (see VDL 5).

89. While in fact the Daozang was propagated in the Tianbao era, Xuanzong's canon is known as that of the Kaiyuan era.

90. A Dunhuang manuscript of this scripture (Pelliot 2257) carries a colophon showing that it was copied for the emperor himself in 753.

91. This can be deduced from the place given to this work in 1430 Daozang quejing mulu.

Among other important developments of this era we must mention the trend toward a historical institutionalization of Taoism through the establishment of genealogies for its major traditions. Thus the Shangqing, Lingbao, and Zhengyi traditions were endowed with contrived genealogies of patriarchs linked to holy mountain sites. The Shangqing tradition became identified with the Maoshan 茅山 in Jiangsu; the Lingbao register with the Gezao shan 閣皂山, and the Zhengyi tradition with the Longhu shan 龍虎山, both in Jiangxi. These identifications were to have far-reaching consequences.

In its manuscript form, the Kaiyuan canon was vulnerable. The revolt of An Lushan 安祿山 (755–757) and Shi Siming 史思明 (755–763) resulted in the destruction of the two capitals, Chang'an and Luoyang, and in the loss of the copies of the Daozang that were kept there. Suzong (r. 756–762), the successor of Xuanzong, immediately set out to have the Taoist scriptures recopied. Nonetheless, the terrible civil war following the rebellion of Huang Chao 黃巢 (874–884) that provoked the end of the Tang dynasty also destroyed most of the religious centers, and with them their manuscript libraries. During the following Five Dynasties period (907–960), several attempts were made to restore at least part of the canon. The best-known example is the effort of DU GUANGTING (850–933), a court Taoist who became the spiritual leader of the Shu kingdom in Sichuan.⁹² Du is especially known for his work as editor of the Taoist classics, as well as for his outstanding expertise in Lingbao liturgy. In later periods, his authority would always be invoked whenever important questions related to ritual surfaced. In the present context, it is important to note that Du was the first to have the works he edited printed, in order to give Taoist texts a wider distribution and therefore a greater chance of survival.⁹³

The Song and Yuan Canons

It is well known that the Song tried in many ways to restore the glory of the Tang and to follow their example. They, too, extended imperial patronage to Taoism and set out, at an early date, to recollect lost Taoist texts and to rebuild the Daozang. Under Emperor Zhenzong (r. 998–1022), the task of collecting the texts and making a new catalogue was entrusted to the most powerful official of the empire, the military commissioner WANG QINRUO (962–1025). Wang, who had also had a hand in editing the new imperial Taoist liturgy, the Luotian dajiao 羅天大醮,⁹⁴ suggested that the traditional organization of the Daozang be abandoned and that, instead of beginning 92. See Verellen, Du Guangting (850–933).

93. One of the works we know Du had printed was his complete edition of 335 Dongyuan shenzhou jing.

94. See Wang's 1285 Yisheng baode zhuan.

with the Shangqing scriptures, the canon ought to open with Laozi's Daode jing.⁹⁵ This suggests that, at least for Wang, the traditional transmission and ordination grid was no longer valid. WANG QINRUO presented his catalogue of the Dongzhen bu in 1015, but it was not accepted. Two years later, he presented a new catalogue, this time of the entire canon, entitled Baowen tonglu 寶文統錄, which was prefaced by the emperor himself.⁹⁶ The Sanchao guoshi 三朝國史 gives the contents of the catalogue in numbers of juan (here to be understood as chapters):

Dongzhen bu 洞真部: 620

Dongxuan bu 洞玄部: 1,013

Dongshen bu 洞神部: 172

Taixuan bu 太玄部: 1,407

Taiping bu 太平部: 192

Taiqing bu 太清部: 576

Zhengyi bu 正一部: 370

It is noteworthy that the 4,350 juan listed here retained the sevenfold structure of the canon, and that the philosophical Taixuan bu had grown considerably, relative to the other sections.⁹⁷

Again, as under the Tang, the listed texts were hand-copied for distribution to Taoist centers, unlike the Buddhist canon, which had been printed under imperial auspices and with government money, in 983.⁹⁸ The copying of the Taoist texts was done in accordance with the catalogue of WANG QINRUO. But it seems that after Wang's death in 1025 some changes were introduced, perhaps while copies were prepared in regional centers. The Dongxiao tuzhi 洞霄圖志, a monograph of the Taoist temples on Dadi shan 大滌山 (Jiangsu, near Hangzhou), reports that one of the copies made under the auspices of Emperor Zhenzong was bestowed on this center. From that set, after revision by an eminent Taoist scholar named Feng Dezhi 馮德之, new sets were made under the title "The Bookcase of the Clouds with the Seven Labels" (Yunji qiqian 雲笈七籤).⁹⁹ This title is of special interest because Yunji qiqian is now the title not of one of the versions of Zhenzong's canon, but of the famous Taoist anthology by

95. 770 Hunyuan shengji 9. See CGF 81. Chen's criticism is unjustified.

96. It was listed in the imperial library of the Southern Song under the title Sandong sifu bu jingmu 三洞四輔部經目 (VDL 34–35).

97. The Sanchao guoshi lists 4,359 juan, a figure that has been adopted by most scholars. See VDL 5 and n. 16.

98. See Demiéville, "Notes additionnelles sur les éditions imprimées du Canon bouddhique," in Pelliot, Les débuts de l'imprimerie en Chine, 223–40.

99. Local copies of the imperial Daozang were also made in Sichuan. See VDL 36–37.

ZHANG JUNFANG (fl. 1008–1025). In his preface, Zhang claims to have been one of the compilers of the Song canon (which he refers to as the Da Song tiangong baozang 大宋天宮寶藏) under WANG QINRUO and to have played an important role in the editorial work. His compilation, he says, was a condensed version of the canon, intended for the bedside table of the emperor. As Piet van der Loon has observed, ZHANG JUNFANG's account is full of inconsistencies and errors, and therefore not trustworthy.¹⁰⁰ Moreover, the title Yunji qiqian, referring explicitly to the sevenfold division of the canon, was a fitting name for a Daozang, whereas Zhang's anthology did not follow that arrangement and completely omitted many divisions of Taoist literature, especially liturgy. A possible explanation may be that the Dongxiao tuzhi account is accurate, that the imperial Daozang was indeed copied in Hangzhou and then distributed under the title Yunji qiqian. ZHANG JUNFANG, or possibly someone else borrowing his name, would then have compiled the anthology using the same title.

The Song canon was revised and considerably enlarged under Emperor Huizong (r. 1100–1125). Moreover, for the first time, the Daozang was printed. The cutting of the printing blocks was to be done in Fuzhou, where previously the Buddhist canon had also been reprinted. All the manuscripts were transported there and lodged in a special library in the Tianning wanshou gong 天寧萬壽宮 temple. The name given to the library was Zhenghe wanshou daozaang 政和萬壽道藏. Work on the blocks began in 1119 and took a long time to complete. By the time the blocks were ready and transported to the capital, the end of the dynasty was near, and it is unclear how many printed copies of the Zhenghe wanshou daozaang were made and distributed.

After careful study, Piet van der Loon arrives at the conclusion that the total volume of Huizong's canon amounted to 5,387 juan.¹⁰¹ This was an increase of more than one thousand juan, or 20 percent, compared to Zhenzong's canon of a century earlier. What new materials were added? Huizong's reign was one of the most fervent Taoist periods in Chinese history. The emperor himself, as Lord of the Tao (Daojun 道君), extended his patronage to many Taoist establishments and undertakings. The period also witnessed, at court and elsewhere, the birth of a number of new Taoist schools. It is, however, difficult to assess how many of the works produced by these new schools were included in the Daozang.¹⁰²

During the Southern Song dynasty, the manuscript copy of Huizong's canon

100. VDL 30–32.

101. Against the number of 5,481 juan given by CGF 135.

102. See, for instance, the case of the 1227 Taishang zhuguo jiumin zongzhen biyao, a Tianxin zhengfa 天心正法 manual that appears to have been composed especially for inclusion in the canon.

was still kept at Fuzhou. Several new copies were made of this set and distributed to temples in South China. The printing blocks of the Zhenghe wanshou daozaang had entered into the possession of the new rulers of northern China, the Jin dynasty. In 1188, these blocks, previously kept in Kaifeng, were transported to the Middle Capital (Zhongdu 中都, modern Peking). There they were completed and printed into a yet larger edition (6,455 juan), titled Da Jin Xuandu baozang 大金玄都寶藏. Here again, we have no clear indication as to the kind of new materials that were added, perhaps in connection with the many new schools that developed in the twelfth century.

One of these new schools, which was to become the major movement of renewal in the modern history of religions in China, was the Quanzhen 全真. It was founded around 1170 by WANG ZHE (1113–1170) in Shandong. The rapidly growing movement, after initial difficulties, obtained recognition by the Jin state in 1197. In 1208, the emperor presented a complete set of his Xuandu baozang to the Taixu guan 太虛觀 in Shandong in honor of QIU CHUJI, hao Changchun (1148–1227), one of the main artisans of the Quanzhen institution as a monastic order. After the conquest of northern China by the Mongols and the destructions it wrought, the Jin Daozang was almost totally lost. Under the direction of SONG DEFANG (1183–1247) and his disciple Qin Zhian 秦志安 (1188–1244), the Quanzhen order reedited the Daozang on the basis of the sole surviving copy of the Jin canon.¹⁰³ To all appearances, the contents of this new Daozang, which was completed in 1244, were the same as those of the Jin Xuandu baozang. Only four new texts, related to the history of the Quanzhen movement, had been added at the end.¹⁰⁴

The Destruction of the Old Canon

During the early stage of the Mongol period (1206–1368), the Quanzhen order enjoyed great official support, enabling it to establish itself durably as one of the major components of modern China's religious system. This success also stoked the fires of the ancient rivalry with Buddhism. Other factors must have contributed to the ensuing conflicts, but the fact that the Daozang, since Tang Xuanzong's times, contained many anti-Buddhist texts and could be considered slanderous with regard to that religion became the focus of the controversy. A debate conducted at court in 1258 before the future emperor Kublai resulted in defeat for the Taoist side. A purge of some forty contentious works in the Daozang was ordered.¹⁰⁵ The texts in question were publicly burned. Twenty-three years later, in December 1281, the official ban on Taoist books

103. See VDL 51–52.

104. See 1430 Daozang quejing mulu and VDL 52, n. 3.

105. The list is given in the Bianwei lu 2 (see Qing Xitai, Zhongguo daojiao shi, 224).

was suddenly extended to all works with the exception of the Daode jing.¹⁰⁶ Not only all copies of the Daozang but all holdings of temples and monasteries and even the books in the possession of individual daoshi were to be destroyed. The extent of the damage can be assessed thanks to 1430 Daozang quejing mulu, a catalogue of missing books based on a comparison of the contents of the Xuandu baozang with those of the Ming canon:¹⁰⁷ the catalogue lists some 800 works as lost. However, according to the Gazetteer of Longxi xian in Fujian of 1762, a complete manuscript copy of the Zhenghe daoizang 政和道藏 survived at the Xuanmiao guan 玄妙觀 (formerly Tianqing guan 天慶觀) of Zhangzhou 漳州.¹⁰⁸ Even though not all Taoist books were lost, the proscription of 1281 stands as one of the worst assaults on China's spiritual heritage by tyrants of various descriptions.¹⁰⁹

The holocaust did give Taoism a chance for renewal. As we have seen, before the burning of the books, premodern China continued to live with a scriptural canon belonging to the middle ages. Once again, the Quanzhen canon of 1244 was in all likelihood virtually identical with the Jin canon, itself a reedition of Huizong's Zhenghe wanshou daoizang, while the latter probably did not differ much from Zhenzong's manuscript canon of the early eleventh century. The compilers of this collection, after the innovative proposals of WANG QINRUO had been discarded, returned to the model of the Tang Daozang of the Kaiyuan era. Even if books had been added, the organizational principles had remained the same. But while 500 years had passed without any fundamental change to the structure of the canon, Taoism itself had evolved in significant ways.

Since the late Tang and the Five Dynasties periods, with the economic and cultural development of the Jiangnan area and the rise of its merchant cities, the local temple organizations had seen a great revival. New scriptural and ritual traditions sprang up from these centers. The influence of Song Buddhism, not only through its Chan and

106. That is, after the conquest of southern China and the reversal of the military fortunes of the Mongols with their attempt to invade Japan. The reasons for Kublai's extraordinary decision to ban Taoist books are unclear. The defeat of his fleet may have been one of them.

107. The authors of the Daozang quejing mulu evidently made use of this catalogue. It is possible that theirs was an incomplete copy, as VDL 62 seems to suggest.

108. Longxi xianzhi 龍溪縣志 11.34b.

109. In his inscription to the memory of Zhang Liusun 張留孫 (1248–1322), patriarch of the so-called Xuanjiao 玄教 order of the Yuan dynasty, ZHAO MENG FU (1254–1322) records that around 1295 the newly enthroned Emperor Chengzong reassured the patriarch of his sympathy to Taoism (see Chen Yuan, Daojia jinshi lue, 912). The work of the Xuanjiao order in support of Taoism in the later part of the Yuan remains to be studied.

Pure Land schools but especially through its Tantric traditions, was pervasive. This influence is clearly perceptible in Taoist texts.

None of these new developments were easily reconcilable with the traditional framework of the canon, which, as we have seen, corresponded to the hierarchy of the clergy of the medieval ecclesia. The ancient Way of the Heavenly Master, with its elaborate liturgical organization, had gradually ceased to exist in the late Tang and Five Dynasties periods—or perhaps, as future research may demonstrate, its communal structure had transformed itself into that of the modern temple association (hui 會). The very lineage of the Heavenly Masters, which had continued since the Han dynasty with its seat at the Yangping zhi 陽平治 diocese in the Guanzhong region in southwestern Shaanxi, was replaced with a new institution, the hereditary Zhengyi patriarchy of Longhu shan in Jiangxi. The claim that this institution hailed from the founder of the Tianshi lineage has never been substantiated. Indeed all the available historical evidence points to the contrary. The transformation may have been a result of the Tang official recognition of the Longhu shan Heavenly Master temple as the seat of the lineage (see above). In any case, the modern Zhengyi order of the Longhu shan bears no resemblance whatsoever with the religion of the Zhengyi fawen. This order is a perfect example of the transformation Taoism underwent at the end of the middle ages. It is also a remarkable testimony of Taoism's adaptability.

The inevitable problems brought about by the discrepancy between the canon and the living Taoist religion of the Song were not easily resolved. In his great liturgical handbook Shangqing lingbao dafa 上清靈寶大法, JIN YUNZHONG (fl. 1225) expressed the difficulties he experienced in matching the ritual practice of his times with the orthodoxy of the canon. In order to accommodate the living Tianxin zhengfa 天心正法 school, he decided to regard it as representing the true Heavenly Master tradition, while rejecting the ancient Zhengyi rites. To legitimate the powerful school of the Jingming zhongxiao dao 淨明忠孝道 promoted by the temple of Saint Xu Jinyang 許旌陽 of Mount Xishan 西山 at Nanchang (Jiangsu), Jin Yunzong associated it with the ancient Lingbao division. In fact, it can be induced from his protracted arguments regarding canonicity that none of the new schools occupying most of the space of part 3.B in the present study had been integrated into the old canon at that time. Indeed, if any of the works produced by schools like the Shenxiao fa 神霄法, the Wulei fa 五雷法, the Tianxin zhengfa, the Jingming zhongxiao dao, the Qingwei fa 清微法—and many other works as well, such as the scriptures written in honor of popular saints—had been included, at least one or two of them would have fallen victim to the great holocaust and presumably listed as such in 1430 Daozang quejing mulu. The fact that no work of the kind can be found in that catalogue suggests that they either had never been admitted or had subsequently been expurgated.

From this perspective, it may be surmised that had the ancient canon not been destroyed, the ultimate outcome might have been even worse: sclerosis followed by radical reformation. Since the traditional Daozang had ceased to exist, the way was now open for a renewal.

THE MING CANON AND ITS SUPPLEMENT

The Compilation of the Zhengtong daoze 正統道藏

We now return to the collection that is the subject of the present study, the Da Ming daoze jing 大明道藏經. The fact that the Heavenly Master was asked to submit the new canon indicates that since the political eclipse of the Quanzhen order during the reign of Kublai, the patriarch of the Longhu shan had obtained virtual leadership over all of Taoism. His headquarters in Jiangxi had become an important Taoist ordination center with a large library. However, as stated earlier, the editorial work was to take almost forty years. It must have advanced well during Zhang's lifetime. He himself had moved to Peking in order to supervise the editing. But after his death in 1410, and the subsequent demise of the Yongle emperor in 1424, things may have come to a standstill. Zhu Di's successor, the Xuande 宣德 emperor (1426–1436), was not interested in the enterprise. During the Zhengtong 正統 reign, beginning in 1436, the work was finally continued and completed. We do not have much information about the editors, except that the registrar (daolu si 道錄司) Shao Yizheng 邵以正 was entrusted with the final revision in 1444.¹¹⁰ It was probably he who included ZHANG YUCHU's collected writings, the Xianquan ji 峴泉集, into the Ming canon, and the place of its insertion probably marks the point at which Shao introduced his additions to the work of the former Heavenly Master. The following entries, numbered 1312 to 1428, correspond to a mass of texts from the Six Dynasties and the Tang period, especially Shangqing scriptures that had not been previously included. Most of these texts have characters altered in deference to Song taboos, suggesting that they originally came from a Song canon. Had it not been for this kind of afterthought on the part of the editors, much of our information about the great Shangqing tradition would have been ruefully incomplete.

The editors could have done much more. We know, as mentioned above, that at the time the Ming canon was compiled, a copy of the Zhenghe wanshou daoze still existed in the Xuanmiao guan at Zhangzhou. Many other, perhaps incomplete, copies existed elsewhere, for instance in Fuzhou itself. Why did ZHANG YUCHU not reprint their contents? We can even ask more precisely: why was the catalogue of the

110. On Shao Yizheng, see Schipper, "Master Chao I-chen."

Quanzhen Xuandu baozang, which most evidently was used by the editors of the Ming canon to make 1430 Daozang quejing mulu, not included? This omission is all the more strange since the editors themselves showed, in that same catalogue of missing works, that catalogues of earlier editions had been reproduced in previous canons. What exactly did the editors imply by marking all those books that were evidently still extant in Fujian at the time as "missing" (que 闕)? That they were literally unable to find them or that, after ZHANG YUCHU had edited a Daozang according to his own ideas, it was no longer feasible or desirable to include them? To do so would have resulted in adding at least 2,000 juan to the 4,000 that had already been collected by the former Heavenly Master.

That the Heavenly Master wished to make a new canon can be seen from the fact that the great majority of the works he selected were modern, that is, dated from the Southern Song or later.¹¹¹ We can gain some insight into his ideas from his Daomen shigui 道門十規 (Ten Guidelines for Taoism), a pastoral directive probably written shortly after Zhang received, in 1406, the imperial request to present a new Daozang. He presents the history and the role of Taoism as they were understood in his times. His historical perception begins with Laozi as grand astrologer and archivist, founder of the Huang-Lao school. Taoism was subsequently dominated by different currents and sects. This situation resulted ultimately in the separation between his own Zhengyi order, with its mainly secular clergy, and the Quanzhen order, with its monastic institutions. He credits his own ancestor, the First Heavenly Master, with having founded the Zhengyi order; GE XUAN with creating the Lingbao school; Xu Jingyang with the Jingming zhongxiao dao; and the elder Mao brother with the Shangqing tradition. Each of these orders, schools, or traditions had in ZHANG YUCHU's time become a sect (pai 派) with its own holy mountain, temples, clergy, titles, and registers.

Beside these sects there were the methods (daofa 道法) of the Qingwei, the Shenxiao, and so on. The practice of such fa, Zhang says, required strict discipline and great purity, lest the performers became indistinguishable from "back-alley shamans." This caveat gives Zhang the opportunity to dismiss the use of spirit writing as a medium unfit for orthodox Taoists. A special paragraph is devoted to those in charge of temples, who can be laymen, but in that case should be senior citizens of impeccable conduct.

In all these precepts there is no trace of the ancient canonical framework of graded initiations and ordinations. Although Zhang clearly saw himself as the supreme leader of the Taoists, he derived this standing from the imperial request to compile the Daozang, and not from any empowerment given to him, either by the body of 111. See VDL 61 and n. 43.

Taoist masters, or by decree of the gods or ancestors. It is obvious that the ecclesia of the middle ages had no contemporary meaning, and that Zhang decided to create a Daozang for his time, in accordance with the Taoism of his time. It is likely that he was aware of the catastrophe that had befallen Taoism because of the contents of the Xuandu baozang and that he wished to avert similar mishaps.

Outlining the scriptural legacy of Taoism, Zhang defines the Three Caverns as containing the revelations made by the Three Pure Ones, that is, the Yuanshi tianzun 元始天尊, the Lingbao tianzun 靈寶天尊, and the Daode tianzun 道德天尊. Therefore, he says, the Lingbao duren jing 靈寶度人經, since it was "spoken" by the Yuanshi tianzun, should be at the head of the canon,¹¹² and that is indeed where it is now found. He also tells us that the most important texts revealed by the Lingbao tianzun were not the Lingbao scriptures, but the Dingguan 定觀 and the Neiguan 內觀.¹¹³ As for the texts of the Daode tianzun, these were the Daode jing and the Riyong 日用.¹¹⁴ Furthermore, Zhang makes a distinction between scriptures meant for personal cultivation (nei er xiu ji 內而修己) and those meant for saving the world (wai er ji shi 外而濟世). Scriptures such as the Beidou jing 北斗經 and Yushu jing 玉樞經 belonged to the second category.

As a result of these principles, the organization of the Daozang became radically altered. Among the most conspicuous departures from the traditional seven-parts classification is the placement of the Daode jing and the other ancient philosophical texts and their commentaries not in the Dongxuan bu, as had formerly been the case, but in the Dongshen bu. This placement occurred under the aegis of Daode tianzun, who, in modern Taoism, is considered to be the deified Laozi (Taishang laojun 太上老君). Other momentous, but perhaps at first sight less visible changes are the transformation of the Dongzhen bu into a collection of modern daofa of the Qingwei, Yutang, and Thunder Magic schools, headed by the sixty-chapter Shenxiao version of the Lingbao duren jing. The Shangqing jing, which used to occupy this place in the first of the Three Caverns, is eliminated. As we have seen, we owe it to the insight, or the afterthought, of Shao Yizheng that, in extremis, the ancient Shangqing scriptural corpus was saved and added at the end of the Daozang.

Needless to say, the attempts by ZHANG YUCHU to pour new wine into old bottles

112. 1232 Daomen shigui 5a.

113. These titles correspond, respectively, to 400 Dongxuan lingbao dingguan jing zhu and 641 Taishang laojun neiguan jing, both early Tang texts. But while the Dingguan is indeed placed in the Dongxuan bu, the Neiguan, as revealed by Laojun, is in the Dongshen bu.

114. Corresponding to 645 and 646 Taishang laojun [nei, wai] riyong jing. These short treatises are probably from the Song or Yuan periods.

rendered the organization of the canon obscure, especially to outsiders. The classification not only of the Three Caverns but also, within each of these, of the Twelve Categories was radically changed. In the Ming canon what used to be a very clear classification system results in total disorder. Thus the Fangfa division of the Dongzhen bu is a mixed collection of Qingwei rites, Inner Alchemy handbooks, some ancient Shangqing texts, and so on.

The Twelve Categories were defined in the Tang period on the basis of Taoist literature as it existed at that time. More than seven centuries later, these categories were totally inappropriate. All kinds of new books had appeared in the meantime, such as the texts of Inner Alchemy, the yulu 語錄 (logia) of the Quanzhen masters, the monographs of sacred sites, and so on, none of which fitted the old system. While ZHANG YUCHU was very much a man of his times and well versed in all the different schools that existed then, he decided to use the old seven-parts system, the rationale of which had become obsolete. The addition of the Twelve Categories did not help to render the classification of the texts any clearer and, in some instances, resulted in an even greater confusion. Hence it is difficult to find one's way in the Ming canon. (See table 1 for a summary of the distribution of texts of the Ming canon.)

Other factors may have played a role in making the organization of the canon so confused. We have seen ZHANG YUCHU's explicit condemnation of spirit writing. Yet there are a great many texts in the canon that state just as explicitly that they were produced in this way. Pride of place as one of the very first books of the Fundamental Scriptures of the Dongzhen bu belongs to 5 Taishang wuji zongzhen Wenchang dadong xianjing, which was revealed by a "descent into the brush" (jiangbi 降筆) in the year 1168 in Wenchang temple in Zitong 梓桐 (Sichuan), as mentioned repeatedly in the prefaces to that work. Another instance is the 317 Lingbao tianzun shuo Hongen lingji zhenjun miaojing. This happens to be the very first book in the next Cavern, the Dongxuan bu, and equally a product of the planchette, wielded this time in the temple of the immortal Xu brothers 徐仙 at Jin'ao feng 金鰲峰 in Fuzhou. The scripture has a preface by Emperor Yongle himself, dated 1420.¹¹⁵ It is evident that this new work was included while the editorial work on the Daozang was already under way; it was placed at this prominent position because of its august patronage. Many other examples could be quoted of books that must have been admitted into the canon because the temple organization that produced them was rich or powerful.

Nevertheless, the worship of local saints does not stand out as prominently in the Zhengtong canon as it would later in the supplement. Remarkable, on the contrary,

115. See the rich documentation on the cult in part 3.B.12, "The Hongen lingji zhenjun Cult."

TABLE 1. Distribution of texts of the Ming canon of the Zhengtong era
For each category we give the number of juan followed, between parentheses, by the number of texts.

TWELVE CATEGORIES	THREE CAVERNS			FOUR SUPPLEMENTS				Total
	Dongzhen 洞真	Dongxuan 洞玄	Dongshen 洞神	Taixuan 太玄	Taiping 太平	Taiqing 太清	Zhengyi 正一
Benwen 本文	160 (77)	84 (71)	40 (51)
Shenfu 神符	8 (9)	10 (8)	8 (5)
Yayue 玉訣	111 (60)	36 (33)	707 (88)
Lingtu 靈圖	27 (17)	11 (13)	51 (6)
Pulu 譜錄	21 (13)	18 (12)	42 (14)
Jielü 戒律	12 (12)	27 (11)	9 (7)
Weiyi 威儀	31 (30)	420 (81)	27 (26)
Fangfa 方法	230 (51)	76 (24)	60 (63)
Zhongshu 衆術	19 (20)	20 (20)	104 (74)
Jizhuan 記傳	124 (19)	35 (17)	37 (20)
Zansong 讚頌	10 (6)	8 (8)	6 (7)
Biaozou 表奏	9 (2)	29 (5)	6 (3)
Total	762 (316)	774 (303)	1,097 (364)	553 (117)	410 (66)	179 (25)	776 (240)	4,551 (1,431)

NOTE: The 1607 supplement of 56 texts raises the total number of texts in the Ming canon to 1,487.

is the place the canon gives to Confucianism, exemplified by the inclusion of the complete works of SHAO YONG (1012–1077). Numerous works by Confucian scholars on cosmology and Inner Alchemy are also noteworthy, such as Zhu Xi’s 朱熹 (1130–1200) commentary on the Zhouyi cantong qi. Here again, public relations and the promotion of the ideology of the Three Religions must have played a role.

The Supplement of 1607

In 1585, 140 years after the completion of the Zhengtong daoze, Zhu Yijun 朱翊鉤, the Wanli 萬曆 emperor, asked the then Heavenly Master Zhang Guoxiang 張國祥, the fiftieth successor to the holy office, to compile a supplement to the canon. Again, the patriarch repaired to Peking to start his work. Again it took him a long time to accomplish the task. Twenty-two years later, Zhang Guoxiang presented the results of his labors. His choice had fallen on just fifty-six books, with a combined volume of no more than 180 juan. Why did it take so long? Why so few books? And above all, why did the emperor all of a sudden express the wish for a supplement? Once again, we have little to go on to reconstitute the history of the compilation. Almost all information has to be distilled from the supplement itself.

It is well known that the last two great rulers of the Ming, the Jiajing and Wanli emperors, favored Taoism. Since we have no clear indication as to what motivated the request for a supplement, we can only presume that an update in keeping with the religious policy of the times was deemed necessary. The borderlines of Taoism, with respect to those of the other two great doctrines (Buddhism and Confucianism), had to be redrawn. Perhaps the growing importance of sectarian movements made it expedient that the position of Taoism be strengthened.

When we look at the kind of books that were selected for the supplement, any of these reasons could be advanced. The selection is indeed surprising. The supplement starts out with a flurry of scriptures related to popular sects and saints. The very first text, 1432 Taishang zhonggdao miaofa lianhua jing, is a pastiche of the Buddhist Lotus Sūtra, produced by an unidentified sectarian movement by means of planchette writing. The ninth entry, 1440 Huangjing jizhu, is an annotated edition of the 10 Gaoshang yuhuang benxing jijing. This was the work of Luo Hongxian 羅洪先, zi Nianan 念庵 (1504–1567?). Luo was the distinguished zhuangyuan 狀元-laureate of 1529, who as a result of a difference of opinion with the Jiajing emperor was dismissed from public office in 1541. He was an ardent admirer of Wang Shouren 王守仁, zi Yangming 陽明 (1472–1529), and a friend of Lin Zhaoen 林兆恩 (1517–1598), the founder of the Sanyi jiao 三一教. Huangjing jizhu also contains a “preface to the original edition” by Luo himself proclaiming that, lacking the means of publishing his work, he presented it to the Heavenly Master for inclusion in the Daoze. This preface is also dated 1585. By that time Luo is thought to have died, so the possibility of some sleight of hand by the editor cannot be excluded. The commentary itself, however, is manifestly written by a scholar familiar with the thought of Wang Yangming. A special feature is that the editor of this work is a certain Zhou Xuanzhen 周玄貞, a Quanzhen master from Shandong, who also served as compiler of this very supplement of the Taoist canon (Zhou's complete title is given in the work as Da Ming jiang daojing xiu xuanzang si Quanzhen dizi 大明講道經修玄藏嗣全真弟子).¹¹⁶

There are many other links between the supplement of 1607 and eminent scholars of the late Ming. The two last works to be included are 1486 Laozi yi and 1487 Zhuangzi yi by Jiao Hong 焦竑 (1541–1620). Jiao Hong was still alive at the time his works were included, and it must be assumed that he gave his assent to this. The 1483 Tianhuang zhidao taiqing yuce by Zhu Quan 朱權 (1378–1448), seventeenth son of the founder of the dynasty, deserves also to be mentioned. But most astonishing is the inclusion of a work by Li Zhi 李贄 (1527–1602), a study of the Yijing with a distinct Chan 禪 approach titled 1473 Yiyin Shangxia jing. At the time of publication, Li had been dead for five years. His demise, possibly by suicide, had not allayed a raging controversy surrounding his personality and actions. The scholar-rebel, pursuing his Buddhist vocation while remaining the most prominent liberal thinker and writer of his time, had been the victim of furious attacks by the Confucian orthodox establishment, both during his lifetime and after. The inclusion of his work in the supplement of the Daozang was politically significant. It amounted not only to a rehabilitation, but to an act of defiance towards the Donglin Party 東林黨 and their allies.

Here we should stress once more the presence of a great number of scriptures and hagiographies related to popular saints in the supplement, in contrast with the main canon of the Zhengtong era. Many deities, such as Bixia yuanjun 碧霞元君, had never obtained official recognition in the form of a canonization title (fenghao 封號), in spite of great popularity, especially in the capital. The inclusion of their scriptures amounted to such a sanction. We must conclude that there existed a political will behind this move. The Ming shilu 明實錄 (juan 183, second month of Wanli 15) reports that candidates in the imperial examinations were wont to refer to texts in the Daozang rather than to cite the Confucian classics and orthodox commentaries. This raises the question of what kind of Taoism the supplement sought to foster and define. It was evidently something far more popular and unconventional than had previously been the case. The legitimization of the cult (xianghuo 香火) of popular saints, of Wang

116. The work identifies yet another collaborator to the supplement. In a third, short preface dated 1588 Wang Jingcui 王靜粹 identifies himself as responsible for copying texts to be included in the Wanli supplement. He must have also had a hand in arranging the texts that went into the present edition.

Yangming's thought, of Lin Zhaoen's teaching, and of Li Zhi's criticisms could be interpreted as an attempt to create an opposition movement to the Confucian orthodoxy of the times and, by the same token, to muster popular support for the Wanli throne. This hypothesis is strengthened by other evidence, notably from the stele inscriptions of the same period in Peking's popular temples, where a similar spirit of opposition to the reactionary orthodoxy prevails.

However futile such attempts to provide a platform for opposition to the Confucian orthodoxy may have been and however miserably they failed in later periods does not diminish the importance of the undertaking. The late Ming stands out in the history of Chinese culture as a moment of freedom and creativity.

Destruction and Rebirth

A few words, finally, about the gradual repression of Taoism during the Qing. The political bias undoubtedly goes back to the days when the kingdom of Hou Jin 後金 (1616–1644) was a sanctuary for fundamentalist Confucians opposed to the liberal culture of the late Ming. The sectarian uprisings that caused the demise of the Ming comforted the future rulers in their opposition to popular religion. As early as 1663, the Kangxi 康熙 emperor assimilated daoshi with shamans (wushi 巫師) and mediums (tiaoshen 跳神), prohibiting their exorcistic rites on pain of death. The foremost persecutor, however, was Qianlong 乾隆. In the fourth year of his reign (1739), he prohibited the recruitment of disciples by the Heavenly Masters. The next year he assented to the following petition by the chief minister of the Court of State Ceremonial (Honglu si qing 鴻廬寺卿), Mei Gucheng 梅穀成 (d. 1763): "Taoists are vile. It is improper that they pollute the court with their filth." Thus after 1740 the Heavenly Master was no longer admitted to the palace. In 1742, Taoists were dismissed from their role in the state rituals and Taoist music was barred from state ceremonials. In 1752, the Heavenly Master was demoted from his dignity as a mandarin of the second degree to the fifth. He was also barred from presenting proposals for the canonization of saints. Although some time later he was reinstalled in the third degree and permitted to come to court once every five years, the Taoists' situation remained unfavorable and altogether different from what it had been during the Ming. It was to degrade continuously thereafter. Finally, in 1821, the first year of the reign of the Daoguang emperor, the Heavenly Master was barred not only from court, but from the capital.

Another eloquent example of the Qing government's ostracism is found in the Siku quanshu 四庫全書. Unlike the Yongle emperor, who gave a large place in his Yongle dadian to Taoist works, the Qianlong emperor banned virtually all of them. At a time when the Ming canon was by no means rare and was readily available in the capital, the old Manchu managed to reduce the presence of Taoist books in this "universal library" to some forty titles, virtually all of them commentaries of the Daode jing or the Zhuangzi. The Daozang, which in Qing times was constantly pilfered because it contained so many rare ancient texts,¹¹⁷ was severely criticized precisely for containing these works! This and similar partisan arguments abound in the review that the Siku quanshu zongmu tiyao devotes not to the Daozang itself, but to an annotated catalogue of the same, the Daozang mulu xiangzhu 道藏目錄詳註 by Bo Yunji 白雲霽 (dated 1626).¹¹⁸ Thus Taoist literature was placed outside the purview of Confucian learning and condemned to oblivion.

The hostility of the literati, encouraged by the Qing policy toward Taoism, became a factor in their programs for national renewal. It was one of the driving forces behind the proposals made by Kang Youwei 康有為 (1858–1927) during the Hundred Day Reform (Wuxu bianfa 戊戌變法) period. For Kang, the religious fervor of the Chinese was "the shame of the nation." The decree issued by the young Guangxu emperor in 1898 to "do away with temples to open schools (feimiao banxue 廢廟辦學)" opened the door for the gratuitous confiscation of temple property and the destruction of their valuable patrimony. The immediate consequence was to destabilize the entire country, one of the causes for the so-called Boxer Rebellion of 1900. In the course of these tragic events, when the allied troops entered Peking, their gunfire destroyed the Da guangming dian 大光明殿 temple in the western part of the city, where the printing blocks of the Ming canon were kept. They were all destroyed.

The initiative by President Xu Shichang 徐世昌 (1855–1939) to reprint the Ming canon came in the wake of the May Fifth Movement in 1919. He financed the enterprise and instructed his minister of education, Fu Yuanshu 傅沅叔 (1872–1939), to supervise the task. The work itself was entrusted to the Hanfen lou 涵芬樓 bibliophile association in cooperation with the Commercial Press in Shanghai. A committee of scholars endorsed the publication in a preface in which some of the main facts related to the history of the Daozang were recalled. Among the signatories we find the reformers Kang Youwei and Liang Qichao 梁啟超.

The canon was reprinted in 1926 in reduced format facsimile, and the original 4,551 juan bound into 1,120 fascicles. The reprint is virtually complete. Minor lacunae must have existed in the original copy. Five hundred sets were made which were sold to sinological libraries all over the world. The study of the treasure house of Taoism could at last begin.

117. It is in the Daozang that many important philosophical texts—such as parts of the Mozi, the Gongsun Longzi, and the works of SHAO YONG—as well as mythological texts such as the Shanhai jing have been preserved. Qing literati edited and published these texts on a large scale but rarely acknowledged their origin.

118. Siku quanshu zongmu tiyao 146 (end).

THE TAO-TSANG PROJECT

Daozang Studies after 1926

It did not take long before scholars delved into the reprinted Daozang and began publishing their findings. This task was by no means easy as there was little to go on. Virtually no study had been made hitherto of the canon and its contents. As mentioned, scholars of the Qing period had mined the Ming canon for ancient texts they deemed of interest, without, however, asking why the Taoists had preserved these texts, and without giving them credit for having done so. In consequence no Qing scholar had ever studied the Daozang in its entirety, with the self-proclaimed exception, at a late stage, of Liu Shipai 劉師培 (1884–1919). Liu had spent the winter months of 1910 in the Baiyun guan 白雲觀 temple in Peking reading ten juan a day and had made a critical study of the whole collection.¹¹⁹

Another claim to having read through the entire canon before it was reprinted was made by Father Léon Wieger, S.J. In 1911, he published his catalogue of the Ming Daozang.¹²⁰ It is doubtful whether the reverend father ever saw, let alone read, the canon. His "catalogue" is an adapted translation of the above-mentioned catalogue by Bo Yunji.¹²¹ On the basis of this catalogue, Wieger made his own classification of the texts according to a rather haphazard selection of fifty-six categories. Nevertheless, in the absence of any better work, Wieger's catalogue was used for many years. His classification of texts was even reprinted in the Daozang index of the Harvard-Yenching Institute Sinological Index Series.¹²²

The general situation scholars found themselves in when tackling the Daozang after it became available has been aptly described by Maspero. After stating that the repository had until recently been nearly inaccessible, he says:

And the collection is vast, over a thousand volumes containing nearly 1,500 different works, many of them very lengthy; so that the exploration, which will be long and difficult, has scarcely begun. . . . One of the chief difficulties of research relating to the history of Taoism arises from the fact that the ancient Taoist books are undated:

119. A simple calculation shows that at this rate Liu would have needed a year and a half to complete the task. His "Reading notes on the Daozang" (Du dao tang ji 讀道藏記) show the limits of both his labors and his understanding. His initiative did, however, set an example and received much attention. Its slender results were published in the Guocui xuebao 國粹學報 75–77 (1911) and again in his collected works in 1934 (Du Dao tang ji in Liu Shenshu xianshen yishu 63).

120. L. Wieger, Taoïsme, vol. 1, Bibliographie générale (Hsien-hsien, 1911).

121. See the remarks by Liu Ts'un-yan, "The compilation and historical value of the Tao-tsang."

122. Weng Dujian, Daozang zimu yinde, xiii–xx.

their authors are unknown, we do not know what period they belong to, and there is almost never either a preface or a prefatory or final note giving an author's name or a chronological indication. For some of them, we can waver between Han and Ming—that is between dates differing by some fifteen centuries.¹²³

Maspero's first attempt at dating some of the texts in the Daozang is important, not so much for the results, which are now largely obsolete, but for its methodology. Maspero first found a few "well established reference points." Using these as points of departure, he examined to what extent he could find these reference materials quoted in other works. Thus he established sets of cognate texts. Without any previous knowledge of the history of Taoist literature, Maspero managed to identify what have since become known as the Shangqing and Lingbao corpuses,¹²⁴ demonstrating the efficiency of what we have since named "internal textual criticism."

It is beyond the scope of the present introduction to give a full account of the progress of Daozang studies since the reprint of 1926.¹²⁵ Some major contributions that have been instrumental in the development of the field should, however, not go unmentioned.

Chen Guofu 陳國符 (1914–2000) issued from a Taoist family in Changshu 常熟 (Jiangsu) and studied chemistry in China and in Germany. During his university years he was attracted to the history of Chinese science and collaborated with Tenney Davis on a study of the Baopu zi neipian.¹²⁶ He returned to China in 1942 and joined the Southwest Union University in Kunming. There he began to work seriously on the history of the Daozang under the guidance of the great linguist Luo Changpei 羅常培 (1899–1958). After the war, Chen traveled extensively in search of materials 123. "An essay on Taoism in the first centuries A.D.," 313–14. This "Bibliographical introduction" must date from around 1936 (see ibid. 313, note 3).

124. Ibid., 314–19.

125. There are several reports on the development of Taoist studies in China, Japan, and the West: see Noguchi Tetsuro 野口鐵郎 and Fukui Fumimasa 福井文雅 in Dōkyō 道教 3:218 ff., edited by Fukui Kōjun 福井康順 et al.; Qing Xitai 卿希泰, Zhongguo daojiao shi 4:479 ff.; Anna Seidel, "Chronicle of Taoist studies in the West 1950–1990," Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 5 (1990): 223–347; K. M. Schipper, "The history of Taoist studies in Europe," in Europe Studies China, 476–91, edited by Ming Wilson and John Cayley (London: Han-Shan Tang Books, 1995); F. Verellen, "Taoism," in Dan Overmyer ed., "Chinese religions: the state of the field (part 2)," Journal of Asian Studies 54 (1995): 322–46. Our introduction here does not highlight the contributions of Chinese scholars such as Xu Dishan 許地山 (1893–1941) and others, as their work did not primarily concern the Daozang and its sources.

126. Tenney Davis and Chen Kuo-fu, "The inner Chapters of the Pao Phu Tzu," Proceedings of the British Academy (1941): 74, 297.

and evidence. The result was his Daozang yuanliu kao 道藏源流考, a pioneer study of the history of the canon and many related topics. It was first published in 1949 and immediately exerted great influence on the then still nascent field. In 1963, a new enlarged edition was published, which comprised, in addition to the original study, a number of important essays, notably on the early Tianshi dao, on Taoist music, and on the history of Chinese alchemy. Chen's work, all the more because he was not a professional sinologist, commands deep admiration. It has been used by generations of students but never superseded. Yet it has one serious drawback. Chen's work admirably reconstructs the development of the old canon, from the Three Caverns of LU XIUJING to the last Xuandu baozang of the Quanzhen masters. But it does not devote any in-depth study to the sole Daozang that has come down to us, that of the Ming. Chen considered the classification system of the Zhengtong Daozang chaotic, and its editors inept.¹²⁷ Be that as it may, his work offers little help to those needing to find their way about the canon. In the end, despite its wealth of materials, Chen's historical study promises more than it delivers, by not taking into account the vast majority of modern texts contained in the Ming Daozang. In 1983 Chen published a sequel titled Daozang yuanliu xukao 道藏源流續考, but it is solely devoted to alchemy.¹²⁸

Daozang studies in Japan truly commenced with the work of Fukui Kōjun 福井康順, whose Dōkyō no kisoteki kenkyū 道教の基礎研究 (Fundamental research in religious Taoism, 1952) broke new ground and opened up the field. Chen Guofu's work exerted great influence in Japan, as can be seen from Yoshioka Yoshitoyo's 吉岡義豊 Dōkyō kyōten shiron 道教經典史論 (Treatise on the history of Taoist scriptures, 1956). Following in Chen's footsteps, Yoshioka added many new materials, notably from Buddhist sources and the Dunhuang manuscripts. Most useful for the new field of Daozang studies were the indexes of book titles occurring in Taoist handbooks and encyclopedias that Yoshioka appended to his study. These permitted tracing quotations and thus advancing the study of Taoist bibliography. Yoshioka continued in this way through a large number of groundbreaking publications. He further collaborated with young scholars from France and made their work known in Japan. Ōfuchi Ninji 大淵忍爾 also contributed immensely to the study of the Taoist canon. Besides reconstructing such scriptural monuments as the Dongyuan shenzhou jing and the ancient Lingbao jing, he collected and edited all of the Dunhuang manuscripts related to Taoism. He also made an important contribution to the study of Taoist ritual.

It was thanks to the works of these last three scholars that, at the time I studied the Han Wudi neizhuan 漢武帝內傳 as the subject of my dissertation, I was able to identify it as a literary work related to the Shangqing scriptures and to explain its 127. CGF 177.

128. Published by Mingwen shuju in Taipei, 1983.

narrative in terms of a ritual for the transmission of sacred texts.¹²⁹ This dissertation induced me to delve into the vast source material on liturgy in the Daozang, only to find it virtually incomprehensible. No guidance was available, whether from books or from field materials. Chavannes's groundbreaking study of the Lingbao ritual Casting of Dragons (tou longjian 投龍簡),¹³⁰ then the only study on the subject of Taoist ritual available, showed that he also had been at a loss as to the meaning of many aspects of the liturgy.

A few years later, in 1964, I was privileged to study with Taoist masters in Tainan (Taiwan) and for the first time to witness zhai 齋 and jiao 醮 services. The Lingbao Qingwei 靈寶清微 liturgy is relatively well preserved in southern Taiwan.¹³¹ The manuscripts handed down from generation to generation contain scriptures and rituals that in many cases are also found, in identical or cognate versions, in the Ming canon.

The study of the living tradition thus opened up a field that hitherto had remained inaccessible, and at the same time allowed us to progress in our understanding of the most important component of the canon. In order to facilitate the identification of manuscript sources and the exploration of the Daozang, I compiled a number of research aids. One of these was a concordance to the titles of the Ming canon, which was useful for identifying pertinent terms within the often long-winded and obscure titles of Taoist texts.¹³²

Thus, during my years in Taiwan (1962–1970), I began laying the groundwork for an overall study of the Ming Daozang. This enterprise, the dimensions of which I did not truly fathom initially, appeared timely as more and more case studies on specific scriptures and movements began appearing. However, these early, topical researches were often difficult to contextualize. Moreover, under the influence of Japanese scholarship, research on Taoism tended to focus increasingly on the Six Dynasties period. Later developments, with the exception of Quanzhen Taoism, remained virtually untouched. The discovery of the living traditions now made it possible, and necessary, to include these in our study as well.¹³³

129. See L'empereur Wen des Han.

130. Chavannes, "Le jet des dragons."

131. The rituals have been published by Ōfuchi Ninji, Chūgokujin no shūkyō girei.

132. First published as Concordance du Tao-tsang and again as a companion volume to the Yiwen yinshu guan reprint of the Zhengtong Daozang (Taiwan 1976), and, more recently, in a revised version published with Chen Yaoting 陳耀庭 as Daozang suoyin 道藏索引 by the Shanghai shudian in 1996. I made my own inventory of the contents. This resulted in a slightly different numbering of the texts. On the Yunji qiqian index, see below.

133. The dangers of introducing medieval data in the study of the contemporary field has

The Beginning of the Tao-tsang Project

At the European Conference of Chinese Studies in Paris in September 1976, I proposed to create a research program for the study of the Daozang. The aim was to provide the first comprehensive, systematic, and analytical bibliography of the Ming canon. All texts were to be investigated for their date, authorship, and significance, as well as abstracted. Indexes were to be made of all hard data the texts might contain. Finally the contents of the canon would be reorganized so as to contextualize each text by giving it a meaningful place in terms of modern scholarship. This reorganization would throw light on the historical evolution of Taoism and give the canon a transparency it had hitherto lacked.

The proposal obtained the sponsorship of the European Association of Chinese Studies, and work began right away. The headquarters of the project were established at the Center for Documentation and Research on Taoism of the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes (EPHE) in Paris. John Lagerwey undertook his study on the Wushang biyao, an important compendium in the history of medieval Taoism.

In 1978, the Tao-tsang Project was recognized by the European Science Foundation (ESF) as an "Additional Activity" of the Council for Humanities. The duration of that activity was set at four years (1979–1983). The ESF installed a steering committee for the project composed of Professors Wolfgang Bauer (Munich), Piet van der Loon (Oxford), Maxime Kaltenmark (EPHE, Paris), Hans Steininger (Würzburg), Erik Zürcher (Leiden), and myself. Three working groups were created, one in Paris, one in Würzburg, and at a later stage, one in Rome. The Paris working group consisted of Catherine Despeux, Caroline Gyss-Vermande, Marc Kalinowski, Pauline Koffler, Kwong Hing Foon, John Lagerwey, Christine Mollier and Isabelle Robinet. Four outside members, Poul Andersen from Copenhagen, Adrianus Dudink from Leiden, Denis Allistone from Zürich, and Franciscus Verellen from Oxford, were also integrated into the Paris working group.

The Würzburg working group included Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein, Ursula Angelika Cedzich, Florian Reiter, and Hans-Hermann Schmidt. The Rome group comprised Lydia Bonomi, Alfredo Cadonna, Giovanna Fulvi, Alessandra Lavagnino, Ritsuko Mazzei, Fabrizio Pregadio, and Giovanni Vitiello.

In addition to the subsidies provided by the European Science Foundation, several research organizations contributed to the undertaking. The Würzburg working group, under the direction of Hans Steininger, received two full and two part-time temporary research posts from the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft. Ph.D. scholarships were provided by the Nordic Institute of Asian Studies, the Dutch Organization for been aptly described by Strickmann, "History, anthropology, and Chinese religion," Harvard Journal of Asian Studies 40 (1980): 201–48.

Scientific Research, and the Swiss National Fund. The French Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique (CNRS) recognized and subsidized the project through the creation of a special cooperative research scheme, RCP no. 625 "Bibliographie taoïste." The participants held positions at the Ecole Française d'Extrême-Orient, the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes, the Universities of Paris III and of Aix-Marseille. Several junior members were in due time appointed as researchers at the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique. Pauline Koffler participated on a voluntary basis. The Rome group, under the guidance of Professor Giuliano Bertuccioli, received support from the Istituto Italiano per il Medio ed Estremo Oriente but provided no research posts or scholarships for its members.

The work was organized so as to progress in stages. First a number of training sessions and workshops were arranged in order to provide the participants with indispensable specialist skills. Professors Nathan Sivin (Pennsylvania), Michel Strickmann (UC Berkeley), Erik Zürcher, Piet van der Loon, and I conducted training sessions. Workshops took place in Würzburg, Paris, and Oxford. At a later stage, Professor Piet van der Loon invited individual participants to training sessions at his home in Oxford. Professor Jao Tsung-i (Hong Kong) was often consulted. Master Chen Yung-sheng (Tainan) was also called upon to share his immense knowledge of the liturgical tradition with the participants.

On the basis of provisional lists of works, classified according to period and groups of texts (subject or school), the participants were invited to choose the books they wished to study. They were encouraged not to restrict themselves to one particular group of texts, but to extend their acquaintance to a variety of different traditions and aspects of Taoism. As can be seen from the present work, this recommendation was only partly carried out. In spite of the precise guidelines elaborated by the steering committee in order to ensure consistency in the writing of the articles, the contributions of the participants reflected in many cases their individual approach. The editors have tried to respect this aspect of the articles as much as possible.

At the start, all texts needed to be indexed. All hard data such as book titles, names of persons, places, and temples, dates, deities, rites, and so on, were collected according to an established protocol. These data were then entered into a filing system. Soon, Professor Erik Zürcher convinced us to use a computer to establish an electronic data bank. This, in 1979 Europe, was still a pioneer undertaking. The data were entered in the mainframe computer of the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique at Orsay. That outfit had been designed for computation, not for what was soon to become, in the eyes of its engineers, a space-devouring monster occupying several megabytes! Each time the Tao-tsang Project needed to sort its data, the entire computer facility was blocked for part of the day. First the results were compiled on printouts that soon invaded all the available space of our small working room. Later they were processed on microfiches. The data were entered in pinyin transcription, as Chinese character codes were not available at the time. Mrs. Irène Schaeffer, the secretary of the Paris working group, did much for the organization and the advancement of the work. Thanks to her efforts, most of the texts had been indexed and processed after two years. The data bank, with its inevitable shortcomings, proved a workable and efficient tool for the "internal textual criticism" that had become our fundamental methodology.

Other important research aids were produced in the meantime. Thanks to the labors of Kwong Hing Foon, the Yunji qiqian index that I had begun in Taiwan was finally completed and copied out in her impeccable calligraphy for offset reproduction. John Lagerwey contributed a most useful study on the sources of the great encyclopedia. The first volume of the Index du Yunji qiqian appeared in 1981 and the second in 1982 at the Ecole Française d'Extrême-Orient. Professor Piet van der Loon prepared a critical bibliography of all Taoist works listed in the catalogues of the Song period. He added a study of his sources and of the history of the Song and Yuan canons. His Taoist books in the libraries of the Song constituted not only a great contribution to the Tao-tsang Project but also a model for all future bibliographical undertakings of this kind.

As a guideline for the writing of the articles it was recommended that authors concentrate on the date, the author, the nature and the historical context of the work. Although full evidence of bibliographical and historical findings were to be included, the articles were to be as succinct as possible, normally not more than one type-written page. A description of the contents was also to be included, but, again, limited: no "tables of contents"! We kept fast to the idea that we should aim to say the first word about a given text, not the last. Regular meetings took place within the working groups where the contributions were discussed and, as necessary, amended.

The Tao-tsang Project also maintained contacts with researchers in the Far East. In 1979 I visited the Institute of World Religions of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences and made a presentation of the project. The next year, Mrs. Wu Shouju 吳受琚 of that institute came to Paris, thanks to a scholarship of the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs. She participated in the working groups and workshops and was given full access to the research materials of the project available at that time. Mrs. Wu's experience, as well as the materials, proved to be useful for the work on the Daozang tiyao 道藏提要 that started in 1981 at the Institute of World Religions, under the direction of Professor Ren Jiyu 任繼愈.

Contact was also maintained with the Japanese Taoist scholars, especially with professor Fukui Fumimasa 福井文雅 of Waseda University. Thanks to his untiring support, two workshops were organized, one in Paris and one in Japan. The topics of the workshops were not directly related to the Tao-tsang Project, but at each occasion reports on the work in progress were presented and discussed. By the time the "Additional Activity" of the European Science Foundation and support of the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft came to an end in 1983, the project had advanced remarkably well. The data bank covered the most relevant portions of the canon, several important studies and working tools had been published, and, last but not least, almost 1,000 articles had been written. Nevertheless, the work was far from finished. Many articles had been revised and corrected, but many others remained first drafts. Moreover, they were written in four different languages: French, German, English, and Italian. In order to produce a scholarly publication with adequate indexes, these articles had to be translated into a single language. At the final sessions of the steering committee, it was decided that the work should be presented in English. I was entrusted with completing the work and editing it for publication. An initial deadline was set for 1993. Many more years proved necessary.

The Final Stage

Although much had been accomplished, still more work remained to be done. Fortunately, many collaborators agreed to translate their own contributions. Several hundred texts in the canon, however, had found no takers, and it fell mostly to myself to study and write about them.

The editing also presented a daunting challenge. In the spring of 1991, I was most fortunate to find Franciscus Verellen willing to join me in the task of editor. His contribution to the final stages of the writing, correcting, and editing of the manuscript has been immense. Working most of the time at different places and at different tasks, we had to find time in holidays and in our respective family surroundings to work together. This changed when, in 1995–1996, we obtained fellowships at the Netherlands Institute for Advanced Study in the Humanities and Social Sciences (NIAS) at Wassenaar. During this time we regularly worked together. The entire manuscript was revised and great advances were made in the reorganization of the materials.

Indeed, one of the main priorities of the project had always been to classify all the texts into appropriate categories. In order to open up the sources of Taoism, a new arrangement of the materials was an absolute necessity. Whatever value the classification into Three Caverns, Four Supplements, and Twelve Categories may have had historically, it was abundantly clear that this system had outlived its usefulness by the time it came to be applied to the contents of the Ming Daozang. Other criteria, such as the distinction between Daojia and Daojiao, were also not viable. An innovative approach was needed.

An overall organization based on historical principles, while at the same time incorporating a scheme of typological classification, emerged as the most meaningful. For the chronological framework, three broad periods were distinguished:

1. From the Eastern Zhou to the Six Dynasties
2. Sui, Tang and Five Dynasties
3. The Song, Yuan, and Ming

This division proved significant and operable with respect to the long-term evolution of Taoist textual traditions. Within the periodic divisions, we introduced a scheme of typological classification that produced, to the extent that this was historically justifiable, a consistent pattern of categories across periods.

For each period, a first distinction was made between (A) "Texts in general circulation" and (B) "Texts in restricted circulation." Although Taoist institutions as well as the diffusion of texts changed in the course of time, the ritual tradition of initiation and ordination was always maintained. Even today, Taoist scriptures continue to be copied by hand and transmitted confidentially from master to disciple. When a given work could be classified on both sides of this distinction, cross-references were supplied.

To the chronological and typological divisions we added a third level of distinction, that of the individual groups of texts in each major subdivision. Choosing these groups and sorting the texts into each of them involved a long period of trial and error. We were not guided by any dogmatic conception but aimed to approach the problem empirically and to let the texts speak for themselves. It became clear that within the category of texts in general circulation, a classification according to subject was the most appropriate, whereas for those in restricted circulation, the different traditions, movements, schools, and orders to which the texts belonged offered the most suitable framework. Eventually, appropriate slots for almost all texts were found. The groups were arranged as systematically as possible, facilitating the survey of a given branch of Taoist literature from one period to another. For most of the final groupings, short introductions have been added, explaining their rationale and composition.

The majority of choices, whether with regard to conceptual categories or to the placement of specific texts within them, should be unproblematic. Yet some will undoubtedly cause surprise or raise objections. I can say only that certain decisions, such as classifying the Zhouyi cantong qi as a Tang work or the Zhenyuan 真元 texts as Ming, have not been taken lightly. In the case of hybrid texts that contain old material together with later additions and alterations, a form of arbitration had to be adopted. When the additions and modifications significantly affected the nature of the text, the later date was chosen. In cases where the subsequent changes could be considered minor (taboo characters, secondary glosses), the earlier date was maintained. These decisions involved much time and deliberation.

During the final stage, the editors were joined by a number of new contributors: Dr. Vincent Goossaert (CNRS), Dr. Jan De Meyer (Leiden), and Dr. Yuan Bingling 袁冰凌 (Leiden and Fuzhou) wrote articles and introductions. On the editorial level,

Mrs. Shum Wing Fong 岑詠芳, Mrs. Fang Ling 方玲, and Mr. Pierre Marsone contributed greatly to the work of correcting the manuscript and completing the bibliography and biographical notices. Special mention must be made of the contribution of Feng Congde 封從德, who wrote a computer program for the conversion of the Wade-Giles romanization system into Pinyin and supervised the electronic entry of the Chinese characters.

The preparation of the final manuscript was entirely coordinated by Franciscus Verellen. He also resolved the problem of formatting the text and directed the revisions of the drafts and the compilation of the bibliographic and biographical sections.

New Perspectives

In the meantime, work continued in other places. Dr. Judith Magee Boltz set out in 1981 to study the Taoist canon, paying special attention to post-Tang literature. This focus led her to read and analyze some 300 Song, Yuan, and Ming texts and collections. Her remarkable study A survey of Taoist literature, tenth to seventeenth centuries presents and discusses much of the historical, hagiographic, and literary materials from these periods and places them in their cultural context. Other young scholars in the United States also have turned to Taoist studies, setting a new trend in the American sinological environment.

Scholarly progress also continued in Japan. Thanks to the pioneering work of the great Japanese scholars, interest in Taoism grew rapidly, especially after World War II. The Dōkyō Gakkai 道教學會 became one of the prominent learned societies in the field of Chinese and Japanese studies. Its journal, the Tōhō shūkyō 東方宗教, has published many important contributions to the field. Excellent monographs, especially on Six Dynasties Taoism, have been produced in the research center of Kyoto, together with valuable research aides, such as the Concordance on the Zhen'gao, Shinkō sakuin 真誥索引, by Professor Mugitani Kunio 麥谷邦夫. Great efforts were also made to introduce Taoist studies to a wider public. These efforts resulted in the successful three-volume encyclopedic work Dōkyō, which presented the state of the art to nonspecialists and included for the first time, next to historical studies, reports on the living liturgical tradition. This work was soon translated into Chinese and has exerted a considerable influence.

In China, the recent progress in Taoist studies has been great. The Daozang tiyao 道藏提要 appeared in 1991. It was the work of young Taoist scholars of the Institute of Religions of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. Apart from the above-mentioned Wu Shouju, these scholars included Chen Bing 陳兵, Wang Ka 王卡, Zhu Yueli 朱越利, and others, under the guidance of Professors Ren Jiyu 任繼愈 and Zhong Zhaopeng 鍾肇鵬. Taking into account the difficult conditions and the tight schedule for the writing of this work, it is a great accomplishment.

This research on the contents of the canon proved to be a powerful incentive for further initiatives. The Daozang was reprinted, this time not from the 1926 Hanfen lou reproduction, but from the original Ming copies preserved in China.¹³⁴ The new reprint proved to be a great success. In its wake, Professor Chen Yaoting 陳耀庭 of the Shanghai Academy of Social Sciences published two series of Taoist texts that had not previously been part of the canon, under the title of Zangwai daoshu 藏外道書.¹³⁵ Other important texts were published in modern typeset editions. Taoist dictionaries and studies, too many to be enumerated here also appeared. The Taoist Association of China (Zhongguo Daojiao xiehui 中國道教協會) has undertaken the compilation of a new Taoist canon, to be called Zhonghua daozaang 中華道藏.

Meanwhile, at Peking University, Professor Tang Yijie 湯一介 created the Center for Research on Taoism (Daojiao yanjiu shi 道教研究室). This development was followed by Professor Chen Guying 陳鼓應, who stimulated research on the classical Taoist texts with his new editions and commentaries and with the publication of the scholarly journal Daojia wenhua yanjiu 道家文化研究.

The other important center of Taoist studies in China is Chengdu. There, at Sichuan University as well as the Sichuan Academy of Social Sciences, many scholars work under the guidance of Professor Qing Xitai 卿希泰. After a number of provisional publications, his complete History of Chinese Taoism (Zhongguo daojiao shi 中國道教史) in four volumes has recently been completed. Here, too, we may say that, as a first complete historical study, it is a true achievement. The Sichuan center publishes the journal Zongjiao xue yanjiu 宗教學研究.

In Taiwan, Professor Li Fengmao 李豐楙 of the Academia Sinica has launched an ambitious program for the digitalization of the entire Ming canon. Not only the texts will be entered on computer file, but also all diagrams, talismans, and illustrations. Much research is being done to overcome the technical challenges of this vast project.

* * *

One century ago, Taoism was threatened with death. The society in which it lived and that it informed to a far greater degree than has been generally assumed was rapidly disintegrating. It had, indeed, for the greater part, ceased to exist. Its temples and monasteries had been expropriated or destroyed, its scriptural legacy was on the brink of being irrevocably lost. One hundred years ago, no scholar had yet undertaken any serious study of Taoism's history and literature. Today, Taoism revives. Although still

134. Jointly published by the Wenwu chubanshe 文物出版社, the Shanghai shudian 上海書店, and the Tianjin guji chubanshe 天津古籍出版社.

135. Compiled by Hu Daojing 胡道靜 et al.

far from its former glory, it is not likely that it will encounter in the near future the kind of crises it has weathered in the past. We may expect with some confidence that Taoism will regain a new lease of vitality, purified and strengthened by its ordeals.

In this renaissance, the work of scholars has its modest place. We have always felt it to be a great privilege to study these important materials and explore their meaning for the history of the human spirit. To be sure, the results of our labors are far from perfect and will invite many corrections. We hope that these may be forthcoming, and that other studies will soon improve on the work presented in these volumes.

Part I

Eastern Zhou to Six Dynasties

1.A Texts in General Circulation

This section contains the works of ancient Taoist philosophers or those who were assigned to this school by tradition. Foremost among these works is the Laozi or Daode jing, which was canonized as a classic (jing 經) probably in the early Han period (206 B.C.–A.D. 220).

Later, the Daode jing, also known as the Text in Five Thousand Characters (Wuqian wen 五千文), became the fundamental scripture of Heavenly Master Taoism which transmitted it alongside with the Xiang'er 想爾 commentary. The transmission of the Text in Five Thousand Characters constituted a distinct degree in the hierarchy of ordination grades as officially established during the Northern Zhou dynasty (557–581) (see 1138 Wushang biyao 37 for the corresponding transmission ritual). Later, with the division into Seven Parts (qibu 七部) by WANG YAN, the Daode jing and its canonical commentaries constituted the Taixuan bu (see 1238 Chuanshou jingjie yi zhujue for the ordination ritual corresponding to the ranks of disciple of the Golden Button [jinniu dizi 金鈕弟子] and of master of the Rites of Divine High Mystery [taishang gaoxuan fashi 太上高玄法師]). In the Ming canon, the Daode jing and other philosophical scriptures made up the core of the Dongshen bu (see general introduction).

The incorporation of philosophical works of the preimperial period into the Taoist canon has been a controversial issue. The Zhuangzi, although not a jing before the eighth century A.D., was very influential in Han Taoism and later, and thus its inclusion can be justified. The same obtains for the Liezi 列子 and such later Taoist philosophical texts as the Wenzi 文子, the Huainan zi 淮南子, and so on. However, the Ming canon also contains the Mozi 墨子, the Han Fei zi 韓非子, the Gongsun Long zi 公孫龍子, and others. There is evidence that the Mozi goes back to a copy in the Song canon (see Wu Yujiang, Mozi jiaozhu).

In incorporating these texts, the compilers of the Ming canon continued a well-established tradition that goes back to the above-mentioned WANG YAN. His Xuandu jingmu catalogue was presented to the throne in 570, and it contained a great number of philosophical texts (zhuzi lun 諸子論). In his Xiaodao lun (9.153b), Zhen Luan criticizes the fact that the canon contained the Han Fei zi, the Huainan zi, the Taixuan jing 太玄經, the Yilin 易林, and the Huangdi jingui 黃帝金匱, all works still present in the Ming canon. Among the works now lost but cited by Zhen Luan as incorporated into the Northern Zhou canon are the oracle manuals Lianshan 連山 and Guizang 歸藏. Interestingly enough, even the Mengzi 孟子 was considered to be a Taoist canon (see CGF 108). The collection of Taoist books under the Northern Zhou was undertaken against the background of the Buddhist and Taoist controversies of the time. It would appear from the above-mentioned evidence that the compilers aimed at defining Taoism as the way of thought and ritual in ancient China, representing all those traditions of Chinese thought that were not explicitly Confucian (the Mengzi became recognized as a fundamental Confucian scripture only in Song times).

Later, the editors of the Siku quanshu echoed Zhen Luan's indignation, when discussing the contents of the Ming canon in their article concerning the Daozang mulu xiangzhu by Bo Yunji. What they and many Qing scholars with them failed to acknowledge, was that without the Daozang many precious philosophical texts (such as the Mozi, the Gongsun Long zi, and others) would have been irretrievably lost.

The Ming canon contains a number of philosophical texts in plain, un-annotated versions, presented as Fundamental Scriptures (benwen 本文). These are the Laozi and the Zhuangzi. Other ancient philosophic texts, such as the Wenzi, are represented by annotated versions of a later date only. These works are discussed under the period when their commentaries were written. In this chapter they are only listed, with the indication as to where the relevant article can be found.

1.A.1 Philosophy

1.A.1.a Texts

Daode zhenjing 道德真經

2 juan

Attributed to Laozi 老子 (traditional date sixth century B.C.); Warring States (475–221 B.C.)

664 (fasc. 346)

"The True Scripture of the Way and Its Virtue." This is the book of Laozi as Fundamental Scripture (benwen 本文), without commentary. Sima Qian, in his biography of Laozi, speaks already of Laozi's book "in two parts, expounding the meaning of the Way and Its Virtue, in some five thousand words 著書上下篇, 言道德之意, 五千餘言" (Shiji 63.2141). Thanks to the manuscripts found at Mawang dui (see 665 Daode jing guben pian), we know that the present division into two parts and the title of The Book of the Way and its Virtue was already current at the beginning of the Han dynasty (206 B.C.–A.D. 220). The present version is, moreover, divided in zhangju 章 句 chapters amounting to the symbolic number of eighty-one, an arrangement that probably dates from the Later Han period (A.D. 25–220). The titles of these chapters correspond to those of the HESHANG GONG commentary (see 682 Daode zhenjing zhu). The word zhen (true) in the title of the present version became current in Tang times (618–907). Part of the original text (1.8b–10b) has been lost, and the missing passages have been replaced with the corresponding ones of 665 Daode jing guben pian.

Recent research places the date of Laozi's book in the fourth century B.C., during the Warring States period, but some parts of the text may well be older, considering the vocabulary and the rhymes used. The Mawang dui versions show already displaced and corrupt passages. The division of the book into two parts, on Tao and De, on ontology and strategy, is not clearly evident in the respective contents, while the division into eighty-one chapters makes the text appear as a series of separate axiomatic statements. Doing away with this division, and reading the text as a continuous discourse, allows one to determine a few instances where formerly separated parts might be linked. The book as a whole, however, does not read as a systematically developed argument. It must have been from the beginning a collection of short axiomatically paradoxical texts, compiled without particular order. The original number of these texts is difficult to assess. There may have been fifty-five (see 1177 Han Fei zi) or seventy-two (see 693 Daode zhenjing zhigui, preface, 4b) before the present division into eighty-one.

Although the exact place of Laozi's book in Taoist tradition has been, and will continue to be, a much debated issue, its dominant position since antiquity is clear. Indeed, the book deals with the major topics of Taoism with a depth and insight that have earned it the place of the religion's foremost scripture.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chan Wing-tsit, The Way of Lao Tzu; Henricks, "The Mawangdui manuscripts of the Laozi"; Karlgren, "The poetical parts in Lao-tsi"; Luo Genze, ed. Gushi pian 4; Ma Xulun, Laozi jiaoguo; Wang Zhongmin, Laozi kao; Yan Lingfeng, Zhongwai Laozi zhushu mulu; Yan Lingfeng, Mawang dui boshu; Xu Fuguan, "Boshu Laozi."

Kristofer Schipper

Daode jing guben pian 道德經古本篇

2 juan

Edited by Fu Yi 傅奕 (555–639)

665 (fasc. 346)

"Ancient Recension of the Book of the Way and Its Virtue." This is the plain text of the Laozi, without commentary, based on a manuscript discovered in A.D. 574 at Pengcheng 彭城 (Xuzhou, Jiangsu), in the tomb of a concubine of Xiang Yu 項羽 (233–202 B.C.). See 770 Hunyuan shengji 3.20a. The date as well as the stylistic characteristics of the present text establish a relationship with the manuscripts of the Laozi found in 1973 in Han tomb no. 3 at Mawangdui near Changsha (Hunan). The division into a Daopian 道篇 and a Depian 德篇 may therefore well correspond to the original arrangement of the text, while the arrangement into eighty-one chapters, according to the so-called Heshang gong zhangju, as well as the indications on the number of characters in each chapter are probably of Fu Yi's own devising.

The present text contains 5,556 characters, almost 300 more than the HESHANG GONG commentary version of 682 Daode zhenjing zhu, which has 5,274. None of these numbers correspond to the indications supposedly given by Fu Yi on the versions he examined in his time: 5,722 characters for the manuscript found at Pengcheng, 5,683 or 5,610 for the WANG BI commentary version, and 5,555 or 5,590 for the HESHANG GONG commentary version (770 Hunyuan shengji 3.20a). The present text, however, shows greater affinities to the extant WANG BI edition than to that attributed to HESHANG GONG.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chen Guying, Lao Zhuang xinlun; Xu Fuguan, "Boshu Laozi."

Kristofer Schipper

Nanhua zhenjing 南華真經

5 juan

Attributed to Zhuang Zhou 莊周 (second half of the fourth century B.C.) and his followers

670 (fasc. 349–351)

"True Canon of the Southern Florescence." This is an unannotated edition of the Zhuangzi, under the canonical title bestowed on it by Emperor Xuanzong in 742. This edition is part of a series, comprising also the Guanyin zi (667 Wushang miaodao wenshi zhenjing), the Liezi (668 Chongxu zhide zhenjing), and the Gengsang zi (669 Dongling zhenjing). Each of these editions has a preface and a portrait of the sage in question. The origin of this small collection of the four Taoist authors canonized by Xuanzong is unknown. Sparse indications in the different prefaces make it appear later than the Song period. The preface of the present Nanhua zhenjing is mostly abstracted from Zhuang Zhou's biography in the Shiji. The division into five juan does not respect the arrangement into inner, outer, and miscellaneous chapters.

Zhuang Zhou was a southerner, that is, he came from the region south of the Yellow River. His native place, according to the sparse information we have from the Shiji and a few other records, appears to have been the township of Meng, a place near the present town of Shangqiu in Henan province, in a region at the intersection of Shandong, Jiangsu, and Anhui provinces. It was part of the ancient state of Song, and Zhuang Zhou is often referred to as a man of Song. After the fall of Song in 286 B.C., the region fell into the hands of other principalities, including Chu. As a result, Zhuang Zhou is also known as a native of Chu.

The dates of Zhuang Zhou are tentative, but most scholars agree with the affirmation in the Shiji that he lived during the times of King Hui 惠 of Wei 魏 (r. ca. 369–325). He was also invited to the court of King Wei 威 of Chu 楚 (r. ca. 339–328). The exact dates of these King s are still under discussion, but grosso modo this means that Zhuang Zhou was active during the second half of the fourth century. Liu Xiaogan gives his dates tentatively as 369–286 B.C. (Liu, Classifying the Zhuangzi chapters, 41) which would make Zhuang Zhou a contemporary of Mengzi 孟子 (tentative dates 372–289).

According to the Shiji, the book of Zhuangzi amounted to more than 100,000 characters. The Han shu, "Yiwen zhi," 30.1730 lists the Zhuangzi as having fifty-two chapters (pian 篇), comprising seven inner, twenty-eight outer, fourteen miscellaneous, and three additional chapters with "explanations" (jieshuo 解說). The present edition of the Zhuangzi has only 70,000 characters, and the inner and miscellaneous chapters number, respectively, fifteen and eleven; no trace remains of the "explanations." The Shiji mentions explicitly the chapters "Youfu," "Daozhi," and "Quqie," which occupy today the position of chapters 31, 29 (miscellaneous chapters, zapien 雜篇) and 10 (outer chapters, waipian 外篇).

GUO XIANG (d. 312) is generally regarded as the editor of today's version in thirty-three chapters. According to his preface (see Guo Qingfan, Zhuangzi jishi), he considered sizeable parts of the work spurious or superfluous and therefore discarded them. Problematically, virtually none of the discarded texts have survived elsewhere.

There is a general consensus for ascribing the seven so-called inner chapters (neipian 內篇) to the author. These stand apart from the others in language, style, and vocabulary. They also have distinct three-character titles, enunciating what may be considered to be their main themes (e.g., "Xiaoyao you," Free and easy wandering), whereas the other chapters (with the exception of chapters 28 to 31) are simply named after their opening words. The distinctiveness and comparatively earlier date for the inner chapters have been demonstrated by Liu Xiaogan. Liu's arguments are based on the vocabulary of the inner chapters and on the more circumstantial, but evident, fact that much of the text in the other chapters consists of explanations and developments of writings contained in the inner chapters.

The dating of the outer and miscellaneous chapters is far more problematic. The general opinion, notably voiced by Graham, is that they come from different periods, the latest, such as the “Tianxia” chapter (33) being early Han (206 B.C.–A.D. 220). Some sets of chapters, such as the above-mentioned series of 28 to 31, are distinguished by thematic, two-character titles. Graham thinks these chapters come from a different school of thought, that of the hedonist Yang Zhu 楊朱. Liu Xiaogan considers such an assumption unnecessary. The book of Zhuangzi is quoted extensively in the Liushi chunqiu 呂氏春秋 (compiled ca. 239 B.C.), in such a way that suggests it had found its definitive shape by that time.

In spite of the long period during which the text of the book was written (roughly between 340 B.C. and A.D. 240), there is a great coherence and unity of thought in the entire work, even if the influence of other schools of thought is very much in evidence in the later chapters. These chapters do, however, refer time and again to passages in the inner chapters, which does convey the impression that parts of the outer and miscellaneous chapters are equally old (this cross-referencing has inspired Graham to supplement the text of the inner chapters with excerpts from the others).

We may conclude that the Zhuangzi is the recipient of the writings of a single tradition, that it was constitutive of the way of thought that later came to be called Taoist and that the older and the newer parts together are representative of the evolution of this thought during the century that preceded the hegemony of Legalism and the united empire (third century B.C.).

Taking this into consideration, we may say that the Zhuangzi displays a marked absence of political thought, at least in the inner chapters. This absence contrasts with all contemporary schools, with the exception of the Logicians (mingjia 名家). The relationship with the latter school is evident, but also of a controversial nature. The Zhuangzi is truly philosophical inasmuch as its object of investigation is human knowledge and its relationship to cognition in all its forms. Zhuang Zhou’s epistemology goes farther than most observers have noted. Most striking is his treatment of mythology and religion. The mythical fish and bird (the iconography of both is present on Warring States bronzes) are compared with ordinary animals and found lacking: too cumbersome! When Laozi sits in meditation with unfastened hair, this is not in conformity with a ritual prescription, but “because he had just bathed” and needed to let his hair dry. Through bodily exercises of the “nurturing life” kind, old Pengzu 彭祖 lived only 800 years: what a pity! Humor is Zhuang Zhou’s foremost maieutic tool.

The treatment the Zhuangzi gives to logic is most remarkable: in the famous “Discussion on the Equality of Things,” the discourse of logic is used to surpass causality and open the way to total understanding, which can be reached through intuition or through dream and trance states. Here Zhuang Zhou proceeds from the background of what may be called Chinese shamanism toward universal mysticism. Mystical truth (zhen 真) is innate, familiar yet unknowable. The opposition between this inward knowledge of the Taoist and the outward projected knowledge of the shaman—portrayed respectively as Master Gourd and as Wuxian the great shaman of antiquity, in the seventh chapter, “Rejoining the Supreme Ruler”—illustrates this mystical approach to knowledge. Although the very disciple of Master Gourd finds the two “ways” difficult to distinguish, the Master confounds the shaman, because the latter is limited to the phenomenal world, whereas the Gourd incapacitates the original chaos. Here the message of the Zhuangzi is truly Taoist.

The Zhuangzi is no doubt one of the most penetrating and beautiful books written in Chinese and also one of the masterworks of world literature. Its influence on Chinese culture—and on Far Eastern culture in general—has been profound, not only on Taoism but on Confucianism and Buddhism as well. Having been canonized as a “classic” only in the eighth century, the Zhuangzi did not suffer from undue exegetical scholasticism: every reader could approach its message unencumbered by considerations of orthodoxy, hence the vast array of different commentaries. The Daozang of the Ming features more than ten editions of these.

The Zhuangzi’s influence on every part of Taoism has been considerable. We find allusions to and quotations from the Zhuangzi in early works of Tending Life practices, in the poems of the 1016 Zhen’gao, and in the hymns of the Lingbao canon.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chen Guying, Lao Zhuang xinlun; Graham, Chuang-tzu; Liu Xiaogan, Zhuangzi zhexue ji qi yanbian; Liu Xiaogan, Classifying the Zhuangzi chapters; Schipper, Zhuang Zi; Tan Shibao, “Dunhuang wenshu Nanhua zhenjing.”

Kristofer Schipper

Tongxuan zhenjing 通玄真經

12 juan

746 (fasc. 520–522)

“True Scripture of Communion with Mystery.” This text corresponds to the Taoist philosophical work Wenzi. It is present in the Daozang with the commentary by Xu Lingfu 徐靈府 (ca. 809–815), and the article is therefore listed in part 2.A.1.a.

Chongxu zhide zhenjing 冲虚至德真经

3 juan

Attributed to Lie Yukou 列禦寇 (early fourth century)

668 (fasc. 348)

“True Scripture of the Void and Supreme Virtue.” The philosophical work Liezi 列子 has been known under this title since 1007. It had previously been granted the title Chongxu zhenjing in 742 (Jiu Tang shu 24.926; Songchao da zhaoling ji 135.1a).

列子

FIGURE 1. Liezi (668 1a). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/663)

According to Graham's study, the work's textual history is as follows: A Liezi in eight pian 篇, first mentioned in the bibliographic chapters of the Han shu 30.1730, was listed as lost at an early date. Liu Xiang's 劉向 (ca. 77–76 B.C.) memorial presenting the collated text, however, is preserved. In the first half of the fourth century, a Liezi, the contents of which fit Liu Xiang's description, was written, probably by the grandfather or father of Zhang Zhan 張湛 (fl. 370). Zhang Zhan was the first to write a commentary on this text. In the preface to his commentary, Zhang describes the transmission of the work (cf. 732 Chongxu zhide zhenjing sijie; for a summary and analysis of this preface, see Graham, “Date and composition,” 144 ff.).

The present edition contains interspersed phonetic annotations and is preceded by an illustrated brief biography of Liezi (fig. 1; from 163 Xuanyuan shizi tu).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Graham, “The date and composition of the Liehtzyy”;
Graham, The book of Lieh-tzu.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Yin Wen zi 尹文子

2 juan

Attributed to Yin Wen 尹文 (second half of the fifth century B.C.)

1173 (fasc. 840)

“Book of the Philosopher Yin Wen.” This book is mentioned, as comprising one chapter, in the section on logicians (mingjia 名家) of the bibliographical treatise in Han shu 30.1736. Yin Wen is said to have lived and taught at the famous Jixia academy at Qi during the reign of Duke Huan (455–405 B.C.) and to have known Gongsun

Long zi 公孫龍子. The Daozang edition has a preface by a certain Mr. Zhongchang 仲長氏 of Shanyang 山陽 (in modern Shandong), who states that he obtained the text at Luoyang during the Huangchu era (A.D. 220–226) and edited it in two juan. Several scholars have pointed out that this must be Zhongchang Tong 仲長統, a scholar of the late Han who came from Shanyang. The latter figure, however, died in A.D. 220.

The authors of the Siku quanshu zongmu tiyao classified the work under “Eclectics” (zajia 雜家) and identified its contents as a mixture of Huang-Lao Taoism and fajia 法家 legalism. They did not express serious doubts as to its authenticity. Modern scholarship has been less generous. Not only is the history of the transmission of the text full of contradictions, but the text itself is shallow and facile and manifestly draws on later works, such as certain passages from the Zhuangzi. By general consensus, the present text is a late forgery.

Kristofer Schipper

Mozi 墨子

15 juan

By Mo Di 墨翟 (active late fifth century B.C.) and his followers

1176 (fasc. 843–845)

The Daozang edition of the Mozi comprises seventy-one chapters. Eighteen have been lost. This is nevertheless the most complete version of the writings of Mo Di and his school that has come down to us. All modern editions are based on it.

Bi Yuan has remarked (Mozi zhu 1.1a) that the Daozang edition observes the taboo on the character kuang 匡 in the personal name of Song emperor Taizu. The present edition therefore appears to be based on a Song version and may have originally formed part of the Tiangong baozang.

The text has no annotation. It is divided into chapters as follows: juan 1, chapters 1 to 7, contains short sayings by Mozi and dialogues on a great variety of topics; juan 2 to 9 contain the thirty-nine famous Essays, each topic being covered by three successive chapters; juan 10 and 11 contain the chapters on Mohist logic (40–45; chapter 46 is found at the end of juan 11 but belongs to the next category); juan 12 and 13 contain the dialogues, in Lunyu style, between Mo Di and his disciples, comprising chapters 46 (in juan 11) to 51; juan 14 and 15 contain the so-called military chapters.

A discussion as to the authenticity and dating of the Mohist canon falls outside the scope of the present bibliography. The question that should be raised here is why the Mozi was included in the Taoist canon at all. Specific reasons have been studied by S. Durrant. Durrant quotes the hagiography of Mozi in the Shenxian zhuan (given in Taiping guangji 5 and authenticated by a citation in 1248 Sandong qunxian lu 16.3a), and also draws attention to the important place given to Mozi's Taoist arts in BPZ and elsewhere in the Shenxian zhuan. Mozi is also mentioned as an immortal in 1016 Zhen'gao 5.12a. All this would suggest that Mozi was the object of a popular cult in early medieval China and had become a Taoist saint.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Durant, "The problem of the inclusion of Mozi in the Daozang," appendix to "An examination of textual and grammatical problems in Mozi" (Ph.D. diss., University of Washington, 1975).

Kristofer Schipper

Han Fei zi 韓非子

20 juan

Han Fei 韓非 (d. 233 B.C.)

1177 (fasc. 846–849)

"Book of Master Han Fei." The book itself is preceded by Liu Xiang's 劉向 (ca. 77–76 B.C.) presentation of it by way of a preface. The text found in the Daozang belongs to the group of editions in fifty-three pian. Its source is probably the same as that of the edition printed by He Fan 何夔 (1267), which was based on the copy of the imperial library. He Fan removed the annotations that are preserved in the Daozang version as well as in the 1165 edition of Huang sanba lang 黃三八郎. Reproduced in the encyclopedias of the beginning of the Song (960–1279) period (TPYL, YJQQ, etc.), these notes probably date from the Tang dynasty (618–907). They may be Li Zan's 李贄 (see He Fan's preface, Han Fei zi yuping 韓非子迂評).

The present version in the Daozang does not correspond to the quotations made by Gu Guangqi in his Han Fei zi shiwu, published in 1816.

An extract of the Zhu dao 主道 is quoted in YJQQ 1.6b (1.14a–15a) between two commentaries on the Laozi. Here, the notes are presented in an abbreviated form. This synthesis of the notion of true power contains Jielao 解老, which may be the earliest extant commentary on the Daode jing.

Jean Lévi

Huangshi gong sushu 黃石公素書

21 fols.

Preface and commentary by ZHANG SHANGYING 張尚英, zi Tianjue 天覺

(1043–1121)

1179 (fasc. 849)

"Book of Simplicity by the Duke of the Yellow Stone." Huangshi gong is the legendary figure said to have given Zhang Liang 張良 the Art of War by Taigong (Taigong bingfa 太公兵法; Shiji 55.2034–35). The existence of a Sushu attributed to him is attested only in the early twelfth century (VDL 145–46). Zhang's exegesis is the oldest preserved commentary to this work. The Tongzhi 68.7a lists commentaries by LÜ HUIQING (1032–1111) that are otherwise unknown, except that the Zhizhai shulu jieti 12.361 names Lü as the author of a Sanlie sushu jie 三略素書解 in one juan.

Zhang writes in his preface that the Sushu is the very text that Zhang Liang received from Huangshi gong. During the Jin dynasty (265–420), robbers broke into Zhang Liang's tomb and found the book in his jade headrest. According to Zhang, the text comprised 1,336 words.

In reality, the present main text has 1,257 characters. It is identical with the version in Shuofu 90.14b–17a. A Sushu citation in 1017 Daoshu 20.4a also derives from this version of the text (19b).

Doubts about the authenticity of the Sushu were expressed at an early date (Junzhai dushu zhi 11.486–87; Yuhai 140.19b), and since Ming times an increasing number of voices name ZHANG SHANGYING as the author of the text (e.g., Tingyu jitan 21b–22a). Such an attribution can be neither proved nor excluded today. But considering the period of its emergence and the "textual history" as told by Zhang, it is not unlikely that Zhang really was the author.

The text, divided into six sections, gives general recommendations for ethical conduct (1–4) and advice for political and military governance (5–6), often exemplified in the commentary by historical events. A number of passages (1a–3a; 14b; 20b) come from the Huangshi gong sanlie.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bauer, "Der Herr vom gelben Stein"; Schmidt, Die drei Strategien.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Huainan honglie jie 淮南鴻烈解

28 juan

Commentary attributed to Xu Shen 許慎 (d. A.D. 124)

1184 (fasc. 863–867)

"Explanations on the Great Achievements by [the Prince of] Huainan." The philosophical work Huainan zi was written at the court of Liu An 劉安, prince of Huainan (179–122 B.C.), and was presented to the emperor Wu in 139 B.C. (see Han shu 44.2145, where it is called "neishu 內書," in twenty-one pian 篇).

In his preface, Gao You 高誘 provides information about the life of Liu An and the work Huainan zi, which he, Gao, had received from Lu 盧 [Zhi 植] (d. A.D. 192). In 205, Gao began to write his commentary. Later on, eight chapters of this commentary were lost, and Gao made up the deficiency only in A.D. 212. Earlier, toward the end of the first century, Xu Shen had written explanations on the Huainan zi. Although only Xu Shen is named as the author of the commentary in the present edition, it was in fact a composite work: the commentaries on juan 16, 17, 18, 21, 22, 25, 27, and 28 are by Xu Shen, all the others are by Gao You.

As an independent work, Gao's commentary in twenty-one juan was lost by the early eighth century, Xu's (also in twenty-one juan) by the late tenth century. Versions in which both commentaries were merged did, however, already exist in the seventh century, and by the eleventh century only this composite kind of Huainan zi commentary was available, with the entire commentary attributed solely to either Xu or Gao.

By subdividing seven juan into shang 上 and xia 下, the Daozang edition arrives at a total number of twenty-eight juan. Of all extant versions, this is closest to the Northern Song edition reproduced in Sibu congkan 四部叢刊.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Roth, Textual history.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Guigu zi 鬼谷子

3 juan

Attributed to Guigu zi 鬼谷子; fourth century B.C.

1025 (fasc. 671)

"Master of the Ghost Vale." Tradition considers the Master of the Ghost Vale to have been the teacher of Su Qin 蘇秦 (d. 317 B.C.) and Zhang Yi 張儀 (d. 309 B.C.) and thus declares him the ancestor of the school of diplomats (Zongheng jia 縱橫家) of the Warring States period (475–221 B.C.). The legendary philosopher is supposed to have styled himself after the location of his retreat.

The questions of the authorship and origin of the work transmitted under this name and the presence of many parallels with the Guanzi 管子 (Guanzi tongjie 2: 197–202 corresponds to our text 2.33b–39a) and especially throughout the Dengxi zi 鄧析子 have up to now remained unresolved.

Although Shuoyuan 11.1a–b contains a quotation of Guigu zi that cannot be traced, a book of this title was described neither by Liu Xiang nor by his son, nor is it listed in the Han shu, "Yiwen zhi." In its table of contents, the Qilu 七錄 lists two texts, together totaling five juan, under the category "Zongheng" (Guang hongming ji 3.110c). With reference to a statement in the Yue Yi 樂壹 commentary that Su Qin wrote under the pseudonym Guigu zi, the Qilu presumably attributed the authorship of Guigu zi to Su Qin (Shiji, Zhengyi commentary in Yuhai 53.21b–22a). Su Qin's works, listed in Han shu 30.1739 as comprising thirty-one pian 篇, were in part retrieved in Mawang dui in 1973 (see Mawang dui hanmu boshu zhengli xiaozu, Zhanguo zongheng jia shu), but no conclusions about Guigu zi can be drawn from them.

The Guigu zi really enters history only after Yue Yi (of whom we merely know that he came from Lu commandery 魯郡 and probably lived in the fourth century) and presumably Huangfu Mi 皇甫謐 (215–282) annotated the book. According to Sui shu 29.1005, both versions comprised three juan. Quotations in Song shu 18.496, in the Zichao 子鈔 by Yu Zhongrong 庾仲容 (476–549)—as preserved in 1262 Yilin 2.15b–16b), based on Yue Yi's redaction—and in the Beitang shuchao (passim) indicate the existence of a text in the fifth to early seventh centuries resembling the extant Guigu zi, although it included material that is now lost.

Huangfu Mi's commentary, said to have existed in Japan until the ninth century (Nihonkoku genzaisho mokuroku 25a), seems to be wholly lost today. Some passages from Yue Yi's explanations, however, which still existed in their entirety during Tang times, are preserved. From one passage we can conclude that already at the time of Huangfu the text contained a section titled Yinfu qishu 陰符七術 (Zhang Yantian, Shiji zhengyi yiwen jijiao, 225).

In the received text, under the heading "Benjing yinfu qipian 本經陰符七篇," we find concepts apparently connected with individual Taoist practices that are not generally believed to have existed before the third or fourth century. For Liu Zongyuan 柳宗元 (773–819) the Yinfu qipian was an even later addition to what he already considered to be a forgery ("Bian Guigu zi 辯鬼谷子," Liu Zongyuan ji 4). The additional fact that Yinfu qipian contains passages borrowed from Dengxi zi could also indicate that the two texts might be contemporary.

In Tang times, apart from the Yue Yi version and one in two juan without commentary, a commentary by Yin Zhizhang 尹知章 (d. 718) is listed (Jiu Tang shu 27.2032). In addition, a contemporary of Liu Zongyuan, Yuan Ji 元冀, had written an abstract of the essential ideas (zhiyao 指要) of Guigu zi (see Liu's "Bian Guigu zi" cited above). Since both of these works are lost, it is not clear to which edition the citations in TPYL refer. However, they give evidence of a text that differed from the present version in length, in the use of section titles, and in the commentary. The reproduction of a long passage from the Guigu zi in Zhao Rui's 趙蕤 Changduan jing 長短經 (716) 3 shows, moreover, that at that time the work had a section titled Quqie pian 祛箴篇, which was borrowed from Zhuangzi (Guo Qingfan ed., Zhuangzi jishi 4.2.342–57). The number of subsections, including this section, in the first two juan of the Guigu zi would have been thirteen, in keeping with the information provided in a preface attributed to Yin Zhizhang ("Bian Guigu zi," commentary of Han Chun 韓醇, ca. 1177).

By the twelfth century, there apparently existed only one complete, commented version of the Guigu zi in three juan. According to the Zhongxing guange shumu (in Yuhai 53.22a) this version was the work of TAO HONGJING, of the Eastern Jin period (317–420). Curiously, this connection is not mentioned in earlier records. The description, including the erroneous dating of TAO HONGJING (456–536), corresponds to information provided by a copy of a Song manuscript from the collection of Qian Zeng 錢曾 (1629–1701). The latter is essentially the same as the present Daozang edition, though apparently more complete.

The present edition comprises only twelve sections in its first two jian (cf. Zhongxiang guang shumu). The Junzhai dushu zhi 11.502–6 lists thirteen sections. Both catalogues seem to refer here to the still existing preface attributed to Yin Zhizhang, of which, however, according to Han yiwen zhi kaozheng 1418, two different versions were in circulation. The text records, moreover, the loss of two other pian, titled Zhuanwan 轉丸 and Quluan 祛亂. The commentator remarks that in some versions the chapter Quqie 祛箴 from the Zhuangzi was inserted in place of the two missing pian. This insertion, however, he dismisses as incompatible with the spirit of the Guigu zi. According to other interpretations, he adds, the lost sections Zhuanwan and Quluan were in reality identical with the sections Benjing 本經 and Zhongjing 中經 of the third jian (see the Guigu zi, 3.12b and 3.24b). The fact that our commentator obviously resorts (2.34b) to the Tang annotations from a corresponding passage in Guanzi 18.2b–3a by no means proves Yin Zhizhang to be the author of the present commentary. On the other hand, it does rule TAO HONGJING out as the commentator, a hypothesis not supported by either the style or the contents of the work.

Thus the commentary was presumably written before the redactions known during the Tang were lost. Material for comparison that was still available to the author included Yue Yi's version (cf. our text 2.9a, 2.12a, or 3.1a with Zhang Yantian, Shiji zhengyi yiwen jijiao, 225–26).

In 1805, Qin Enfu 秦恩復 compared the Daozang version with the above mentioned manuscript from Qian Zeng's collection and subsequently compiled a revised and completed edition of this commentary to Guigu zi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Bian Guigu zi 辯鬼谷子," in Liu Zongyuan ji 4; Gulik, "Kuei-ku-tzu"; Wong Yuk, "Lao Zhuang dui Guigu zi de zhanyi"; Xiao Dengfu, Guigu zi yanjiu; Zhao Tiehan, "Guigu zi kao-bian"; Zheng Jiewen, Guigu zi da zhibui; Zheng Jiewen, "Daojia xianshi Guigu xiansheng jiqi Guiguzi."

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Gongsun Long zi 公孫龍子

3 jian

By Gongsun Long 公孫龍 (b. 498 B.C.); commentary by Xie Jiang 謝絳; zi

Xishen 希深 (995–1039)

1172 (fasc. 840)

This is the work of the logician Gongsun Long, in six chapters (pian 篇). The Han shu, "Yiwen zhi," 30.1736 lists this work as comprising fourteen chapters; the Sui shu, "Jingji zhi," 34.1002, while placing it among Taoist books, lists it as Shoubai lun 守白

論. However, Pang Pu has argued convincingly (Gongsun Long zi yanjiu, 51–71) that the present text corresponds to the complete original, despite a certain number of errors and interpolations (such as the opening phrases of the first chapter).

Xie's commentary endeavors to stress the Confucian values of the text and remains very much at the surface. The present Daozang text forms the basis of all modern editions.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Pang Pu, Gongsun Long zi yanjiu.

Kristofer Schipper

Yuzi 鬻子

2 jian

Attributed to Yu Xiong 鬻熊 (legendary date: eleventh century B.C.); commentary by Feng Xinggui 逢行珪 (presentation dated 653)

1171 (fasc. 840)

"Book of Master Yu." This work is supposed to have been written in pre-Han times. The Han shu, "Yiwen zhi," gives a Yuzi in 22 chapters (pian 篇) in the section on "Daojia" (30.1729), and another in nineteen chapters under "Xiaoshuo jia." Legend makes Master Yu a councillor of King Wen of the Zhou dynasty (r. 1099–1050 B.C.), who enfeoffed Yu in Chu. He is cited in the Liezi and in Jia Yi's Xin shu 9.15b–16a.

The authenticity of the text as a pre-Han work is much debated. The present version is very short and is not divided into different pian. Although the text must, therefore, be incomplete, there is no obvious trace of falsification. Its contents are close to the subject matter of the Lüshi chunqiu 呂氏春秋 and could well be the work of a later writer of the Huang-Lao school.

The commentary is by an otherwise unknown scholar of the early Tang who presented it to the throne in 653, claiming the work had been transmitted in his family for many generations. This annotated edition is attested since the Tang (see VDL 168). All extant editions derive from the present Daozang version.

Kristofer Schipper

Sunzi zhujie 孫子註解

13 jian

Late eleventh or early twelfth century

1180 (fasc. 850–854)

"Commentaries to the Sunzi." This work is a collection of eleven different commentaries to "Sunzi's Art of War" in thirteen sections. The commentators are Cao Cao 曹操 (155–200); a certain Mr. Meng 孟氏 (Liang dynasty; cf. Sui shu 34.1012); the Tang commentators Li Quan 李荃 (fl. 750), Du You 杜佑 (735–812), Du Mu 杜

牧 (803–852), Chen Hao 陳皞, and Jia Lin 賈林; as well as the Song commentators Mei Yaochen 梅堯臣 (1002–1060), Wang Xi 王皙 (fl. 1082), He Yanxi 何延錫, and Zhang Yu 張預.

The present edition does not state when or by whom the collection was compiled. Sun Xingyan 孫星衍 is of the opinion (see the preface to Sunzi shijia zhu 孫子十家注) that this work is the same as the Shijia Sunzi huizhu 十家孫子會注, in fifteen juan, compiled by Ji Tianbao 吉天保, which is listed in the bibliographic chapters of the Song shi 207.5183. The Suichu tang shumu 29b lists a Shiyi jia zhu Sunzi 十一家註孫子, but without naming a compiler. Different figures of ten and eleven commentaries are due to the fact that Du You's annotations did not exist as an independent work, but were assembled from juan 148–162 of his Tongdian (cf. Yu Jiaxi, Siku tiyao bianzheng 11.595–96) and thus cannot be considered as a separate commentary.

The Sunzi shijia zhu in thirteen juan revised by Sun Xingyan is based on the Daozang and another Ming edition. In many instances it has been supplemented by passages from the Tongdian and TPYL, resulting in considerable textual variants. In contrast, the text of a recent typeset edition, Shiyi jia zhu Sunzi, which is based on a Song print in three juan dating from the reign of Ningzong (1195–1225), hardly differs from this Daozang edition.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Baopu zi neipian 抱朴子內篇

20 juan

By GE HONG 葛洪, hao Baopu zi 抱樸子 (283–343)

1185 (fasc. 868–870)

“Book of the Master Who Keeps to Simplicity, Inner Chapters.” Sun Xingyan 孫星衍 (1753–1818), in his preface to his critical edition in the Pingjin guan congshu 平津館叢書, demonstrates that this is a work altogether different from the 1187 Baopu zi waipian, although the two are placed together in the Daozang edition. The work is recorded in the Sui shu, “Jingji zhi,” as comprising twenty-one juan and is classified among the texts of Taoism (34.1002). It is further documented in all major bibliographies and appears to be complete. The present Daozang version is at the origin of most modern editions, including the one by Sun Xingyan quoted above.

The reasons that prompted GE HONG to write this famous treatise on the search for immortality are given by the author himself, especially his autobiography “Zixu 自序,” which occupies juan 50 of the 1187 Baopu zi waipian. There the author retraces his youth (he was born in Jurong 句容, Danyang 丹陽, near present-day Nanking) and early career as a military official during the Jin dynasty. He notes that by the time of the disastrous Jianwu era (317), when the north fell into the hands of the Tuoba and Luoyang was destroyed, he had already written most of his literary works, including the present one. This work he characterizes as concerning matters pertaining to “the drugs and recipes for becoming immortal, the marvels and feats caused by demons and spirits, the lengthening of years through nurturing life, the [methods] for averting evil and warding off calamities belonging to the Taoist school (Daojia 道家).” Written in the most accomplished parallel (pianti wen 駢體文) style, it is undoubtedly thanks to its literary value that this work has been preserved.

Elsewhere in the book, GE HONG reveals that his knowledge of Taoism was transmitted to him by his teacher ZHENG YIN, a scholar who taught the esoteric arts of Taoism. Juan 19 gives a vivid account of GE HONG's studies under Zheng's guidance, as well as a list of the more than 200 books and sixty talismans he saw in Zheng's library, some of which he had been able to copy himself. ZHENG YIN was the student of the famous magician at the Wu court, GE XUAN, who was GE HONG's granduncle, according to GE HONG's own claims.

The book was written before the influx of refugees from the north was to profoundly change the culture and religion of the Jiangnan region where GE HONG lived. Indeed, the Baopu zi neipian shows no acquaintance with the Way of the Heavenly Master (Tianshi dao 天師道), to which many of the aristocrats who immigrated from the north and founded the Eastern Jin dynasty (317–420) belonged. This implies that the present work bears testimony to the traditions of the Taoism of the Han dynasty (206 B.C.–A.D. 220) as they survived in the south before the fall of Luoyang.

The value of the Baopu zi neipian as a source for our knowledge of early Taoism cannot be overestimated. Despite the marked partiality of the author for laboratory alchemy as the sole true method of obtaining immortality, all systems and methods of early Taoism are presented and discussed in detail.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Han Xiduo, “Guanyu Rong Liulang keben Baopu zi”; Hu Fuchen, Wei Jin shenxian daojiang; Lan Xiulong, Baopu zi yanjiu; Schipper, Concordance du Pao-p'ou-tseu nei-p'ien; Sivin, “On the Pao-p'u-tzu, Nei-p'ien”; Wang Ming, Baopu zi neipian jiaoshi; Ware, Alchemy, medicine and religion; Yang Fucheng, “Tan Baopuzi 'Xialan pian'”

Kristofer Schipper

Baopu zi waipian 抱朴子外篇

50 juan

By GE HONG 葛洪, hao Baopu zi 抱樸子 (283–343)

1187 (fasc. 871–873)

“Book of the Master Who Keeps to Simplicity, Outer Chapters.” While the inner chapters (1185 Baopu zi neipian) provide a wealth of important information for the study of Taoism, as a work of philosophy the present outer chapters are certainly superior; they also reflect more faithfully the genius of their author, who was in the first place a Confucian scholar. Although some fragments have been found that may have originally been part of the book but no longer feature in it, the authenticity of the present text is beyond doubt.

Living at a time when Confucian learning was in decline and many traditions of ritual and moral attitudes were being abandoned, GE HONG maintained the high scholarly standards and the rigorous critical thinking that developed in the Later Han period (A.D. 25–220) and was maintained until the middle of the third century. GE HONG's Confucianism put great emphasis on personal cultivation, on the role of study and literature, and on the ideal of an ordered society. In this context, these outer chapters recognize the validity of inner cultivation according to Taoist principles and therefore have their place in the Taoist canon alongside the neipian 內篇.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Lan Xiulong, Baopu zi yanjiu; Sailey, The Master Who Embraces Simplicity; Schipper, Concordance du Pao-p'ou-tseu wai-p'ien; Yang Mingzhao, Baopu zi waipian jiaojian.

Kristofer Schipper

1.A.1.b Commentaries

Daode zhenjing zhu 道德真經註

4 juan

Attributed to HESHANG GONG 河上公; Later Han (A.D. 25–220)

682 (fasc. 363)

"Commentary to the True Scripture of the Way and Its Power by the Old Man on the River Bank." The date and authenticity of this commentary, which in Huangfu Mi's 皇甫謐 (215–282) Gaoshi zhuan 高士傳 is titled Laozi zhangju 老子章句, have long been the object of debate. The most radical view was put forth by the Tang historian Liu Zhiji 劉知幾 (661–721), who simply denied the existence of the book (see Liu Zhiji's biographies in Jiu Tang shu 102 and Xin Tang shu 132). The dating of the present commentary has been hampered by the identification of HESHANG GONG with Heshang zhangren 河上丈人, who is supposed to have lived near the end of the Warring States period (475–221 B.C.). A date for the commentary is also complicated by the lore surrounding HESHANG GONG in GE HONG's Shenxian zhuan and in the apocryphal "Laozi Daode jing xujue 老子道德經序訣," attributed to the shadowy GE XUAN (traditional dates, 164–244). In this lore, HESHANG GONG is considered to be a contemporary of the Han emperor Wendi (r. 179–157 B.C.).

Adding to the confusion, the bibliographical treatises in Jiu Tang shu 47.2026 and Xin Tang shu 59.1514–15 mention a work with the title Laozi zhangju in two juan, not authored by HESHANG GONG but by Anqiu Wangzhi 安丘望之. The latter apparently lived at the time of the Han emperor Chengdi (r. 32–7 B.C.). Both of the Tang histories also mention, apart from Anqiu Wangzhi's work, HESHANG GONG's commentary to the Daode jing in two juan. Sui shu 34.1000 mentions a HESHANG GONG commentary of the early Han (200 B.C.—A.D. 220), while noting that under the Liang (502–557) there was a Laozi jing commentary in two juan written by Heshang zhangren of the Warring States period.

Heshang zhangren, or the Elder from the Banks of the [Yellow] River, is first mentioned in Sima Qian's biography of Yue Yi 樂毅 (Shiji 80.2436) as the teacher of An Qisheng 安期生 and as the originator of a line of thought that eventually influenced Cao Can 曹參, a prime minister under Emperor Gaozu of the Han (r. 206–195 B.C.). Cao Can was noted for his sympathy for the Huang-Lao doctrine. Contrary to Huangfu Mi's Gaoshi zhuan (quoted in TPYL 507), however, the Shiji makes no mention of a Daode jing commentary by Heshang zhangren.

Given the confusion surrounding the identity of Heshang zhangren and of HESHANG GONG and the role played by Anqiu Wangzhi, it remains uncertain whether the work now known as the HESHANG GONG commentary dates back to the late Warring States period or to the early Han, as stated by GE HONG. There are sufficient reasons, however, to conclude that the present work dates at least from the middle or the end of the Later Han (25–220 A.D.). This date would imply that the HESHANG GONG commentary is one of the oldest Daode jing commentaries now in existence. Rao Zongyi, in his critical edition of the Xiang'er commentary 想爾注 to the Daode jing (Laozi Xiang'er zhu jiaozheng), has found indications that the Xiang'er commentary quotes the commentary by HESHANG GONG (on this issue, see also the following article). It is thus no coincidence that in the Tang dynasty transmission rite of the Daode jing to the so-called students of the Eminent Mystery (gaoxuan dizi 高玄弟子), the HESHANG GONG commentary was second only to the Daode jing itself, preceding the Xiang'er zhu and four other texts dealing with protocol and hagiography (see Benn, The Cavern-mystery transmission, 84).

Formally, the title of the present commentary as mentioned by Huangfu Mi, Laozi zhangju, is an indication of the Later Han as a probable time of composition. The Later Han was the heyday of the zhangju 章句 (chapters and phrases) style of commentary. The reaction against the zhangju style came in the third century, with the rise of the so-called Neo-Taoism of WANG BI (226–249) and others. As can be expected, the HESHANG GONG commentary is entirely free of the metaphysical elements omnipresent in Neo-Taoism.

Conversely, Huang-Lao thought, one of the dominant Han dynasty schools, looms large in this commentary. It has been noted that in the course of the Han dynasty, Huang-Lao thought witnessed a shift in emphasis from politics and society to longevity. The HESHANG GONG commentary bears witness to this evolution. The expression zhishen zhiguo 治身治國, referring to the equal sustenance of country and body, is ubiquitous in this work. In the commentary to Daode jing chapter 59, the equality of country and body is explicitly stipulated (Guo shen tong ye 國身同也). Despite HESHANG GONG's insistence upon the equal sustenance of country and body, a preference for the latter is noticeable. Thus, the constant Tao (changdao 常道) in Daode jing 1 is explained as "the Way to spontaneously attain longevity." And in the commentary to Daode jing 64, it is said that "[ordinary] people study the administration of the country, whereas the sage studies the management of the body." Frequent reference is made to longevity techniques, such as in the commentary to Daode jing 6, where the Mysterious Female (xuanpin 玄牝) is for the first time likened to the human nose and mouth.

Another noteworthy element in HESHANG GONG's ideology is that although certain Confucian values are treated as inferior, others are given a high status. Thus, in the commentary to Daode jing 18, it is stated that when the Great Tao was active (i.e., before the appearance of humanity and righteousness, which are regarded as pernicious in both the Daode jing and the HESHANG GONG commentary), filial piety and loyalty were to be found everywhere. Similarly, in the commentary to Daode jing 27, it is said that the sage saves the people by constantly educating them in loyalty and filial piety.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Benn, The Cavern-mystery transmission; Chan, Two visions; Rao Zongyi, Laozi Xiang'er zhu jiaozheng; Wang Ka, Laozi Daode jing Heshang gong zhangju.

Jan A. M. De Meyer

Laozi Xiang'er zhu 老子想爾注

Dunhuang manuscript Stein 6825

Later Han (A.D. 25–220)

"Xiang'er Commentary to the Laozi." This is one of the earliest glosses on the Daode jing, and many sources mention this work, probably of the Han period (206 B.C.–A.D. 220), as once having been included in the Daozang. 1430 Daozang quejing mulu 1.6b lists the Xiang'er zhu Laozi daode jing 想爾注老子道德經, in two juan, as lost. Its partial recovery among the Dunhuang manuscripts is, therefore, fortunate. Rao Zongyi has published the text in a critical edition. It has also been reproduced and studied by Ōfuchi Ninji.

The Dunhuang manuscript fragment contains only the text of the first juan of the Daode jing, the so-called Daojing 道經, and the first two chapters are missing. The text begins with the phrases of the third chapter: "By not seeing things that can be desired, the heart will not be troubled" (bu jian ke yu ze xin bu luan 不見可欲, 則心不亂) and ends with the thirty-seventh chapter and the title the Book of the Tao by Laozi, First Part, Xiang'er (Laozi Daojing, shang. Xiang'er 老子道經, 上, 想爾). The manuscript, 26.7 cm high and 9 m long, has 585 columns with an irregular number of characters written in neat clerical script. Remarkably, the commentary following each sentence is written in exactly the same way as the main text, without any punctuation or other mark to separate the two. This style is archaic. The manuscript is not dated. Given the style and the paper, it might date from the Six Dynasties (220–589), and it probably came from North China (see Rao Zongyi, Laozi Xiang'er zhu jiaozheng, 5).

It is not known who Xiang'er was. The earliest mention of the name occurs in 789 Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie kejing, which contains a collection of some of the oldest texts of the Way of the Heavenly Master, dating from the Three Kingdoms period (220–265). The second text (12a–19b), titled Rules Governing the Family of the Tao (Dadao jialing jie 大道家令戒) and dating to about 255, is a short treatise on the religious policy of the ecclesia. It refers on page 14b to Xiang'er as a book that the faithful should heed. However, as the passage is obviously corrupt (four characters are missing), it is impossible to decide whether it refers to the commentary of the Daode jing or to the commandments of Xiang'er (Daode jing Xiang'er jie 道德經想爾戒) that had to be obeyed by those who received this scripture (see 786 Taishang laojun jingliu 1a–b). In any case, the two, commentary and commandments, are closely related. The name Xiang'er here refers to an important doctrinal work that, together with two other fundamental texts (the Huangting jing 黃庭經 and the now lost Miaozhen jing 妙真經), deserved special respect. Indeed, whereas the Way of the Heavenly Master apparently did not itself produce any major doctrinal work, it did transmit and use a number of ancient doctrinal texts, such as the Daode jing, the Taiping jing 太平經, and the Huangting jing.

In later times, the Xiang'er commentary came to be considered the work of Zhang Daoling 張道陵, the founder of the Way of the Heavenly Master, or of his grandson Zhang Lu 張魯 (d. 216). In his prefatory treatise (xulu 序錄) to his Jingdian shiwen, Lu Deming 陸德明 (556–627) mentions Xiang'er (the printed edition mistakenly writes "xiangyu 想余"; see Rao Zongyi, Laozi Xiang'er zhu jiaozheng, 4) and states: "it is not clear who he is; some say Zhang Lu, some say Liu Biao 劉表." Liu Biao (d. 218) refers to the famous military commander at the end of the Han dynasty. The latter attribution is so improbable as to suggest that by the time of Lu Deming the identity of Xiang'er was completely lost to oblivion.

In the liturgical organization of the Tang, the transmission of the Daode jing and its commentaries formed a separate stage of initiation and ordination. The corresponding ordination ritual of the early Tang has been preserved in 1238 Chuanshou jingjie yi zhujue. The author of this ritual discusses the ranking of texts and says that the Xiang'er commentary should come third, after the plain text of the Daode jing (the so-called “great character text,” Dazi ben 大字本) and the HESHANG GONG commentary (682 Daode zhenjing zhu). According to this author, the commentary deserves this rank because it was written by Zhang Lu, the Successor of the Master (xishi 系師), who assumed the name of Xiang’er and wrote the work in order to instruct the uncouth and primitive inhabitants of Sichuan. Still later in the Tang period, Xiang’er became identified with Zhang Daoling himself. In the prefatory chapter of the second commentary he wrote to the Laozi classic, Emperor Xuanzong (r. 712–756) lists the Xiang’er commentary in second place (before HESHANG GONG) and notes: “this commentary was made by Zhang Daoling, the Ritual Master of the Three Heavens” (see 679 Tang Xuanzong yuzhi Daode zhenjing shu, Waizhuan 1b). This text is taken over by DU GUANGTING, in his 725 Daode zhenjing guangsheng yi (preface, 2b). It is clear, therefore, that the identification of Xiang’er with either Zhang Lu or Zhang Daoling occurred at a rather late stage and that the place of the commentary in the order of glosses on the Daode jing was subject to discussion.

These issues have been debated by modern scholarship, but without conclusive results. The hypothesis that the Xiang’er commentary was written by the early Heavenly Masters raises the immediate problem of content and style. The cosmology and theology of the early Heavenly Masters as expounded in 789 Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie kejing and many other texts is well known and bears little resemblance to the system of the Xiang’er commentary. Another difficulty is that if the Xiang’er commentary really were the work of the founders of the Heavenly Master ecclesia, then why do none of the numerous texts that have come down to us from this ecclesia mention or even imply such a relationship?

The Xiang’er commentary explains the thought of the Daode jing in terms of Tending Life (yangsheng 養生) practices in often highly contrived glosses with little or no relationship with what appears to be the original meaning of the Laozi text. Among other tenets, the commentary explains that the Tao is present in the human body but cannot be seen, and adepts should not attempt to visualize the Tao or, for that matter, the deities of the body, such as the spirits of the Five Viscera and so on. The Tao is personified in Taishang laojun 太上老君, and he is therefore also the author of the Laozi. Each time the word I occurs in the text, the commentary reminds us that we have to understand this as the voice of the Tao (“wu, Dao ye 吾, 道也”). The commentary addresses itself to a community of believers (xin Dao 信道) who are enjoined to respect the commandments of the Tao (Daojie 道誡). They should worship (gongyang 供養) the Tao but not offer sacrifices (ji 祭), nor pray at ancestral shrines (daoci 禱祠). This is one of the most stringent interdictions. Great importance is attached to sexuality. Sexual desires should be banned, sexual energy carefully preserved. Males should learn to behave like women, to curb their aggressiveness and ambition. There is a heavenly bureaucracy (tiancao 天曹) that keeps records of human sins. Some, but not all, of these tenets are also found in the ecclesia of the Heavenly Master, yet the style, the tone, and the theology are quite different. For all appearances, the Xiang’er commentary represents an earlier stage of community Taoism than the ecclesia of the Heavenly Master.

This brings us to the problem of dating. First there is the main text of the Daode jing as it features in the Xiang’er commentary. As we have seen, we do not find the division into chapters that are present in the HESHANG GONG and WANG BI versions. In other respects, the text is much the same. In two instances, however, the Xiang’er text omits a sentence: the words “wei wuwei 爲無爲” in chapter 3, and “dajun zhi hou, bi you xiong nian 大軍之後必有凶年” in chapter 30. It is important to note that in both versions of the Daode jing discovered in 1973 in Han tomb no. 3 at Mawang dui near Changsha (Hunan), which date from the second century B.C. or earlier, these sentences are also lacking. Other minor evidence also suggests that the Xiang’er text is closer to the Mawang dui versions than to any other of the early Laozi versions. Even the special way the numeral 30 is written, which has been considered a typical indication that the version was made by Zhang Lu (see Rao Zongyi, Laozi Xiang’er zhu jiaozheng, 4), can be found in the Mawang dui manuscripts.

Could the Xiang’er commentary be older than the HESHANG GONG commentary? Rao Zongyi has reached the opposite conclusion, pointing to many instances where the two commentaries are similar and assuming that Zhang Daoling was the author of the Xiang’er commentary. Other scholars have followed suit, without offering significant new evidence. Yet the question cannot be said to have been settled conclusively. Within the limits of the present article, we can observe only that in all the instances where the two commentaries are manifestly similar, it is impossible to establish which copies the other or whether both draw on a common exegetical tradition. In conclusion, the Xiang’er commentary could, therefore, date from the Later Han period, possibly from as early as the first century A.D.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, Zurokuhen; Rao Zongyi, Laozi Xiang’er zhu jiaozheng.

Kristofer Schipper

Daode zhenjing zhu 道德真經註

4 juan

By WANG BI 王弼, zi Fusi 輔嗣 (226–249)

690 (fasc. 373)

“Commentary to the Laozi.” The present version of WANG BI’s commentary is followed by two colophons, one by Chao Yuezhi 晁說之, dated 1115, and another by Xiong Ke 熊克, dated 1170. This text shows a number of variants with respect to other received versions (cf. “Laozi Daode jing zhu 老子道德經注,” in Lou Yulie, Wang Bi ji jiaoshi). The taboo for the character xuan 玄 is not observed. The text is divided into four juan, and there is no division into two parts. The numbers and the headings for the different chapters are also missing.

As Rudolph Wagner’s exhaustive study (The craft of a Chinese commentator) of WANG BI’s commentarial technique has shown, one of the main original features of the present work is WANG BI’s emphasis on the epistemological value of the Laozi’s language. The original text stresses the ineffability of the Tao and the incapacity of language to express ultimate truths. According to WANG BI, the structure of the work’s textual composition (wen 文), in particular its complex patterns of parallelism, termed “interlocking parallel style” by Wagner, was a key to establishing its unambiguous meaning. WANG BI himself adopted what he understood to be Laozi’s rhetorical technique for his own analytic and argumentative purposes. Intricate parallel prose became a hallmark of Dark Learning (xuanxue 玄學) discourse, of which WANG BI was a leading exponent.

Wang Bi considered the Daode jing to be the coherent work of a single author, the historical sage Laozi. After several centuries of rival claims with respect to the relative status of Laozi and Confucius as sages, and with vacillating Han patronage now in favor of Confucian learning, now in favor of the new cult of Lord Lao, WANG BI and his intellectual circle regarded Confucius as the supreme sage, followed directly by Laozi. In this scheme, the Daode jing together with the Analects and the Book of Changes constituted a set of fundamental classics encapsulating the metaphysical teaching of the ancients, embodied most perfectly by Confucius.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chan, Two visions; Rump and Wing-tsit Chan, trans., Commentary; Wagner, “Wang Bi’s recension”; Wagner, The craft of a Chinese commentator.

Isabelle Robinet, with an addendum by Franciscus Verellen

Laozi weizhi lilue 老子微旨例略

8 fols.

By WANG BI 王弼, zi Fusi 輔嗣 (226–249)

1255 (fasc. 998)

“Some Examples of Laozi Hermeneutics.” Many Song bibliographers have identified WANG BI, the great commentator of the Daode jing (see 690 Daode zhenjing zhu), as the author of this text. The work has been listed under different titles since Lu Deming’s 陸德明 (556–627) Jingdian shiwen.

Wang argues in this short essay that the gist of Laozi’s thinking is in his emphasis on essentials and disregard for the marginal (chongben ximo 崇本息末). The other key is that “there is no obscure [mystery] that cannot be known” (wuyou bushi 無幽不識).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Wagner, “Wang Bi: The structure of the Laozi’s Pointers.”

Kristofer Schipper and Yuan Bingling

1.A.2 Divination

This section opens with the Taixuan jing 太玄經, a classic of Taoist and Confucian divination modeled on the Book of Changes that has recently been the subject of exhaustive studies by Michael Nylan and Nathan Sivin. The following text, the “Forest of Changes” (Yilin 易林), is an oracle book again based on a systematic elaboration of the sixty-four hexagrams in the Book of Changes. Despite the complicated history of its transmission, it has been widely accepted as a work of the Han period (206 B.C.–A.D. 220). The “Book of Sublime Tokens” (Lingqi jing 靈棋經) is traditionally also attributed to various Han masters, but its historical transmission can be traced only to Six Dynasties (220–589) times. As the title indicates, its subject is divination by casting tokens like dice.

The last three works are closely related treatises on the liuren 六壬 system, an astro-calendric method using the ancient divination board (shi 式). Placed traditionally under the patronage of the Dark Maiden (Xuannü 玄女), these works were said to have been first revealed to the Yellow Emperor and transmitted to the world by him. The method was used, among other things, for determining calendrical correspondences and divining auspicious and ill-fated marriages. Despite their fragmentary state of preservation and partial fusion with later commentaries, these texts constitute early Six Dynasties writings, reflecting Han theory and methods.

Jizhu taixuan jing 集註太玄經

6 juan

By Yang Xiong 揚雄 (53 B.C.–A.D. 18); commentary by Sima Guang 司馬光 (1019–1086)

1183 (fasc. 860–862)

“Collected Commentaries on the Book of Supreme Mystery.” Literary sources of the Han period leave no doubt about the authenticity of the Book of Supreme Mystery, nor about its attribution to Yang Xiong. It is also mentioned in the Han shu, "Yiwen zhi," 30.1727. Between its diffusion during its author's own lifetime and the Northern Song period (960–1127), about fifteen commentaries were written.

The work was conceived by Yang Xiong on the model of the Book of Changes. It comprises two parts: the first part itemizes the eighty-one symbolic figures of the Supreme Mystery (xuanshou 玄首) accompanied by explanatory formulas; the second part comprises the eleven appendixes that offer an initiation—theoretical as well as practical—into the manipulation of the figures described in the first part.

In this respect, the present edition in six juan is incomplete, for it comprises only the first part of the original work. This edition was nevertheless conceived as a whole, since the absence of the appendix corresponds to the original intention of Sima Guang, editor of the text and author of the "Collected Commentaries." The Song shi, "Yiwen zhi," 205.5172 mentions the present text and specifies a version in six juan.

The Ming edition in ten juan, which was included in the Sibu beiyao 四部備要, is identical to the Daozang version as regards the first part of the work (juan 1–6). In this Ming edition we find slight variants in the content of the commentary: sometimes the text is abridged by a few phrases; sometimes, on the contrary, the text is enlarged with passages that do not occur in the Daozang version. The part containing the eleven appendixes (juan 7–10) is accompanied by the commentary of Xu Han 許翰 (eleventh/twelfth century).

In his preface dated 1082 (xu 1a–b), Sima Guang gives the list of the seven commentaries he used. The only still extant commentary is that of Fan Wang 范望 (end of third century). It appears in the excellent Northern Song printed edition by a certain Zhang Shi 張實 (cf. Siku quanshu zongmu 108.4a), which is reproduced in Sibu congkan 四部叢刊.

A good bibliographical study of the Book of Supreme Mystery is found in Sui shu jingji zhi kaozheng by Yao Zhenzong, 4:407–10.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Nylan, The Canon of Supreme Mystery.

Marc Kalinowski

Yilin shangxia jing 易林上下經 (焦氏易林)

10 juan

Jiao Gan 焦贛 (end of the first century A.D.)

1475 (fasc. 1101–1104)

"Forest of Changes." This text consists essentially of a list of 4,096 (64 times 64) derived hexagrams (biangua 變卦) obtained from the sixty-four original hexagrams of the Book of Changes and consequently claims to be its logical and natural development. To each of the derived hexagrams corresponds an oracular formula in four-character verse. The same formula may be associated with several hexagrams at the same time.

The ten juan of the work are divided into two equal parts, shangjing 上經 and xiajing 下經, each numbered one to five. This type of division is unique. After the Ming, all editions of the work adopt a four-juan pattern. The other two Ming editions now extant (see below) comprise sixteen juan, which corresponds to the number of juan given by the earliest recension of the "Forest of Changes," in the bibliographical catalogue of the Sui shu (34.1033).

Although the attribution of the work to Jiao Gan has often been questioned, none of the serious suggestions propose a date of composition beyond the Later Han period (25–220). See the preface and postfaces of Ding Yan 丁晏 (mid-nineteenth century) to this work in Yilin shiwen 易林釋文, Nanjing shuyuan congshu 南菁書院叢書 3; see also Yu Jiaxi, Siku tiyao bianzheng 733–49, for a discussion of this question. The first traceable quotation of the "Forest of Changes" (xiajing 4.4b) is found in Dongguan Hanji 東觀漢記 (see Siku quanshu zongmu 109.924). Similar instances multiply from the Six Dynasties period (220–589) on. The earliest extant preface was written in 846 by Wang Yu 王俞. It does not appear in the present Daozang edition.

Our text contains four colophons:

1. The colophon of Chen Zhensun 陳振孫, dated 1241. It is less complete than the version in Zhizhai shulu jieti 12.28a–b, but richer in concrete details.
2. The colophon of Peng Hua 彭華, dated 1473. Its main interest lies in the indication that its edition came from the libraries of the Imperial Cabinet.
3. The colophon of Jiang Enshu 姜恩書, dated 1525. Jiang relates the circumstances that led him to publish the Forest of Changes on the basis of a specimen he obtained from Kang Hai 康海 (1475–1541).
4. The colophon of Ma Lin 馬麟, written nine years later (1534), only describes the reprinted edition quoted in the former colophon.

The present Daozang edition can be identified with near certainty as Jiang Enshu's. It forms, together with the editions of Mao Jin 毛晉 (Jindai bishu 津逮祕書), and He Yunzhong 何允中 (Guang Han-Wei congshu 廣漢魏叢書), the three Ming editions known today.

As regards the earlier history of the text, there is a Song (960–1279) edition that, however, seems to have undergone considerable modifications in the course of its transmission up to the version we now possess (Shili ju congshu 士禮居叢書, dated 1808), as well as an edition of the Yuan period (1279–1368). The latter is, properly speaking, the oldest extant version (Sibu congkan 四部叢刊) and the only one to include a major commentary, of unknown origin. One should finally note the excellent critical edition of Zhang Haipeng 張海鵬 (1805), established on the basis of the Song version and the three Ming editions mentioned above.

Marc Kalinowski

Lingqi benzhang zhengjing 靈棋本章正經

2 juan

Commentary by Yan Youming 顏幼明 (Jin [265–420]) and He Chengtian 何成天 (370–447)

1041 (fasc. 719)

“Original Stanzas of the Venerable Book of the Sublime Tokens.” This is a treatise on a divination technique carried out by throwing a set of twelve two-sided tokens. Besides the two juan of the main text, the work includes a number of prefaces (xu 序 1a–8a), a table of contents (mulu 目錄 1a–7a), and two colophons (2.54a–56b). The text appears for the first time in the bibliographical catalogue Sui shu, “Jingji zhi,” 34.1034 under the slightly different title Shier lingqi bujing 十二靈棋卜經. In the bibliographical catalogue of the Song shi, “Yiwen zhi,” 206.5241 and 5242 it is mentioned under its more common title of Lingqi jing. The existence of the work during the Six Dynasties period (220–589) is attested by the Nan shi (36.950), which quotes an excerpt of the text (corresponding to 2.4a in the present work).

The present text does not mention any author’s name. The prefaces contain imaginary attributions to one or another of the Han authorities on divinatory matters. The earliest extant version, the manuscript of the Yonezawa 米澤 Library in Japan, attributes the transmission of the text to the monk Fa Wei 法味 of the Jin dynasty (265–420). The preface, probably from the Tang period (618–907), dates this event to the years 280–289. The same preface is reproduced in the present work (preface 3), where the name of the recipient of the book, however, becomes Chang Fahe 常法和. An identical account of the transmission of the work is found in the Yiyuan 異苑 (fifth century) 5.7b, which gives the same name for the recipient but a later date (373–375) than the Yonezawa manuscript. Yu Jiayi examines this question in detail, using the edition described in the Jingji fangshu zhi 經藉訪書志 (Siku tiyao bianzheng 13.730–33).

The work has three commentaries:

1. Yan Youming of the Jin period (265–420). An attempt to identify this person is made by Yu Jiayi. The date of the commentary is confirmed by the fragment of our Lingqi jing discovered at Dunhuang (Stein 557). In this fragment, one finds some passages attributed to Yan Yuan 顏淵 or simply to Yan.

2. He Chengtian of the Liu Song dynasty (420–479). The three combinations (ke 課) preserved in Stein 557 (100, 101, 102, corresponding to 2.41a–42b in the present text) come with two commentaries. One is explicitly attributed to Yan [Yuan], the other is simply preceded by the term zhu 注 (commentary). This fragment is nevertheless close to the commentary by He Chengtian. It should be noted that this commentary, which precedes Yan’s, was probably considered at the time to be chronologically anterior to Yan’s. This is not the case in the present version where Yan’s commentary (of the Jin period) precedes He’s (of the Liu Song period).

3. The third commentary is simply introduced by the word jie 解 (gloss). All the editions, from Ming times on, agree on attributing this commentary to Liu Ji 劉基 (1311–1375). The original edition of this commentary, as presented in Deyue yi congshu chuke 得月蓂叢書初刻, considers only the first part of the entire gloss (as it is found in the other editions, including the present Daozang version). This preliminary part is always separated from the remainder from the commentary by the term ci 此 (“this means . . .”).

The various prefaces and postfaces are organized as follows:

A. Tang period (618–907)

1. Preface 1 (xu 1a–2a) by Li Yuan 李遠, dated, incongruously, Huichang 會昌 9 (849?) and reproduced in all the extant editions except the Yonezawa manuscript.

2. Preface 3 (xu 3b–5b), not signed. It does not mention Li Yuan’s preface. Numerous factual elements related to the Six Dynasties period are given. One finds in particular the name of Wang Yin 王胤 of the Liu Song dynasty, to whom the Yonezawa manuscript attributes the invention of the one hundred and twenty-five combinations that form the body of the work. This preface is the one found in the Yonezawa manuscript.

3. Colophon 1 (2.54a–55b) by Han Yun 韓運. Internal evidence dates it to the Tang period (see 2.54a). It also appears as a colophon in the Yonezawa manuscript with a variant in the author’s name, there given as Han Yunxiu 韓運休.

B. Song period (960–1279)

1. Colophon 2 (2.55b–56b) by Zhang Shi 張拭 (1133–1180).

2. Preface 2 (xu 2b–3a), unsigned. The author refers to the Song through the term benchao 本朝 “the present dynasty.”

C. Yuan period (1279–1368)

Preface to the gloss (xu 5b–6b). This preface is unsigned in the present work but unanimously attributed to Liu Ji by all the editions since Ming times. One of them gives the year 1361 (Shugu congchao 述古叢鈔).

Although the presence of the gloss—if one considers it to be authentically written by Liu Ji himself, around the end of the Yuan period—does not permit assigning a date earlier than 1361 to this edition of the Lingqi jing, it is nonetheless distinct from all the other editions derived from Ming versions. The latter, with their general presentation and supplementary elements such as the commentary of Chen Shikai 陳師凱 of the Yuan dynasty and the 125 qijue 七絕 poems, derive from the same source. The Dunhuang manuscripts (Stein 557 and 9766, Pelliot chinois 3782, 4048, and 4984), the Yonezawa manuscript, and the Daozang edition may all be considered as the antecedents of this version. On the other hand, only Li Yuan's classical preface and the preface of Liu Ji's gloss are found in the typical Ming editions of the Lingqi jing. Preface 3 and colophon 1 are those of the Yonezawa manuscript. Preface 2 and colophon 2 come from a Song edition. They do not seem to appear elsewhere. In this respect, the present Lingqi jing edition represents an essential document for the systematic study of the formation of the Lingqi jing and its transmission from the Six Dynasties on.

Besides the editions quoted above, one should also note the editions of the Wenxuan lou congshu 文選樓叢書 (for the quality of its prefaces) and the edition of the Mohai jinhu 墨海金壺, which was used as a model for the Qing editions.

Articles dedicated to the Lingqi jing are found in all Chinese bibliographical works from the Song until the present day.

Marc Kalinowski

Huangdi longshou jing 黃帝龍首經

2 juan

Han (206 B.C.–A.D. 220)

283 (fasc. 135)

"Book of the Dragon's Head, Transmitted by the Yellow Emperor." The preface (2b) explains that when the Yellow Emperor was about to leave the world and ascend to Heaven on a dragon, he transmitted this book (which he himself had received from Xuannü 玄女) to his descendants. Upon his departure, the dragon's head was the last thing to be seen, hence the title.

This is the first of a series of three treatises in the Daozang that deal with the astrocalendrical divination known as liuren 六壬. Until Song times (960–1279), this method was practiced with the aid of a divination board (shi 式), which we know to have existed since Han times (206 B.C.–A.D. 220), and to which the present text refers (see the expression "to turn the board" [tuishi 推式] on 2.18a).

The earliest references to the Longshou jing are in BPZ 19.307, Wuxing dayi 2.12a, and Yanshi jiaxun 19.520–21. The Sui shu, "Yiwen zhi," 34.1029 gives the present title and number of juan.

Hong Yixuan 洪頤暄, in the preface to his edition (dated 1805) of the Longshou jing (in the Pingjin guan congshu 平津館叢書), shows the multiple relationships between this book and Han society. It must be noted, however, that the present text has undergone modifications, as a number of quotations, especially those given in the Wuxing dayi, can no longer be found here.

The text is divided into seventy-two paragraphs and is provided with an extensive commentary that quotes a great number of ancient sources. In several places, the main text refers to these same sources (1.13a, 17a, 21b, and 2.21b). It is therefore likely that in the course of copying, text and commentary have become intermingled.

The commentary (1.3a) gives a list of correspondences between the twelve equatorial constellations (xin 宿) and the civil calendar. The series is identical with that found on the most ancient model of liuren boards, dated 173 B.C. (see Wenwu 文物 no. 8 [1978]: 12–31). This is all the more remarkable, since none of the Han astronomical treatises that have come down to us mention it, nor do any of the other liuren manuals, with the exception of 284 Huangdi jingui yuheng jing.

Marc Kalinowski

Huangdi jingui yuheng jing 黃帝金匱玉衡經

23 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

284 (fasc. 135)

"Book of the Jade Scales and Golden Casket, Transmitted by Huangdi." The term jingui (Golden Casket) points up the esoteric dimension of the work (22a). Yuheng (Jade Scales) here refers to the constellation of the Northern Dipper (1a).

The book has a short introduction (1a–2a) where magical and ritual aspects of the mantic method—described in the text itself—are emphasized. The work is composed of two parts: Jingui zhang (2a–14b) and Yuheng zhang (14b–23a). Each zhang 章 comprises ten headings, numbered one to ten.

Like 283 Huangdi longshou jing, the present text is a treatise of divination by the liuren 六壬 method. The basic theory is assumed to be known to the reader. The work limits itself to taking an inventory of a set of typical examples. In most cases, a single example corresponds to each heading. The ten headings of Jingui zhang are organized in such way that the examples follow each other according to the increasing complexity of the method.

The Huangdi jingui yuheng jing does not appear in the ancient bibliographical catalogues. However, it contains some elements that point with near certainty to a date of composition in the Six Dynasties period (220–589).

The term liuren used by Yan Zhitui 顏之推 (531–591) is accompanied by a reference to the Jingui yuling (Yanshi jiaxun, "Zayi 雜藝").

Except for the variant (the introduction to the present Jingui yuheng jing, 1b, uses the title of the work in a slightly modified form; here too, the modification concerns the same character as the one in the list of Yanshi jiaxun: Jingui yufang 房), we can infer that the Jingui yuheng jing occupied a choice position among the liuren treatises as early as the Six Dynasties. On an other hand, Yan Zhitui introduces the term longshou 龍首 before the mention of Jingui yuling. In the Daozang, Jingui yuheng jing is also preceded by 283 Huangdi longshou jing.

The Wuyue chungiu 吳越春秋 quotes, on four occasions, the first or the second part that composed the Jingui yuheng jing (yuheng appears there also in a modified form: yumen 閤門; 5.57b; 7.17b and 22a; 10.65a; Sibu congkan 四部叢刊). The Wuyue chungiu mentions the number of the heading to which each example it uses is related. Therefore, it may be assumed that the author used, if not the work incorporated in the present Daozang, then a similar treatise written according to the same classifying criteria (cf. Kalinowski, "Les instruments astro-calendériques"). The first elaboration of the present text should be either contemporary or anterior to the composition of the Wuyue chungiu (second to fourth century; cf. Zhang Xinzhen, Wei shu tongkao, 661–63).

Finally, one should note the occurrence (17a) of the same set of twelve equatorial constellations as the one mentionned in the commentary of 284 Huangdi longshou jing. But while in this last work the set is presented as a simple annex to the computation technique described by the text, in the Jingui yuheng jing it forms the actual substance of the work. It is unlikely that the Jingui yuheng jing was written much earlier than the Wuyue chungiu. Nevertheless, it should be noted that the Jingui yuheng jing is in part devoted to the application of shi 式 techniques of the Han period.

A good critical edition of the text, based on the Daozang version, by Sun Xingyan 孫星衍, is found in Pingjin guan congshu 平津館叢書.

Marc Kalinowski

Huangdi shou sanzai xuannü jing 黃帝授三子玄女經

4 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

285 (fasc.136)

"Book of the Dark Maiden, Transmitted by Huangdi to His Three Disciples." This is a short treatise on divination by the liuren 六壬 method.

The presentation and style of the work are comparable to 284 Huangdi jingui yuheng jing. A few rare commentaries come with the text. All the prognostications are aimed at determining the lucky or ill-fated character of matrimonial unions. From the fragmentary nature of this opuscle, one can suppose that the present text is an extract from a larger work devoted to the liuren method, such as the Xuannü shijing 玄女式經.

The technical formula stated in the first lines of page 1a of the text is also found in an inscription that appears on a divinatory table shi 式 dating from the end of the Six Dynasties (220–589; cf. Wenwu cankao ziliao 文物參考資料 no. 7 [1958]: 20–23). It also appears in the Wuxing dayi 5.2b, which considers it to come from a Liuren shijing. Siku tiyao III.947c establishes a connection between the present text and the Xuannü shijing yaofa 要法 mentioned in the Sui shu (34.1029). Before the Tang period (618–907), the existence of liuren treatises placed under the patronage of the Dark Maiden is attested by the Wuxing dayi 5.4b. Part of the description of this liuren method by the Wuxing dayi is based on extracts from a Xuannü shijing. The quoted passages are not found in the present version.

Other editions are found in the Jindai bishu 津逮秘書 and Pingjin guan congshu 平津館叢書.

Marc Kalinowski

1.A.3 Medicine and Pharmacology

Medical works entered into the Taoist canon with the catalogue of the Xuandu guan 玄都觀 by WANG YAN and his collaborators (see the general introduction). Medicine and drugs have been part of Taoist practice since early times. In the Heavenly Masters ecclesia, spiritual exercises were to replace medicine for the curing of illness, but soon, as for instance in the case of the sectarians of 335 Taishang dongyuan shenzhou jing, the masters used acupuncture to alleviate the sufferings of the faithful. Medicine, especially herbal drugs, also figures prominently in the Shangqing scriptures, and their editor TAO HONGJING was also an important scholar of Chinese medical science.

Ancient medical texts have been reassembled and reedited time and again throughout history. As a result, many important old texts figure in the Ming canon in later versions. The reader is therefore advised to consult also part 2.A.3 and part 3.A.3. The present section presents only the Yellow Emperor Classics and TAO HONGJING's Zhouhou beiji fang.

The scholarly literature on ancient Chinese medicine is abundant and easily accessible to students of the discipline. It has therefore seemed sufficient to the editors to limit the present section to the discussion of the actual editions as preserved in the Daozang.

Huangdi suwen lingshu jizhu 黃帝素問靈樞集註

23 juan

Edited by Shi Song 史崧; preface dated 1155

1020 (fasc. 661–663)

"Combined Commentaries on the Basic Questions and the Divine Pivot of the Yellow Emperor." The classic Inner Canon of the Yellow Emperor (Huangdi neijing 黃 帝內經) is traditionally considered to be composed of two parts, the Basic Questions and the Divine Pivot, each in nine juan. Although the Huangdi neijing may have been elaborated during the Former Han period (206 B.C.–A.D. 9) or even earlier, there is still much discussion about the formation of the text as we have it today.

The preface of Shi Song states that in his time the text of the Suwen was current and well established, whereas Lingshu editions were quite deficient. On the basis both of a number of ancient manuscripts that his family had handed down and of other old versions, he edited the Lingshu text. He divided the text into twenty-four juan and eighty-one chapters, adding phonological glosses (the last juan containing the glosses). He does not mention any commentary, and the present edition does not contain any. The title of the present version of Shi Song's work is therefore erroneous: it contains neither the text of the Suwen, nor the commentaries. The text as edited here has only twenty-three juan, as the phonological glosses have been distributed inside the main text.

The Lingshu as edited by Shi is mainly concerned with acupuncture. Therefore it has also been called the Needle Classic (zhenjing 針經). Its authenticity has been much debated, the authorship being ascribed to Huangfu Mi 皇甫謐, and even to WANG BING. Much of the material it contains is certainly ancient.

Kristofer Schipper and Yuan Bingling

Huangdi neijing suwen buzhu shiwen 黃帝內經素問補註釋文

50 juan

Commentary by WANG BING, hao Qixuan zi 啓玄子 (762), corrected by Lin Yi 林億 (1058–1064) and others, and again by Sun Zhao 孫兆

1018 (fasc. 649–660)

“Questions on Initial Life, from the Inner Canon of the Yellow Emperor, Text and Annotations.” The title of Huangdi neijing, not mentioned in the Shiji, does figure in the bibliographic chapters of the Han shu, which lists it as comprising eighteen juan, according to the Qiliue 七略 catalogue by Liu Xin 劉歆 (d. 23 B.C.). This title therefore existed some time before the beginning of our era. Its attribution to the Yellow Emperor was already questioned by Huangfu Mi 皇甫謐 (215–282) in his preface to the Jiayi jing 甲乙經. Huangdi's early association with medicine, however, can also be seen, for instance, in the Biography of Cangong (Shiji 105).

The title Suwen, not mentioned in the biographical chapters of the Han shu, appears in the third century in the Shanghan lun 傷寒論, in the Maijing 脈經, and in the preface of Huangfu Mi to the Jiayi jing, where it is said: “At the present time there exists a Zhenjing 針經 in nine juan and the Suwen 素問 in nine juan. These two works form the Neijing 內經 in eighteen juan.”

WANG BING adopts this viewpoint, but places the Suwen first (preface, 1a). Thus, the title Suwen appears around the second and third centuries. According to Yu Jiayi, this title may well have existed at the time of Liu Xin, who may have only mentioned two encyclopedic works in his catalogue, the Huangdi neijing in eighteen juan and the waijing in eighteen juan, without giving the titles of the component works (Siku tiyao bianzheng 12.624).

For Quan Yuanqi 全元起, the first commentator of the Suwen (early sixth century), the term su 素 designates the foundation of life. According to the Qianzuo du 乾鑿度, su means Taisu 太素, “the beginning of the manifestation of the qi, of matter” (1.1a).

Prior to the commentary by WANG BING, there existed two other commentaries on the Suwen, on which Wang based himself. The first of these is that of Quan Yuanqi, of whom we know nothing except that his friend Wang Sengru 王僧儒 died in 503 (Nan shi 59.4459). His commentary, originally in nine juan, is mentioned as comprising eight juan in the bibliographical chapter of the Sui shu (34.1043, based on the catalogue of the Liang), in the Jiu Tang shu (47.2046), and in the bibliographical chapters of the Song shi (207.5303). The Xin Tang shu (59.1565) and the Tongzhi, “Yiwen lue,” list the nine-juan version. The second commentary, by Yang Shangshan 楊上善, titled Huangdi neijing taisu 黃帝內經太素, is in thirty juan. This is a classification of the text of the Suwen by themes, accompanied by commentaries. The author is said to have been an imperial physician during the Daye era (605–618) of the Sui dynasty.

WANG BING, whose hao was Qixuan zi, thus based his commentary on the two texts mentioned above, which he had obtained from his master Xuanzhu zi 玄珠子 (see 1023 Suwen liuqi xuanzhu miyu, preface, 1a). He also made use of the manuscript of an earlier master named Zhang, which he discovered in the library of a certain Mr. Guo (preface, 3a). He not only commented on the text, but also modified the number (and order) of the juan to twenty-four and of the chapters to eighty-one. In order to make the text more explicit, he sometimes added characters in red ink, to set them off from the original text (preface, 5a). His commentary is essentially based on certain chapters of the Suwen and the Lingshu, the quotations of which are occasionally introduced under the title Zhenjing. Wang also wrote a preface dated 762 that is placed at the head of the book.

Lin Yi and his group revised the text and the commentary on imperial orders received in 1057. Sun Zhao proceeded to make a new revision. The work was presented to the emperor before being published. The Daozang edition begins with a memorial (biao 表) presented by Lin Yi and his collaborators on that occasion. In his revision notes, always signaled by the phrase “xin jiaozheng yun 新校正云,” Lin Yi often quotes the Jiayi jing and the commentaries on the Suwen by Quan Yuanqi and by Yang Shangshan. Moreover on several occasions, he indicates variants from an unidentified “separate manuscript” (bieben 別本). These notes are the result of a painstaking study comparing the redundancies of the different chapters and the commentaries to these passages by WANG BING. The notes also mention the changes in the titles and the order of the chapters that WANG BING made with respect to the edition annotated by Quan Yuanqi (see the comparative tables in Okanishi Tameto, Song yiqian yiji kao, 1:11-14; Ma Jixing, Zhongyi wenxian xue, 68-109).

The Suwen presents itself as a dialogue between Huangdi and his minister and teacher Qibo 岐伯, with the exception of the last seven chapters (juan 49-50, chapters 75-81), where Huangdi transmits his knowledge to his minister Leigong. Huangfu Mi writes in his preface to the Jiayi jing: "The marvelous treatise [of the Yellow Emperor] was received by Leigong, who transmitted it to posterity."

This book is of a composite nature; it does not date from a single period, nor does it represent a single school (see the studies by Yamada and Keegan). At present, only seventy-nine chapters survive: chapters 72 and 73 were already lost when WANG BING wrote his commentary. Of the remaining seventy-nine chapters, the authenticity of seven (66-71, 74) has been questioned by Lin Yi, who attributes them to WANG BING himself (preface). These chapters develop the theory of the five revolutions and the six qi (wuyun liuqi 五運六氣). Besides these chapters, there are three others (4, 8, and 15) that are never mentioned in the Jiayi jing and that are therefore probably of later date; chapter 8, moreover, mentions official titles that came into being only after 265. The other chapters date from the end of the Warring States period at the earliest, and from the end of the Later Han (A.D. 25-220) at the latest. The chapters that speak only of yinyang without mentioning the Five Agents are from the late Warring States period, like the manuscripts found at Mawang dui. Some chapters only use cyclical characters to designate the time of day; these are of the early Han period (e.g., chapter 3), whereas the chapters that use cyclical characters where the first month of the year corresponds to the sign yin 寅 are later than 104 B.C. (cf. chapter 49).

The Suwen, which expounds medical theory, diagnostics, major diseases, and acupuncture, represents an already elaborate synthesis of medical knowledge that circulated among physicians who referred themselves to Huangdi and among the fangshi 方士. Certain principles (chapter 26) are close to the current theories in Han astronomy and divination by wind (fengzhan 風占).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Keegan, "The Huangdi neijing"; Ma Jixing, Zhongyi wenxian xue; Wang Hongtu, Huangdi neijing yanjiu; Yamada Keiji, "Formation of the Huangdi neijing."

Catherine Despeux

Ge xianweng zhouhou beiqi fang 葛仙翁肘後備急方

8 juan

By GE HONG 葛洪 (283-343), TAO HONGJING 陶弘景 (456-536), and Yang Yongdao 楊用道 (preface dated 1144); edited by Duan Chengyi 段成已, hao Juxuan xiansheng 菊軒先生 (1276)

1306 (fasc. 1013-1015)

"Vade Mecum with Prescriptions for All Emergencies, by Old Immortal Ge." This famous handbook of herbal medicine was originally compiled by GE HONG, with the title Zhouhou jiuzi fang 肘後救卒方 (Vade Mecum for Extreme Urgencies), which must have comprised three juan, totalling 86 rubrics. About two centuries later TAO HONGJING made a revised edition, sometimes condensing Ge's prescriptions, and sometimes adding his own, arriving at a total of 101 rubrics. This number had a symbolic meaning, because it corresponded to the number of diseases, which, in Buddhist texts, are related to each of the Four Elements (earth, water, fire, and wind). The rubrics were classified into internal diseases, external diseases, and illnesses caused by animals or by exterior agents.

In the twelfth century, Yang Yongdao again revised Tao's work. He had obtained an edition of the Qiantong era (1101-1110). Yang added at the end of each rubric prescriptions copied from another handbook called Zhenglei bencao 證類本草 (Classified Materia Medica), by Tang Shenwei 唐慎微 (fl. 1082).

According to Chen Jiru 陳繼儒, who edited the present handbook during the Wanli period (1573-1620), the work was included in the Ming Daozang at the request of ZHAO YIZHEN. Zhao was himself the editor of another medical handbook also included in the canon, 1165 Xianchuan waiké bifang.

The present edition has five prefaces: (1) by GE HONG; (2) by TAO HONGJING; (3) a continuation of this "old preface" written at Luming shan 鹿鳴山; (4) by Yang Yongdao, who called his expanded edition the Fuguang zhouhou fang 附廣肘後方; (5) by Duan Chengyi, who found a copy while on an inspection tour in Henan and had it printed. Duan, a jinsi of the Zhengda era (1224-1231), was a famous man of letters, close to the Quanzhen school of which his cousin Duan Keji 段克己 was an adept (cf. Ermiao ji 9a).

In addition to recipes of herbal medicine, the present handbook sometimes prescribes acupuncture and moxibustion, as well as certain "shamanistic" practices, especially in cases of possession (1.12a-b). Incantations are prescribed in juan 3 (5b). The handbook also has some veterinary prescriptions.

Catherine Despeux

1.A.4 Yangsheng

The contents of the present section do not adequately represent the wealth of early textual material preserved in the Taoist canon concerning the arts of Tending Life. Indeed, here we find only those works that we can surmise correspond to pre-Sui (581–618) versions. Many more texts, however, survive in later collections of the Tang dynasty (618–907), and the reader is therefore invited to consult also part 2.A.4. Moreover, many ancient yangsheng 養生 practices were transmitted as part of the Shangqing revelations. Hence they were rewritten and also more or less altered; nevertheless the ancient forms remain very much apparent. In one famous case, that of the Book of the Yellow Court (Huangting jing 黃庭經), we happen to have the two complete versions: the ancient text (332 Taishang huangting waijing yujing) as well as the Shangqing version (331 Taishang huangting neijing yujing), which is listed among the texts in part 1.B.2. Critical studies of this kind of Shangqing material may yet yield many new insights into the early history of Tending Life practices.

The few texts assembled here are, nevertheless, important. Both the original version of the above-mentioned Huangting jing and the newly identified Laozi zhongjing 老子中經 (1168 Taishang laojun zhongjing) are highly significant works. Equally essential is the 818 Taiqing daoyin yangsheng jing, which can be linked to the well-known Ma-wangdui manuscripts. The hitherto unstudied 132 Taiqing zhenren luoming jue is also a remarkable source for the vision of the body and its transcendent dimensions.

Taishang laojun zhongjing 太上老君中經

2 juan

Later Han (25–220)?

1168 (fasc. 839)

“The Most High Lord Lao’s Book of the Center.” This work is one of the earliest manuals of Taoist cosmology to have come down to us. An identical version has been preserved in YJQQ 18–19, under the title Laozi zhongjing 老子中經 (Laozi’s Book of the Center), also named Zhugong yuli 珠宮玉曆 (Jade Calendar of the Pearly Palace). The commentary by Liangqiu zi 梁丘子 in 402 Huangting neijing yujing zhu 2.5b quotes a passage of chapter 17 of the present text under the title of Yuli jing 玉曆經, and again at 2.23a a passage of chapter 11. The work 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu 1.18b–19b and 21a quotes different passage from chapters 34, 35, and 22 of our work, without indentifying them.

The work is composed of fifty-five chapters, numbered in sequence and followed by the mention of divine immortals (shenxian 神仙). The significance of this term here is unclear, unless we assume that it was originally followed by the word xuantu 玄圖 (mysterious picture). Indeed, the final chapter gives a book title that may well have been that of the present work: Jade Calendar of the Sun [and the Moon?], with Mysterious Pictures of the Divine Immortals, in Fifty-Five Chapters (Shenxian xuantu ri [yue?] yuli wushiwu zhang 神仙玄圖日[月?]玉曆五十五章). It is therefore possible that formerly each chapter was accompanied by illustrations depicting the deities described. When these illustrations no longer existed, the editors removed the reference “mysterious picture,” leaving before each chapter the truncated enumeration of diyi shenxian, dier shenxian, and so on.

Chen Guofu (CGF 80) identifies the present work with a Laojun yuli zhenjing 老君玉曆真經 in the library of GE HONG (BPZ 19.305). 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 4.7a, however, lists a Yuli jing (in one juan) as well as a Laozi zhongjing (in one juan) as two different works to be transmitted at the ordination of a Gaoxuan fashi 高玄法師 priest. However this may be, it seems certain that the present work antedates GE HONG (283–343). The final chapter mentions the titles of several talismans named the Zhutai 珠胎, Qiji 七機, Huagai 華蓋, and Qingguan 清觀. The bibliographical chapter of the Baopu zi mentions the talismans called Zhutai and Qiji (BPZ 19.307), titles not found in any other Taoist text known today. Moreover, our text finishes with the following words spoken by Laozi: “I enjoin you to search diligently for a master. I have taught eighty-one disciples, who have all become immortals. Ten of them have dispersed among the people. They are grain immortals (guxian 穀仙), who roam everywhere, looking for adepts. I have traversed the times of Qin 秦 [221–207 B.C.] and Xiang 項 [i.e., Xiang Yu 項羽, 233–202 B.C.] without manifesting myself. Now I shall appear for the Han, in accordance with the Yellow Era. Those who will see me shall know great happiness!” This coming of a new “yellow” era recalls not only the cosmological speculations of Wang Mang’s (r. A.D. 9–25) times, but especially the Yellow Turban Revolt of 184. The term guxian is also given in 818 Taiqing daoyin yangsheng jing 6b, where it is applied to Pengzu 彭祖. This is undoubtedly an ancient work that may date to the Eastern Jin dynasty (317–420).

The work describes in detail all the gods of the universe and of the human body, giving the exact correspondences between the two, from the greatest and highest to the smallest and lowest. Farther on, the text places these gods in a liturgical calendar that takes into account the phases of the moon, the sexagesimal cycle of days, and the twelve hours of the day. The meditation on the gods of the body is accompanied by visualization, massage, and invocations. Sexual exercises also appear to have been used, as women and men practice together (chapters 13 and 24), while the latter are instructed to retain their semen (chapter 21).

The Jade Calendar concerns not only these exercises, but also the cosmic cycles, short and long, that separate the recurring periods of crisis. The book foretells (chapter 52) the imminent end of a major cycle, when only immortals and Taoists will be saved from the wholesale destruction of the present world.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Schipper, "Inner world of the Lao-tzu chung-ching."

Kristofer Schipper

Taiqing zhenren luoming jue 太清真人絡命訣

9 fols.

Third or fourth century

132 (fasc. 59)

"Methods for a Lasting Life of the True Persons of Greatest Purity." This is an ancient manual for Tending Life techniques, quoted under the present title in Song catalogues (see VDL 92). It quotes (on page 2a) a Shenxian tu 神仙圖 (Illustrations of Divine Immortals). This is the ancient title of 1168 Taishang laojun zhongjing, where the quoted passage can be found in section 12 (1.7b). The names given here on pages 3b–4b to the different spirits of the body are also similar to those in Taishang laojun zhongjing, section 26 (1.21b; e.g., "Dandan 旦旦" for the spirit of the stomach, "Bibi 俾俾" for the spirit of the spleen, etc.).

The manual draws on a variety of sources. It begins (1a–2b) with a few theoretical explanations by Huang-Lao, the foremost saint of early Han (206 B.C.–A.D. 220) Taoism.

These explanations are followed by instructions for "serving the Tao" (shidao 事道) given by a master (shi 師). First the adepts, male as well as female, should atone for their sins and obtain pardon from the heavenly administration. Then they should visualize the spirits of the body by means of the techniques of Visualizing of the Five Beasts (cun wushou 存五獸) and Traveling through the Viscera (lizang 歷臟).

The final part (5a–9b) is spoken by deity (shen 神). He says: "Can I constantly remain separated from mankind? If I am to dwell with mankind, it behooves to think of me. Humans are neglecting themselves and do not take loving care of their bodies. They reject me, they lose me, they shame me, they hurt me, they injure me through their married life, they tire me out with their sex, . . . they do not meditate on me according to the Tao." Thereupon, a Taoist (dao 道) asks the deity about the ways of preserving the vital energies. These ways are then expounded in terms that are close to 1168 Taishang laojun zhongjing (compare the description of the Cinnabar Field [dantian 丹田] here on page 8b with 1168 Laojun zhongjing, section 17, 1.13a–13b), the main innovation in the present text being that, in addition to the dantian in the lower part of the body, there is also one each in the median and upper parts (zhongbu dantian 中部 丹田 and shangbu dantian 上部丹田). This is a development also found in Shangqing Taoism. In the absence, however, of other references to this tradition, we may conclude that the present text belongs to an earlier stratum.

Kristofer Schipper

Xiandao jing 顯道經

14 fols.

Third century?

862 (fasc. 578)

"Exposition of the Tao." This is an ancient manual of Tending Life practices that emphasizes practical methods, especially for reducing starches ("abstaining from cereals," duangu 斷穀) and slimming, as well as for meditation. The practice of the Tao is defined here as "entering the room of the Tao" (ru dao shi 入室). After an introduction into general and theoretical topics, a subtitle, "Explanations of the Simple Tao" (Su dao jie 素道解), aptly characterizes the contents. Few sources are given, but similar instructions can be found in Tang works such as 830 Fuqi jingyi lun by SIMA CHENGZHEN. At the end, the text refers to a Shenxian tu 神仙圖. This title could well refer to 1168 Taishang laojun zhongjing (q.v.), and quotations here show many similarities with that text; for instance: "If you constantly think of the Tao, the Tao will also think of you. In sadness, think of the Tao; in illness think of the Tao; in poverty think of the Tao; in need and distress think of the Tao; when rich and noble, think of the Tao; when eating and drinking, think of the Tao. . . . The Tao is I, and I with you shall together practice the arts of Long Life." 132 Taiqing zhenren luoming jue also gives a citation from the Shenxian tu that in many respects is similar. Also, the particular names for the spirits of the Five Viscera (e.g., Bibi 俾俾 for the spleen; see page 10b) are common to the three texts. The present work should be of a contemporary, pre-Eastern Jin (317–420) date.

Kristofer Schipper

Taiqing daoyin yangsheng jing 太清導引養生經

19 fols.

Fourth century?

818 (fasc. 568)

"Treatise of Great Purity on Gymnastics and Nurturing Vitality." This work is listed in the Bishu sheng xubian dao siku quesbu mu (1145) under the title of Daoyin yangsheng jing 導引養生經, in one juan (VDL 150). The text is later than 1427 Taiqing Daolin shesheng lun, to which it refers, and 824 Songshan Taiwu xiansheng qijing, which it cites. It probably dates in its present form to a period after the mid-eighth century. However, the Zhubing yuanhou lun (dated 610) and 836 Shenxian shiqi jingui miaolu already cite much the same material from traditional sources. On the basis of these citations, the majority of the exercises described here can be dated to the late sixth century. A relationship between the present text and the lost Yangsheng yaoji 養生要集 (fourth century; see Barrett, "Transmission") can only be surmised.

The partial edition of the work in YJQQ 34.1a–13b corresponds, with variants, to the section 1a–13a of the present text. Another abridged version is found in juan 28 of 1017 Daoshu.

The work consists of a collection of gymnastics and breathing techniques, including those of Daolin 道林 (i.e., Zhi Dun 支遁, 314–366), representing the schools of various immortals of antiquity (Chisong zi 赤松子, Ning Feng zi 寧封子, Pengzu 彭祖, Wangzi Qiao 王子喬). Several of the latter's biographies in 294 Liexian zhuan are cited. The breathing techniques and animal-like movements placed under the patronage of Ning Feng zi continue an ancient tradition.

Remnants of this tradition dating from the Han period (206 B.C.–A.D. 220) have been unearthed in recent decades by archaeologists: the Gymnastics Chart (Daoyin tu 導引圖) in Mawangdui, depicting movements and exercises; and a set of commentaries on these illustrations, inscribed on bamboo slips discovered separately in Jiangling, Hunan (see the references in Despeux).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Despeux, "Gymnastics."

Jean Lévi and Franciscus Verellen

Taishang huangting waijing yujing 太上黃庭外景玉經

3 juan

Before A.D. 255

332 (fasc. 167)

"Precious Book of the Exterior Landscape of the Yellow Court." This is the original Huangting jing, a didactic poem spoken by Lord Lao and describing the interior world. The epithet waijing was later added by the Shangqing tradition, in order to distinguish this ancient text from their own 331 Taishang huangting neijing yujing (see, for instance, 1344 Dongzhen taishang shuo zhihui xiaomo zhenjing 1.15b: 黃庭內外[景經]).

The oldest copy of the present text is by Wang Xizi 王羲之 (303–379). Written in 337, it has been reproduced on a stele, from which a number of rubbings have been preserved. These rubbings have been studied and critically edited by Nakata Yūjirō (Chūgoku shoron shū, 83–142).

The Huangting jing is, however, older than that. Its prosody and rhymes correspond to Later Han (25–220) or Three Kingdoms (220–265) usage (see Maspero, "Methods," 489). 294 Liexian zhuan 2.21a (biography of Zhu Huang 朱璜) mentions the Laojun Huangting jing and the practice of its multiple recitations. It is, moreover, mentioned in 789 Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie kejing 16a (dated 255) as an important work for the instruction of adepts. Its specific vocabulary is also used in 1294 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi 19b–20b. The work was part of GE HONG's library (1185 Baopu zi neipian 19.5a).

In the present edition, the text is divided into three short juan, which correspond to the version in the annotated edition of 263 Xiuzhen shishu 58–60.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gong Pengcheng, "Huangting jing lunyao"; Schipper, Concordance du Houang-t'ing ching; Yang Fucheng, "Huangting nei wai erjing kao"; Yu Wanli, "Huangting jing xinzheng."

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang mingjian zhenjing 太上明鑑真經

11 fols.

1207 (fasc. 876)

"The Most High True Scripture of the Clear Mirror." The territorial units listed in our text (6a) are zhou, jun, xian, and so on. The same text in Laojun mingzhao fa xushi 老君明照法敘事 (in YJQQ 48.7b), in the oath of transmission (shifa 誓法), omits jun 郡 from this list. The jun commandery was abolished as a formal territorial unit during the early Tang (618–907). YJQQ 48.7a also shows traces of another revision of our text (5a) in the substitution of li 理 for zhi 治, the taboo name of Tang Gaozong. We may therefore conclude that the present text dates from the Six Dynasties period (220–589).

The work is an assortment of instructions and charms devoted to the pursuit of immortality. It comprises two parts, of which only the first deals with mirrors, the second part concerns a medicinal plant and the three poisonous worms (sanchong 三蟲).

Part 1 (1a–6b) presents various methods of meditation that make use of the powers of water and metal intrinsic to Chinese mirrors. From resolute self-visualization in one or several mirrors, the adept progresses to the technique of the four discs. These discs are implanted at cardinal points by the four emblematic animals, each bearing a looking glass. In this way the adept may perceive his personal gods as well as the nine transformations of Laozi according to the hours of the day. For the highest degree of meditation the text counsels the use of a single mirror. It gives details (but no drawing) of a charm, the tianyuan fu 天圓符 attributed to Zuo Yuanfang 左元放, the master of GE HONG. Placed on the back of a small mirror to be worn by the adept, this charm assures him protection against all evil. A formula of transmission for these instructions ends the first part of this text.

Part 2 (7a–9b) consists of moral injunctions addressed to a Huangting zhenren

FIGURE 2. The Three Deities guarding against the Three Afflictions of lust, greed, and ambition (1207 10b–11a). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/1191)

daoshi 黃庭真人道士 concerning jiuheng 就衡 (manna), used by Emperor Yao to nourish victims of the Deluge. This food is made from a nine-knotted, thirty-six leaved plant gathered by a Huangting yunü 黃庭玉女. It is associated with four charms of the cardinal points; the charms are shown in drawings and identified in the text accompanied by their propitious dates, regulated to the calendrical system jianchu 建除.

The final instructions are aimed at fighting the three poisonous worms by means of three charms. Two of these charms, the text states, derive from the Laozi sanshijiu zhen fu 老子三十九真符. There are no illustrations of these charms, but auspicious days for entering the mountains to prepare the remedies are given. Our text closes with the illustrations of three gods complete in details of dress and identity, who, when invoked, will help the adept to fulfill the instructions provided (fig. 2).

Reference concerning the four discs sigui 四規 (2a) is found in BPZ 19, which lists among lost works a book of Four Discs (Sigui jing 四規經) and a Book of the Clear Mirror (Mingjing jing 明鏡經). BPZ 19 further lists a Charm of the Forty-nine True Mirrors (Sishijiu zhenjing fu 四十九真經符), which may well be related to the Charm of the Thirty-nine True Mirrors (Sanshijiu zhenjing fu 三十九真經符) mentioned in the present text (9b).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kaltenmark, “Miroirs magiques.”

Pauline Bentley Koffler

Taiqing jing duangu fa 太清經斷穀法

12 fols.

846 (fasc. 573)

“Methods of the Great Purity Canon for Abstaining from Cereals.” This text comprises elements of a tradition that can be traced at least to the Han dynasty (206 B.C.–A.D. 220). Among the patron saints of this tradition is Cui Yezi 崔野子, whose biography in LZIT 7.13b probably derives from the late Six Dynasties (220–589) Dongxian zhuan 洞仙傳. The present work probably dates to the end of the Six Dynasties period at the earliest.

All of the six recipes for which a source is indicated (see 2a–b, 5b, 6a, 6b, and 9b) are said to derive from the Wufu jing 五符經. Four of these resemble recipes found in 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu 2.21a–b, 2.30b–31a, 2.35a, and 2.36a, except for details concerning measures and quantities. The recipes are also abridged. The two remaining recipes attributed to the Wufu jing (2.a–b, 6a) are related only remotely to those found there: perhaps 2.12a for the fuling 茯苓 (pachyma cocos) recipe and 2.21a–b for huangjing 黃精 (poligonatum giganteum).

The present work (7a–b) contains a citation of the Baopu zi that is not found in extant editions.

The book consists of a selection of exclusively plant-based recipes for preparing substitute foods. Some of the foods are themselves based on cereals, but in fermented form. All of the preparations are extremely simple and require only a few common ingredients. The recipes refer to only five plants: fuling 茯苓, huangjing 黃精, zhu 朮, jusheng 巨勝, and tianmen dong 天門冬.

Jean Lévi

1.A.5 Alchemy

As with other technical texts (medicine, yangsheng 養生), the early materials related to alchemy have been preserved in a great variety of sources and in many different compilations. Here again, later editions brought together in part 2.A.5 should be consulted alongside the present ones. Many alchemical recipes and techniques have also been transmitted within the Shangqing scriptures (see part 1.B.2).

The works assembled here are of a varied nature. Some are highly technical (930 Sanshiliu shuifa), while others relate to mythology (see, for instance, the “method” of the five transcendental “mushrooms” planted by the divine Mao brothers on Maoshan 茅山 [889 Taiji zhenren jiuzhuan huandan jing yaojue]). Some works, such as the ancient alchemical manual 880 Taiqing jinyi shendan jing, have sections on ritual. Throughout this section the role played by GE HONG in the elaboration of alchemical lore is apparent. As can be seen from many titles in this section and in part 2.A.5, the compilers of the Xuandu guan 玄都觀 catalogue and subsequent bibliographers classified these alchemical texts in the Taiqing division.

For the Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契 and related texts, the reader is invited to consult the introduction to part 2.A.5. Although the notion of Inner Alchemy was in a way already present in later Han times (see 1168 Taishang laojun zhongjing 38), to all evidence the work that is now called Zhouyi cantong qi belongs to a later development in Taoist thought and practice.

Shenxian fuer danshi xingyao fa 神仙服餌丹石行藥法

26 fols.

Attributed to Jingli xiansheng 京里先生; Six Dynasties (220–589)

420 (fasc. 192)

“Methods of the Divine Immortals for Ingesting Cinnabar and Other Minerals, and for Making Medicines Edible.” This text includes a collection of alchemical recipes and a section dealing with the general principles of the treatment of mineral and vegetal substances. Apart from two references to cinnabar as coming from Yue 越 (in modern Zhejiang; 7a) and Ba 巴 (in modern Sichuan; 9a), which suggest that the text dates at least partially from before the Tang (618–907), there is no definite evidence on the date of this compilation. The name of its legendary author, who is also credited with 836 Shenxian Shiqi jingui miaolu, appears as Jingli 景里 xiansheng in Bishu sheng xubian dao siku quesu mu 2.36b, where the title of the work is given as Shenxian fushi ershi bing xingyao fa 神仙服食餌石并行藥法 (Methods of the Divine Immortals for Ingesting Minerals in Pills, and for Making Medicines Edible; cf. VDL 130).

The contents of the work may be divided into three parts. The first part (1a–11a) includes twenty-one methods for making cinnabar edible. There follow similar recipes for realgar (11a–17b) and other substances (25a–26a). A third section (17b–25a, entitled Shenxian fushi ershi 神仙服食餌石, a name close to the variant title mentioned above) discusses the value and use of common minerals and plants for obtaining immortality, as well as the general principles underlying their treatment and ingestion. The methods described in this work seem to be related to traditions reflected in the early hagiographical sources, where the ingestion of minerals and plants is often mentioned as part of dietary regimes. Several recipes here are in fact associated with names of legendary immortals of antiquity.

Fabrizio Pregadio

Sanshiliu shuifa 三十六水法

12 fols.

930 (fasc. 597)

“Thirty-six Methods for Liquefying [Solids].” This work describes ways of turning metals and minerals into aqueous solutions. A Sanshiliu shuifang 三十六水經, without attribution, is mentioned by GE HONG (283–343) in 1185 Baopu zi neipian 19.4b. Some of these methods were known to GE HONG since he speaks of “transforming instantly the thirty-six minerals (or stones) into water 三十六石, 立化爲水” (1185 Baopu zi neipian 3.1b) and further describes two methods for making aqueous solutions of realgar and cinnabar (1185 Baopu zi neipian 16.9b–10a). These two methods correspond, with some variants, to 2a–2b of the present text. The book is entitled Lian sanshiliu shui shi fa 鍊三十六水石法 in the Chongwen zongmu (VDL 163).

According to one tradition, the authorship of the work is ascribed to Liu An 劉安 (179–122 B.C.). His biography in the Shenxian zhuan 神仙傳 states that he was given an alchemical book in thirty-six juan 丹經三十六卷 by his Eight Masters (Bagong 八公). An excerpt from the same work in YJQQ 109.24a adds: “Alchemical scriptures along with thirty-six recipes for mercury, etc. [丹經及三十六水丹等方] or: diverse recipes of which thirty-six concern solvents and silver[.]”

Supplementary information can be found in 885 Huangdi jinding shendan jingjue 8.1a–2a, according to which Liu An not only received the Sanshiliu shuifa from the Bagong, but also a Wuling shendan shangjing 五靈神丹上經. That source also includes the line of transmission of these texts (8.2b) and states that Liu An transmitted them to Zuo Wu 左吳 before ascending into Heaven. According to Gao You 高誘, however, Zuo Wu himself was one of the Bagong (cf. 1184 Huainan honglie jie, preface 2a).

Another tradition ascribes the authorship to TAO HONGJING. His bibliography in the Huayang yinju xiansheng benqi lu (YJQQ 107.10a), by his nephew Tao Yi 陶翊 (ca. 502), includes the title Fuyunmu zhu shiyao xiaohua sanshiliu shuifang 服雲母諸石藥消化三十六水方 in one juan. TAO HONGJING himself, however, notes in his commentary to the Bencao 本草: “The methods of transformation [xiao 消] of nitre can be found in the Sanshiliu shuifang” (Shennong bencao jing jizhu 23, and 769 Tujiang yanyi bencao 1.28a). The sentence is also quoted, although incorrectly, in 885 Shendan jingjue 19.2a. There are indeed several procedures for dissolving nitre in our text (4a–b); the third of these also figures in 885 Shendan jingjue 19.2a.

Despite the title, the Sanshiliu shuifa comprises more than thirty-six methods. The text must have acquired its present form during the Northern Song (960–1127), if not already during the Tang: the 885 Shendan jingjue includes a “rongyan shuifa 戎鹽水法” excerpted from the Sanshiliu shuifa which figures after the thirty-six methods in our text.

The procedures themselves are short; nitre (xiaoshi 硝石) is generally used as solvent to obtain various solutions (alum, gold, realgar, cinnabar, lacquer, etc.). Instruction on the ritual used for the transmission of the text, attributed to a certain Gao Qi 高起, along with an incomplete list of days forbidden for the making of drugs is found at the end of the text (11b–12b; compare this list with that of 885 Huangdi jiuding shendan jing 1.2a; 880 Taiqing jinyi shendan jingjue 1.7a; and 908 Shangqing jiuzhen zhongjing neijue 2b).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao; Tshao Thien-chhin et al., “An early medieval alchemical text,” 122.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Shangqing jiuzhen zhongjing neijue 上清九真中經內訣

6 fols.

Attributed to Chisong zi 赤松子; early Six Dynasties (220–589)

908 (fasc. 589)

“Secret Instructions on the Central Book of the Nine Authentic [Lords] of High Purity.” This text is attributed to Chisong zi, who appears here under the appellation Taiji zhenren 太極真人 (Zhenren of the Great Ultimate). No exact details are available about the origin and date of this short text, but its title and attribution suggest that it may have been transmitted as part of the Shangqing corpus. Taiji zhenren is also associated with 889 Taiji zhenren jiuzhuan huandan jing yaojue and 1376 Shangqing taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing, two other works related to this corpus and entirely or partially devoted to alchemical methods.

The text includes three methods for the ingestion of cinnabar (1a–2b), followed by the description of an Offering (jiao Taiyi fa 醮太一法; 2b–5b) to be performed before the preparation of the elixir.

Fabrizio Pregadio

Taiji zhenren jiuzhuan huandan jing yaojue 太極真人九轉還丹經要訣

8 fols.

Early Six Dynasties (220–589)

889 (fasc. 586)

“Essential Instructions on the Book of the Nine-Times-Transmuted Elixir of the Zhenren of the Great Ultimate.” This work includes the recipe for an elixir (1a–5b), two methods for compounding minor drugs (5b–6b), and an account of five zhi 芝 (substances of a transcendental nature that only divinities can confer upon adepts) said to have been planted by Mao Ying 茅盈 and his brothers on Maoshan 茅山 (6b–8a).

The text, which is listed for the first time as Taiji zhenren jiuzhuan huandan jing in Sui shu 34.1049, is presented here as revealed by Xicheng Wangjun 西城王君, one of the Shangqing immortals.

Several quotations in TPYL from the biography of Mao Ying confirm that the materials found in the present text were once part of the Shangqing scriptural corpus. These quotations are derived from both the first recipe (e.g., passages in 1a and 3b are quoted in TPYL 942.4b, 811.7a, and 812.7a; cf. also TPYL 671.1a and 1016 Zhen'gao 5.4a) and the account of the zhi (passages in 6b and 7a–b are quoted in TPYL 718.7b and 986.3b). It is likely that these recipes were already transmitted before YANG XT's revelations of 364–370, and that they entered Mao Ying's biography from different sources, being later separated from it to form the present text. The earlier origin of the section on the zhi, said to have been appended (fu 附) to the elixir recipe, is attested by 1185 Baopu zi neipian 11.6b and 11.7b.

Part of the first recipe (summarized in Strickmann, “On the alchemy of T'ao Hung-ching,” 146–150) is quoted as jiuzhuan fa 九轉法 (Method of the Nine Cycles) in 885 Huangdi jiuding shendan jingjue (passages in 3b and 5a are found there in 20.16b–17a and 20.1b; the latter is also in 930 Sanshiliu shuifa 11b). The recipes of the two corollary drugs are reproduced in YJQQ 77.10b–11b. The account of the zhi was later incorporated in 304 Maoshan zhi 19.11a–b, and in 1333 Shangqing daobao jing 4.9b. It is quoted in WSBY 78.3a–4a as coming from the now lost Daoji jing 道跡經.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Strickmann, “On the alchemy of T'ao Hung-ching.”

Fabrizio Pregadio

Taiqing jing tianshi koujue 太清經天師口訣

15 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

883 (fasc. 583)

“Oral Instructions of the Heavenly Master on the Books of the Great Purity.” This work includes a short introduction (1a–b) and two different texts: the Taiqing shendan jingjue 太清神丹經訣 (Instructions on the Book of the Divine Elixir of the Great Purity; 1b–4b) and the Chisong zi zhouhou yaojue 赤松子肘後藥訣 (Instructions on the Medicines by Chisong zi to Keep at Hand; 4b–15b). The first text comments on some passages of the Taiqing jing, a lost early alchemical scripture repeatedly quoted here as benjing 本經 (original canon). The second text gives the recipes of the Three Powders (sansan 三散) and the Five Salves (wugao 五膏), revealed by Chisong zi after a dialogue with Yunyang zi 雲陽子.

The introduction, on the pledges necessary to receive the first text and the consequences of its illicit transmission, is also found in 885 Huangdi jinding shendan jingjue 3.4a–b. The passages in the first text on the acetic bath (huachi 華池; 1b) and the crucible (tufu 土釜; 3a–b) are also found in 885 Shendan jingjue 17.5a and 7.6a–b, respectively. In the second text, the method for making pellets for driving away demons (zuo quegui wanyao fa 作卻鬼丸藥法; 14a) is almost identical to a recipe given in 885 Shendan jingjue 5.10b, which also includes an identically named talisman, and in SUN SIMO's Taiqing danjing yaojue 太清丹經要訣 (YJQQ 71.27a). The first recipe of the Five Salves also includes the so-called methods of the eight refinements (balian 八鍊; 7a–8b), said to belong to a corpus of early alchemical texts and methods in 954 Taishang hunyuan zhenlu 7b. All the passages quoted in 885 Shendan jingjue mention (with some variants) the title of the present text, showing that the introduction and the two other sections were part of a single work already by the middle of the seventh century.

Fabrizio Pregadio

Taiqing jinyi shendan jing 太清金液神丹經

3 juan

Juan 1 attributed to Zhang Daoling 張道陵 (second century A.D.); juan 2 attributed to Yin Changsheng 陰長生 (first century A.D.); juan 3 by GE HONG 葛洪 (283–343)

880 (fasc. 582)

“Book of the Divine Elixir [Made from] Liquid Gold, from [the Canon of] Greatest Purity.” This is a collection of diverse texts, some alchemical, others indirectly or not at all related to alchemy. The title is mentioned, without the prefix Taiqing, in the Chongwen congmu (VDL 118). The composite nature of the work is already manifest from the different attributions given at the headings of each juan. The structure of the text itself does not in fact correspond to this tripartite division. The compilation, possibly undertaken by GE HONG, seems to draw on various sources related to the alchemy of Yin Changsheng and his followers.

Juan 65 of the YJQQ, in the section on alchemy (“Jindan jue” 金丹訣) of that encyclopedia, is entirely devoted to excerpts of the present text and provides some clues as to its structure.

The book begins with a preface by Zhang Daoling, who speaks of himself as Dao-ling (3a7) and refers to his disciples Zhao Sheng 趙昇 and Wang Chang 王長. This preface, written in a philosophical vein and an obvious forgery, may explain the attribution of the whole juan to the first Heavenly Master. The YJQQ version has a commentary to this preface, which, in the present version, is added at the end (3b–7a).

Following this commentary, our text 7b–13a has a ritual of fasting and sacrifice in preparation for the alchemical work, to be performed before producing the liuyi ni 六一泥 sealing paste necessary for the hermetical closing of the alchemical vessel. The famous talisman of the True Form of the Five Sacred Peaks (Wuyue zhenxing tu 五嶽真形圖; see 1281 Wuyue zhenxing xulun) plays an important role in these rites. This part is omitted in the YJQQ version, which gives only the final didactic poem (13a–14b). The poem, in seven-character verse, is identified in a following note as the core of the Taiqing jinyi shendan jing. It was originally written in unintelligible “ancient script,” but transcribed into Han-time characters (Hanzi 漢字) by Yin Changsheng. The biography of Yin Changsheng in YJQQ 106.21b (“Yin zhenjun zhuan” 陰真君傳) states that the (recipe) for the divine elixir made from Liquid Gold (Taiqing jinyi shendan 太清金液神丹) was bestowed on Yin by his master Ma Mingsheng 馬鳴生. The biography is followed by an autobiography (zixu 自敘) by Yin where he announces his departure from this world in A.D. 122.

Chen Guofu has examined the rhymes of the poem and dated it to the Later Han period (25–220). Other features, such as place names, confirm this date (Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanlin xukao, 289–92). These place names figure in the remainder of the first juan, which contains a recipe for making liuyi ni, a detailed explanation on the making of the elixir, and the ritual to be performed before taking it. These texts are consistent throughout. Chen concludes, therefore, that the entire first juan is of an ancient, possibly Han, date, and that the two remaining juan are later additions.

The first part of the second juan (1a–5b) is also preserved in YJQQ 65. It contains explanations and elaborations on the themes of the above-mentioned poem. The last paragraph quotes “Lord Zheng,” that is, ZHENG YIN, GE HONG's master, who pronounces a eulogy of Yin Changsheng and his master Ma Mingsheng.

The text continues (11a) with a story by GE HONG about his father-in-law BAO JING, who met Yin Changsheng in the first year of the Taixing era (A.D. 318). On this meeting, see also Jin shu 95.2482. The story as it is told here is similar, for the first part, to that of the Daoxue zhuan 道學傳 quoted in TPYL 663. Here Yin Changsheng prophesies about the future of the Jin dynasty (265–420), and GE HONG concludes (page 9b) that the events of 324 and 328 bore out the words of the immortal.

The last juan is attributed to GE HONG. It contains a description of foreign countries, especially of the south and the west. In a long preamble, GE HONG laments the lack of information about foreign regions and tells about his study of them and their products, especially those of use in alchemy. He ends by saying: “I now have written a record of those states that produce cinnabar, in order to increase the knowledge of foreign countries and enlighten ignorant minds, and have added it at the end of the [Book of] Divine Gold.” We have no proof that this text is by GE HONG's hand, but neither is there conclusive evidence to the contrary. It would not seem likely that a forger of GE HONG's Taoist work would have selected this subject. In any event, this work would appear to date to the Six Dynasties period (220–589), if not earlier.

Kristofer Schipper

Baopu zi shenxian jinzhuo jing 抱朴子神仙金鈞經

3 juan

Attributed to GE HONG 葛洪 (283–343); includes texts dating from the Han to the Six Dynasties (206 B.C.–A.D. 589)

917 (fasc. 593)

“Book of the Golden Liquor of the Divine Immortals.” This work includes texts of different date, all related to GE HONG and his 1185 Baopu zi neipian. The title is mentioned for the first time as Shenxian jinzhuo jing in Chongwen zongmu (VDL 130).

The first juan describes a method for the preparation of the Golden Liquor, called jinzhuo in the title and jinsui 金水 (Golden Water) throughout the text. This description corresponds in several details to the short and often unclear summary given by GE HONG in 1185 Baopu zi neipian 4.16a–17b (cf. Pregadio, “The Book of the Nine Elixirs,” 574–78). The recipe is divided into thirty short passages, each followed by a commentary. Two references to the change in the weight system between the Han (206 B.C.–A.D. 220) and the Jin (265–420) dynasties (commentary, 1.1b and 1.8a; cf. 1185 Baopu zi neipian 4.18a) suggest a Han date for the text. On the evidence of the place names mentioned, the commentary dates from the sixth century.

The second and third juan reproduce 1185 Baopu zi neipian 4.1a–7a and 4.7a–22a, respectively. Among the most significant variants are the reference to the method of the divine elixir of the Great Purity (taiqing shendan 太清神丹) as coming from the Taiqing shangjing 太清上經 (3.2b), and a method attributed to Bo xiansheng 白先生 (3.7b), not found in GE HONG’s work.

As described in this text, the main ingredients of the Golden Liquor are gold and mercury. The final product can be ingested, or it can be used to cast eating and drinking utensils, or to obtain a cyclically transformed elixir (luandan 還丹). The commentary refers to the Jiudan jing 九丹經 (1.4b) for a “test preparation of gold and silver” (shizuo jinyin fa 試作金銀法); the corresponding method is found in 885 Huangdi jiuding shendan jingjue 1.5a.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Liao Guifen and Ding Yizhuan, “Daojiao waidan shu”; Pregadio, “The Book of the Nine Elixirs.”

Fabrizio Pregadio

1.A.6 Sacred History and Geography1.A.6.a Cosmogony and the Pantheon

The “Register of Primordial Beginning” (166 Yuanshi shangzhen zhongxian ji) is a description of the pantheon that includes an account of the Taoist creation myth, a regular feature in subsequent Laozi annals (see part 2.A.6.a and part 3.A.6.a; an early specimen of the genre has come down via the Dunhuang manuscript Laozi bianhua jing 老子變化經; see Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō and Su Jinren, “Dunhuang yishu Laozi bianhua jing”). It is followed here by the “Scripture on the Creation of the World” (1437 Taishang laojun kaitian jing) a work likewise devoted to cosmogony and the history of Laozi manifestations. Further accounts of the pantheon include TAO HONGJING’s “Table of the Ranks and Functions in the Pantheon” (167 Dongxuan lingbao zhenling weiye tu), which presents the Shangqing pantheon in the form of an organizational chart of officials presiding over the underworld and the terrestrial and celestial spheres.

Yuanshi shangzhen zhongxian ji 元始上真衆仙記

9 fols.

Attributed to GE HONG 葛洪 (283–343); Six Dynasties (220–589)

166 (fasc. 73)

“Register of [the Heavenly Prince of] Primordial Beginning, the Superior Zhenren, and Hosts of Immortals.” This work comprises elements of two shorter versions listed in Song catalogues (cf. VDL 82). The present edition adds both the alternative title “Inside a Pillow” and the reputed author’s name as a subheading (“Ge Hong Zhenzhong shu 葛洪枕中書”). Yu Jiayi has demonstrated, however, that the work is later than GE HONG, since it mentions (7a) the apotheosis of Xu Mu 許穆 (i.e., XU MI 謚, d. 373; see Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao chan, 124 ff.) and Xu Yufu 玉斧 (i.e., Xu Hui 翺, d. ca. 370; see Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao chan, 156 ff.), who both survived Ge.

The work has been transmitted, with its traditional attribution, under both the present title and as Zhenzhong shu. Another version is contained in 446 Shangqing zhongjing zhu zhensheng bi 5, and several later editions may be consulted in congshu 叢書 of the Ming period (1368–1644). In addition, Yu Jiayi pointed to parallels between the Yuanshi shangzhen zhongxian ji and 1016 Zhen’gao 16, as well as to similarities with LÜQIU FANGYUAN’s edition of TAO HONGJING’s 167 Dongxuan lingbao zhenling weiye tu.

The present text purports to be a revelation to GE HONG (1a–2a). Despite its uncertain origin, it constitutes an important source on the Taoist creation myth. The work includes a brief cosmogony, beginning with Pan Gu 盤古, the Heavenly Prince of Primordial Beginning (Yuanshi tianwang 元始天王), a genealogy of primordial deities, and accounts of the “hosts of immortals,” with their titles and residences.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Liu Zhongyu, “Ge Hong Zhenzhong shu”; Rao Zongyi, “Lun daojiao chuangshi ji”; Yu Jiaxi, Siku tiyao bianzheng 19.1220–23.

Franciscus Verellen

Taishang laojun kaitian jing 太上老君開天經

7 fols.

Attributed to Zhang Pan 張泮; Six Dynasties (220–589)

1437 (fasc. 1059)

“Scripture on the Creation of the World, by the Most High Lord Lao.” The Guang hongming ji 12.174c, compiled by Daoxuan (596–667), claims that the Kaitian jing was the fabrication of a certain Zhang Pan. In Xu Gaoseng zhuan 23.624c, Daoxuan states that under the reign of the Northern Wei emperor Xiaoming (516–528), the Taoist Jiang Bin 姜斌 cited the Laozi kaitian jing in a debate. It is likely to be a work of the Six Dynasties period. Another edition is found in YJQQ 2.9a–14b.

The scripture’s ostensible subject, cosmogony, relates the work to the Taoist genesis tradition (see, e.g., 166 Yuanshi shangzhen zhongxian ji). At the same time, and perhaps more importantly, it provides a chronicle for the pre-Zhou period to precede the Laozi legend as assembled by Sima Qian in Shiji 63, emphasizing the sage’s role as instructor of rulers (dishi 帝師) and revealer of scriptures. In this sense, the “Creation of the World” also belongs to the Laozi annals tradition in the Daozang (e.g., 770 Hunyuan shengji). The present litany of Laozi’s credentials suggests that the work, like Laozi chronicles in general, served a polemical purpose. Daoxuan’s reference to its use in religious debate at court seems to bear this out.

The scripture postulates that Lord Lao is at the origin of creation, the process through which the undifferentiated One of nonbeing first divided into Heaven and Earth and then brought forth the myriad beings, each endowed with countless attributes. At the Great Beginning (taichu 太初), the first of a series of cosmic phases, Lord Lao orally pronounced (koutu 口吐) the Kaitian jing scripture. The “Creation of the World” incorporates several traditional creation myths (3a–b; cf. Rao Zongyi, “Lun daojiao chuangshi ji,” 37), including the legend of the two sons of Chaos (Hundun 混沌), named Hu Chen 胡臣 and Hu Ling 胡靈, whose spirits after death became the gods of the mountains (shanyue shen 山嶽神) and the rivers (shuishen 水神), respectively. Having first enlightened Hundun, Laozi subsequently reveals other scriptures and instructs every one of the culture heroes and mythical rulers from Fu Xi 伏羲, Zhu Rong 祝融, the Three Sovereigns 三皇, and Huangdi 黃帝 down to the legendary kings of the Shang dynasty. The narrative ends with Lord Lao’s renewed manifestation as teacher (shi 師) under the Zhou.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Rao Zongyi, “Lun daojiao chuangshi ji”; Schafer, trans., “The Scripture of the Opening of Heaven”; David C. Yu, “The creation myth.”

Franciscus Verellen

Dongxuan lingbao zhenling weiye tu 洞玄靈寶真靈位業圖

29 fols.

Originally compiled by TAO HONGJING 陶弘景 (ca. 500); revised by LÜQIU FANGYUAN 闕丘方遠 (before 893)

167 (fasc. 73)

“Table of the Ranks and Functions in the Pantheon.” The title of this work by TAO HONGJING, preserved here in a revised edition by LÜQIU FANGYUAN, is not mentioned in contemporary or early sources, probably due to the fact that this text originally formed part of 421 Dengzhen yinjue (q.v.). 1128 Daomen jingfa xiangcheng cixu 2.16a, for example, mentions a Zhenling weiye jing as a subsection of the Dengzhen yinjue and provides a comprehensive quotation. Also the references to 421 Dengzhen yinjue in 446 Shangqing zhongjing zhu zhensheng bi 7.13b–14a and 8.9b–10b seem to refer to a section in that work similar in content to this “Table of Ranks.”

The present Zhenling weiye tu reflects TAO HONGJING’s attempt to provide an exhaustive survey of names, ranks, and administrative responsibilities of the inhabitants of the spiritual realms of the universe, structured in seven levels. In his annotations he apparently provided additional details about the provenance and career of the deities. Tao based himself on the Shangqing literature, but for former historical persons, he also used non-Taoist sources for comparison. A major part of the work—the description of the offices in the mountain caves and in the terrestrial and underworldly realms—obviously taken directly from 1016 Zhen’gao 12–16, supplemented by investigations Tao himself conducted there.

Although no source is named, juan 83 and 84 of the WSBY are certainly based on Tao’s Zhenling weiye tu. There we find, in an ascending order, entries on the officials of the underworld (guiguan 鬼官), the terrestrial level (dixian 地仙, dizhen 地真), and the so-called nine palaces (jiugong 九宮), as well as those of the heavenly spheres of Taiqing 太清 and Taiji 太極, with frequent additional remarks, brief yet typical for TAO HONGJING (see also the Dunhuang manuscripts Pelliot 3141, Pelliot 3773, and Stein 5751, in Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 343–44; Zurokuhen, 772–75). The following sections on the Shangqing 上清 and Yuqing 玉清 Heavens were presumably distributed over juan 85–86 of the WSBY (cf. the table of contents of the WSBY preserved in Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2861, in Ōfuchi, Zurokuhen, 751; and Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 69). Yet these sections are at least partly covered by the citation in 1128 Daomen jingfa xiangcheng cixu. There the supreme deities of the pantheon are listed in a descending order, only a few passages of the commentary are quoted, and possibly some additions are already worked into the final part (2.18b–20a). But since there can be no doubt about the main source of both, this citation and those in the WSBY taken together provide ample material for comparison with the present revised edition made by LÜQIU FANGYUAN (see fig. 3) during his time in the Tiantai 天台 Mountains (he moved to the Dadi Grotto Heaven 大滌洞天 near Hangzhou in 893). The comparison reveals considerable shortcomings in his work. Possibly Lüqiu had relied on copies of TAO HONGJING's original version but failed to reproduce the various interrelations that had been indicated graphically in the Zhenling weiye tu of the Dengzhen yinjue. His arrangement of the gods into a continuous, linear sequence is presumably based on an understanding of their spatial groupings on the right, left, and in the center of the diagram as a hierarchical classification. Thus, for example, [Yuqing] zixu gaoshang yuanhuang daojun [玉清] 紫虛高上元皇道君, the supreme deity in the pantheon, is given place eleven, right rank, in this rendering, probably because that name had originally been placed in the right (i.e., the beginning) on the diagram (cf. 1128 Daomen jingfa xiangcheng cixu 2.16a with our text 1b). Frequently Lüqiu misinterprets brief lines of summarizing commentary and lists them as independent entries (compare, e.g., 1128 Daomen jingfa xiangcheng cixu 2.16b3, 2.16b10, and 2.17a7 with our text 1b3–5). Sometimes both misunderstandings occur at the same time, resulting in a completely unintelligible disarray (compare, e.g., WSBY 84.12a7–9 with our text 11a9–11b4). In other instances Lüqiu found himself compelled, because of the confusing order, to alter lines of commentary (compare, e.g., WSBY 84.2a–b with our text 15a–b).

FIGURE 3. The Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning and his court, the register of deities at the highest echelon of the pantheon, according to Lüqiu's recension (167 1a–b).

Since it is, finally, unlikely that TAO HONGJING wrote a separate preface for a subsection of his Dengzhen yinjue (1050 Huayang Tao yinju ji does not contain such a preface), we can only assume that LÜQIU FANGYUAN used Tao's general introductory remarks and placed them, reworked into a preface and signed with Tao's name, at the beginning of his new edition.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ishii Masako, "Shinkō no seiritsu oneguru shiryoteki kento."

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

1.A.6.b Mythology and Hagiography

This section assembles six classics of Taoist hagiography and mythical geography that stand as models for their respective genres and have exerted major influences on the development of Chinese imaginative literature and narrative fiction. The work 1031 Shanhai jing is an early comprehensive description of the natural world and its inhabitants, extending outward from the actual realm to increasingly fantastic lands. Composed nearly a thousand years later, 598 Shizhou ji is concerned with projections of the "true [i.e., esoteric] form" of the realms of the immortals.

The work 294 Liexian zhuan, probably of Later Han (25–220) date, can be regarded as the prototype of an extensive body of collected lives of immortals. In one way or another, all later works of this sort look back upon the Liexian zhuan as their ancestor and authentic nucleus. The remaining three works, dealing with the spiritual aspirations of rulers, form a genre of their own. Like the 1031 Shanhai jing, the 291 Mu tianzi zhuan is thought to have originated in the fourth century B.C. Describing the shamanistic journeys of King Mu of the Zhou (r. 1023–983 B.C.), it is similarly concerned with the exploration of mythical geography. Both works engaged the interest of the Jin scholar and author Guo Pu 郭璞 (276–324), whose commentaries survive.

The spiritual quest of King Mu, however, also relates this work to the historical romance about the Han emperor Wudi (r. 140–87 B.C.), 292 Han Wudi neizhuan, which in time is closer to the Shizhou ji (ca. sixth century A.D.). A central feature of the adventures of both rulers is their respective encounter with the goddess Xi wang mu 西王母, who appears in more archaic form also in the Shanhai jing. The work 293 Han Wudi waizhuan, finally, continues the themes of divine revelations obtained by Wudi and the fervent quest for immortality that was associated with his reign. It belongs to a larger tradition of legends about the emperor and his court, widely transmitted outside the Taoist canon, that enjoyed great popularity in medieval China.

Shanhai jing 山海經

18 juan (juan 14–15 are missing)

Probably fourth century B.C., with later additions; commentary by Guo Pu 郭璞 (276–324)

1031 (fasc. 675–676)

“Book of Mountains and Seas.” This is a mythical geography of the ancient world, written as a systematic repertoire of regions, landmarks, mythical animals and peoples, prophylactics, drugs, and other cures for the various ills that befall this world. The first five chapters relate to the Chinese world of the times and refer, at least partially, to actual places and their names. The following chapters, grouped in series of four, concern increasingly remote and mythical regions and their inhabitants. A final chapter (18) appears to be a later addition.

The systematic nature of the compilation and the importance given, for each place mentioned, to the drug that can be found there and the divination practices related to it suggest that this work originated as a handbook of shamanistic medicine.

The Shanhai jing is mentioned by Sima Qian at the end of his treatise “Dayuan zhuan 大宛傳” (Shiji 123.3179), where he judges that its contents “cannot be believed.” It is probable that he refers to the present work. The Han shu, “Yiwen zhi,” lists the work in thirteen pian 篇 and classifies it under xingfa 形法 (30.1774–75), which suggests that it was used for divination.

The present and many other editions of the text are accompanied by a presentation by Liu Xin 劉歆 (d. 23 B.C.), stating that he edited the text in eighteen pian. This number is at variance with the above-mentioned reference in the Han shu, “Yiwen zhi.” For this reason as well as for matters of style, the presentation must be considered spurious. Many elements in it, such as the attribution of the Shanhai jing to Bo Yi 伯益, who assisted Yu the Great in subduing the Flood, have nevertheless long been given credence.

The commentary by Guo Pu, on the other hand, is well authenticated. It is mentioned in Guo’s biography in the Jin shu as well as in the bibliographical treatises of the Sui shu and Tang shu 唐書. The present edition, moreover, incorporates Guo’s Shanhai jing tuzan 山海經圖讚, eulogies written as captions for the illustrations of the work as they existed already in his time. Here they are given at the end of each chapter.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The bibliography related to the Shanhai jing is extensive. See Fracasso, Libro dei monti e dei mari, and references in idem; “Shanhai jing,” in Loewe, ed., Early Chinese Texts, 357–67; Zhang Chunsheng, “Ping Zhengtong Daozang ben Shanhai jing”; Zhang Chunsheng, “Shanhai jing pianmu kao.”

Kristofer Schipper

Mu tianzi zhuan 穆天子傳

6 juan

Probably early fourth century B.C.; discovered in A.D. 281; commentary by Guo Pu 郭璞 (276–324)

291 (fasc. 137)

“The Story of Son of Heaven Mu.” The epic narrative of the life of King Mu of the Zhou (r. 1023–983 B.C.), his travels through the world and his meeting with the Queen Mother of the West (Xi wang mu 西王母; juan 1–5), as well as of the death and burial of Lady Sheng Ji 盛姬 (juan 6). According to the undated preface by Xun Xu 荀勗, the manuscript on bamboo slips was discovered by robbers in Taikang 2 (A.D. 281) in the tomb of King Xiang of Wei (r. 318–296 B.C.), together with many other texts. It was edited by Xun and other scholars. Apparently juan 1–4 are of a piece and correspond to the original state in which they were found, whereas juan 5 was reconstructed by Xun and his colleagues from other remains. Juan 6 corresponds to a fragment from another work, the Zhou Muwang meiren Sheng Ji sishi 周穆王美人盛姬死事, which was also found in the tomb.

The Daozang edition is based on a printed edition of the Yuan period (1279–1368). According to the preface (dated 1350) by Wang Jian 王漸, zi Xuanhan 玄翰, this eccentric scholar obtained a rare copy from the imperial censor Liu Zhen 劉貞 (1289–1361) and had it reprinted. The original Yuan edition has not been preserved. The present Daozang reprint is therefore the oldest extant edition. The Tianyi ge reprint, from which all later editions derive, is probably based on it.

The Mu tianzi zhuan is cited in Taoist works as a source related to the search of immortality. Central to this interpretation is the episode of the meeting between the Son of Heaven and Xi wang mu. This theme has been adopted in many later hagiographies, the most famous being 212 Han Wudi neizhuan.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gu Shi, Mu tianzi zhuan xi zheng jiangshu; Wang Yiliang and Chen Jianmin, Mu tianzi zhuan huijiao jishi; Wei Tingsheng, Mu tianzi zhuan jinkao; Yang Shanqun, “Mu tianzi zhuan de zhenwei”; Zheng Jiewen, Mu tianzi zhuan tongjie.

Kristofer Schipper

Liexian zhuan 列仙傳

2 juan

Attributed to Liu Xiang 劉向 (77–6 B.C.)

294 (fasc. 138)

“Biographies of Famous Immortals.” The present work is not mentioned in the Han shu, “Yiwen zhi,” whereas the Biographies of Famous Women (Lienü zhuan 列女傳) by the same author is given. According to the Sui shu, “Jingji zhi,” 33.979, Liu Xiang, while editing the classics, started to write the Biographies of Famous Immortals, Famous Men, and Famous Women. The same source (19b) gives two editions of the Liexian zhuan, one in three juan, with eulogies (zan 讚) added by Sun Chuo 孫綽 (314–371), and another in two juan, with eulogies added by the Jin poet Guo Yuanzu 郭元祖. This latter version corresponds to the present work.

Yang Shoujing (1839–1915) in Riben fangshu zhi 6.30b–31b and Yu Jiayi (1883–1955) in Siku tiyao bianzheng 19.1197–1205 have pointed out that for reasons of style, place names, book titles, and so on, the present work must have been written in later Han times (A.D. 25–220), in imitation of Liu Xiang’s Lienü zhuan. The author even wrote a preface that is lacking in the present edition but that has been preserved in a manuscript version of the Shuofu, which was reproduced by Sun Yirang 孫詒讓 (1848–1908) in his Zhayi 11.22a. The last two sentences are missing in this preface but appear to have been preserved in Falin 法林 (572–640), Poxie lun 破邪論 (in Guang hongming ji 11.21a), and give a fictitious date of 18 B.C. In the text itself, there are some intentional anachronisms. For instance, the biography of Mao nü 毛女 (7b–8a) is dated to 35 B.C. (170 years after the fall of the Qin).

The oldest citations of the Liexian zhuan, in Wang Yi’s (second century A.D.) commentary to the Chuci 楚辭 (3.13b) and in Ying Shao’s (d. 195?) commentary to the Han shu 25A.1204 and 57B.2599, are no longer found in the present text. Also, Ying Shao’s commentary is said to have comprised seventy-two biographies (see 1016 Zhen’gao 17.17a), whereas our present version has only seventy. In spite of these defects, the present version corresponds to the version included in the Song canon Da Song tiangong baozang 大宋天宮寶藏 of 1019, as it is similar to the abbreviated version of YJQQ 108. In the YJQQ, the sequence of the biographies is identical. Twenty-seven biographies have been omitted, and there is one additional one (Ruan Qiu 阮丘, YJQQ 108.14b).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kaltenmark, Le Lie-sien tchouan.

Kristofer Schipper

Shizhou ji 十洲記

13 fols.

Probably sixth century

598 (fasc. 330)

“Record of the Ten Islands.” A description of the ten paradisiacal regions in the Eastern Sea where the immortals have their abode, with a further description of the holy mountain Kunlun in the west, together with that of three additional islands: Fangzhang, Fusang, and Pengqiu. Although these four additional regions are not part of the ten islands and are not mentioned at the beginning of the text, the description does not vary notably from the preceding ones and there is no reason to suppose that they are later additions.

The opening sentences and evidence from 1281 Wuyue zhenxing xulun and other sources suggest that the present text was originally part of a longer work that included 292 Han Wudi neizhuan and 293 Han Wudi waizhuan (see 1281). The division into separate parts must, however, have occurred at an early date, as the Sui shu, “Jingji zhi,” and later bibliographies quote it as an independent work. Variant titles are Haiwai shizhou ji 海外十洲記 and Shizhou sandao ji 十洲三島記.

Whereas 212 Han Wudi neizhuan is a narrative constructed around the transmission of the ancient talisman called the Image of the True Form of the Five Sacred Mountains (Wuyue zhenxing tu 五嶽真形圖) and the later revealed texts of the Shangqing canon, the present sequel is concerned with an analogous Image of the True Form of the Ten Islands (Shizhou zhenxing tu 十洲真形圖), also mentioned in 212 Han Wudi neizhuan. Since the narrative here assumes the persona of Wudi’s courtier Dongfang Shuo 東方朔 (154–93 B.C.), the text is traditionally ascribed to him. It is also included as an independent text in YJQQ 26.

The description of the lands of the immortals is colorful and picturesque. The text has exerted widespread influence, notably on Tang poetry.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Li Fengmao, Liuchao, Sui, Tang xiandao, 123–85; Smith, “Record of the Ten Continents.”

Kristofer Schipper

Han Wudi neizhuan 漢武帝內傳

31 fols.

Probably sixth century

292 (fasc. 137)

“The Inner Story of Emperor Wu of the Han.” This is a short novel in the classical style that tells the legend of the visit of the goddess Xi wang mu 西王母 to Emperor Wu (reign 140–87 B.C.). A famous text of medieval Taoism, it is often quoted in the literature of the end of the Six Dynasties (220–598) and Tang (618–907) periods. The earliest direct citation of our text appears to be that in the preface (2b) of the Yutai xinyong 玉台新詠 by Xu Ling 徐陵 (507–583). On the other hand, the work should be later than the revelations to YANG XI (364–375), as the greatest part of the text is an adaptation of the now lost biography of Mao Ying 茅盈, one of the most important saints of the Shangqing jing (see Schipper, L'empereur Wou des Han, 11–19).

In fact, this work is not a primary Taoist source but a literary production composed from a number of different sources, combining excerpts from the dynastic histories with legendary accounts and Taoist hagiography. It may have served an apologetic purpose, inasmuch as the story sets out to prove the superiority of the new texts of the Shangqing jing over those of ancient Taoism, here represented by the Image of the True Form of the Five Sacred Mountains (Wuyue zhenxing tu 五嶽真形圖), a talisman that existed already in Han times (206 B.C.–A.D. 220). Therefore, in the story, the miraculous appearance of the classical goddess Xi wang mu is followed by that of the Shangqing female deity Shangyuan furen 上元夫人, whose revelations supersede that of her predecessor. At first, Shangyuan furen refuses to transmit the most holy scriptures and talismans to the emperor, but after a resounding quarrel with Xi wang mu and endless entreaties by a kneeling and kowtowing emperor, she at last gives in and parts with the scriptures. Later, the emperor shows himself unworthy of this holy revelation, and the sanctuary where the sacred texts are kept goes up in flames.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Schipper, L'empereur Wou des Han.

Kristofer Schipper

Han Wudi waizhuan 漢武帝外傳

19 fols.

293 (fasc. 137)

“Extraneous Stories on Emperor Wu of the Han Dynasty.” This is a collection of anecdotes and legendary biographies that are presented as a sequel to 292 Han Wudi neizhuan. Early bibliographic sources tend to confound both texts. The Chuxue ji 5.103, for instance, cites the source of the story of Li Shaojun 李少君 of the present collection (10b) as coming from the Han Wudi neizhuan, and the Yiwen leiju (94.1626) does the same for the story on Feng Junda 封君達 (6b). Moreover, no ancient catalogue quotes the title Han Wudi waizhuan. For this reason, the scholar Qian Xizuo 錢熙祚, in his colophon to his critical edition of the present work in Shoushan ge congshu 守山閣叢書, suggests that this waizhuan originally corresponded to the second juan of 292 Han Wudi neizhuan. Indeed, the Xin Tang shu, “Yiwen zhi,” 59.1519 notes that this work was composed of two juan, whereas at present it has only one (see also 292).

In its present version, the text can be subdivided into three distinct parts. The first part relates to the legend of Dongfang Shuo 東方朔 and seems to come from the preface to 598 Shizhou ji, another work closely related to 292 Han Wudi neizhuan.

The second part consists of six biographies, comprising those of the King of Huainan, the alchemist Li Shaoweng 李少翁, and so on. It may be that these stories were originally added to 292 Han Wudi neizhuan by the daoshi Wang Youyan 王游岩 in 746. Chao Zaizhi 晁載之, in his Xu tanzhu 續談助 4.76 (Congshu jicheng 叢書集成 ed.; see also Zhongxing guange shumu, quoted in Yuhai 58.9a), quotes a colophon by Wang in which he states that he made this addition. The addition aimed at illustrating the transmission of the alchemical secrets handed down by the eight scholars (bagong 八公) who worked at the court of the king of Huainan. However, in this part, the stories on Lady Quan 拳夫人 and the dwarf Juling 巨靈 appear to have been borrowed from the Han Wudi gushi 漢武帝故事, yet another collection of stories surrounding the great emperor. The present part must therefore have been remodeled.

The third and last part comprises eight biographies, beginning with that of Lu Nüsheng 魯女生, that all concern the transmission of the holy scriptures that were given to the emperor by the goddesses who visited him. They therefore relate directly to 292 Han Wudi neizhuan and form a sequel to the latter's narrative. The biographies are rather close to those found in the Shenxian zhuan 神仙傳. A similar transmission is also given in 1281 Wuyue zhenxing xulun.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Shimomi Takao, “Sō Shi-son no denki.”

Kristofer Schipper

1.A.7 Collected Works

Huayang Tao yinju ji 華陽陶隱居集

2 juan

By TAO HONGJING 陶弘景 (456–536), compiled by Fu Xiao 傅霄, hao Zhaotai dizi 昭臺弟子 (d. 1159), collated by Chen Jue 陳桷, hao Dadong dizi 大洞弟子 (fl. 1131–1162)

1050 (fasc. 726)

“Literary Works of Tao [Hongjing], the Hermit from Huayang.” Fu Xiao, the editor of the present version, was a well-known Taoist at Maoshan. He was temporarily appointed by Song Gaozong (r. 1127–1162) to the Taiyi gong 太一宮 temple in the capital, and he is named as one of the authors of a monograph on Maoshan, the Maoshan ji 茅山記 of 1150, now lost (see 304 Maoshan zhi, "Xulu," 1a, 16.7a–b). Some information on his contemporary Chen Jue is also provided in 304 Maoshan zhi 16.8a–b.

If we accept the information given in Sui shu 35.1077, which already lists a Liang Yinju xiansheng Tao Hongjing ji 梁隱居先生陶弘景集 in thirty juan and a Tao Hongjing neiji 陶弘景內集 in fifteen juan, Fu Xiao's compilation contains merely a small part of the contents of earlier collections. The present version still includes a preface by Jiang Zong 江總 (1.1a–b), who, as stated elsewhere (1.3b, commentary), was the first to compile TAO HONGJING's literary oeuvre, by official order, in 588. Already by that time Jiang deplored earlier losses. Nevertheless, all clear references in 300 Huayang Tao yinju neizhuan (presumably dating from the Tang [618–907]) to specific writings in a contemporary wenji can be found in the present version.

Our collection contains poetic writings, letters, and inscriptions from Tao's hand, as well as the prefaces to 421 Dengzhen yinjue; Yao zongjue 藥總訣; Zhouhou baiyi fang 肘後百一方 (more detailed than the version in 1306 Ge xianweng zhouhou beiji fang, "xu," 3b–7b); Bencao 本草 (1.19b–24b); and Xiangjing 相經 (2.12b).

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

1.A.8 Compendiums and Encyclopedias

Wushang biyao 無上祕要

100 juan (juan 1–2, 10–14, 36, 58–64, 67–73, 75, 77, 79–82, 85–86, 89–90 are missing)

Late sixth century

1138 (fasc. 768–779)

"The Essence of the Supreme Secrets." According to Xu gaoseng zhuan 2.463a, this work was compiled at the request of Emperor Wu of the Zhou after his victory over the state of Qi in 577 (see Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 1). Only two-thirds of the original 100 juan are extant, but the complete, annotated table of contents of the original anthology survives in the Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2861. From this list of contents it can be concluded that the work was intended as a general survey of Taoist cosmology and practice in the form of a collection of quotations (for the translation of the complete table of contents, see Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 49–71). The Dunhuang manuscript dates from 718, but Lagerwey suggests that the original mulu 目錄 dates to the same period as the anthology. The care taken in the compilation of the Wushang biyao seems to indicate that Emperor Wu wished to use this work as an ideological instrument to prepare and justify the political unification of China, which at that time he was trying to accomplish by military force.

In its present form the Wushang biyao includes quotations from about 120 texts, 69 of which are still extant in the Daozang (Lagerwey, 268). The great majority of the quoted texts come from the Dongzhen and Dongxuan canons. We may also note the importance of the liturgical texts contained in this anthology: not only are they among the most ancient complete texts of Taoist rituals, the fact that they are attributed to the emperor himself (Lagerwey, 125) shows that already at that time the institution of Taoism as a state religion presupposed the realization of an orthodox liturgy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao; Yoshioka Yoshitoyo, Dōkyō kyōten shiron, 361–75.

John Lagerwey

1.B Texts in Internal Circulation

1.B.1 The Way of the Heavenly Master

The texts presented here are nearly all that remain of the scriptural legacy of early Heavenly Master Taoism (Tianshi dao 天師道). Much has been lost (see 1430 Daozang quejing mulu 2.6b–9a). A certain number of important works current in the Six Dynasties period (220–589) have been preserved in Tang (618–907) versions. Among these are “The Petition Almanac of Chisong zi” 615 Chisong zi zhangli and the corresponding ritual 1288 Yuanchen zhangjiao licheng li. These works were nevertheless written almost entirely in the Six Dynasties period and are most representative of the Taoism of that time. They are therefore included in this chapter.

The present group of texts contains a wealth of information on the original organization, liturgy, and doctrines of Heavenly Master Taoism. Among the most important liturgical texts are 790 Nüqing guilü and the unique 1294 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi. The doctrinal works comprise such famous texts as 789 Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie kejing, 1195 Laojun bianhua wuji jing, 785 Laojun yinsong jiejing, and 1205 Santian neijie jing. Other early doctrinal works, such as 658 Taishang miaoshi jing, have only recently been identified. Some texts preserve the prefix Zhengyi fawen (jing) 正一法文 (經) from the time they were incorporated into the Zhengyi canon, compiled, as far as we know, by MENG ANPAI (fl. 699; see YJQQ 6.18a).

The only overall study to date of these materials is Chen Guofu, “Nanbei chao Tianshi dao kao changpian 南北朝天師道考長篇,” in CGF 308–69. See also the historical study by Fukui Kōjun, Dōkyō no kisoteki kenkyū, 2–61.

1.B.1.a Didactic and Doctrinal Treatises

Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie kejing 正一法文天師教戒科經

23 fols.

Wei dynasty, ca. 255

789 (fasc. 563)

“Commandments of the Heavenly Master from the One and Orthodox Canon.” A collection of five texts concerning the religious doctrines of the Heavenly Master. The second text, dated about 255, indicates that this collection contains the most ancient documents known on the Way of the Heavenly Master.

The first text (1a–12a) is a general discourse on the rules to observe in religious life and presents Five Commandments (jiaojie 教戒). It discusses the foundations of moral order in the universe, based on the principle of cosmic harmony (chonghe 沖和). Classical in tone and subject matter, the treatise exerted considerable influence on medieval Taoism, reflected in the fact that it was rewritten as 1120 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhonghe jing, a pseudo-Lingbao text, and reworked again into 1122 Taishang lingbao shengxuan neijiao jing zhonghe pin shuyi shu.

The Rules Governing the Family of the Tao (Dadao jialing jie 大道家令戒; 12a–19b) is a short treatise on the theological foundations of Heavenly Master Taoism. It recalls first the creation of the universe out of the Three Qi or Pneumata (sangqi 三氣): the Mysterious, Original, and Incipient (xuan 玄, yuan 元, shi 始). These primordial energies were black, white, and yellow and became the Triad of Heaven, Earth, and the Tao as the Original Being. This Tao appeared throughout the ages as Laozi, the sage counselor of kings. Under the Zhou (1050–221 B.C.), he bestowed the Way of Taiping (Taiping dao 太平道) on Gan Ji 干吉. Later, Yin Xi 尹喜 obtained the Daode jing, and the Tao went to the Western Regions in order to convert the barbarians. Thus the True Way (zhendao 真道) developed and flourished. In China, Laozi “newly appeared” (xinchu 新出老君) and revealed the teaching of the One and Orthodox Covenant with the Powers (Zhengyi mengwei zhi dao 正一盟威之道) to Zhang Daoling 張道陵 in A.D. 142. But because of both the turmoil created by Zhang Jue 張角 (the leader of the Yellow Turban Revolt in A.D. 184) and the immoral behavior of the adepts, the institutions of the Way degenerated. Today, in A.D. 255, under the Wei dynasty, says the treatise, everyone should again obey the ancient rules.

This important document, which appears to be corrupt in some places, refers on page 14b to the Xiang'er 想爾 commentary of the Daode jing (see Laozi Xiang'er zhu, Stein 6825), on 16a to the Book of the Yellow Court (Huangting sanling qiyan 黃庭三靈七言; see 332 Taishang huangting waijing yujing), and on 17a to the practice of addressing memorials to the Three Officials (Sanguan wenshu 三官文書). A translation can be consulted in Bokenkamp, Early Daoist scriptures, 149–85.

The “Teachings of the Heavenly Master” (Tianshi jiao 天師教; 19b–20a) is a didactic hymn in seven-character verse (qiyan 七言), recommending to the adepts the practice of confession and meditation, and recalling that salvation can be obtained through religious merit.

The text entitled “The Diocese of Yangping” (Yangping zhi 陽平治; 20a–21b) is an epistle of an unknown Heavenly Master to the libationers (jijiu 祭酒) of all the dioceses exhorting them to adopt a worthy and correct behavior in accordance with the traditions of the Way. The Yangping Diocese was the Heavenly Master's own headquarters, and the epistle must have originated there, hence the title.

The collection ends with a song in eleven couplets, in the pattern of what appears to be a counting rhyme called Drawing Three (Qiansan shi 牽三詩).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Zhang Songhui, "Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie kejing chengshu niandai kao."

Kristofer Schipper

Laojun bianhua wuji jing 老君變化無極經

9 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1195 (fasc. 875)

"Scripture of the Limitless Transformations of Lord Lao." Such is a possible translation of the title of this long poem of 369 seven-character verses. More likely, however, the title derives from the opening verse of the present poem: "Lord Lao transformed himself in the Wuji period." Wuji (Limitless) is a celestial era (tianshang nianhao 天上年號) corresponding to the time of King You 幽, when Laozi left China for the west. The present work belongs to the early texts of the Way of the Heavenly Master, as may be deduced from the explicit mention of the Twenty-four Dioceses (zhi 治) and assemblies (hui 會) at the Heavenly Master's diocese of Yangping 陽平 (6b). This poem is remarkably similar in vocabulary and expression to parts of 615 Chisong zi zhangli, as well as to the One Hundred and Eighty Rules of Laojun (Laojun yibai bashi jie, in 786 Taishang laojun jingliu) and to the didactic poem in juan five of 790 Nüqing guiliu. Our text twice mentions (2a and 5a) a now lost Yinyang zhongjing 陰陽中經, which may have been related to the rites of sexual union of 1294 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi.

The poem consists of two parts. The first part (112 verses) describes the successive transformations of Laozi in each of the five directions: (1) his departure to the West and the conversion of the barbarians; (2) his return to China as Li Hong 李弘 (written mu zi gong kou 木子弓口) and the investiture of Zhang Daoling 張道陵 as Heavenly Master; and his appearances (3) in the Eastern Sea, (4) the northern Dark River, and (5) among the southern barbarians (Zhang Lu 張魯).

In the second part (231 verses), the author begins by describing his flight from the north to the south around the time of the fall of the Western Jin (ca. A.D. 310). He continues with a complaint about the present situation, namely, the decay of both the civil government and the Heavenly Master organization (ca. 360). They will be restored by the True Lord of Great Peace (Taiping zhenjun 太平真君), whose coming is expected apparently in the west (Sichuan), as the author intends to go there or has just arrived there.

At nearly every stage, and usually indicated by a change of rhyme, the narrative of both parts is interrupted by other narratives (such as the transmission of the Daode jing to the author, after the description of Laozi's departure to the west), by hymns on the Way, or by descriptions of methods and rites (such as the rites of sexual union, guodu 過度) by which men and women can escape present and future disasters and obtain the status of Seed People (zhongmin 種民).

The poem concludes with a coda (twenty-six verses) that recommends retirement from office, retreat into mountainous regions, ingestion of elixirs, and abstention from cereals.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Dudink, "The poem Laojun bianhua wuji jing."

Adrianus Dudink

Taishang miao shi jing 太上妙始經

7 fols.

Fifth century?

658 (fasc. 344)

"The Scripture of the Marvelous Beginning." This is a short but interesting text, which, on the basis of its contents and style, must date to the Six Dynasties period, perhaps as early as the fourth century. The version of the Conversion of the Barbarians story, which resembles that of 1205 Santian neijie jing, antedates the sixth century, while the reference to the Three Caverns (sandong 三洞) implies a date after 350.

The book gives an account of the creation of the universe, the birth of the gods, the mythical geography of the earth, the reproduction of human beings and finally the manifestation of Laozi in this world, his conversion of the barbarians and the transmission of the Zhengyi mengwei zhi dao 正一盟威之道 to Zhang Zhennan 張鎮南, that is Zhang Lu 張魯. This scripture is not mentioned elsewhere.

Kristofer Schipper

Zhengyi tianshi gao Zhao Sheng koujue 正一天師告趙昇口訣

5 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1273 (fasc. 1003)

"Oral (Secret) Instructions to Zhao Sheng, by the One and Orthodox Heavenly Master." According to the Shenxian zhuan (YJQQ 109.19a–21a), Zhao Sheng 趙昇 (also written 升) and Wang Chang 王長 were Zhang Daoling's 張道陵 foremost disciples, whom he chose as his successors on Yuntai shan 雲臺山 (corresponding to the diocese of the same name, in Sichuan). The present work takes up this lead and reveals the apocalyptic prophecies that were spoken before the master left this world (Zhang died on Yuntai shan in 157; see 774 Yunlong zhuan 5.5a–b).

The present text, although in many respects close to other works of Six Dynasties apocalyptic literature, mentions a number of texts and talismans that are not encountered elsewhere. The beginning of the apocalypse is predicted (2a) for the first year of the sexagesimal cycle (jiuzi 甲子) in the reign of the Golden Horse, jinma 金馬, a circumlocution for the Sima 司馬 family of the Jin 晉 dynasty, who ruled by the Virtue of Metal (this date would correspond to A.D. 364). The suffering would end and the reign of the messiah would begin at the end of the Golden Horse period (3a; compare, for similar prophecies, 322 Taishang lingbao tiandi yundu ziran miaojing 5a). Zhang first recalls his investiture by Lord Lao, who made him Chief of All Spirits (baigui zhuzhe 百鬼主者; 1b) and directed him to establish the Twenty-four Dioceses “in order to convert those who belonged to the heterodox and vulgar (cults),” while, on the other hand, bestowing upon him a Red Register of Huang-Lao (Huang-Lao chilu 黃老赤籙) for the attainment of Long Life. Finally, Lord Lao tells Zhang that the present times are coming to an end and that before Lord Li 李 (Hong 弘) comes to shepherd the people, great sufferings are to befall the world. At first, 240,000 people will be saved as Seed People (zhongmin 種民; 1b). Their names are written in the Purple Book of Great Mystery (Taixuan zibu 太玄紫簿; 2a). Another 140,000 will be selected at that time on the basis of their merits. They will be chosen from among those who have obtained diocesan ordination (zhilu 職籙) and will receive the Huang-Lao chilu as a token of their status as the elect (2a). In the year jiashen 甲申, there will be a great flood that will wash away the impurities of the world, including bad Taoists.

The Heavenly Master then reveals a Life-Giving Talisman of Myriad (Divine) Names, of the Nine Lights of the Great Mystery (Taixuan jingguang wancheng shengfu 太玄九光萬稱生符; 3a), by which the chosen ones will be recognized on the day of the coming of the True Lord of Great Peace (Taiping shengjun 太平聖君). At that time, the dead will rise from their graves and shall be judged. Only those who have this fu and are Taoist initiates shall escape punishment.

Kristofer Schipper

Santian neijie jing 三天內解經

2 juan

By Xushi 徐氏, hao Santian dizi 三天弟子 (fl. 421–478)

1205 (fasc. 876)

“Explanations of the Essentials of the Three Heavens.” The author of this work, a certain Mr. Xu, Disciple of the Three Heavens, cannot be identified with certainty. The work, however, was written during the Liu Song dynasty, praised here as successor to the Han ruling house by mandate of the Tao. Particular mention is made of the official measures to extinguish cults in A.D. 421 (1.9a–b; cf. Song shu 17.488).

The scripture explains political and social changes as the results of an ongoing cosmic revolution in which the correct emanations of the Three Heavens embodied in Laozi alternate with the stale emanations of the Six Heavens (liutian guqi 六天故氣). Each of Laozi’s manifestations in the world, from the mythical age of Fuxi through the Zhou and Han periods up to the blessed rule of the Liu Song, marked a renewal of the cosmic order based on the Three Teachings, which Laozi, as Counselor of the State (guoshi 國師), instituted at different times, in different places, and in response to different needs. These Three Teachings were: (1) the Great Way of Nonacting (wuwei dadao 無爲大道); (2) Buddhism (fodao 佛道) for disciplining the barbarians; and (3) the Great Way of the Pure Covenant (qingyue dadao 清約大道), which corresponds to the Heavenly Masters religion.

The times of decay are, on the other hand, characterized by the mixing of the original Three Teachings (e.g., the introduction of Buddhism into China); their abuse (e.g., unauthorized transmission within the liturgical tradition); the formation of sects such as the Way of the Pure Water (qingshui dao 清水道; 1.7b); and, above all, the spreading of illegitimate, popular cults.

The warning against decadence is primarily directed at the libationers (jijin 祭酒) of the period. They are called upon to conform to the principles of the Daode jing and to return to purity and simplicity in their liturgical offices (juan 2).

Both in its description of the foundations of the Heavenly Master tradition and in its criticism of deviations, this text resembles the roughly contemporary work 1127 Lu xiansheng daomen keliu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bokenkamp, Early Daoist scriptures, 186–229.

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Laojun yinsong jiejing 老君音誦誡經

22 fols.

By KOU QIANZHI 寇謙之 (365–448)

785 (fasc. 562)

“Book of the Hymnal Rules of Lord Lao.” This text gives instructions for a liturgical reform linked to hymns and music. It is generally acknowledged that the present work corresponds to the New Liturgical Rules of the Hymns from amid the Clouds (Yunzhong yinsong xinke zhi jie 雲中音誦新科之誡), which was revealed, according to Wei shu 114.3051 and Sui shu 35.1093, to KOU QIANZHI in 415. These sources indicate, however, that the text comprised twenty juan, whereas our present work occupies only one. It is divided into thirty-seven sections, which all end with the injunction: “Observe and practice this (rule) carefully, in accordance with the law” (mingshen fengxing ru liu ling 明慎奉行如律令).

Notwithstanding the fact that it contains only a fraction of the original, the present work gives ample and precise information about the reforms introduced by Kou. Among the most prominent reforms are simplification of the rules (see, for instance, 1a), recitation of the holy scriptures with psalmody and hymns (1a); abolition of the rites of sexual union (huangchi fangzhong zhi shu 黃赤房中之術; 2a–b; 18b); and new rules for the communal banquets (chu 廚; 7b–8a), mortuary rites (15a–b), and healing (16a–b). Moreover, the supremacy of the linear descendants of Zhang Daoling 張道陵 is abolished (20b). The real Heavenly Master is Lord Lao himself (2b), and his first vicar on Earth was Zhang Daoling, now succeeded by Kou (3a). The account given here of the revelation received by Kou (2b–3a) accords with that given in the official histories Wei shu and Sui shu cited above.

With a view to establishing Taoism as a state religion, Kou puts forward a certain number of measures to curb the independence of the communities and end the power of the hereditary libationers (2b; 6b–7a). This privilege was conferred through an Iron Contract (tiequan 鐵券; compare 1205 Santian neijie jing 1.6a). The Twenty-four Dioceses (ershisi zhi 二十四治) are also abolished, and the libationers should no longer claim affiliation with these localities in Sichuan but instead with the heavenly dioceses of the Twenty-eight Stellar Mansions (ershiba xiu 二十八宿), which replace the former dioceses (19a–20b). Messianic beliefs are severely criticized. The text mentions the great Li Hong 李弘 (compare 790 Nüqing guilü 5.3a and 335 Taishang dongyuan shenzhou jing 1.10b) and the lesser known messiah Liu Ju 劉舉 (4b).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chen Yinque, “Cui Hao yu Kou Qianzhi”; Mather, “K’ou Ch’ien-chih”; Shao Mingsheng, “Song Lingmiao bei”; Yang Lien-sheng, “Laojun yinsong jiejing jiaoshi.”

Kristofer Schipper

Lu xiansheng daomen kelüe 陸先生道門科略

9 fols.

By LU XIUJING 陸修靜 (406–477)

1127 (fasc. 761)

“Master Lu’s Summary of Taoist Liturgy.” This is a small treatise, the text of which, in its present version, appears to be truncated at the end. A commentary, in small characters, seems at times to have incorporated parts of the main text (6b.1–2).

The liturgical manuals of the early Tang period (618–907) quote instructions by LU XIUJING concerning the liturgical organization of Heavenly Master Taoism (see 1211 Zhengyi fawen chuan dugong ban yi 1b). This organization, as it is described in the present work, corresponds by and large to that presented in 1205 Santian neijie jing.

A reference to the Ritual of the Three Caverns (Sandong guifan 三洞軌範; 5a) and a quotation of the words of Taiji zhenren 太極真人 (5b; this citation has not been identified; compare 425 Shangqing taiji yinzhū yujing baojue) recall Lu’s involvement with the Lingbao liturgy.

Having first discussed the origins of the liturgical tradition and the establishment of the Covenant of Purity (qingyue 清約; 1b) by the Way of the Heavenly Master, the text then outlines the structure of the religious organization (1b–3a). A second part (3a–5b) is devoted to the liturgy of the layman: the domestic registers (zhailu 宅錄), the communal banquets (chu 廚), the contributions to be made to the dioceses (xin 信), the domestic sanctuaries called jing 靖 or jingshi 靜室, the ritual vestments (fafu 法服), and the recitation of scriptures (songjing 誦經).

The final part (5b–9b) discusses initiation and ordination degrees, as well as the interdiction of shamanistic (yaowu 妖巫) and divination practices.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Nickerson, “Abridged codes of Master Lu.”

Kristofer Schipper

1.B.1.b Rituals and Rules

Nüqing guilü 女青鬼律

6 juan

Third century?

790 (fasc. 563)

“Code of Nüqing for [Controlling] Demons.” This is the abbreviated title of the Code of the Demons of the Nüqing Mysterious Capital (Nüqing xuandu gui lüling 女青玄都鬼律令; 3.1a). The exact meaning of the name Nüqing remains unclear (cf. 2.5b and 5.4a). The code belongs to early Heavenly Master Taoism. According to the text itself (1.1a), it was revealed by the Great Way to Zhang Daoling 張道陵 in A.D. 143. “The second year” mentioned here should be that of the Han’an era (A.D. 142–143; see Zhang tianshi ershi zhi tu 張天師二十四治圖 in SDZN 7.6a–b).

The present version in six juan (together some 700 columns of text) must be incomplete, as it speaks of a code in eight juan (see 1.1a and 4.4b). Juan 2 and 4 seem to occupy their original place (see 2.1a and 4.4b). The Chongwen zongmu lists a version of our text in ten juan (VDL 79).

The oldest extant quotations of this work are found in 1201 Daoyao lingqi shengui pin jing (early Tang?). These quotations show so many variants that one can hardly attribute them all to scribal errors. At several points, the present text can be corrected by comparing it with the quotations in 1201 Shengui pin jing and its Dunhuang manuscript versions Pelliot 2395, 2432, 2753, and Stein 986. A quotation from the Nüqing guilü in 615 Chisong zi zhangli 2.5a is no longer found in the present version.

The Nüqing guilü was still widely available in modern times, which is evident from the fact that a Nüqing lü quoted in 220 Wushang xuanyuan santian yutang dafa 13.2a (after 1158) corresponds to 2.5b and that the text following this quotation in 220 Yutang dafa 5.7a–11b corresponds to 1.1b–7b, and 5.10b–11b to 2.1a–5a and 6.6b). In addition to these passages, 220 Yutang dafa may well contain material from the lost part of the original Nüqing guilü. The quotation of this work in DENG YONGONG's preface to 461 Shangqing gusui lingwen guilü (first half of the twelfth century) can no longer be found.

The present text reveals to the adept the existence of 36,000 demons that can be warded off by knowing their names. About 320 demons are identified, and in some instances, details of surname, appearance, dress, and so on are given. The demons are divided into groups. Juan 1 lists 100 demons related to the heavens, the sexagesimal cycle, the Twenty-eight Stellar Mansions, the Six Jia periods, the winds, and the Dipper stars. Juan 2 gives the names of the demons of mountains and seas, trees and animals. Juan 4 concerns the evil spirits of wind and water that dwell in ruined tombs or are released by sorcerers and heterodox Taoists. This juan gives more information than the others on demons and ways to ward them off. Juan 6 lists 110 plague demons, as well as those of death and of the grave. All these forces are roused through immoral behavior. Juan 3 therefore provides rules of conduct (daolü jinji 道律禁忌) for the adept. Each rule is followed by a number of years (counted in suan 算), which will be subtracted from one's lifespan in case of infringement.

More rules can be found in juan 5, which also includes an important didactic poem on the theme of the apocalypse. The poem contains explicit references to the rites of sexual union (heqi 合氣; 1a) by which the adept can enter into the company of the Seed People (zhongmin 種民; 2a), the chosen ones who will escape the destruction of the apocalypse, foreseen for the thirty-seventh (gengzi 庚子) year of the sexagesimal cycle. The Seed People will see the time of the Great Peace (taiping 太平; 2a) and meet the savior Li Hong 李弘, whose name here is written mu zi san tai 木子三台, a rebus to be understood only by the initiates.

The rites of sexual union are also mentioned elsewhere in the text (1.8a and 5.4a). Those who have accomplished these initiation rites receive the Mandate of the Yellow Book (huangshu qiling 黃書契令; 3.4b; compare 1294 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi 23b, and 1343 Dongzhen huangshu 12b). Some rules concerning the proper behavior to be adopted during these rites are given on 3.3a–b. They forbid the adepts to divulge the names of the Father and Mother of the Tao (dao fumu 道父母; compare 1294 Guodu yi 6b–7a and 1343 Dongzhen huangshu 11b–12a).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Li Fengmao, "Daozang suo shou zaoqi daoshu."

Adrianus Dudink

Dongzhen huangshu 洞真黃書

16 fols.

Third century?

1343 (fasc. 1031)

"Yellow Book of the Dongzhen [Canon]." A fragment of the important Yellow Book manual containing instructions and commandments concerning sexual intercourse. This text is a companion to 1294 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi inasmuch as most of the diagrams and formulas it contains provide the theoretical framework for accomplishing the above-named ritual. Maspero has shown that the present work corresponds to the Yellow Book of sexual techniques mentioned and criticized by Buddhist polemicists (Maspero, "Methods," 536; see fig. 4).

According to our text (2a), the Yellow Book originally had eight juan and was revealed in the year 142 by Laozi to Zhang Daoling 張道陵. Elsewhere in our text (7b) it is specified that this revelation happened at noon on the tenth day of the first moon. On 12b the same (or another?) revelation is said to have occurred on the seventh day of the seventh moon of 142. Here, the text first refers to "Zhang Ling 張陵" and on the next line using his epithet, "Daoling 道陵." The following year (143), we are told, Zhang Ling transmitted the text(s) to his disciples Zhao Sheng 趙升 (also written 昇), Wang Chang 王長, Wang Zhi 王稚, and Wang Ying 王英 (2a, and again 12b). This, according to the second passage, enabled them to practice the Mandate of the Yellow Book, Huangshu qiling 黃書契令, a term frequently mentioned in other Six Dynasties works. Afterward, the disciples gave the instructions of the

FIGURE 4. Diagram showing the order of the Nine Palaces (1343 8b). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/1324)

Yellow Book to the Three Ladies (san furen 三夫人) at the diocese of Beiwang 北望治 on Zhuangshan 莊山 (the present region of Rongjing 榮經 in Sichuan). The name of this diocese is not among the original twenty-four zhi 治. Everything points to a similar date for this work and 1299 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi, and like the latter it was preserved as part of the Maoshan legacy.

The final fragment deals mainly with the auspicious and prescribed days for sexual intercourse, for the most part calculated on the basis of the sexagesimal cycle. At the end there is a register (lu 錄) that may correspond to the above-named Huangshu qiling.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Wang Ka, "Huangshu kaoyuan."

Kristofer Schipper

Shangqing huangshu guodu yi 上清黃書過度儀

24 fols.

Third century?

1294 (fasc. 1009)

"Ritual of Passage of the Yellow Book." This work contains the rites of sexual union (heqi 合氣) that confer on the disciples of the Heavenly Master the privilege to join the Seed People (zhongmin 種民; 4a, 24b) by attaining the Mandate of the Yellow Book (Huangshu qiling 黃書契令; 23b). This document is also called the Yellow Book with Red Linings (Huangshu chijie 黃書赤界), the colors being those of the male and female, yellow and red qi (huangqi 黃氣, chiqi 赤氣), the union of which is accomplished through this ritual (see 1016 Zhen'gao 9.9a).

According to Taoist as well as Buddhist sources, the Yellow Book and its mandate were issued by Zhang Daoling 張道陵 to his disciples (see 1343 Dongzhen huangshu). It is certain that the present ritual belongs to the most ancient documents of the Way of the Heavenly Master, as is affirmed in 790 Nüqing guilü 3.4b–5a. 1016 Zhen'gao 2.1a–b contains evidence of the widespread practice of the ritual, as well as of the Shangqing reaction to it (see Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao Chan, 181–87). The Buddhists condemned the ritual, as can be seen from Xuanguang's Bianhuo lun (Hongming ji 8.48b), which contains a verbatim quotation of the present text. However, this ritual was practiced as late as the tenth century (1237 Sandong xiudao yi 3b). It is listed in the Song shi, "Yiwen zhi," 4.5199 (without the epithet Shangqing; see VDL 148). The present text may well have been transmitted, together with the Dongzhen huangshu, as part of the bulk of Shangqing texts preserved in this section of the Ming canon.

The ritual is divided into three distinct parts. The first part (1a–8b) concerns the preliminary rites of meditation and invocation. The second and main part (8b–22a) contains the rites of union, while the last part gives the texts of the memorials to be presented at the end as the Announcement of Merit (yangong 言功) earned by the adepts.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kalinowski, "La transmission du dispositif," 781–801.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang laojun jinglü 太上老君經律

12 fols.

Third century?

786 (fasc. 562)

"Canonical Rules of the Most High Lord Lao." This collection originally contained four different codes, of which only the first two remain. No trace survives, either here or elsewhere, of the Taiqing yinjie 太清陰戒 or the Nüqing lüjie 女青律戒, which both appear, according to the table of contents, to have been intended especially for women (nüguan 女官). The relationship between the Nüqing lüjie and 790 Nüqing guilü is difficult to ascertain.

The first remaining code is called the Commandments of the Daode jing (Daode zunjing jie 道德尊經戒; 1a–2a). It consists of two parts: the Nine Rules of Conduct (Jiuxing 九行) or Commandments of Xiang'er (Xiang'er jie 想爾戒), and the Twenty-seven Commandments of the Venerable Book of the Tao and Its Power. Virtually the same texts can be found in 787 Taishang jingjie 17b–19a as well as in 463 Taoxiu keyi jielü chao 5.4b and in YJQQ 38.18a–19a.

The other remaining code, One Hundred and Eighty Rules of Lord Lao (Laojun yibai bashi jie 老君一百八十戒; 2a–12b), is an important document for the history of early Taoism. Especially intended for the male adept (nanguan 男官), it is mentioned in 532 Taiji zhenren fu lingbao zhaijie wei yi zhujing yaojue 17a and should therefore antedate the revelation of the Lingbao canon at the end of the fourth century.

According to the preface to our present version (2a–4a), this code is linked to the transmission of the Taiping jing 太平經 in 170 juan and ten parts (jiayi shibu 甲乙十部). The preface says that during the reign of King Nan 赧 of the Zhou 周 (315–256 B.C.), Lord Lao transmitted the Taiping jing to Gan Ji 干吉 at Langye 瑯琊. When Lord Lao later returned, during the reign of King You 幽 (of Chu 楚; 238–228 B.C.), after converting the barbarians in the West, he found that the religion he had established at Langye, with its male and female libationers, had greatly degenerated. Therefore he gave the present code to Gan Ji.

The same text is found in 463 Taoxiu keyi jielü chao 5.14a–19a, with an abridged preface, which specifies that these commandments were spoken by Lord Lao for initiates of the Alliance with the Powers (Mengwei 盟威). This specification would indicate that the present code was adopted by Heavenly Master Taoism. The code, with the unaltered preface, is also given in YJQQ 39.1a–14b.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hendrichske and Penny, “The 180 Precepts Spoken by Lord Lao”; Rao Zongyi, “Xiang’er jiujiu yu sanhe yi”; Schmidt, “Die Hundertachtzig Vorschriften.”

Kristofer Schipper

Zhengyi fawen taishang wailu yi 正一法文太上外籙儀

30 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1243 (fasc. 991)

“Compendium of the Exterior Registers of the Zhengyi Canon.” These wailu are the ordination registers of the ordinary people, as opposed to those of the masters, that is, the heads of the communities (see 463 Yaoxiu keyi jielü chao 10.5b–6a). The Register of the Delegated Mandate (gengling 更令) is given to children at the age of seven sui; from this initial stage onward, at intervals of five, four, and three years, the young people receive, respectively, the registers of One, Ten, and Seventy-five Generals. Two years later, at the age of twenty-one sui, the adepts form couples and receive together the Register of One Hundred and Fifty Generals. At that moment, the ritual of the Passage (guodu yi 過度儀) is practiced (see the memorial on 20b–22a, and 1294 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi 22b). This last register marks the highest level of the Exterior Registers and qualifies the adept for the functions of master (shi 師). Those who wish to pursue such a goal have to undergo training as scribes (shuli 書吏) at one of the dioceses (17b–18a).

There are moral and ritual rules that determine the conferral of the Exterior Registers, especially for the different categories of women (1a–4a), for those of inferior social status, for foreigners (4a–5a), and for those who, for some reason, have lost their registers and must consequently renew their ordinations (23b and 24b). The latter have to begin again with the Register of the Renewed Order (gengling 更令; 22a–30a; in this case, the word geng is pronounced with the third tone, qusheng 去聲, as indicated in 463 Yaoxiu keyi jielü chao 10.5b).

There are at least two quotations from a Taiping jing 太平經 on 4a. One quotation does not occur verbatim in the parts of the Taiping jing that have come down to us, but it is similar in style and enumerates six classes of superior beings (sages, immortals, etc.), which are also found, in reversed order, in 71.8a of the present Taiping jing. A second, longer quotation in 13b–14a of the present text shows affinities with Taiping jing 42.1a–b, and it may therefore be assumed that the jing 經 mentioned on 14b.3 corresponds to the Taiping jing, albeit in a version different from 1101a.

Kristofer Schipper

Zhengyi fawen jing zhangguan pin 正一法文經章官品

4 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1218 (fasc. 880)

“Chapter on Petitions and Officials of the Zhengyi Canon.” The title indicates that this text was originally not a separate work but part of the Zhengyi canon (Zhengyi fawen 正一法文). The present text derives from the old Protocol of the Twelve Hundred Officials (Qianerbai guan yi 千二百官儀), which goes back to the foundation period (second to third centuries) of the Way of the Heavenly Masters in Hanzhong, in the border region between modern Sichuan and Shaanxi (see 421 Dengzhen yinjue 3.23a, commentary). This manual, now lost, listed the celestial officials (guan 官) together with their residences (gong 宮), competences (zhu 主), and subordinates (libing 吏兵). Some fragments of the original work have been preserved in the third juan of 421 Dengzhen yinjue. As can be seen from numerous repetitions in the text, different manuscripts of uncertain date and of varying quality were used for the present version. Two of the officials, Chitian shiqi jun 赤天食氣君 and Shoushen tunding jun 收神土明君, were, according to TAO HONGJING, revealed only to WEI HUACUN, the ancestress of the Shangqing tradition (compare 1.1a in the present text with 421 Dengzhen yinjue 3.22a–b). But the text contains traces of a much later revision consisting in the observance of the name taboos of the Song founding emperor Taizu 太祖 (Zhao Kuangyin 趙匡胤, r. 960–976) on 1.21b and his father Xuanzu 宣祖 (Zhao Hongyin 趙弘殷; cf. Song shi 1.1–2; hence the substitution of yin 引 for hong 弘 on 7b and 4.5b).

The work 1224 Daomen dingzhi 7 contains a number of models for memorials said to be quoted from a Qianerbai guanzhang jing 千二百官章經, which Lord Lao gave to the First Heavenly Master. Indeed, in several of these memorials, the names of the celestial officials are the same as those given in the present work (compare 1224 Daomen dingzhi 7.22a with 1.11b here).

The present text provides the names, attributes, and functions of the celestial officials addressed in seventy memorials (zhang 章), without giving the text of these memorials. The titles, among other things, indicate that the memorials concerned above all the different kinds of diseases and everyday ills of rural society. Thus reference is made to many aspects of peasant life in early medieval China. Elements that can be connected to the life of the gentry or literati are notably absent.

The practitioners, men and women, are given the title of libationer (jijiu 祭酒). The celestial officials are invoked in order that they may come and dominate (zhu 主) the agents of disorder, or again to control and heal (zhi 治) diseases or contain (shou 收) bad influences. From a comparison of the titles of the memorials as they are listed in the table of contents with those given in the text itself, it appears that these titles are largely interchangeable.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Fukui Kōjun, Dōkyō no kisoteki kenkyū, chap. 1; Liu Lin, "San Zhang wudou midao."

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Chisong zi zhangli 赤松子章曆

6 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589) with some later additions

615 (fasc. 335–336)

"The Petition Almanac of Chisong zi." A calender by the same immortal is quoted in the introduction (1.1a) as being at the origin of the present manual (compare 463 Yaoxin keyi jielü chao 10.8a ff.). Another important source is the Protocol of the Twelve Hundred Officials (Qianerbai guan yi 千二百官儀), which is quoted frequently (1.1a, 1.18a, 3.11a, 3.28a, 5.31b, and passim). A long passage entitled Invitation of the Officials (qingguan 請官; 2.18b–22a) is also found in 421 Dengzhen yinjue 3.14b–23a, where it is said to have originally come from this same Qianerbai guan yi, whereas the present text gives the Taizhen ke 太真科 as its source. It can therefore be assumed that the ritual of the Way of the Heavenly Master—the rites that 421 Dengzhen yinjue (3.13a) calls the Ancient Ritual from Hanzhong (Hanzhong jiu fa 漢中舊法)—forms the basis of our work.

At the beginning of the protocol (1.2a–17b) is a list of the pledges (zhangxin 章信) that must be provided when presenting the different petitions. This list is at the same time an index of the texts of the petitions given in juan 3 to 6. Originally, there were 134 different petitions, but, as indicated by the list itself, 68 of them have been lost.

The petitions correspond to a wide range of preoccupations: droughts, locusts, tigers, diseases, possession, witchcraft, birth, death, liturgical festivals, and others. In the case of illness and possession, divination is mentioned as a means for diagnosing the origin of the affliction (see, for example, 3.8b, 15a). In some cases, human effigies made of metal (jinren 金人, 4.5a; or yinren daixing 銀人代形, 1.11b) are offered as substitutes for a sick person or as a messenger to the other world.

All petitions are presented by a master on behalf of a follower. A long ordination title, corresponding to the highest initiation grade of the Heavenly Masters liturgical organization, is given in 2.22b. There is also a vivid description of the meditation that accompanies the presentation of the petitions to the Heavenly administration (cunsi 存思; 2.23b–24a).

The present edition is probably not earlier than the latter part of the Tang dynasty (618–907), since it mentions (4.22b) the Registers of the Immortal King of the Way of Filial Piety (Xiaodao xianwang 孝道仙王; see 449 Xiaodao Wu Xu er zhenjun zhuan). The text of the petition where this reference occurs may have been added at a later stage to the manual, which no doubt was actually used by daoshi over a long period of time.

Kristofer Schipper

Yuanchen zhangjiao licheng li 元辰章醮立成曆

2 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1288 (fasc. 1008)

"Practical Almanac for the Offering of the Memorial of the Original Star." This is a complete ritual of the Zhengyi tradition for the cult of a person's life-star, which presides over one's destiny. The second juan contains different tables for the calculation of a person's destiny, and prayers for averting the evil elements that form part of one's fate. Such prayers are incorporated in the service described in juan one. The cult of the life-star here aims at averting danger for the entire family (jia 家). The patrons of the Offering are named "male and female officers" (nannü guan 男女官), following the precepts of the ancient Way of the Heavenly Master. The ritual shows traces of Lingbao influence. For instance, the invocations (zhou 咒) of the Five Emperors (wudi 五帝) on pages 5a–6b come from the Lingbao scriptures (see 330 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhenwen yaojie shangjing 6a–7a). But the pantheon, the indications concerning the altar, and the offerings are similar to those given in 615 Chisong zi zhangli. The present ritual should be about contemporary with the latter.

The beginning of juan 1 gives detailed instructions about the establishment of the altar, and contains a rare illustration of how it was laid out (fig. 5). There were seats for the Five Emperors at each of the four sides and the center of the altar, and votive lamps for the stars of the Dipper and the Twenty-eight Stellar Mansions. Outside the main altar, three subsidiary altars were established for the family ancestors, the domestic gods, such as the Stove God, and the Earth God. Among the sacrificial offerings to prove the sincerity of the adept's faith (zhangxin 章信), we find money, rice, silk, divination stalks, oil, and silk threads, as well as a substitute body in metal (jinren yi xing 金人一形) and two gold rings. Paper, brushes, ink, a correction knife, and incense were also laid out. At the end of the Offering service (jiaofa 醮法) wine, dried meat, and other foods were presented, as well as pieces of silk in five colors. As a supplement to the present ritual, 1289 Liushi jiazi benming yuanchen li allows the adepts to determine which deity governs his or her destiny.

FIGURE 5. Diagram of the altar with indications for the placement of the incense burners and other items. On the West side, three small altars are dedicated to the ancestors, the Stove God, and the Earth God of the home (1288 1.1a–2a). Ming reprint of 1398. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/1270)

Kristofer Schipper

Liushi jiazi benming yuanchen li 六十甲子本命元辰曆

7 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1289 (fasc. 1008)

“Sexagesimal Almanac of Fundamental Destiny and the Original Stars.” The binomials of the sexagesimal cycle corresponding to a person’s year of birth are considered to denote his or her Fundamental Destiny (benming 本命). Each binomial is related to another one, called the “original star,” or “prime chronogram,” which varies according to the sex of the individual concerned. The method for determining these binomials is given in 283 Huangdi longshou jing 1.16a.

This is a simple concordance between the two kinds of binomials. To each of these corresponds a deity, whose name and surname is given (for example, the jiazi binomial is called Wang Wenqing 王文卿), and each deity disposes of a retinue (congguan 從官). The correspondence that exists between the fundamental destiny as determined by a person’s birth date and the stars of the Dipper is also given.

It is clear that the present text is an appendix to the preceding 1288 Yuanchen zhang- jiao licheng li. There, in 2.4a–6b, we find the same list of the sixty gods of fundamental destiny as well as the method for calculating the number of their retinue.

Similar lists of the deities of the sexagesimal cycle are given in 615 Chisong zi zhangli 3.18b–19a and 1294 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi 4b–7a; some of the personal names for the deities of the sexagesimal cycle also occur in 1209 Taishang zhengyi mengwei falu yibu 5.4a–5.

Yao Zhenzong (1843–1903) identifies (Sui shu jingji zhi kaozheng, 560) the present work with a Yuanchen benshu jing 元辰本屬經 mentioned in the Sui shu, “Jingji zhi.”

Marc Kalinowski

1.B.2 Shangqing

The turbulent century during which the Eastern Jin dynasty survived south of the Yangzi (317–420) witnessed a profound religious renewal. Among the most important legacies of that period are the scriptures revealed, during a period of six years (364–370), to the mystic and visionary YANG XI. The transmission, diffusion, and canonization of these scriptures, the sequels that were written to them, and even the forgeries that almost immediately proliferated have been the subject of much interest and study since early times (see Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao Chan, 1–81).

The Shangqing scriptures have come down to us in varying states of preservation. Some of them have been preserved intact, while others survive only in fragmentary form. A number have come down in multiple versions under different titles. Attempts have been made to reconstruct the original corpus revealed to YANG XI from the mass of Shangqing scriptures and thus to separate the authentic works from the apocrypha. The following articles are based on this research, without sharing, however, its aim of reconstructing the corpus. Our classification, therefore, does not attempt to isolate YANG XI’s texts from their near-contemporary sequels or forgeries, but follows the example of Isabelle Robinet’s La révélation du Shangqing in considering as fundamental for our purposes the group of canonical works as defined by the Shangqing scriptural tradition itself.

The basis for this classification is the Catalogue of Shangqing Scriptures (Shangqing jingmu 上清經目), the first part of the Sandong jing shumu 三洞經書目, which LU XIUJING presented in 471 to Emperor Mingdi of the Liu Song dynasty. This part of Lu’s original catalogue is now lost. The earliest version we have of the catalogue of the canonical Shangqing scriptures is given in 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 5.1a–1b. It is called Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu 上清大洞真經目 and lists thirty-four works totaling forty-one juan. This list corresponds to the scriptures received on ordination into the highest grades of the Taoist priestly office. The source of the list is not given; however, it is preceded in the above-named 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi (4.8a–9b) by a similar list of Lingbao scriptures, and, as shown by Ōfuchi Ninji (“On Ku Ling Pao Ching”), this Lingbao catalogue corresponds to the Lingbao jingmu 靈寶經目, the second part of the Sandong jing shumu of LU XIUJING, revised and enlarged by SONG WENMING. It is therefore likely that the list of Shangqing scriptures we have here was also originally based on Lu’s catalogue.

The Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu contains not only the titles of original Shangqing scriptures, but of a number of apocrypha as well. At the same time it fails to list a number of authentic works. The present group is therefore divided into four subdivisions: (a) the canonical Shangqing scriptures, containing the articles on the texts mentioned in the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu; (b) other early Shangqing scriptures, containing those texts that, although original (or early apocryphal), were not included in the corpus of canonical texts; (c) Shangqing hagiographies; (d) manuals and anthologies compiled during the period under review.

The sequence in which the scriptures are presented here in the first subdivision (1.B.2.a) follows that of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu. More than half of the texts mentioned in this list have survived in their original or near-original form. As stated earlier, some texts have come down to us in several versions, while of others only fragments remain. At the end of each article, or group of articles, the relevant information concerning the relationship of the work(s) to the original corpus is given.

The most important scripture, the Shangqing dadong zhenjing, is present in the Daozang in several editions, all of which date from the Song (960–1279) or later. For this reason, these editions will be discussed in part 3 below, while here we present only a few short texts which were part of the original version. These texts are related to what Isabelle Robinet has termed the “Formula of the Dadong zhenjing” (Dongjue 洞訣, or Dadong koujue 大洞口訣, or Dadong koujue yinshu 大洞口訣隱書; see Robinet, “Le Ta-tung chen-ching,” 412–13).

1.B.2.a The Canonical Shangqing Scriptures

Shangqing jiutian shangdi zhu baishen neiming jing

上清九天上帝祝百神內明經

9 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1360 (fasc. 1039)

“Scripture on the Esoteric Names of the Hundred Gods.” This work contains fragments of original Shangqing texts, divided into four parts: (1) The hymns of the Esoteric Names of the Hundred Gods (baishen neiming; 1a–3a), mentioned in the title. They belong to the “Formula of the Dadong zhenjing.” The esoteric names are those of the heavens, as given at the end of each section in 6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing. (2) A song to expel demons (3a–7b), also found in 1344 Dongzhen taishang shuo zhihui xiaomo zhenjing 1.6a–10b. (3) A method for the absorption of the mysterious root (xuangen 玄根). This is an exercise in visual meditation, linked to the practice of the Dadong zhenjing. It is reproduced in YJQQ 23.10a–11a. (4) Hymns sung by one of the gods who appeared to YANG XI. These hymns are given, at least partially, in 1016 Zhen’gao 10b–11a, as well as in 608 Shangqing zhuzhen zhangsong 10b–11b and in 1374 Shangqing zhu zhenren shoujing shi song jinzhen zhang 1a–b.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing taishang yuqing yinshu miemo shenhui gaoxuan zhenjing

上清太上玉清隱書滅魔神慧高玄真經

42 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1355 (fasc. 1038)

“Scripture of the Divine Wisdom That Annihilates Demons.” This is one of the Secret Scriptures of the Yuqing Heaven of the Shangqing school, closely associated with the Dadong zhenjing 大洞真經. The present work contains hymns as well as talismanic writings.

The hymns can be divided into three groups: First, a song (1a–3a) that CHEN JINGYUAN quotes in 104 Shangqing dadong zhenjing yujue yinyi as belonging to the Dadong zhenjing. Chen notes a number of variants of the “Maoshan version”; these variants correspond to the present text.

A second group (4b–8b) is also found in the introduction to the Dadong zhenjing (6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing 1.9a–10b and 7 Dadong yujing 大洞玉經 1.4a–5b). The hymns of the Dadong zhenjing (with the exception of those called Dadong yujing) make up the final group.

The revealed commentary of the Dadong jing (in YJQQ 8.1a–18b) includes these hymns together with the others of this scripture (see YJQQ 8.1b and 2a commentary on certain expressions that are found in our text on 8b). The same text is again found in YJQQ 42. Our present version must be later than the WSBY, as that work is mentioned in the commentary on 36b.

The talismanic characters of our text correspond to the Ziwen danzhang 紫文丹章 (see 1335 Dongzhen taishang ziwen danzhang), a Shangqing text that is linked to the practices of the Dadong zhenjing.

A colophon states that a god transmitted our text to Youyang jun 幼陽君, a saint of the Shangqing tradition. Finally there are a few phonetic glosses.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing gaosheng taishang dadao jun dongzhen jinyuan bajing yulu

上清高聖太上大道君洞真金元八景玉錄

17 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1389 (fasc. 1045)

“Hagiography of Taishang Dadao Jun.” This text begins with a long poem on the search for immortality and on the different ways to attain it. There follows a description of the travels of the god in the eight directions on his chariot of effulgence (jing 景) and on su 素. Su is the Yin counterpart of jing; the travels are related to the Eight Gates of the Mysterious Mother (Xuanmu bamen 玄母八門; see 1323 Dongzhen taishang basu zhenjing fushi riye huanghua jue 17a–end). This rite is closely related to the Dadong zhenjing.

It should be noted that our text is never quoted under its present title but often as Dadong zhenjing. Thus it would appear that it was one of the texts which accompanied the practices of the Dadong zhenjing.

There is a colophon recording the transmission by the Ziwei furen 紫微夫人 to YANG XI in A.D. 355 of texts amounting to 20,230 characters and of the Dadong zhenjing in 10,000 characters.

This text and the two preceding ones correspond to number 1 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Robinet, “Le Ta-tung chen-ching,” 415–16.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing jinzhen yuguang bajing feijing 上清金真玉光八景飛經

25 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1378 (fasc. 1042)

“The Scripture of the Eight Effulgences [bajing, here referring to heavenly gods] of Jade Brilliance and Golden Truth.” This is an apocryphal Shangqing text that has adopted as its title the name of one of the fu from the original works it imitates. It states that it was revealed by a Shangqing deity, and it has a colophon (24b–25a) of the kind written by XU RONGDI (d. 435; see 1016 Zhen’gao 19.13a–b and Strickmann, “The Mao Shan revelations,” 49). It should therefore date to the beginning of the fifth century.

This scripture has been incorporated into the Shangqing corpus and is quoted by numerous anthologies of the school. Its present version seems incomplete, as a number of quotations in other works can no longer be found here. However, quotations in the encyclopedias of the sixth and seventh centuries (WSBY and SDZN) agree with the words of our text.

This work borrows material and exercises of visual meditation from the original texts of the Shangqing. We find a meditation exercise called badao biyan 八道秘言 (6a–14a), which is a variant of a similar exercise in 1376 Shangqing taishang dijun jiu zhen zhongjing 1.11b–15b. The names given here to the Eight Effulgences are the same as those found in 1359 Shangqing danjing daojing yindi bashu jing.

Next we find another series of the fu called Huoluo qiyeuan 豁落七元 (19a–end). There is a sequence of five fu of the Five Emperors (wudi 五帝; 14b–22b), with an accompanying song (14a–b). This song has since been included in a Shangqing ritual for the transmission of the present scripture (1324 Dongzhen taishang basu zhenjing dengtan fuzha miaojue 3b–4a).

The present text corresponds to number 2 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu. Other versions are the Dunhuang manuscripts DX 1962, Pelliot 2728 and 2848, and Stein 238 (dated 692). An abbreviated version is included in YJQQ 53.1a–8b.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 上清太上八素真經

28 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

426 (fasc. 194)

“True Scripture of the Eight Purities.” The Eight Purities (basu) are female celestial deities (see 1323 Dongzhen taishang basu zhenjing fushi riye huanghua jue). This Basu jing is a Shangqing scripture, the present version of which includes passages quoted in WSBY and SDZN, but it is incomplete. In fact, this text should have been incorporated into the above mentioned 1323 Huanghua jue. The stanzas named Yangge jiuzhang 陽歌九章 (see 13b) that can be found in WSBY 20.4b–6b (quotation partly corresponding to 303 Ziyang zhenren neizhuan 17a–18a) must also be added, as they were once part of this work.

Our text can be divided into three parts: the first part (4a–9b) presents a hierarchical list of Shangqing texts, indicating to which celestial eminences and heavens their practice gives access (this list is also found in YJQQ 6.6b–8a and in 428 Taishang feixing jiuchen yujing 2b–4a).

The next part (9b–26b) contains meditation exercises on the Five Planets and their deities, to be carried out as a form of penitence on the Five Universal Days (wutong 五通). This rite is complementary to the form of penitence called Return to the Origin (huiyuan 迴元; see 1377 Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue 10b). This part is reproduced in 637 Taishang feibu wuxing jing 4b–8b and 10b, as well as in 1385 Shangqing dongzhen tianbao dadong sanjing baolu 1.34a–41a and in YJQQ 25.21a–31a.

The text ends with three formulas aimed at setting one's hun 魂 souls at rest and expelling the Three Corpses (sanshi 三尸; 26b–end). These formulas are also included in 1319 Dongzhen xi wang mu baoshen qiju jing 16b–18a and in 637 Taishang feibu wuxing jing 9a–10a.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang basu zhenjing fushi riyue huanghua jue

洞真太上八素真經服食日月皇華訣

26 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1323 (fasc. 1028)

“Absorption of Solar and Lunar Essences.” This text constitutes the part of the Basu jing dealing with the absorption of these essences. It was probably joined to 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing, as only the present work contains the part concerning the Eight Purities (basu), the celestial female deities for whom 426 Basu zhenjing is named. Quotations from both works in WSBY and SDZN are indiscriminately ascribed to the Basu jing. The present text must therefore belong to the original Shangqing revelation.

The text begins with a description of the practice of the absorption of solar and lunar essences by means of consecrated water that has been previously exposed to the light of the stars (1a–8b). This practice is similar to that described in other Shangqing texts (e.g., 639 Huangtian shangqing jinque dijun lingshu ziwen shangjing, part 1; 33 Shangqing huangqi yangjing sandao shunxing jing, parts 1 and 2; 1315 Dongzhen shangqing qingyao zishu jin'gen zhongjing, parts 1 and 2). There are charms used for the absorption of lunar and solar essences (8b–17a): two for Yin and Yang, two for the sun and moon, eight for the basu.

The second part of the text deals with the ritual of the Eight Gates of the Mysterious Mother (Xuanmu bamen 玄母八門); the Mysterious Mother is a hypostasis of the Original Yin. This ritual consists in writing votive tablets, which are then arranged according to the eight directions (the Eight Gates) and intended for the deities they invoke. The ritual is completed by the visualization of the Ladies of the Eight Purities (Basu yuanjun 八素元君) at the time of the Eight Calendar Nodes (bajie 八節). The entire ritual is linked to the recitation of the Dadong zhenjing (one finds the same names for the gods in 1389 Shangqing gaoshang taishang dadao jun dongzhen jinyuan bajing yulu and 1358 Shangqing gaoshang jinyuan yuzhang yuqing yinshu jing, and the same vows in 1313 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi dadong ciyi yujian wulao baojing 22a–23a).

The liturgy of the Song period (960–1279) has borrowed several invocations from the present text (for example 219 Lingbao wuliang duren shangjing dafa 37.7b and 67.33a–b correspond to 3b, 35.8a, and 60.8b in the present text, and 20b corresponds to 4b). The description of the sun and moon on 3b–4a of our text is also found in 1220 Daofa huiyuan 76.14a.

This text and the preceding one correspond to number 3 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen shangqing taiwei dijun bu tiangang fei diji jinjian yuzi shangjing

洞真上清太微帝君步天綱飛地紀金簡玉字上經

29 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1316 (fasc. 1027)

“Superior Scripture in Jade Characters on Golden Tablets for Pacing the Celestial Mainstay and Flying on the Terrestrial Filaments of the Sovereign Lord of the Great Tenuity, of the Dongzhen Shangqing Canon.” This text deals principally with the practice of flying paces (feibu 飛步) for pacing the Dipper (the Celestial Mainstay; see Schafer, Pacing the void, 238–42). This is an ancient practice (see BPZ 19.306 and the Heavenly Master texts 795 Zhengyi chuguan zhangyi 5b and 1294 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi 14b). Another version of this method is said to have been taught by Master Zhang of Handan 邯鄲張先生, who transmitted it to Liu Jing 劉京 (first century B.C.). According to our text (28b–29a), a version of this method was once presented to Wang Mang (r. A.D. 9–25), but it was not, unlike the present text, the authentic Shangqing version.

The authenticity of our text is nevertheless doubtful from the Shangqing perspective: the beginning is altered, and no quotation is found in the WSBY. 1338 Dongzhen taishang taisu yulu 4b contains a colophon by XU RONGDI that was perhaps originally attached to this work, according to which the text was transmitted to Xu Yuanyou 許遠遊 in A.D. 345. In that case it would be apocryphal. A few passages of the text, however, agree with quotations in 1016 Zhen'gao (for example 9.1a4 corresponds to 17b1 in the present text).

The beginning of the text (1a–7a) is composed of incoherent fragments of Shangqing texts (cf. 140 Shangqing wozhong jue and 876 Taishang wuxing qiyan kongchang jue). The following part (7a–23a) presents the highly elaborated practice of pacing the Dipper, to be executed in four phases. This presentation is followed by a passage on the history of the practice from the time of Huangdi 黃帝 on. Then come various minor prescriptions (20a–23a). The work ends (23a–end) with a postface by Lord Wang of the Western City, Xicheng Wangjun 西城王君, master of Mao Jun 茅君, written for an unidentified text entitled Taishang zishu 太上紫書.

The present work is one of the oldest to describe in detail the practice of pacing the Dipper. Some fragments are included in rituals (for example, 1015 Jinsuo liuzhu yin 1.1a–2b and 15.14a, corresponding to a passage on page 8a in our text).

Other versions of the text are: 428 Taishang feixing jiuchen yujing 25b–34a, corresponding to 1385 Shangqing dongzhen tianbao dadong sanjing baolu 1.20a–25a. The latter is a parallel version of 11a–17b of the present text (with some variants). This text corresponds to number 4 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing 上清太上帝君九真中經

2 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1376 (fasc. 1042)

“Central Scripture of the Nine True Ones.” This title refers to one of the practices of the Shangqing tradition. The meditation on the Nine True Ones is attributed to Chisong zi 赤松子, an immortal of ancient times who was adopted by the Shangqing tradition. It is closely linked to 1377 Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue.

The present text is a patchwork of other Shangqing texts, sometimes assembled from incoherent fragments that are either originals or ancient apocrypha. They correspond to quotations found in other Shangqing texts, or in WSBY and SDZN.

The work can be divided into five parts, beginning with the practice of the Nine True Ones (jiuzhen fa 九真法; 1.2b–11b). This practice consists in evoking the nine “souls of the Lord Emperor”—which, in 6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing (3.6b–end and 4.1a–7a), are the spirits of the vital organs of the body—and then having them take up residence in each of these organs. In the end, they are all united in the Heavenly Palace of the Brain (niwan 泥丸). The aim of this exercise is to regenerate the body. The same method is found in 1382 Shangqing jiudan shanghua taijing zhongji jing 16b–26a. It is reproduced, in an abbreviated form, in YJQQ 30.5b–9b and 52.1a–4a. Another version can be found in the Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2751, lines 200–365.

Next (1.11b–15b) there is a Discourse on the Essentials of the Eight Ways (Badao biyan 八道秘言; i.e., the eight directions). The practice described here, attributed to Huang-Lao jun 黃老君, is closely related to the jiuzhen fa. It consists in visualizing at given periods deities traveling in their chariots. Descriptions of the practice have been copied and developed in several apocrypha of the school. They have been incorporated into YJQQ 51.4a–6b and 430 Shangqing badao biyan tu 1a–9a. Third, there is a fragment of the practice of the five spirits (wushen fa 五神法 1.15b–16b; see 405 Shangqing zijing jun huangchu ziling daojun dongfang shangjing, where this method is given in its complete form).

The second juan begins (2.1a–8b) with a practice to invoke the Emperors of the Sun (called Yuyi 鬱儀) and the Ladies of the Moon (Jielin 結璘). This exercise culminates in the ascension of the practitioner to Heaven in the chariots of these gods. There is a fragment of the wushen fa in 2b–3a. The present protocol was revealed to Lord Pei 裴君, patron of the Shangqing revelation; it is probably one of the most ancient practices involving the sun and the moon. It is also found in 1377 Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue 15b–21b and is reproduced in numerous other texts. A great number of its elements have been incorporated in liturgy.

Finally, there is a series of alchemical recipes attributed to Zhang Daoling 張道陵. These recipes are considered apocryphal (Strickmann, “On the Alchemy of Tao Hung-ching,” 171–72), but they are closely linked to the ancient Shangqing corpus. The first of these recipes can also be found in YJQQ 68.1a–9b and 77.7b–10b; it is similar to the one in 255 Taiwei lingshu ziwen langgan huadan shenzhen shangjing. There is also a distinct relationship between this part and the above-mentioned 1377 Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue, since the title of this work corresponds to the first of the alchemical recipes found here.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Robinet, “Introduction à l'étude du Kieou-tchen tchong-king.”

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue

上清太上九真中經絳生神丹訣

22 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1377 (fasc. 1042)

“Instructions on the Divine Elixir of Life and the Central Scripture of the Nine True Ones.” This scripture is closely related to the preceding 1376 Shangqing taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing and to the following 405 Shangqing zijing jun huangchu ziling daojun dongfang shangjing. Its title refers to two distinct practices: that of the Nine True Ones (jiuzhen) and that of the divine elixir (shendan). These practices are absent from the present text but are found in 1376 Jiuzhen zhongjing. Like the latter, our text is composed of several parts, all belonging to the original Shangqing revelation (364–370).

The first part is devoted to the Futong zhi dao 拂童之道, also called the practice of the twenty-four spirits (ershi si shen fa 二十四神法), or again the practice of the bright mirror (mingjing fa 明鏡法; 1a–2a): the practice of washing the eyes (read tong 瞳 for tong 童) with a solution of pure cinnabar, as described in many other places, e.g., Zhen'gao 5.13a. Another part discusses a precious formula of the Jade Scripture (Yujing baojue 玉經寶訣; 2a–4b), which corresponds to the practice of the Five Planets (wuchen fa 五晨法). A third practice that receives attention is that of the Return to the Origin (huiyuan fa; 4b–11a). These same three practices are recorded in a more complete form in 405 Shangqing zijing jun huangchu ziling daojun dongfang shangjing.

The second half of the present work is devoted to the Scripture of the Nine Yin of the Lord Emperor (Dijun jiuyin jing 帝君九陰經; 11a–15b) and to the Yuyi jielin 鬱儀結璘 practice (15b–end). The scripture contains instructions for meditation on the secret spouses of the Great Yin 太陰, who reside in the stars of the Dipper and in the Mingtang 明堂 (a palace of the brain). These deities confer salvation; their names refer to the powers of invisibility and transformation. The same text occurs in 1367 Shangqing hetu neixuan jing 2.14–end, and in YJQQ 31.10a–end. For the Yuyi jielin practice in 15b–end, see the preceding 1376 Jiuzhen zhongjing.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Robinet, “Introduction à l'étude du Kieou-tchen tchong-king.”

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing zijing jun huangchu ziling daojun dongfang shangjing

上清紫精君黃初紫靈道君洞房上經

19 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

405 (fasc. 191)

“Superior Scripture on the Dongfang Palace of the Brain.” The title refers to one of the palaces of the brain (dongfang), as well as to two Shangqing deities (compare 6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing, paragraphs 9 and 17). The present text is totally different from two others also called Dongfang jing (133 Taishang dongfang neijing zhu and 879 Shangqing jinshu yuzi shangjing).

The title bears little or no relationship to its contents. The text contains a few exercises that may have originally been interrelated, but the present version represents a later compilation. The contents of the work do not appear to be quoted elsewhere under the present title. The practices expounded are also to be found in many other scriptures, too numerous to be listed here (see, in particular, 1376 Shangqing taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing and 1377 Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue, as well as Robinet, “Kieou-tchen tchong-king”). The text under discussion contains the best version of this set of practices, four of which may be of earlier origin than the Shangqing revelation (364–370), as follows.

First, the practice of the five spirits (wushen fa 五神法; 1a–3b). The five spirits—those of the eyes, the hands, and the lungs—are divided into three groups, related to exercises to be performed in the morning, at noon, and in the evening. Here only the spirits of the hands belong to the Shangqing pantheon. The exercise consists in reciting a poem and in visualizing qi, which transform themselves into dragons. The adept mounts these dragons in order to rise up to the sky.

The second practice is called the practice of the twenty-four spirits (ershi si shen fa 二十四神法; 3b–10a). The practice begins with an enumeration of the twenty-four spirits of the body (in three groups of Eight Effulgences [jing 景], with the specific names these spirits bear in the Shangqing tradition. There follows a visualization of the same spirits (9a–10a). They appear in two mirrors, which the adept forms out of white qi. What we have here is an adaptation, by the Shangqing tradition, of an ancient magical practice with mirrors, comparable to that described in BPZ 15.69.

The third practice is the practice of the Five Planets (wuchen fa 五晨法; 10a–12a). This is a visualization practice of the planets linked to particular points on the face (the names of these points are not found elsewhere), as well as a visualization of the sun and the moon, situated in the temples on each side of the head.

The final practice involves a table of the names of the stars and gods of the Dipper. These names correspond to those found in other Shangqing texts. This list is followed by a description of the practice of the Return to the Origin, or Revolving Principles (huiyuan 迴元). This is a text for doing penitence that is complementary to the exercise of the wutong 五通 days (426 Shangqing taishang taishang basu zhenjing, where the spirits of the planets also intervene).

This text and the two preceding ones correspond to number 5 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Robinet, "Introduction à l'étude du Kicou-tchen tchong-king."

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing huangqi yangjing sandao shunxing jing

上清黃氣陽精三道順行經

29 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

33 (fasc. 27)

"Shangqing Scripture on Following the Three Trajectories and [Absorbing] the Yellow Qi and Yang Essence." The yellow qi is the energy of the moon, the yang essence that of the sun. The exercises contained in this work explain how the adept can absorb these energies. The Three Ways (sandao) are the trajectories of the three luminaries: sun, moon, and Dipper. The adept follows their course (shunxing 順行).

The title of the present scripture is mentioned among those revealed to YANG XI (between 364 and 370). It is closely linked to the other Shangqing texts dealing with the same subject, such as 639 Huangtian shangqing jinqie dijun lingshu ziwen shangjing, 426 Taiqing taishang basu zhenjing, and 1315 Dongzhen shangqing qingyao zishu jin'gen zhongjing. A final colophon mentions the transmission of the scripture to Lady WEI HUACUN, patron of the Shangqing. Quotations in ancient anthologies (WSBY, SDZN, etc.) correspond to the present text. Pages 3b, 4, and 5 (corresponding to blocks 3 and 4 in the original edition) are lost.

The work contains two main parts. One is dedicated to the sun and the moon, the other to the Dipper. Among the practices related to the sun (1b–12a), we find first of all a description of the sun and the different stages of its course across the sky. The exercises consist mainly in mentally ascending to the palaces through which the sun passes during the first day of each season, and there meeting the Lord of each palace, as well as purifying oneself in the waters of life and eating the fruit of a tree of immortality. The practices related to the moon (12b–33a) are similar. They are performed during the solstices and equinoxes.

The practices related to the Dipper (25a–27b) are as follows: the adept must lie on top of the seven stars of the Dipper, which are inhabited by seven holy lads who inundate the adept with the radiance of the seven jewels. A number of figures of antiquity and some immortals are mentioned as having practiced these methods.

Complete parts and long extracts of this text are quoted in YJQQ 9.12b–13a, 23.1a–2a, 11a–12b, 14a–b, and in 1333 Shangqing daobao jing 2.3b, 4a, 5a, 5b, 8b. This work bears out the continuity between the Shangqing texts and the Chinese mythological tradition. The names given to the stations of the sun and the lunar lodges here also occur in the Lingbao texts and in liturgies. This text corresponds to number 8 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing waiguo fangpin Qingtong neiwen 上清外國放品青童內文

2 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1373 (fasc. 1041)

"Esoteric Text of the Green Lad on the Goods Deposited in Foreign Countries."

This work describes the lands of the other world, the fields of the cardinal points, the heavens and subterranean regions, and the marvelous goods they possess; the text gives their talismanic names, which are heavenly sounds. The Green Lad (qingtong 青童) is a Shangqing god.

The present work is mentioned in 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 5.1a as one of the Shangqing texts. However, none of the original Shangqing writings, revealed between 364 and 370, mention this work or even allude to it. Other aspects—such as certain elements of its terminology (Buddhist terms, or expressions originating in the Lingbao scriptures), as well as the fact that the work incorporates fragments from 598 Shizhou ji (compare our text 3b–4a with 598 Shizhou ji 2.31a–b, 32b, 30a–b)—indicate that we are dealing here with an apocryphal work. The quotations in WSBY agree with the present text. The two juan appear to have been originally separate works. Each of them has an introduction, certain passages of which are identical, as well as a conclusion. Moreover, both juan introduce the Thirty-six Foreign Countries, giving them distinct names.

The text of the first juan, in which the number six dominates, presents qi-writings termed ming 銘 (inscriptions) with indications of their pronunciation (yin 音). The names of the furthestmost regions of the four horizons, the center, and the zenith are also given. The second juan adopts a system based on the number nine and contains the names of the Thirty-six Heavens, divided into nine groups. Each of these groups is introduced by one of the Nine Shangqing Heavens. The same text then gives the names of the Thirty-six Terrestrial Regions, divided into nine layers.

This cosmology constitutes a form of compromise between different Chinese traditions concerning the islands of immortals, the stations of the sun, and the lands of the barbarians. Its exotic, outlandish presentation of names imitates transcribed Sanskrit. The entire work is meant to be recited and to furnish the practitioner with the means—the names and descriptions—to visualize the regions of the nether world and to receive the fu that facilitate penetration into the Sacred Mountains and the Remotest (ji 極) Countries, as well as with the means to rise up to the Heavens.

Juan 22 of the YJQQ is made up entirely of extracts of the present work. The names of the lands and rulers given in our text have been adopted in certain rituals, such as 219 Lingbao wuliang duren shangjing dafa 4.1b–2b and 515 Dongxuan lingbao hetu yangxie sanshiliu tian zhayiyi 1.6b3–4 (compare 2.5a9–10 in the present text). This text corresponds to number 9 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Huangtian shangqing jinque dijun lingshu ziwen shangjing

皇天上清金闕帝君靈書紫文上經

13 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

639 (fasc. 342)

“Marvelous Scripture in Purple Characters of the Lord Emperor of the Gold Portal.” This is one of the texts that most surely belongs to the original Shangqing revelation (364–370). Some of TAO HONGJING’s glosses to 1016 Zhen’gao and to 421 Dengzhen yinjue confirm this. Quotations in WSBY and SDZN also correspond to the present text. This scripture is closely related to 255 Taiwei lingshu ziwen langgan huadan shenzhen shangjing, 179 Taiwei lingshu ziwen xianji zhenji shangjing, and 442 Shangqing housheng daojun lieji. All these texts probably formed originally one single work, for they appear to complement each other, and in the quotations made from these texts they are often confused with one another.

The text contains three main parts. The first part (4a–8b) describes the absorption of solar and lunar essences. The core of this practice comprises two spells (zhou 咒), one formed by the names of the Emperors of the Sun, the other by the names of the Ladies of the Moon. These spells are accompanied by the visualization of the astral essences that should be absorbed by the adept.

The second part (8b–11a) evokes the mastery of the three hun 魂 and seven po 魄 souls by means of a spell and the visualization of colored qi. The description of this mastery is followed by an imaginary self-cremation for the hun souls and by the adept’s vision of himself surrounded by the emblematic animals of the four directions for the po souls.

The third and last part (11b–end) contains a spell of the Three Original Principles (sanyuan 三元), which are the Three Ones (sanyi 三一), the three spirits of the Cinnabar Fields (dantian 丹田). A spell of the God of the Mysterious Pass (xuanguan 玄 關) completes this exercise. The rite of the Mysterious Pass, that is the Palace of Life or the Gate of Destiny (mingmen 命門), here located in the navel, constitutes a kind of interiorization of sexual practices. This interiorization is said, by the text itself, to replace such practices and to be superior to them (13a–b).

The present work is a fundamental text of Taoism. Each practice we find here is an elaboration by the Shangqing movement of more ancient rites, traces of which can be found either in 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu (absorption of astral essences, spirits of the Cinnabar Fields), or in the tradition of the Heavenly Masters (the God of the Mysterious Pass). The names attributed to the spirits of the Cinnabar Fields are the same as those of the Taiqing tradition (see YJQQ 49.8b). The Lingshu ziwen is the basic reference for the invocation of the sun and the moon. These invocations are repeated not only in various Shangqing texts, but also in numerous rituals whose aim is to achieve mastery over the hun and po souls (the names of these souls found here are similar to those used in many other texts) as well as in the rite of the xuanguan.

Another version of the text is found in the Dunhuang manuscripts Stein 4314 and 6193, and Pelliot 2751 (see Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 183–84).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Wu Jing-nuan, Ling shu or the Spiritual Pivot.

Isabelle Robinet

Taiwei lingshu ziwen langgan huadan shenzhen shangjing

太微靈書紫文琅玕華丹神真上經

8 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

255 (fasc. 120)

“Scripture of the Langgan Elixir.” Langgan is the name of a mythical tree on Mount Kunlun 崑崙. This text is linked to the Lingshu ziwen group (see the preceding article and the following two articles). Our text probably formed a single work with this group. The rules of transmission given in 7b–8a apply to all of these texts. They derive from the original Shangqing revelation.

The elixir recipe contains fourteen ingredients commonly used in Taoist recipes, such as cinnabar, orpiment, and so on. Their esoteric names correspond (with a single exception) to those used in another Shangqing recipe, in 1376 Shangqing taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing 2.9b–11b.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Strickmann, “On the alchemy of T’ao Hung-ching,” 134–36.

Isabelle Robinet

Taiwei lingshu ziwen xianji zhenji shangqing 太微靈書紫文仙忌真記上經

4 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

179 (fasc. 77)

“True Record of Interdictions [to Be Observed by] the Immortals.” This is a fragment of the Lingshu ziwen and one of the rare scriptures among the original Shangqing revelations devoted to the formulation of the rules of ritual.

A gloss indicates that it was transmitted by the Green Lad (qingtong 青童) to Gong Zhongyang 龔仲陽 (here written 楊) and to his brother Youyang 幼陽 (two Shangqing immortals). The same indications are already found in the biography of Ziyang zhenren 紫陽真人 (YJQQ 106.13b and Dengzhen yinjue 登真隱訣 quoted in TPYL 660).

The text presents an enumeration of the ritual prescriptions and interdictions against lust, drinking, and eating the meat of animals (corresponding to that of one's own Fundamental Destiny [benming 本命] or to that of one's parents); taboos concerning the north; and so on. To infringe these prescriptions and interdictions means to damage the marks or signs of immortality (xianxiang 仙相), as given in 442 Shangqing housheng daojun lieji.

Other versions of the present text exist in 427 Shangqing xiuxing jingjue 22b–25a and in the Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2751 (Ziwen xingshi jue 紫文行事訣), lines 182–95.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing housheng daojun lieji 上清後聖道君列紀

13 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

442 (fasc. 198)

“Annals of the Latter-Day Saint.” This work is part of the textual group of the Lingshu ziwen (see the articles on 639 Huangtian shangqing jinque dijun lingshu ziwen shangjing and following) and constitutes an important part of the original Shangqing revelation. It is authenticated through quotations in 1016 Zhen'gao, SDZN, and elsewhere. According to tradition, the present text was transmitted by the Lord Green Lad 青童君 to Wang Yuanyou 王遠遊, one of the legendary immortals of the Shangqing corpus.

The Latter-Day Saint is Li Hongyuan 李弘元 (Li Hong being the traditional name of Laozi as messiah; see Seidel, “The image of the perfect ruler,” 236–47). He is the Lord of the Golden Portal and a divine intermediary. This work starts with a biography of the saint, who practices Shangqing methods in order to attain apotheosis.

The saint is then pictured as the judge at the end of time (3b–4a) and as a mediator (7b–8a) who sends twenty-four teachers into the world under the guidance of Wang Yuanyou, whose task it is to transmit the Shangqing scriptures (enumerated in 8a). The Latter-Day Saint also descends to reign over the world.

The main purpose of the text is to establish a hierarchy among the elect who are to be saved when the world comes to an end. From 9b on, our work describes the different marks or signs of physical immortality (xianxiang 仙相), which differ according to the palace in Heaven where the name of the elected has been inscribed. These palaces correspond to those given in 1379 Shangqing yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing 17b–29b. This text and the three preceding ones correspond to number 10 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao Chan, 209–24 (translation of 1a–9a).

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang zidu yanguang shenyuan bian jing

洞真太上紫度炎光神元變經

33 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1332 (fasc. 1030)

“Rules on Purple [Tablets], Book of Blazing Light, [Created by] Transformation from the Divine Mystery [for yuan read xuan 玄].” This scripture materialized through the condensation of light and divine vital qi.

TAO HONGJING in 1016 Zhen'gao 9.5a–b and in 421 Dengzhen yinjue 3.2b seems to indicate that the present text is one of the Shangqing apocrypha. Its context, however, agrees perfectly with that of the other works of this school; quotations made by WSBY and SDZN accord. This text could therefore date from the beginning of the fifth century. It is incomplete (see the following article on 1368 Shangqing huishen feixiao dengkong zhao wuxing shangfa jing).

The present work deals with light and its horizontal expansion. It teaches long distance vision and the evocation, mastery, and absorption of the luminous forces of the Five Directions.

After an introduction of a few pages, the text presents an exercise for the evocation of emptiness (zhaomu 招無; 2b–7a). This exercise is found, in more succinct (perhaps its original) form, in 1016 Zhen'gao, 421 Dengzhen yinjue, and 1319 Dongzhen xi wang mu baoshen qiju jing. It consists in visualizing the limits of the Five Directions (east, south, west, north, and zenith) and summoning the Immortal Officials of these places, until general enlightenment is obtained. The work then presents the Bell of Fire and Flowing Gold (liujin huoling 流金火鈴; 7a–17a), from the name of an important Shangqing charm. This part of the work also contains five other charms and four formulas of invocation. Next comes a ritual for the Emperors of the Five Directions (17a–23b). It consists of lighting lamps decorated with charms. Other practices include an alchemical recipe (23b–27b) for the purpose of summoning the Officials of the Five Peaks, and a visualization and absorption of the spiritual forces of the Five Directions (27b–33a). These forces appear in the form of Divine Lads bearing plants and beverages of long life, of Jade Maidens associated with the shoots (ya 芽) of the Five Directions, and of colored halos that are absorbed through the mouth and swallowed together with saliva. Instructions relating to the practice of 1317 Dongzhen shangqing kaitian santu qixing yidu jing are also given.

A substantial part of our text (9a–17a) is found in 1337 Dongzhen taiwei jinhu zhenfu (7a–end).

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing huishen feixiao dengkong zhao wuxing shangfa jing

上清迴神飛霄登空招五星上法經

5 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1368 (fasc. 1040)

“Scripture of the Superior Method for Returning to the Divine, Flying up to High Heavens, Rising into Space, and Calling upon the Five Planets.” The first part of this scripture is linked to 1332 Dongzhen taishang zidu yanguang shenyuan bian jing, because this part is quoted by 446 Shangqing zhongjing zhu zhensheng bi and by WSBY 97.1a–12b under that title. Moreover, the contents of this part correspond to that of 1332 Shenyuan bian jing: a method of visualizing the different gods of the Five Directions as well as the sun and the moon.

The second part is an appendix of sorts, introducing the evocation of the gods of the Book of the Yellow Court (Huangting jing 黃庭經) and of 6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing 4, 5, and 6. This second part is mentioned as an apocryphal work by TAO HONGJING in 421 Dengzhen yinjue 3.2b.

This text and the preceding one correspond to number 11 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen shangqing qingyao zishu jin'gen zhongjing

洞真上清青腰紫書金根衆經

2 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1315 (fasc. 1026–1027)

“Purple Book [of the Celestial Emperor] of Qingyao, [Containing] the Combined Scriptures of Gathering the Golden Root.” Qingyao (green waist) in ancient mythology designates either a celestial maiden or a sacred mountain, while jin'gen (golden root) refers to solar energies. This Shangqing scripture was at least partially revealed to YANG XI in 365 (see 1016 Zhen'gao 2.7a). According to one source (596 Xianyuan bianzhu 3.15a), this text was revealed in the second century A.D. The present version corresponds to the citations found in WSBY and SDZN but is perhaps incomplete since the remarks concerning it in 442 Shangqing housheng daojun lieji 8a do not correspond to its present contents.

The book as a whole is attributed to the Great Minister Lord Green Lad (Shangxiang qingtong jun 上相青童君), but each juan starts with the biography of the god under whose aegis it has been placed.

Juan 1 deals with practices of absorbing solar and lunar energies (closely resembling those found in 1323 Dongzhen taishang basu zhenjing fushi riye huanghua jue, 639 Huangtian shangqing jinque dijun lingshu ziwen shangjing, and 33 Shangqing huangqi yangjing sandao shunxing jing). It also contains charms which enable one to escape the catastrophe of the apocalypse and methods to purify oneself of the pollution caused by the sight of a corpse.

Juan 2 deals exclusively with descriptions of the three paradises mentioned in the Shangqing scriptures as well as of the rituals that enable adepts to gain access to these paradises. This is one of the ritualistic texts of the Shangqing corpus. It contains rituals (yige 儀格) for the presentation of memorials written on wooden tablets (yuzha 玉札) and ends (18b ff.) with practices of visualization that enable the adept to cross the Three Celestial Passes (san tianguan 三天關). The same text is found in 1317 Dongzhen shangqing kaitian santu qixing yidu jing 1a–b.

The present work corresponds to number 12 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu. It is quoted in several places in YJQQ. Certain ritual elements have found their way into later manuals, such as the invocation on 1.6a–b, which is given in 219 Lingbao wuliang duren shangjing dafa 60.8a–b.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang sanjiu suyu yujing zhenjue 洞真太上三九素語玉精真訣

14 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1327 (fasc. 1029)

“Jade Essence Formulas in the Pristine Words of the Three and Nine.” The “Pristine Words” (suyu) of the title are those of the Nine Emperors of the Nine Heavens and of the Three Perfected (i.e., the Three Original Ones, sanyuan 三元; 1b). This text is a Shangqing apocryphal work. It bears the title of a text of the school (see 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 5b; 1331 Dongzhen shangqing shenzhou qizhuan qibian wutian jing 27b). Indeed, quotations found elsewhere under this title do not correspond to the present work (compare 421 Dengzhen yinjue 3.1a and the biography of Pei jun 裴君 in YJQQ 105.14b). A gloss by TAO HONGJING in 421 Dengzhen yinjue 3.1a mentions an apocryphal work bearing the title of our text. Quotations in the anthologies WSBY and SDZN accord with our text. If it is the work mentioned by TAO HONGJING, it must have appeared sometime around the end of the fourth century (Shangqing revelation) and the beginning of the fifth century.

The Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2576 (lines 1–134) corresponds to pages 5b–end of the present text. Ōfuchi Ninji's (Tōnkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 180) identification of this manuscript as being the Shangqing sanzhen zhiyao yujue 上清三真指要玉訣 is erroneous.

The work concerns the rites for addressing the deities or spirits of the five cardinal points. It begins with a Sanjiu suyu yujing zhenjue (1a–6a), which gives the text its title. This formula consists of a series of invocations to the Emperors of the Five Directions. The same invocations are also found in the biography of Pei jun 裴君 (YJQQ 105.10b–11b) as well as in various Shangqing texts. A visual meditation accompanies these invocations.

The invocations are followed by a ritual of presentation of memorials on the Eight Nodal Days (bajie touci fa 八節投刺法) to the sacred peak (yue 嶽) with which the adept is identified (6a–9b). This ritual consists in burying a tablet that establishes the Taoist adept's identity. The association of the adept with a sacred peak may be influenced by the ancient Lingbao tradition.

The final part (9b–14b) of our text contains a ritual for establishing the gods (zhen-shen 鎮神) of the five sacred mountains. In order to perform this ritual, charms are engraved on stones and buried in places surrounding one's residence and corresponding to the five cardinal points.

The present text corresponds to number 13 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu. The entire first part of this text is also found in YJQQ 44.18b–22a.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing sanyuan yujian sanyuan bujing 上清三元玉檢三元布經

43 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

354 (fasc. 179)

“Jade Rule of the Three Original Ones [sanyuan yujian] [and the] Promulgated Scripture of the Three [Female] Original Ones [sanyuan bujing].” The title contains a double reference, corresponding to two conflated scriptures. The first triad corresponds to the traditional division of the universe into Heaven, Earth (here: the mountains), and humans (here: the immortals). The second triad represents the Three Ladies of Purity, goddesses of the Shangqing. The text appears, therefore, to be a hybrid from perhaps a half century later than the original Shangqing revelation but is nevertheless linked to it. The quotations found in encyclopedias (WSBY, SDZN) agree with our text.

The “Jade Rule” is one of the earliest Shangqing rituals. Its text is divided into two parts, with the “Promulgated Scripture” wedged between the two. The first part (3b–26a) is composed of fu, a register (lu 籙), and a formulary. Some of the fu are missing. They can be recuperated thanks to 416 Shangqing pei fuwen huangquan jue 1b–3b. Part of our text (4a–11b) can also be found in 168 Yuanshi gaoshang yujian dalu 1a–2a and 8a–11b. The second part (31b–35b) expounds a ritual with offerings inviting the gods to descend.

The “Promulgated Scripture of the Three [Female] Original Ones” is a guide for recognizing different apparitions that may occur during meditation (26a–31b); this exercise is similar to that of 1393 Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiu ling taimiao guishan xuanlu (mentioned in our text, 31a).

At the end of the second part of the “Jade Rule” (from page 35b on) there is a description of the meditation on the three goddesses. A similar description is given in 1313 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi taidong ciyi yujian wulao baojing 28b–29a. The present text corresponds to number 14 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing danjing daoqing yindi bashu jing 上清丹景道精隱地八術經

2 juan

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1359 (fasc. 1039)

“The Scripture of the Tao Essence of Cinnabar Effulgence [Containing] the Eight Methods for Hiding in the Earth.” This text concerns various techniques for transforming oneself and making oneself invisible. In spite of a similarity in the titles, the text is entirely different from 1348 Dongzhen taishang danjing daoqing jing. Our work is mentioned by many of the original Shangqing texts: 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 5b, 1331 Dongzhen shangqing shenzhou qizhuan qibian wutian jing 28a, and 1016 Zhen'gao 5.2b. It may, however, go back to a period earlier than the Shangqing revelation (364–370), as it mentions (2.4a–5a) more or less legendary persons who once followed its practice. The 1016 Zhen'gao 12.7a–b confirms this when it says that Liu Yi 劉翊, who lived at the time of the Yellow Turbans (A.D. 184; see his biography in Hou Han shu 111), received these Yindi bashu. The ancient version is said to have had eight juan (2.1a). The quotations found in the WSBY correspond to the words of the present text.

The different methods of transformation are considered as means to salvation in the concrete sense of escaping from dangers, obtaining bodily freedom, mounting up to heaven, and so on. The names given to the eight methods belong to the vocabulary of ancient Taoism and are inspired by the Laozi and the Zhuangzi. One of the main characteristics of this text is the relationship between the Eight Gods of Effulgence (bajing 八景), the Eight Trigrams (bagua 八卦), and the Eight Calendar Nodes (bajie 八節). In this respect, our work is different from other Shangqing texts in which the Eight Trigrams never occur.

The first juan enumerates the Eight Methods of Transformation, with the help of eight fu and with visual meditation on colored clouds. The latter change into mythical animals, each then being related to a specific part of the body. The bajing are also invoked by using their secret names (these are given on 2.5b–6a).

The second juan contains methods for escaping disasters. These correspond to different Trigrams (1a–4b). The method uses the same fu and the same secret names of the bajing. It is placed under the aegis of the Lord Emperor Ziqing 紫清帝君 and enables one to be transformed into a mythical animal.

The remainder of the text gives detailed information for putting these methods into practice. Almost all of the first juan is reproduced in YJQQ 53.9a–13b. This present text corresponds to number 16 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kaltenmark, “King yu pa-king.”

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen shangqing shenzhou qizhuan qibian wutian jing

洞真上清神州七轉七變舞天經

29 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1331 (fasc. 1030)

“Seven Recitations of the Divine Realm with Seven Transformations for Dancing in Heaven.” The title of this scripture comprises references to two distinct parts of the text. The first part, Seven Recitations of the Divine Realm (Shenzhou qizhuan shangjing 上經), consists of a series of fourteen units to be recited in a prescribed order. The second part, Seven Transformations for Dancing in Heaven (Shenzhou qibian wutian jing 經), deals with techniques of transformation and salvation to enable the adept “to dance in Heaven.”

The text is placed under the aegis of a Shangqing deity and is mentioned in many texts of this school (for example 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 5b; 1016 Zhen'gao 5.3a). It is quoted in 639 Huangtian shangqing jingque dijun lingshu ziwen shangjing (2b–3a). The quotations in WSBY, SDZN, and other anthologies correspond to our text. There are reasons to believe that the last pages (26b–end) have been added in order to justify the inclusion of this new text into the corpus of scriptures revealed to Yang Xi.

The text begins with the biography of the Shanghuang xiansheng zichen jun 上皇先生紫晨君. Next there is the series of fourteen units also found in 6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing and in 1393 Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiuling taimiao guishan xuanlu. These units are paraphrases of passages in the Dadong zhenjing.

The second part of the work expounds seven methods for transforming oneself into a cloud, a beam of light, into fire, water, or even into a dragon, in order to obtain corporeal liberation. These methods require the visualization of colored qi 氣, divine beings, and charms (23a–26b). The exercises are accompanied by invocations. The last pages of the text contain an almost complete list of the Shangqing scriptures. This text corresponds to number 17 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taiyi dijun taidan yinshu dongzhen xuanjing

洞真太一帝君太丹隱書洞真玄經

46 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1330 (fasc. 1030)

The title of this scripture refers to its various components. It is usually cited under one or another of their names, as either “Secret Scripture of Taidan” (Taidan yinshu 太丹隱書), referring to the Southern Palace, a place of redemption, where the book is stored; or “Scripture of the Supreme One” (Taiyi jing 太一經), to whom the present work is dedicated; or again, “Mysterious Scripture of Dongzhen” (Dongzhen xuanjing) or “Dongxuan.” The two terms Dongzhen and Dongxuan, which later designate two distinct groups of Daozang texts, are found for the first time in Shangqing scriptures. A work named Taishang yinshu belonged to the revelations received by YANG XI (see 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 4b; 1016 Zhen'gao 5.3a). The present form does not correspond to the original version, although it certainly contains elements from the original Shangqing texts. A number of passages quoted in anthologies (WSBY, SDZN) are not found in our text. The text is considerably altered and disjointed. Its contains (14b, 20b) interpolations from a Taiwei huangshu 太微黃書 that is no longer extant (compare, for example, 1338 Dongzhen taishang taisu yulu 1b–2b). In some places, a commentary is included. The text is closely related to 1313 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi dadong ciyi yujian wulao baojing, which may be of a slightly later date.

As the title indicates, our text is the scripture of Taiyi 太一. Its themes are regeneration and fusion with Taiyi and the Lord Emperor (dijun 帝君). It treats of various visual meditations that aim at the amalgamation of all the deities with the adept and the inscription of the adept's name on the registers of life. The gods acting in these exercises are those who rule over the formation of the embryo and human reproduction. Among these we find the Five Spirits of the Registers, the Three Original Ones of the Cinnabar Fields, the Mysterious (xuan 玄) Father and Mother, and the generative spirits of the body (see 6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing 5). The exercises described here often provide a key for the understanding of the relevant Dadong zhenjing passages, the latter serving as a kind of incantatory recapitulation of the former. The exercises are expounded, one after the other, without any clear transition.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing dongzhen yuanjing wuji fu* 上清洞真元經五籍符

5 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

82 (fasc. 37)

“Five Register-Charms of the Mysterious Book [for yuan 元 read xuan 玄] of the Dongzhen Canon.” This is a fragment of 1330 Dongzhen taiyi dijun taidan yinshu dongzhen xuanjing. Its title here is an alternate name for this Taidan yinshu. The latter (30a) mentions five charms, while only one of these charms is reproduced in the text. Our present text has all five (1a–2b, 2b–4b, and 5a corresponding to 1330 Taidan yinshu 30b–31a, 33a, and 44a).

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing taiyi dijun taidan yinshu jiebao shier jiejie tujue

上清太一帝君太丹隱書解胞十二結節圖訣

16 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1384 (fasc. 1043)

“Illustrated Instructions for Untying the Twelve Embryonic Knots according to the Secret Scripture of Taidan.” This is the final part of 1330 Dongzhen taiyi dijun taidan yinshu dongzhen xuanjing (38b–end). It explains, with illustrations, the method of the FIGURE 6. Nurturing the immortal embryo by untying the strings of death (1384 2a–b). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/1365)

Taidan yinshu 太丹隱書 for “untying the Inborn Knots” (jiejie 解結). The concept of Inborn Knots that make the body perishable is proper to the Shangqing texts, which contain various methods for untying them (see 1382 Shangqing jiudan shanghua taijing zhongji jing 3b–16b and 1313 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi dadong ciyi yujian wulao baojing 50b–53b; see also Robinet, Méditation taoïste, 214–19) (figs. 6–9).

The “knots” are here distributed in groups of four and located in the three main sections of the body: the head, the thorax, and the abdomen. The disciple invokes the Lord Emperor (dijun 帝君) and twenty-seven other gods, in three groups of nine. The knots are untied as a result of the solemn decision of this assembly.

This text and the two preceding ones correspond to number 18 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

FIGURE 7. Deities of the Twenty-four Knots (1384 7a–b). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/1365)

FIGURE 8. Meditating when reclining (1384 13b). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/1365)

FIGURE 9. The transmission of the method (1384 14a–b). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/1365)

Dongzhen shangqing kaitian santu qixing yidu jing

洞真上清開天三圖七星移度經

2 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1317 (fasc. 1027)

“Scripture on Dipper Transfer with Three Limits for Opening Heaven.” The Three Limits (santu) or Celestial Diagrams (tiantu 天圖) correspond to the Three Celestial Passes (san tianguan 三天關; 1.1a) that the adept must open. The seven stars (qixing) mentioned in the title are those of the Dipper. Their intercession enables the adept to have his or her name inscribed on the register of life. The term yidu (transfer) designates at the same time the rotation of the stars that transport the adept to the skies and his transfer from the register of death to the register of life.

This text is a Shangqing apocryphal work probably dating from the end of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth century. It is a replica of 1366 Shangqing tianguan santu jing, the title by which it is ordinarily cited.

However, our work includes a first part (1a–8a) that is missing from 1366 Santu jing and seems to have been borrowed from 1315 Dongzhen shangqing qingyao zishu jinggen zhongjing 2.18b–23b (anthologies quote this passage under the title of that text). Moreover, the Huoluo qiyan 豁落七元 charms, which are missing in 1366 Santu jing appear here on page 3a. The division of the text into two juan, which occurs in the middle of an exercise, is awkward and contradicts the indication of the text itself that it comprises only one juan (2.18a).

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing tianguan santu jing 上清天關三圖經

32 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1366 (fasc. 1040)

“Three Limits Scripture on the Passes of Heaven.” The Passes of Heaven (tianguan) are “the gates of life of the Nine Heavens” in the southeastern regions (see 1317 Dongzhen shangqing kaitian santu qixing yidu jing 1.1a). There are three gates, and they are also called tiantu (Heavenly Diagrams or Limits), hence the expression santu (the Three Limits).

The present text, which is duplicated in the preceding entry, 1317 Yidu jing, belongs to the Shangqing legacy but is probably an ancient apocryphal work of that school. The title is listed among the original works (see, for instance, 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 5b; 1016 Zhen’gao 9.5b), but the quotations of the work in the Zhen’gao do not conform to the present text. TAO HONGJING, in a commentary to the relevant passage, states that the work has not yet “come out into the world.” The quotations in WSBY and SDZN, however, do correspond. In consequence, the present text must date, at the latest, from the end of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth century.

Our text must have been altered, as it is disorganized and refers to two juan (see 9b), whereas only a single juan remains. The fu of the Huoluo qiyan 豁落七元, referred to on 9b, are lacking.

The methods described are all copied from those of the original Shangqing scriptures, except perhaps the lamp ritual, which seems to be inspired by the practice of the Heavenly Masters and borrows its terminology, although the names of the gods of the planets show slightly variant readings. The type of colophon we have here, stating that the work was transmitted to the two Shangqing patrons, Lord Wang 王君 and Lady WEI [HUACUN], is also found in other apocrypha.

The scripture begins with a technique for obtaining salvation through the intercession and mediation of the gods of the stars of the Dipper (1a–10b and 12b–13b). This method “opens the Passes of Heaven” and is similar to that given in 1377 Jiuzhen zhongjing 4b–11a. Then follows a paragraph devoted to the names of the Courts of the Inferno. To recite these names results in the closing of the Gates of Death (10b–12b). This practice and the preceding one are complementary. The same names for these courts are given in Zhen'gao 15.1a–b. On pages 14a–22b there is a rite of penitence (wuli 五離) entailing the intercession of the planets. This rite is close to that of the wutong 五通 in 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 20a–25b.

The lamp ritual (22b–26a), inspired by the Heavenly Masters tradition, invokes the adept's star of destiny (benming 本命), the star of the current year, and Taisui 太歲, the counterrotating invisible twin of Jupiter. Such a stellar triad is unknown in the original Shangqing texts.

Our work terminates with the Vows of Immortality (xianyuan 仙願, 26a–31a), inspired by the ritual of Xuanmu bajian 玄母八間 in 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing (17a–end). This text and the preceding correspond to number 19 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing jiudan shanghua taijing zhongji jing 上清九丹上化胎精中記經

26 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1382 (fasc. 1043)

“The Embryonic Essence From Superior Transmutation of the Ninefold Elixir.”

It is achieved through the ninefold union of the qi of the Nine Primordial Heavens with the Embryonic Essence (taijing), and through their coagulation inside the Gate of Destiny (mingmen 命門; 2b–3a). These Nine Transmutations (jiuzhuan 九轉) form the human body at the time when, during nine months, the qi of the Nine Heavens inspire life in the fetus. The Embryonic Essence means either the essence that unites with the qi in order to create the fetus (3a), or the qi that transform themselves first into essence, then into cinnabar, and finally into a fetus (16b).

The present text is part of the original Shangqing revelations. Its contents agree with the numerous quotations in WSBY. The entire work is devoted to the process of regeneration from the embryonic state thanks to assistance from the Primordial Nine Heavens. This scripture concerns the realization, in one's mind, of the divine origin of human life, which is the Fundamental Truth (benzhen 本真; see 2b, 16b).

The work begins with an introduction (1a–3b) on the general principles of the origin of human beings. The text is then divided into two main parts.

The first part (3b–16b) concerns a method “to untie the knots of the embryo” (jie baozhong shier jie 解胞中十二節). The theory of the knots, which are the inborn principles of death, is more or less the same as in 1330 Dongzhen Taiyi dijun taidan yinshu dongzhen xuanjing, but the method used here is different. The untying is done by the Original Father, the Mysterious Mother, the Kings of the Nine Primordial Heavens, and the Twenty-four Effulgences (jing 景) of the body. Meditating on these figures must be practiced three times a day—at sunrise, noon, and sunset—for the three parts of the body: upper, middle, and lower.

The second part (16b–26b) describes a method for reconstituting the process of gestation from the Nine Heavenly Qi, and thus creating a divine body. In order to achieve this, the disciple summons the Kings of the Nine Primordial Heavens, one by one, and installs them in his own body. Then he achieves the union, in his heart (the central organ), of the Original Father and the Mysterious Mother, the former coming down from the Palace of the Brain (niwan 泥丸), the latter rising up from the Gate of Destiny (mingmen 命門). Of all early Shangqing scriptures, the present text is the one that most clearly marks the first development in the direction of Inner Alchemy.

In YJQQ 29.4a–17b, there is an abstract of the first part of the present text, while the second part is quoted in extenso. A slightly abridged version of our text is given in 408 Shangqing taijing ji jiejie xingshi jue. The invocations in this work have been adopted in certain rituals (for instance in 1221 Shangqing lingbao dafa 2.11b).

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing taijing ji jiejie xingshi jue 上清胎精記解結行事訣

14 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

408 (fasc. 191)

“Formula for the Practice of Untying the Knots from the Records of Embryonic Essence.” This work is similar to 1382 Shangqing jiudan shanghua taijing zhongji jing, of which it reproduces the essential passages (pages 1a–12b, 12b–13a, and 13b–14 in our text correspond to pages 3a–15b, 22a–b, and 26a in 1382 Taijing zhongji jing). This text and the preceding one correspond to number 20 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Taishang jiuchi banfu wudi neizhen jing 太上九赤班符五帝內真經

32 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1329 (fasc. 1029)

“The Nine Crimson Speckled Talismans of the Five Emperors’ Inward Contemplation.” The expression jiuchi banfu (Nine Crimson Speckled Talismans) refers to the qi of the Nine Original Ones (here: the Emperors of the Five Directions and those of the Four Seas). The second part of the title probably has a double meaning: it concerns not only the “Five Emperors who inwardly establish” (read zhen 鎮 for 真) the spirits in their dwellings (as they establish the nature of things), but also the “interior truth of the Five Emperors”—an allusion to the inward contemplation (neisi 內思) of the true form (zhenxing 真形) of the deities concerned (2b, 6a, 25b, etc.).

The present text belongs to the original Shangqing revelation. Its title is mentioned by a few works originating from this revelation (e.g., 1016 Zhen’gao 5.3a). Its contents tally with the quotations in WSBY.

The work is dedicated to the terrestrial divinities, that is, those of the Five Directions, the Five Sacred Peaks, and the Four Seas. It begins with an exercise (2b–6a) that teaches the adept how to interpret colored visions during meditation—appearances of celestial guides or demoniac emanations—and how to interpret the true form of deities. Similar exercises are found in other Shangqing texts (e.g., 354 Shangqing sanyuan yujian sanyuan bujing and 1393 Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiuling taimiao guishan xuanlu).

The two other exercises (6a–25b and 25b–31a) are complementary. They belong to the numerous Shangqing practices for obtaining both the inscription of the adept’s name in the registers of life and its removal from the registers of death. Here, the life registers are held by the Emperors of the Five Directions and the Lords of the Sacred Peaks. They are also related to the planets and to specific organs of the body. The registers of death are held by the Emperors of the Seas. The exercises group together visual meditation, the use of talismans, and invocations.

The talismans confer on the adept the power to secure the mountains and govern the seas. However, the names of the Emperors of the Five Directions are not those that the Shangqing texts attribute to them. They are found again in a commentary to 87 Yuanshi wuliang duren shangpin miaojing 2.62a–b, citing a “Shangqing zhenren 上清真人.”

The present text corresponds to number 21 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang shenhu yinwen 洞真太上神虎隱文

7 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1334 (fasc. 1031)

“Secret Scripture of the Divine Tiger.” This text is said to have been revealed to YANG XI in A.D. 365 (see 1016 Zhen’gao 1.12a). It is also known as the Scripture of the Wisdom That Annihilates Demons (Zhibui xiaomo jing 智慧消魔經 [or miemo jing 滅魔經]) and as the Secret Scripture of the Eight Methods (Bashu yinwen 八術隱文; see this title on 7b and the quotations in 412 Shangqing pei fuwen qingquan jue 2b and 413 Shangqing pei fuwen boquan jue 4b). The present text corresponds to the comments in 1016 Zhen’gao 3.16a–b and 17.1b.

The scripture is essentially composed of two apotropaic hymns, chanted by Shangqing deities in a jubilant celestial atmosphere. The first hymn, entitled “Huishen zhi shi 揮神之詩” (Shaking the [Divine] Spirits), is intended to drive away (evil) spirits (1a–3b). The second hymn, “Jinzen zhi shi 金真之詩” (Song of the Golden Zhenren; 5b–7a), is a form of Pacing the Void (buxu 步虛). The first stanzas of each of these hymns are modeled on those of Dadong zhenjing (compare 1a–b and 6b with 6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing 2.12a–b, 14b and 9b). A colophon (7b) mentions a further hymn, revealed by the Celestial Maiden of the Nine Flowerings (Jiuhua Anfei 九花安妃; the same maiden who appeared to YANG XI). This song, says the text, should have been recorded in a chapter of Taishang bashu zhibui miemo shenhu yin wen 太上八術智慧滅魔神虎隱文, a title corresponding to 1344 Dongzhen taishang shuo zhibui xiaomo zhenjing. The second juan of the latter indeed corresponds, with some additions, to the present text. The poem in question, however, is lacking.

This present text corresponds to number 22 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing gaoshang yuchen fengtai qusu shangjing

上清高上玉晨鳳臺素上經

23 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1372 (fasc. 1041)

“Superior Scripture on the Emanations from the Labyrinth of Phoenix Terrace.” This scripture was created out of the cosmic qi of the Phoenix Terrace (fengtai) of Nine Meanderings (jiuqu 九曲) in the Heavens, energies that pervade the eight directions of space, in correspondence with the Eight Purities (basu 八素; see 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing). The present work is placed under the aegis of Gaoshang yuchen and is part of the original Shangqing revelations, as stated in other books of the Shangqing tradition (such as 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 5a, 1331 Dongzhen shangqing shenzhou qizhuan qibian wutian jing 2.7b, 1016 Zhen'gao 5.3b). But the work appears to be incomplete (compare, e.g., 412 Shangqing pei fuwen wen qingquan jue 2b, 413 Shangqing pei fuwen wen baiquan jue 7a, 414 Shangqing pei fuwen jiangquan jue 1a, 415 Shangqing pei fuwen wen heiquan jue 1a and 416 Shangqing pei fuwen wen huangquan jue 4b).

The text is composed of hymns and fu. The hymns (2b–7b) are linked to the Five Emperors of the Five Directions. They are songs of heavenly bliss and of compassion for the sufferings of humanity. They are composed of sacred sounds that ward off the calamities of the impending apocalypse, and they use the distinctive terminology of this type of Shangqing literature.

A number of fu correspond to the Secret Fu of the Five Phases (wuxing bifu 五行秘符; 15b–end), which are linked to the five pairs of Heavenly Stems. This material may have originally formed a separate work (compare 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 5b and 1016 Zhen'gao 5.3a).

The hymns are also found in 608 Shangqing zhuzhen zhangsong 2b–8b. YJQQ 51.7b–11a quotes the last part of our text (15b–21b). 1457 Gaoshang yuchen youle zhang is formed entirely from the present work, from which it has taken all the hymns.

This scripture should not be confused with 1348 Dongzhen taishang danjing daoqing jing, although the latter has been quoted under the same title. One of the titles of 1348 Daoqing jing is Qusu jueci 曲素訣辭 (1a), which is very close to that of the present work.

Isabelle Robinet

Gaoshang yuchen youle zhang 高上玉宸憂樂章

5 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1457 (fasc. 1064)

“Hymn of Joy and Sorrow of the Most High Yuchen.” As indicated by a colophon, these pages are an excerpt of 1372 Shangqing gaoshang yuchen fengtai qusu shangjing, and contain the hymns of the latter work.

This text and the preceding one correspond to number 23 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang feixing yujing jiuzhen shengxuan shangji

洞真太上飛行羽經九真昇玄上記

13 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1351 (fasc. 1033)

“Record on Wings for Flying on High.” This text expounds the method that enables the adept to “rise up to Mystery” thanks to the Nine True Ones, that is, the nine gods of the Dipper (Ursa Major). The subtitle, Huiyuan jiudao 迴元九道, refers to the same gods (the term huiyuan designates the Revolving Principles [see YJQQ 8.20a–b] as well as the Return to the Origin [see 3a in the present text]).

This work is quoted in WSBY, but the majority of the quotations, as well as those from other sources (such as SDZN, 1132 Shangqing dao leishi xiang and others) come from 428 Taishang feixing jiuchen yujing. The latter’s subtitle is identical with that of the present work (see 83 Boyu heihe lingfei yufu). All these texts appear to have originally belonged to the same work, the Beiyu heihe feixing yujing that corresponds to number 24 in the list of canonical Shangqing writings, the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu. However, the only early quotations of our text are found in WSBY. These quotations, moreover, concern only the rules of transmission and may well have come from another source. In other words, the present work is nowhere authenticated. The possibility that this is an apocryphal text that borrowed the title of a scripture of the Shangqing corpus can therefore not be excluded.

This “Record” describes a variant exercise of sanyi wudou 三一五斗 (see 60 Yuanshi tianzun shuo xuanwei miao jing), which consists in meditating on the three major gods of the stars in the Dipper, whom the adept invokes and induces to descend into his Three Cinnabar Fields (the names these gods receive here are unknown in the authentic Shangqing scriptures).

The text also shows evidence of interpolated glosses (1b6–2a2 comes from 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 5a and 5b–6b). It also has detailed prescriptions concerning other exercises as well as comments on other Shangqing scriptures (compare “the oral formula” of 1376 Shangqing taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing 11a–13a).

The entire text is incorporated into 324 Shangqing wuchang biantong wanhua yuming jing 34b–end. Some fragments are quoted in YJQQ 25.14a–15b (corresponding to 8b–9b) and 52.4b–8a (corresponding to 4a–5a, 6b–9b).

Isabelle Robinet

Taishang feixing jiuchen yujing 太上飛行九晨玉經

34 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

428 (fasc. 195)

“Jade Scripture of the Flight to the Nine Stars.” The stars referred to in the title are those of the Dipper, plus the two invisible stars Fu 輔 and Bi 弼 (also called Kongchang 空常) on either side of the constellation. The present text is quoted in WSBY and SDZN under the title [Huiyuan jiudao] Feixing yujing [迴元九道] 飛行羽經 (compare 1351 Dongzhen taishang feixing yujing jiuzhen shengxuan shangji). It bears the subtitle Jinjian neiben 金簡內文 (Esoteric Scripture on Golden Tablets).

Feixing yujing is a title belonging to the Shangqing corpus (cf., for example, 1016 Zhen'gao 5.4b and 442 Shangqing housheng daojun lieji 2a). Two parts of the present text must be distinguished: the first part (up to 25b) actually represents the Feixing yujing. The process of pacing the Dipper, which is expounded here, begins with a dance on invisible stars surrounding the Dipper. These stars are the hun 魂 and po 魄 souls inhabited by female deities. A description of the Dipper stars and of the deities who preside over them follows.

The second part (25b–end) is a shortened and slightly modified version of 1316 Dongzhen shangqing taiwei dijun bu tiangang fei diji jinjian yuzi shangjing 7b–18b (q.v.). This second part is never quoted by sixth and seventh-century anthologies under the present title. It is probably this part that the subtitle of our text refers to. Indeed, the title Jinjian neiben is equivalent to Jinjian yuzi 金簡玉字. This last part therefore derives from 1316 Jinjian yuzi and was grafted onto the present text at a much later date.

The first part is linked to the Kongchang method (cf. 875 Taishang laojun da cunsi tu zhujue and 324 Shangqing wuchang biantong wanhua yuming jing) and to the Longfei chisu 龍飛尺素 formula (see 1326 Dongzhen shangqing longfei jiudao chisu yinjue). The entire text is quoted in YJQQ 20.

Isabelle Robinet

Boyu heihe lingfei yufu 白羽黑翮靈飛玉符

6 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

83 (fasc. 37)

“Jade Fu for the White Feathered, Black-Winged Spirits Taking Flight.” This text owes its title to the white and black phoenixes under whose aegis it is placed (2b, 6b). In later quotations, one sometimes finds longfei 龍飛 (dragons taking flight) instead of lingfei. The text dates to the Shangqing revelation (see 1016 Zhen'gao 5.4b). One of the work's alternative titles is Feixing yujing shengxuan shangji 飛行羽經昇玄上記 (see 1326 Dongzhen shangqing longfei jiudao chisu yinjue 6a). The latter text is connected with 428 Taishang feixing jiuchen yujing, a scripture that, according to tradition, was conveyed of the world by the phoenix at the same time.

Our text is quoted in 1132 Shangqing dao leishi xiang (1–5b) under its present title. 414 Shangqing pei fuwen jiangquan jue and 415 Shangqing pei fuwen heiquan jue, as well as 413 Shangqing pei fuwen boquan jue and 416 Shangqing pei fuwen huangquan jue, also quote it under the title Huiyuan jiudao feixing yujing (see 428 Taishang feixing jiuchen yujing). The Five Fu—one for each direction—that provide the main material for this work were used to perform the ritual of pacing the Dipper (feibu shengxuan 飛步昇玄), as expounded in 428 Jiuchen yujing.

Our text is also found in its entirety in 1326 Dongzhen shangqing longfei jiudao chisu yinjue 6a–fin and in 324 Shangqing wuchang biantong wanhua yuming jing 28b–34a.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen shangqing longfei jiudao chisu yinjue 洞真上清龍飛九道赤素隱訣

11 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1326 (fasc. 1028)

“Secret Formula [of Talismans] on Crimson Silk of the Nine Ways of the Dragon's Flight.” This work owes its name to the talismans included in the text—these are to be written on strips of red silk three feet long—as well as to its connection with the method of pacing the nine stars of the Dipper (the Nine Ways) in 428 Taishang feixing jiuchen yujing. It pertains to the Shangqing revelation.

The work comprises two parts. The first bears the title of 83 Boyu heihe lingfei yufu 白羽黑翮靈飛玉符. Here are invoked the Lads and Maidens of the Dipper stars, who were created through the qi (breaths) exhaled by the Ladies of the Black Stars of the Dipper (the names of their palaces correspond to those in 428 Taishang feixing jiuchen yujing). We also find the Lads and Jade Maidens from the palaces on the planets. Their names are those given in 324 Shangqing wuchang biantong wanhua yuming jing 17b–18b, a text related to the present work. This first part is concerned with the method of pacing the stars Kongchang 空常 (2a–b; cf. 876 Taishang wuxing qi yuan kongchang jue). It is entirely reproduced in 324 Yuming jing 24a–28b. The second part has been duplicated in 83 Lingfei yufu (q.v.).

Isabelle Robinet

Taishang wuxing qi yuan kongchang jue 太上五星七元空常訣

23 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

876 (fasc. 581)

“Formula of the Five Stars [i.e., planets], the Seven Original Ones [i.e., the stars of the Dipper], and of the Kongchang [i.e., the invisible stars of the Dipper].” On the Kongchang, see 324 Shangqing wuchang biantong wanhua yuming jing. The text is composed of a variety of elements assembled in great disorder. Many passages are given twice, others are truncated (see 15b, where the invocation breaks off in the middle); some fragments and texts are interpolated, as in a ritual (see the gloss on 17a). All these texts concern the stars, with the exception of some passages borrowed from 1016 Zhen’gao 9.2a–b concerning the twenty-four spirits of the body (see 3b–4a, 8a and 19a–b).

The texts the present work draws on are 637 Taishang feibu wuxing jing, 405 Shangqing zijing jun huangchu ziling daojun dongfang shangjing, 1377 Shangqing taishang jiu zhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue, 140 Shangqing wozhong jue, 1316 Dongzhen shangqing Taiwei dijun bu tiangang fei diji jinjian yuzi shangjing, and Huiyuan jiudao feixing yujing (WSBY 18).

An important passage is devoted to the practice of pacing the stars called Kongchang. It is, however, incomplete (compare 324 Shangqing wuchang biantong wanhua yuming jing). The diagram of the Kongchang, which is absent from the latter, is given here (fig. 10).

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing wuchang biantong wanhua yuming jing

上清五常變通萬化鬱冥經

47 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

324 (fasc. 166)

“Airy and Mysterious Scripture on the Universal Metamorphosis and Ten Thousand Transformations of the Five Permanent Ones.” The term wuchang (Five Permanent Ones) in the title may be an error for Kongchang 空常, the name of the invisible stars of the Dipper that play a major role in the present text. The term wuchang also appears in the foreword of the text. This may, however, be an a posteriori explanation, since the prologue constitutes a later addition. 304 Maoshan zhi 9.4a mentions a Wudi yuming jing 五帝鬱冥經 where wuchang designates the Five Emperors of the cardinal points. As for the term biantong wanhua (Universal Metamorphosis and Ten Thousand Transformations), it refers to the adept’s metamorphosis, which is presided over by the stellar deities. The exercises explained in the text are related to these deities.

FIGURE 10. Choreography for the Dance of the Dipper Stars (876 5b–6a).

Yuming jing appears to mean “Airy and Mysterious Scripture,” but the expression may well have a technical signification.

The text is a collection of exercises, all of which involve stellar deities. The compilation is probably of a date later than the Shangqing revelation, for the foreword testifies to a more metaphysical approach than is usual for that corpus.

The Kongchang practice (2b–3a and 20b–24a) is more complete here than in 876 Taishang wuxing qi yuan kongchang jue 14b–15b, 17b–21b. The term Kongchang is formed by the contraction of the names of the spirits of the invisible stars Fu 輔 and Bi 弼 of the Dipper. These two spirits are the souls of Heaven and Earth. They gave their names to a network of twenty-five points located around the Dipper. These points are placed in correspondence, five by five, with the planets. In the method of the Kongchang stars the adept starts by pacing this network (bugang 步綱; p.2b) and then continues pacing the planets before arriving at the Dipper. The names of the Lords and Ladies of the Dipper are given on 13a–14a. They correspond to those found in other Shangqing texts.

Pages 19b–20b present a technique of meditation and visualization of stellar deities. These transform themselves into a child named the Impermanent (Wuchang 無常).

Pages 24a–28b contain a method entitled Longfei jiudao chisu yinjue, which corresponds to 1326 Dongzhen shangqing longfei jiudao chisu yinjue 1a–6a, while 28b–34a corresponds to the whole text of 83 Boyu heihe lingfei yufu. The end of our text corresponds to all of 1351 Dongzhen taishang feixing yujing jiuzhen shengxuan shangji.

This text and the five preceding ones correspond to number 24 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing qionggong lingfei liujia zuoyou shangfu

上清瓊宮靈飛六甲左右上符

23 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

84 (fasc. 37)

“Six-Jia Talismans for Summoning the Lingfei [Maidens] of the Qionggong Palace.” The maidens are in charge of the days marked with the cyclical signs beginning with jia. This scripture is authenticated by a quotation in 1016 Zhen’gao 14.15a–16a (our text 22a–23a). It corresponds—except for a few variants—to 1391 Shangqing qionggong lingfei liujia lu. However, neither of the two texts is complete. Some quotations referring to these titles in WSBY and TPYL cannot be traced.

Originally, the Liujia scripture was linked to the Suzou danfu 素奏丹符 (cf. Zhengao 5.4b and WSBY 43.14a), under which title it is sometimes quoted. BPZ 19.307 mentions the six jia talismans, and these must, therefore, have had a history before their incorporation into the Shangqing corpus (Robinet, La révélation du Shangqing, 1:12–13, 24–25). Tradition says that these talismans were connected to the Scripture of the True Form of the Ten Regions (shizhou zhenxing 十洲真形). Our text mentions some persons living under the Zhou, Han, and Wei periods to whom the talismans were purportedly transmitted. According to TAO HONGJING’s glosses on the Zhen’gao (13.2a and 20.7b–8a), XU MI’s brother XU MAI once received these talismans from the libationer Li Dong 李東. In reality, the talismans may well have existed in many versions, one of them belonging to the Way of the Heavenly Master (see 1210 Zhengyi sawen shilu zhaoyi 16b–17a). Therefore our text must be a specific Shangqing version.

FIGURE 11. The Jade Maiden of the jiashen period, with a description of her attire (84 9a).

Missing from this incomplete version are the talismans and descriptions of the Five Emperors of the cardinal points in WSBY 92.19a–20b—as well as in 412 Shangqing pei fuwen qingquan jue and 416 Shangqing pei fuwen huangquan jue—titled “Suzou danfu 素奏丹符” or “Lingfei liujia jing 靈飛六甲經”. These talismans and descriptions are also present in the hymns of 611 Dongxuan lingbao liujia yunü shanggong gezhang.

The text contains spells (2a–3b) addressed to the Jade Maidens that should be pronounced on the jia days before as well as after absorbing the fu (reproduced on pages 3b–20b) of the sexagesimal cycle. These talismans are classified into six groups, each linked to one of the six Celestial Palaces to which the Jade Maidens belong. Each of these groups has an image of the Jade Maiden who is in charge of the corresponding palace (see fig. 11).

The text ends with two major talismans that are the progenitors (zong 宗) of the sixty others.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing qionggong lingfei liujia lu 上清瓊宮靈飛六甲錄

23 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1391 (fasc. 1046)

“Six-Jia Register for Summoning the Lingfei [Maidens] of the Qionggong Palace.” This text duplicates 84 Shangqing qionggong lingfei liujia zuoyou shangfu. A Lingfei liujia lu is mentioned in 1239 Zhengyi xiuzhen lüeyi 18a among the registers (lu) of the Shangqing tradition. The title of our text is also given in the Dongzhi yiwen lue (VDL 77).

Isabelle Robinet

Dongxuan lingbao liujia yunü shanggong gezhang

洞玄靈寶六甲玉女上宮歌章

4 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

611 (fasc. 334)

“Hymns of the Jade Maidens of the Six Jia-Periods in the Palaces on High.” The reference in the title to the Dongxuan Lingbao canon is spurious. The present work belongs to the Shangqing corpus and is linked to the fu of the liujia 六甲 (see 84 Shangqing qionggong lingfei liujia zuoyou shangfu). This link can be deduced from the fact that the six hymns correspond exactly to the fu given in 84 Zuoyou shangfu. The names of the Jade Maidens are also the same (compare this text 1a3, 1b4, and 3a4 with 84 Zuoyou shangfu 6b, 14b, etc.). Moreover, the style and terminology of the present work are purely Shangqing; there is no discernible trace of Lingbao influence.

The hymns were to be sung in the meditation room, on jia days, in conjunction with the absorption of the fu. This text and the two preceding ones correspond to number 25 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Taishang Yupei Jindang taiji jinshu shangjing 太上玉佩金璫太極金書上經
26 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

56 (fasc. 30)

“Superior Scripture Golden Writ of the Supreme Pole [in Honor] of Jade Pendant and Gold Ring.” The title features the names of Jade Pendant (Yupei) and Gold Ring (Jindang), the two main deities to whom the text is devoted. It belongs to the Shangqing scriptures, but according to 1016 Zhen’gao 14.a–b and 13.12a, it may have existed previously and been linked to the Shijing jinguang fu 石精金光符 which is at the origin of the Scripture of the Jewel-Sword (Baojian jing 寶劍經). The name Yupei Jindang jing is also linked to that of Master Zhang of Handan 邯鄲張先生, who produced the method of the Three Ones and Five Bushels (wudou sanyi 五斗三一; see Zhen’gao 10.6a–b). Our text presents itself as a preparatory practice for the absorption of astral emanations. It is typical of the Shangqing attitude to consider the ancient scriptures it adopted as inferior.

The present text, however, is an original Shangqing version that was rewritten during the revelation. Its style and terminology agree with those of the other scriptures of this school. We find, nevertheless, a certain number of physiological elements that are peculiar to this text: the Three Palaces of the median and inferior parts of the body (6b–9b) as well as the names of the deities that inhabit them do not occur in any other Shangqing text.

Except for the end of the text (beginning 23b), relating to the Mingtang xuanzhen 明堂玄真 practice, all the quotations of the text found in anthologies (WSBY, SDZN) agree. This Mingtang xuanzhen practice is peculiar to the Yupei Jindang jing. It belongs to the biography of Maojun 茅君 (see 424 Shangqing mingtang yuanzhen jingjue). This appendix might have been added later. It is never quoted under the title of Yupei Jindang jing.

Yupei and Jindang are the hun 魂 and po 魄 souls of the Primordial Nine Heavens. They incarnate the Green Yang and the White Yin and are deities of imperial rank who dwell in the sun and the moon. The practices are expounded in two consecutive parts: one concerning Yupei, the other Jindang. The adept recites invocations, complemented by the use of charms (which represent the esoteric names of the essence of the Shangqing Primordial Nine Heavens) and the visualization of the Nine Zhenren, derived from the Three Principles (sanyuan 三元) and dwelling in the Nine Palaces of the body (three for each of the three parts of the body centered on the Three Cinnabar Fields). The present text thus connects the practices of absorption of solar and lunar emanations with those of the Three Ones (the Three Original Principles). This text corresponds to number 26 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiuling taimiao

Guishan xuanlu 上清元始變化寶真上經九靈太妙龜山玄籙

3 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1393 (fasc. 1047–1048)

“Mount Turtle Register of the Nine Spirits Pertaining to the Superior Scripture of Transformation of Primordial Beginning.” Mount Turtle, after which the present register (lu) is named, is situated east of Kunlun. It is the residence of the Queen Mother of the West (Xi wang mu 西王母). She is the patron deity of the present text. Nine Spirits (jiuling) is the name of her palace (see YJQQ 8.14a). This is the Register of Transformations (bianhua 變化) of Primordial Beginning (or of Incipient Life, [shisheng 始生], which is here the equivalent of the Primordial Qi [yuanqi 元氣]), which manifests itself through the aspects of seventy-four gods (1.9a).

The quotations in the encyclopedias WSBY and SDZN correspond to the texts of juan 1 and 3. Juan 2 is different from the others and corresponds in fact to 1394 Shangqing gaoshang Guishan xuanlu, which has been inserted here. The two original juan follow each other in a perfectly homogeneous way.

The text in talismanic characters (1.4a–8b) is a concretion of the purple qi that constitutes the body of Xi wang mu. This text must be copied by the adept, who then recites it while absorbing this qi, after it has been visualized, as coming down from the stars of the Dipper and surrounding the constellations of the zodiac. The Queen Mother is presented here as an astral and celestial deity.

The remainder of the text, which includes juan 3, gives a list of the seventy-four deities. Their different forms correspond to signs (hao 號), that is, manifestations of the Primordial Beginning. These gods adopt different forms that change with the seasons; they have human forms, animal forms, or appear as lights. These transformations are in keeping with the saying of Laozi (chapter 1): “the Tao has no permanent name.” The disciple has to learn, with the help of this register, to see these forms and to reduce them to their true form (zhenxing 真形).

This register gives us the most complete available list of the celestial pantheon of the seventy-four gods of the Shangqing school. They were also recorded, so it seems, in the now lost Bianhua qishisi fangjing 變化七十四方經, of which a part is used in the Dadong jing 大洞經, as well as in 1331 Dongzhen shangqing shenzhou qijuan qibian wutian jing.

The first part of our text (1.1a–55a) is also found in 1436 Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing (see the following article).

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing 上清元始變化寶真上經

53 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1436 (fasc. 1059)

“Superior Scripture of Transformation of Primordial Beginning.” This text is a duplicate of 1393 Shangqing yuanshi bianhua baozhen shangjing jiuling taimiao Guishan xuanlu 1.1a–55a. Together they correspond to number 27 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing

上清玉帝七聖玄紀迴天九霄經

32 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1379 (fasc. 1043)

“Scripture of the Return to the Nine Highest Heavens, Mystical Records of the Seven Saints of the Jade Emperor of Utmost Purity.” The word ji 紀, here translated as “records,” refers to the lists on which the disciple must inscribe his or her name in order to rise up to the heavens.

Although this scripture belongs to the original Shangqing corpus, a quotation by TAO HONGJING in 1016 Zhen'gao 14.19a cannot be found in the present version. The contents of the work as a whole correspond in particular to 442 Shangqing housheng daojun lieji. Our text is quoted abundantly in WSBY.

After a long prologue (1a–5b) in which the formation of the scripture in the heavens is described, there is a method for visual meditation for the purpose of having one's name inscribed on the heavenly records on the days when the Five Emperors update them (5b–12b).

Next there are seven hymns in seven-character verses to the glory of the seven patrons of the scripture (12b–17b), followed by talismanic writs that open the gates of the Shangqing paradises (17b–19b).

At the end there is an enumeration of the Seven Wounds (qishang 七傷)—lewdness, impurity, and so on—that impair one's Marks of Immortality, the corporeal characteristics of the saints (xianxiang 仙相; 29b–32b).

The names of the paradises, the characteristics of the records, and the Marks of Immortality correspond exactly to the terms found in 442 Housheng daojun lieji.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing qisheng xuanji jing 上清七聖玄紀經

3 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1361 (fasc. 1039)

“Mystical Records of the Seven Saints of the Utmost Purity.” This is a fragment from the original version of 1379 Shangqing yudi qisheng xuanji huitian jiuxiao jing. This text is missing from the extant version of that book. Together these two texts correspond to number 28 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu. The fragment (12b–16a) refers to the hymns in 1379 Jiuxiao jing.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing taishang huangsu sishisi fang jing 上清太上黃素四十四方經

21 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1380 (fasc. 1043)

“Scripture of the Forty-four Methods on Yellow Silk.” This is a code of rules concerning the transmission and the practice of a group of texts or methods related to the Dadong zhenjing 大洞真經. These practices are called the Rites of the Supreme One (Taiyi zhi shi 太一之事). Many of these practices are found in 1330 Dongzhen Taiyi dijun taidan yinshu dongzhen xuanjing and in 1313 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi dadong ciyi yujian wulao baojing. The present work can, on the whole, be considered as belonging to a current of thought related to the “Formula of the Dadong zhenjing.”

Notwithstanding the fact that a work under the present title is mentioned in 1016 Zhen'gao 5.2a, the text under consideration either must be later than the original Shangqing revelation, or it has been modified. Terms like Ritual Master of the Three Caverns (sandong fashi 三洞法師) or of the Great Cavern (dadong fashi 大洞法師) are later than the Lingbao revelation.

The aim of this work was to incorporate 1313 Wulao baojing into the Shangqing scriptural corpus and to develop and systematize the ritual rules that are outlined in 1016 Zhen'gao and in the above-mentioned 1330 Dongzhen xuanjing and 1313 Wulao baojing, in order to devise an ecclesiastical hierarchy of sorts. This development coincided with the beginning of the ritualization and institutionalization of the Shangqing tradition, which began almost immediately after the revelation of the texts of this school. Juan 46 of YJQQ is entirely composed of excerpts from the present work, which corresponds to number 29 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Gaoshang taixiao langshu qiongwen dizhang jing 高上太霄琅書瓊文帝章經
29 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

55 (fasc. 30)

“Scripture of the Emperor’s Stanzas in Precious Writing, Jewel Book of the High Heavens.” This work is a Shangqing apocryphal text. It declares that it belongs to the method of the whirling wind (huifeng 徊風) and to 1313 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi ciyi yujian wulao baojing, which shows a link with the Formula of the Dadong zhenjing. Quotations found in the WSBY (see Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 225–26) confirm this link. The text is essentially composed of nine hymns and talismanic characters. Hymns are addressed to the Kings of the Nine Shangqing Primordial Heavens. They are sung on the days when the envoys of these kings perform their inspection tour on Earth. The talismanic characters are formed by the essence of the Nine Heavens. These characters should be engraved on jujube kernels (zaoxin 棗心; 26b) and carried to summon the officers of the Five Peaks who drive away malefic creatures.

Isabelle Robinet

Taixiao langshu qiongwen dizhang jue 太霄琅書瓊文帝章訣

10 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

129 (fasc. 59)

“Formula of the Emperor’s Stanzas in Precious Writing, Jewel Book of the High Heavens.” This text is identical to juan five of 1352 Dongzhen taishang taixiao langshu, which contains prescriptions for the copying of sacred scriptures and rules pertaining to the gifts to be offered by the disciple at the time of the transmission of the scriptures, as well as various other ritual prescriptions. This text and the preceding one correspond to number 30 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing gaoshang miemo dongjing jinyuan yuqing yinshu jing

上清高上滅魔洞景金元玉清隱書經

11 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1357 (fasc. 1038)

“Secret Writings of the Yuqing Heaven, from the Jinxuan [read xuan 玄 for yuan 元] Palace of Profound Radiance, which Annihilates Demons.” This is an early Shangqing apocryphal text, composed of hymns that are aimed at expelling demons and healing illness. Its recitation is prescribed after practicing the Formula of the Dadong zhenjing, in alternation with the recitation of 1356 Shangqing gaoshang miemo yudi shen- hui yuqing yinshu. These hymns are, in places, similar to those of 1358 Shangqing gaoshang jinyuan yuzhang yuqing yinshu jing.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ishii Masako, “Gyosei insho kō.”

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing gaoshang miemo yudi shenhui yuqing yinshu

上清高上滅魔玉帝神慧玉清隱書

20 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1356 (fasc. 1038)

“Secret Writing of the Yuqing Heaven, Being the Embodiment of the Divine Wisdom of the Jade Emperor, which Annihilates Demons.” This is an apocryphal Shangqing text, associated with the Formula of the Dadong zhenjing.

The work’s aim is to divulge the names of demons as well as those of demon slayers (shaqui dubo li 殺鬼都伯吏). It presents invocations and fu used to expel evil spirits. This text is recited jointly with 1357 Shangqing gaoshang miemo dongjing jinyuan yuqing yinshu jing.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing gaoshang jinyuan yuzhang yuqing yinshu jing

上清高上金元羽章玉清隱書經

28 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1358 (fasc. 1038)

“Secret Writings of the Yuqing Heaven, Feathered Stanza from the Jinxuan [read xuan 玄 for yuan 元] Palace.” This text is closely related to 1357 Shangqing gaoshang miemo dongjing jinyuan yuqing yinshu jing; it contains hymns similar to those of the latter, and the quotations found in the different anthologies often confound both texts under a single reference to Yuqing yinshu. This text is also linked to the Formula of the Dadong zhenjing.

The work introduces a method that allows the adept to drive away the Demon-Kings of the Eight Directions, thanks to his or her knowledge of their names and appearances, while singing hymns to the Heavenly Lords who subdue these demons. The latter are marshalled by fu of the heavens that are governed by these Lords.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen bajing yulu chentu yinfu 洞真八景玉籙晨圖隱符

8 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1339 (fasc. 1031)

“Secret Fu from the Images of Aurora, Jade Registers of the Eight Effulgences.”

This text is one of the works associated with the Formula of the Dadong zhenjing (see 5a and 6a, and Robinet, “Le Ta-tung chen-ching,” 417) and consequently is an early Shangqing apocryphal text. The title indicates that it is affiliated to 1389 Shangqing gaosheng Taishang dadao jun dongzhen jinyuan bajing yulu, another apocryphal work. Its contents show a connection with 1358 Shangqing gaoshang jinyuan yuzhang yuqing yinshu jing, which features fu of the same structure (1a–5a) and corresponding to the same deities.

The meditation exercise described in 5b–6a is also linked to 6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing and to exercises found in 1313 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi dadong ciyi yujian wulao baojing. The passage on page 7a.1–3 is found in 1389 Shangqing gaosheng Taishang dadao jun dongzhen jinyuan bajing yulu 13b.8–10.

The final colophon indicates that under King You 幽王 of the Zhou dynasty, a certain Wang Xuandu 王玄度, alias Jingu zi 金谷子, discovered these fu and transmitted them. This kind of colophon is often found attached to Shangqing texts that are considered apocryphal.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang ziwen danzhang 洞真太上紫文丹章

5 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1335 (fasc. 1031)

“Cinnabar Scripture in Purple Characters.” The talismanic signs of this text were written in purple (4b; or green, 3b) on red silk.

The title is mentioned in 1358 Shangqing gaoshang jinyuan yuzhang yuqing yinshu jing 1b (a text from the Shangqing corpus) and in 352 Taishang dongxuan lingbao chishu yujue miaojing 2.29a (an early Lingbao scripture). The entire text is found at the end of 1356 Shangqing gaoshang miemo yudi shenhui yuqing yinshu 37b–end. This places it among the texts belonging to the Formula of the Dadong zhenjing (see Robinet, “Le Ta-tung chen-ching,” 414). The present text claims to allow the adept to receive the Yuqing yinwen 玉清隱文 (5a). Of the one hundred and twenty characters it is said to comprise, the text gives only seventy-two.

Rules have been added to these characters, to be observed by the adept who copies the characters and carries them on his person. These rules concern the transmission of the text, incantations, and visualizations.

A final colophon mentions the transmission of the text by Shangqing deities to Lord Youyang, that is, Gong Youyang 龔幼陽, Gong Zhongyang's 龔仲陽 brother. Both are Shangqing patron saints. This text and the four preceding ones correspond to number 31 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang jinpian hufu zhenwen jing 洞真太上金篇虎符真文經

6 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1336 (fasc. 1031)

“True Writ Scripture of the Tiger Talismans.” The text contains the Metal-Tiger Fu (1a–2b), also found in 1337 Dongzhen taiwei jinhu zhenfu 1a–3b, as well as the Divine Tiger Fu, also found in 1333 Dongzhen taishang shenhu yujing. The presence of a colophon by XU RONGDI suggests that this text is apocryphal.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taiwei jinhu zhenfu 洞真太微金虎真符

17 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1337 (fasc. 1031)

“True Talismans of the Metal Tiger of Greatest Subtlety, from the Dongzhen Canon.” In spite of the title, the fu and corresponding texts brought together here are probably apocryphal. Only the first pages (1a–2a) are quoted by WSBY. The work 413 Shangqing pei fuwen boquan jue 4b quotes page 1b as part of 1344 Dongzhen taishang shuo zhibui xiaomo zhenjing.

The text itself is composed of three parts: (1) the Metal-Tiger Fu of 1336 Dongzhen taishang jinpian hufu zhenwen jing; (2) the Huoluo dafu 豁落大符, consisting of seven fu for the sun, moon, and the Five Stars (i.e., planets), and five supplementary fu that resemble those of 1392 Shangqing qusu jueci lu; and (3), from 7a to the end, corresponding to 1332 Dongzhen taishang zidu yanguang shenyuan bian jing.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ishii Masako, “Kinko shinfu, Shinko gyokukyō shinfu kō.”

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing taishang huiyuan yindao chu zuiji jing

上清太上迴元隱道除罪籍經

7 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

1362 (fasc. 1039)

“Scripture of the Secret Method of the Return to the Origin [or: to the Original Ones; or: of the Turning Original Ones], for the Remission of Sins.” It contains the exercise of Return to the Origin (huiyuan 迴元), which belongs to the Shangqing legacy. It is also found in 1377 Shangqing taishang jiuzhen zhongjing jiangsheng shendan jue 4b–11a.

This text and the two preceding ones correspond to number 32 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang shenhu yujing 洞真太上神虎玉經

5 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1333 (fasc. 1031)

“Scripture of the Divine Tiger Talisman.” This talisman is often associated with the Metal-Tiger Fu. The text bears a colophon by XU RONGDI. It corresponds to its quotations found in WSBY.

The work consists of a talisman and instructions for its use, to which are added the “secret names of the Great Demons of the Nine Heavens, Jiutian mowang 九天魔王.” The text in its entirety is found in 1336 Dongzhen taishang jinpian hufu zhenwen jing and corresponds to number 33 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ishii Masako, “Kinko shinfu, Shinko gyokukyō shinfu kō.”

Isabelle Robinet

Taishang huangting neijing yujing 太上黃庭內景玉經

12 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

331 (fasc. 167)

“Precious Book of the Interior Landscape of the Yellow Court.” It has not been established that this long, didactic song in thirty-six sections, which describes the Inner World, existed before the revelations to YANG XI, but it is firmly linked to that early development of the Shangqing tradition. A fragment of a copy of the text in YANG XI’s autograph has been handed down (see Nakata Yūjirō, Chūgoku shoron shū, 83–136).

The Huangting neijing jing is an expanded version of the original Book of the Yellow Court, afterward called the “Precious Book of the Exterior Landscape of the Yellow Court” (332 Taishang huangting waijing yujing).

Ouyang Xiu 歐陽修 (1007–1072) has pointed out the particular relationship between these two versions (Jigu lu 10.2a). A systematic comparison between the two texts is found in Schipper, Concordance du Houang-t’ing ching.

The 1016 Zhen’gao 8.4a–b shows that the text was recited by XU MI himself (see Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao Chan, 201). The importance of multiple recitation as an adept’s first step on the road to perfection has been stressed in hagiography. The song was transmitted expressly for this purpose to Lady WEI HUACUN (see Nanyue Wei furen zhuan, quoted in TPYL 678.7a). It soon enjoyed a wide circulation (1344 Dongzhen taishang shuo zhihui xiaomo zhenjing 1.15b).

Divine instructions for its recitation by beginners were reproduced and copiously annotated by TAO HONGJING (421 Dongzhen yinjue 3.1a–5b).

The text has a number of variant readings in common with the annotated version in 263 Xiuzhen shishu 55–57. The present work was included in the catalogue of Shangqing scriptures of the Sandong jingmu 三洞經目 (see 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 5.2a), where it corresponds to number 34 of the Shangqing dadong zhenjing mu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gong Pengcheng, “Huangting jing lunyao”; Schipper, Concordance du Houang-t’ing ching; Yang Fucheng, “Huangting nei wai erjing kao”; Yu Wanli, “Huangting jing xinzheng.”

Kristofer Schipper

1.B.2.b Other Early Shangqing Scriptures

Taishang dongfang neijing zhu 太上洞房內經注

5 + 7 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

133 (fasc. 59)

“Hymn to the Gods of the Cave-Chamber.” The Cave-Chamber (dongfang) is a residence in the brain. A Dongfang xianjin jing 洞房先進經 is mentioned in 1016 Zhen’gao 17.16b in connection with Ji Kang 嵇康 (223–262), which could imply that a similar text existed before the Shangqing revelations. According to the same source, Sima Jizhu 司馬季主 (fl. ca. 170 B.C.) is said to have possessed a copy. The present work undoubtedly did not belong to the original Shangqing revelation, but it was later adopted by the school; the commentary by TAO HONGJING to the above-mentioned passage in Zhen'gao indicates as much. It is also mentioned in 302 Zhoushi mingtong ji 周氏冥通記, Bianzheng lun 辯正論, and elsewhere.

The preface, quoted in WSBY, is attributed to the immortal Zhou Yishan 周義山. The text borrows heavily from his biography, 303 Ziyang zhenren neizhuan.

The text of the hymn in the present version is shorter than that in 1313 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi dadong ciyi yujian wulao baojing 24a–27a. A single verse in 4a, and the two final verses, are not found in 1313 Wulao baojing. All quotations of the hymn in encyclopedias are from 1313 Wulao baojing. Thus, the present version may be an abridgment.

At the end of the text, two short hymns are included from a Zhengyi Xuandu lii 正一玄都律 (see 7a). They can still be found in 188 Xuandu liuwen 4a–b.

The commentary of our text is anonymous. It is quoted in SDZN 8.20a, and it should therefore date, at the latest, to the seventh century. The commentary often cites 1313 Wulao baojing and 1330 Dongzhen taiyi dijun taidan yinshu dongzhen xuanjing.

Isabelle Robinet

Dadong jinhua yujing 大洞金華玉經

12 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

254 (fasc. 120)

“Jade Scripture of the Golden Flower.” This work, named after a divine dwelling in the brain, is an illustrated collection of Shangqing texts centered on the Formula of the Dadong zhenjing.

A first part (1a–6b) contains various passages from 1313 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi dadong ciyi yujian wulao baojing. The remainder (7a–10a) illustrates, with the help of nine pictures, the method of the whirling wind (huaifeng 徊風), which partially matches 6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing 6.10a–17b (see fig. 12).

A description of the One Emperor (Di Yi 帝一) follows (10b–11a). The scripture concludes with thirteen illustrations of the meditation on the Male-Female Real One (Cixiong zhenyi 雌雄真一; 11a–12a).

Isabelle Robinet

FIGURE 12. Stages of the huaifeng meditation (254 7a–b)

Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing

洞真太上素靈洞元大有妙經

68 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1314 (fasc. 1026)

Suling (Unadorned Spirituality) and Dayou (Vast Possessions) are the names of the room and the palace where the heavenly prototype of the Suling jing is kept (1b). According to a gloss in YJQQ 8.19a, the term dongxuan 洞玄 (for yuan 元) means that the present scripture “penetrates mystery.”

We find a number of texts of different origins assembled here, all related to the Shangqing school and linked to the practice of 6 Shangqing dadong zhenjing and 1313 Dongzhen gaoshang yudi dadong ciyi yujian wulao baojing. Together with these two texts, the present work forms the Three Extraordinary Writings (sanqi 三奇; 44b). The texts and exercises it contains are either earlier or later than the Shangqing revelation. It seems that none of the three is much later than the beginning of the Lingbao movement (early fifth century). The names of the gods and the topology are sometimes different from those found in other Shangqing texts. A number of the methods expounded here come from a different school and are considered inferior from the Shangqing point of view.

The Suling jing did not have its present form at the time of the SDZN (seventh century), as that encyclopedia mentions the work as having three juan. Certain exercises given in the present version are incomplete. The text contains a number of interpolations.

The first part (5a–12b) expounds the method of the Three Caverns (sandong 三洞), that is, Heaven, Earth, and the Underworld or Abyss, and dates from the time when this expression was not yet used to designate the three divisions of Taoist scriptures (see below).

A second part (12b–24b) contains a description, famous throughout the Taoist tradition, of the Nine Palaces in the brain and their divine inhabitants. This part constitutes the real Suling jing. The practices expounded here are probably earlier than the Shangqing revelation. The main section in this part can be found in 421 Dengzhen yinjue 1, where these practices are given as excerpts from the biography of Su Lin 蘇林 and as fragments of a Suling jing “not yet revealed in this world.”

The third part (24b–41a) describes the important method of the Three Original Ones and the True One which is also linked to the biography of Su Lin. This part is in disorder and incomplete. The same method is also given in many other texts.

Next there is a digression (41a–44a) on the six invocations to the Shangqing gods who are mentioned in the biography of Lord Pei 裴君 (see YJQQ 105.10b–11b). This part is probably apocryphal. It is also found, with variants, in 1327 Dongzhen taishang sanjiu suyu yujing zhenjue.

Finally, there is a passage from the Jiuzhen mingke, also found in 1409 Taishang jiuzhen mingke 九真明科. This passage is, however, quoted in WSBY as coming from the present Suling jing, which could mean that it was already incorporated in our text before the end of the sixth century. It is in this passage (44a–b) that we find the hierarchical classification of Taoist scriptures in three degrees, where the Sanhuang texts 三黃文 occupy the lowest rung, the Lingbao the middle, and the Shangqing the top. This corresponds to the traditional classification of the Three Caverns (sandong 三洞), although the term is not used here.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing suling shangpian 上清素靈上篇

10 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1371 (fasc. 1040)

“Unadorned Spirituality, Upper Chapters.” This is an excerpt of 1314 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing, corresponding to pages 12b–22a of that work. There are a few variant readings, and one page (15b–16a) is missing.

Isabelle Robinet

FIGURE 13. Vision of the Dipper stars in spring (765 1a–b). Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/758)

Shangqing jinque dijun wudou sanyi tujue 上清金關帝君五斗三一圖訣

20 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

765 (fasc. 534)

“Illustrated Instructions on [Visualizing] the Three Ones in the Five [Phases] of the Dipper, according to the Imperial Lord of the Gold Portal.” This illustrated text derives from the hagiography of Su Lin 蘇林, one of the original Shangqing texts, which was dictated by Zhou Yishan 周義山 (hao Ziyang zhenren 紫陽真人; see 1016 Zhen’gao 10.3b; 10.6a–b; see figs. 13 and 14). The narrative part of this hagiography is reproduced, apparently in a highly condensed form, in YJQQ 104.1a–4b. The original second part of Su Lin’s hagiography, containing methods practiced and transmitted by Su, is mostly lost. Some of these methods, however, such as the visualization of the Nine Palaces (jiugong 九宮), can still be found in the first juan of 421 Dengzhen yinjue, or are, as in the present case, extant as separate works (see also 253 Jinque dijun sanyuan zhenyi jing).

Other versions of this meditation method survive in fragmentary or condensed form in 1314 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing 38a–40a and in 140 Shangqing wozhong jue 3.3a–5a, 3.6b–7a. A nearly identical version exists in 60 Yuanshi tianzun shuo xuanwei miaojing (a major omission, however, occurs on 2b of that scripture), as well as in YJQQ 49.11a–17b. No clue as to the date of the present illustrated version has been found.

FIGURE 14. The transmission of the scriptures (765 17b). Ming reprint of 1598.
Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/758)

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Yuanshi tianzun shuo xuanwei miaojing 元始天尊說玄微妙經

7 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

60 (fasc. 31)

“Marvelous Scripture of Mysterious Subtlety.” This text contains one of several versions of the Five Bushel Stars (five stars of the Dipper) and the Three Ones method (wudou sanyi 五斗三一, also called wudou neiyi 五斗內一). This is a variant practice of Keeping the One (shouyi 守一). The present method was given in the biography of Su Lin 蘇林 as the Oral Formula of Lord Zhou (Zhoujun koujue 周君口訣; YJQQ 49.11b). This Lord Zhou is Zhou Jitong 周季通, the zhenren of Purple Yang (Ziyang zhenren 紫陽真人), the “author” of Su Lin’s biography.

This practice is said to have been known to Sima Jizhu 司馬季主 (d. ca. 170 B.C.) and other masters of antiquity, such as Master Zhang of Handan 邯鄲張先生 (see 1016 Zhen’gao 10.6a–b).

The most complete version of the method is found in YJQQ 49.11a–17b. It is also found in 765 Shangqing jinque dijun wudou sanyi tujue, as well as in 140 Shangqing wozhong jue 2.2a–4b and 3.3a–5a.

The text can be divided into two parts: the first part (1a–2b) gives a method to rise up to the Dipper, escorted by the Three Ones, the gods of the Three Cinnabar Fields (dantian 丹田). This first part is also found in 1314 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing 38a–b and 39a–41b.

The second part (2b–7b) is devoted to different methods concerning the Three Ones coming out of the Cinnabar Fields or coming down from the Dipper, spewing colored qi. This same text is reproduced, in a much condensed form, in 1404 Shangqing taiji zhenren shenxian jing.

Isabelle Robinet

Shangqing jinshu yuzi shangjing 上清金書玉字上經

8 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

879 (fasc. 581)

“Golden Book with Jade Characters.” The real title is Scripture of the Cavern-Room of the Fangzhu Heaven (Fangzhu dongfang jing 方諸洞房經), a work attributed to the Green Lad (Qingtong dijun 青童帝君), a god from the Fangzhu paradise. That title is given here on 2b; and 1016 Zhen’gao (14.6a, 18.3b), 421 Dengzhen yinjue (1.6b and 11b), and other anthologies use it to quote the present text. The work is not mentioned in the catalogues of Shangqing texts, but, according to 1016 Zhen’gao 2.22a, it was revealed to YANG XI. The text itself states in 8b that it was known to persons of the Han dynasty.

The text agrees with quotations in 1016 Zhen’gao and 421 Dengzhen yinjue but must have undergone alterations. Certain glosses have been incorporated in the main text, and the latter is in disorder.

The theme of the work is a variant method of pacing the stars of the Dipper. This practice consists in “lying down” in the constellation and absorbing its effulgences, which penetrate into the Cavern-Room Palace situated in the brain.

The YJQQ gives two versions of this work (25.16b–20a and 52.8b–11a). It is widely used in liturgy.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taiwei huangshu tiandi jun shijing jinyang sujing

洞真太微黃書天地君石景金陽素經

12 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

81 (fasc. 36)

“Pure Scripture of Golden Yang of Mineral Splendor of the Lord of Heaven and Earth, from the Yellow Book of the Taiwei Heaven.” This is a fragment of the Yellow Book of the Taiwei Heaven, comparable to 257 Dongzhen taiwei huangshu jiutian balu zhenwen (q.v.). The present text corresponds to juan 7 of the latter text, where it was entitled Pure Scripture of Golden Yang of Mineral Splendor (Shijing jinyang sujing 石景金陽素經), a name that corresponds to the Shangqing tradition's terminology and that designates the solar essence as described in the first pages of the present text.

The work is composed of short explanations on Embryonic Breathing (taixi 胎息) and on the absorption of solar essence (1a–b) as well as fu. The colophon is of the kind written by XU RONGDI.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taiwei huangshu jiutian balu zhenwen

洞真太微黃書九天八籙真文

8 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

257 (fasc. 120)

“True Writs of the Eight Registers of the Nine Heavens, from the Yellow Book of the Taiwei Heaven.” This is a fragment of the Yellow Book of the Taiwei Heaven. Another fragment of this text constitutes 81 Dongzhen taiwei huangshu tiandi jun shijing jinyang sujing. The title of the present text corresponds to that of juan 8 of the original work, which, according to the list given in 2a–b, was called the True Writs of the Eight Registers of the Nine Heavens (Jiutian balu zhenwen 九天八籙真文). The Taiwei huangshu was originally the work of Dai Meng 戴孟, who is said to have lived during the reign of Emperor Wu of the Han (r. 140–87 B.C.; see Dongxian zhuan 洞仙傳 in YJQQ 110.15a–b). 1016 Zhen'gao 14.6a–b states that Dai was still living at the time of emperor Cheng of the Jin dynasty (r. 325–342). Although the work appears to have been revised and incorporated among the Shangqing scriptures, it is certain to have existed prior to YANG XI (330–ca. 386). It was also adopted, at least partially, as an element of the Shangqing liturgy (see 1293 Shangqing taiwei dijun jiedai zhenwen fu, a ritual by LU XIUJING; cf. also 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 5.2b).

This fragment consists of an introduction (1a–2b), talismanic characters (3a–6a), and a 200-character spell to be copied on a piece of green silk and worn around the waist (7a–8a).

Isabelle Robinet

Taizhen yudi siji mingke jing 太真玉帝四極明科經

5 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

184 (fasc. 77–78)

“Sworn Code [read ming as meng 盟] of the Four Poles of the Jade Emperor.” This title is among those of many codebooks mentioned by the Shangqing scriptures. Most of these codes, however, were purely imaginary.

A Siji mingke is explicitly quoted by such early works as 1331 Dongzhen shangqing shenzhou qizhuan qibian wutian jing (29a) and 1321 Dongzhen taishang basu zhenjing xiuxi gongye miaojue (2b), but these quotations are not found in the present text. Later sources quote the present text more closely: 1314 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing contains an exact rendering, and the quotations in 1352 Dongzhen taishang taixiao langshu 2a–13b, 1203 Taishang santian zhengfa jing 8b–9a, and WSBY have their equivalents in the present work.

The preface contains excerpts from 1344 Dongzhen taishang shuo zhihui xiaomo zhenjing 1.5a–b and a quotation from the Taizhen ke 太真科 (now lost), which is also found in SDZN 7.16b.

The five juan are placed under the authority of the five palaces of the Capital of Mystery (Xuandu 玄都) and under the jurisdiction of the Five Emperors of the Five Directions. Each juan comprises twenty-four articles.

The work contains the rules for transmission of the sacred scriptures, as well as for the rites to be observed by those who possess them. The majority of texts mentioned are those of the Shangqing tradition, either from the original revelation, or of a later date. Lingbao and Sandong 三洞 texts are also mentioned (4.2b, 3b).

An analysis of the contents and of the different quotations seems to indicate that this text has undergone a number of revisions, following the scriptural development of the Shangqing tradition. In its present state the work is later than 1314 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing because it gives a more coherent synthesis of the different scriptures. It is also later than the Lingbao revelation, but earlier than 1203 Taishang santian zhengfa jing, which gives quotations corresponding exactly to the present version.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang danjing daoqing jing 洞真太上丹景道精經

8 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1348 (fasc. 1033)

“Scripture of the Essence of the Tao and of the Effulgence of Cinnabar.” Although the title is borrowed from a Shangqing work (1359 Shangqing danjing daoqing yindi bashu jing), the present text (1b) states that it is distinct from the latter. Therefore it is later. The subtitle, Qusu jueci 曲素訣辭, also comes from the Shangqing legacy (cf. 1372 Shangqing gaoshang yuchen fengtai qusu shangjing). Finally, the present work is said to have been transmitted by Guxi zi 谷希子, a patron saint of the school.

The style accords with that of the Shangqing scriptures, and the hymns are also similar, if less ornate. They are composed of four-character verses that invoke the gods of the Shangqing pantheon by name but lack the literary quality of their models. This work should therefore be later than YANG XI (330–ca. 386) but antedates the WSBY (late sixth century), which quotes it on 33.3b.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang qingya shisheng jing 洞真太上青牙始生經

3 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1349 (fasc. 1033)

“Most High Scripture from the Dongzhen (Canon) on the Budding of the Green Shoots.” This work presumably derived from a method bearing the same name mentioned in the hagiography of the Mao brothers and originally described in its appendix (cf. the version of this hagiography in YJQQ 104.16b). A technique by the same name was also known to TAO HONGJING, but not as a separate scripture (jing 經; cf. 1016 Zhen’gao 18.11b). Such a scripture did, however, exist by the time of 184 Taizhen yudi siji mingke jing (see 2.10b–11a) and WSBY (see 47.10b). A passage that corresponds to 1a of the present text is quoted 184 Mingke jing.

The method itself—meditative absorption of the elementary qi, or shoots (ya 牙), of the Five Directions—probably has its origin in an old exercise described in 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu 1.11b–14b. It later became a well-known method both within the Shangqing and Lingbao traditions (see, e.g., 424 Shangqing mingtang yuanzhen jingjue 6a–10a and 352 Taishang dongxuan lingbao chishu yujue miaojing 2.4b–14a).

The special feature in the present variant of this method is that the visualization is to be performed simultaneously by two partners of the male and female sex aged between twelve and fifteen and sexually inexperienced. Thereby a kind of spiritual union is effected (erren gongtun yu shen tongyi 二人共吞与神同一).

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Dongzhen jinfang duming luzi huinian sanhua baoyao neizhen shangjing

洞真金房度命綠字迴年三華寶曜內真上經

11 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1346 (fasc. 1033)

“Superior Scripture of the Inner True Beings in the Golden House of Precious Threefold Effulgent Radiance, which Saves Life by Registering Names (in Heaven) and Rejuvenating Beings, [a Book] of the Dongzhen Canon.” This is a small but complete text for recitation and meditation, written in seven-character verse, not unlike the Huangting jing 黃庭經, giving a description of the Inner Landscape (the Golden House) and the True Beings who inhabit it.

The present work is quoted several times in WSBY (see Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 250) as well as in 184 Taizhen yudi siji mingke jing 2.11a. According to Robinet (La révélation du Shangqing 2:434), the names of the deities correspond to those given in the Dadong zhenjing (see the introduction to part 1.B.2). This small manual should therefore date to the later Six Dynasties period. An obviously apocryphal colophon states that it was transmitted to WEI HUACUN by the Xicheng zhenren 西城真人 on Mount Yangluo 陽洛.

There is an introduction that describes the original revelation of the text and the method of recitation. For recitation the adept has to enter into a meditation room and salute the four directions, visualizing the [Donghua] Dadi jun 大帝君 in the east, the Nanji shangzhen jun 南極上真君 in the south, the Santian changsheng jun 三天長生君 in the west, and Gaoshang xuhuang jun 高上虛皇君 in the north. During the recitation, some talismans, of which the models are given, are to be ingested. At the end, a number of ritual prescriptions are given, especially for the transmission of the text, which entails the oblation of a replacement body (daixing 代形) made of gold (jinren 金人).

Kristofer Schipper

Shangqing taishang yuanshi yaoguang jinhu fengwen zhang baojing

上清太上元始耀光金虎鳳文章寶經

15 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1383 (fasc. 1043)

“Precious Scripture of the Stanza of the Golden Tiger, Written in Phoenix Script, [Produced by] the Primordial Effulgence of the Most High: A Shangqing Book.” The title of the text is not mentioned in any of the bibliographical sources at our disposal for the Six Dynasties period. Its contents, however, show a close relationship with other Golden or Divine Tiger (shenhu 神虎) texts of the earlier Shangqing scriptures (see Robinet, La révélation du Shangqing 2:436). The present text has a colophon stating that it was transmitted by the saint Wang Bao 王褒 (Tongbo zhenren 桐柏真人) in 365 to Xu Yuanyou 許遠遊. This colophon belongs to the kind that XU RONGDI is reputed to have added to the scriptures he possessed or forged.

The text starts with a talisman writ related to the Three Sovereigns (Sanhuang 三皇). These are defined here as, respectively, the Dihuang 地皇, the Renhuang 人皇, and the Gaoshang 高上. They are powerful exorcistic talismans and spells, and as such are linked to the “Scripture of Wisdom That Annihilates Demons” (1344 Dongzhen taishang shuo zhihui xiaomo zhenjing).

Kristofer Schipper

1.B.2.c Early Shangqing Hagiographies

The Shangqing revelations included not only scriptures but hagiographies. These concern the most important divine patriarchs of the movement and were written by other saints or by the patriarchs themselves. Thus, the biography of Lady WEI HUACUN was produced by Fan Miao 范邈, hao Zhonghou 中侯, one of the immortals who appeared to YANG XI, while the Lady herself dictated the Life of her divine preceptor Lord Wang (Qingxu zhenren Wangjun neizhuan 清虛真人王君內傳, YJQQ 106.1a–8a). In fact, all the hagiographies were revealed either to YANG XI himself or to other participants in the movement at its earliest stage.

These holy biographies retrace the career of the noted personages and describe in detail the manner and means by which they attained the rank of zhenren. Foremost among these works is 442 Shangqing housheng daojun lieji, which was incorporated into the canonical Shangqing scriptures and has therefore been discussed above. Of the other hagiographies, only a few remain in their original or near original form.

Only fragments survive of the important Life of Lady Wei (Nanyue Wei furen zhuan 南嶽魏夫人傳), the holy matriarch of the movement. The longest synopsis is in Tai-ping guangji 58, which seems to be based on a revised version dating from the Tang (618–907; see Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao Chan, 62). This version has also been reproduced in Gushi wenfang xiaoshuo 顏氏文房小說.

The Life of Mao Ying 茅盈, another important divine patriarch, and the eldest of the three Mao brothers, survives partially in YJQQ 104.10b–20a (Taiyuan zhenren dongyue shangqing siming zhenjun zhuan 太元真人東嶽上卿司命真君傳). The same encyclopedia contains numerous excerpts of other Shangqing hagiographies as well as one apparently complete version—the Life of Lord Pei—discussed below.

The Shangqing hagiographies have been studied by Chen Guofu (CGF 8–14), Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao Chan, 62–64; and Robinet, La révélation du Shangqing, 1:51–57 and 2:365–405.

Qingling zhenren Pei jun zhuan 清靈真人裴君傳

26 fols.

Attributed to Deng Yunzi 鄭雲子; Six Dynasties (220–589)

1032 Yunji qiqian 105 (fasc. 677–702)

“Life of Lord Pei, Zhenren of Pure Transcendence.” Pei jun was one of the saints who appeared to YANG XI. The present hagiography is mentioned by TAO HONGJING (1016 Zhen’gao 2.18b; commentary). Deng Yunzi (otherwise unknown) is given as Zheng Ziyun 鄭子雲 in Jiu Tang shu, “Jingji zhi,” 46.2004, and as Zheng Yunqian 鄭雲千 in Xin Tang shu, “Yiwen zhi,” 49.1519, while the Song bibliographies follow the present version (VDL 156).

Pei, zi Xuanren 玄仁, is said to have been born into a Buddhist family in 178 B.C. He was first initiated in the rites of contrition and the techniques of sexual continence by a Buddhist master, the daoren 道人 Zhi Ziyuan 支子元, before being introduced to the higher paradises and their immortals by Chisong zi 赤松子. From these teachers he also received a great number of texts that generally correspond to the canonical Shangqing scriptures.

Kristofer Schipper

Ziyang zhenren neizhuan 紫陽真人內傳

19 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

303 (fasc. 152)

“The Esoteric Life of the Zhenren of Purple Yang.” Purple Yang is Zhou Yishan 周義山. According to a colophon (Zhou Pei erzhen xu 周裴二真序; 18a–19a) by Lord Pei (see previous article) and the zhenren Zhou himself, the present biography was written by the latter and revealed to a certain Hua Qiao 華僑, prefect of Jiangcheng 江乘 (Jurong 句容, Jiangsu), allied to the family of XU MI, YANG XI’s patron. These facts are discussed by TAO HONGJING at the very end of 1016 Zhen’gao (20.13b–14a), stating that Hua was an early recipient of divine revelations, but that he was indiscreet and that, therefore, the immortals stopped visiting him, turning instead to YANG XI. In any event, Tao was acquainted with the present text and its colophon.

A copyist notes (14b): “[Copy based on the] edition of the Chief of Rites Mozhao 摹召法主 (?), [itself] originally copied on sexagesimal day one, seventh of the First Moon of the third year of the Longan era of the Jin [1 March 399].” It is further noted that Lord Zhou was born in 80 B.C. (there is a slight error in the chronology here). In 65 B.C. Zhou became the disciple of Lord Su 蘇君, from whom he received the [method] of the Three Ones. According to the bibliographical indications of TAO HONGJING (Zhenbo 貞白), the text should contain 3,488 characters, whereas the present version has 3,489. The copyist states, “As I do not know which character is superfluous, I do not dare to delete any.” The present version is therefore later than Tao.

Quite similar in style to the previously examined Life of Lord Pei, the biography presents Zhou Yishan as the son of an aristocratic family who is entirely devoted to the quest of the Tao and who discovers that a poor vendor of sandals is in fact the zhenren Immortal Lord Su. Thanks to the latter’s instructions, Zhou travels to the sacred mountains of the immortals and meets ever greater saints, including the Yellow Old Lord (Huang-Lao jun 黃老君) from whom he receives many scriptures and talismans of the Shangqing tradition. A recapitulative list of these documents is given on 15a–17a. The present text is partially reproduced in YJQQ 106.8a–15b.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Porkert, Biographie d'un taoïste légendaire.

Kristofer Schipper

1.B.2.d Anthologies

Zhen'gao 真誥

20 juan

Compiled and annotated by TAO HONGJING 陶弘景; completed in 499

1016 (fasc. 637–640)

“Declarations of the Zhenren.” The zhenren are the gods who appeared to YANG XI during the years 364–370. The term gao originally referred to a sacrificial ceremony intended to convey a written proclamation to the gods. The present title confers on the Declarations the same solemn character that is associated with the teachings of the Buddha. Here, the Declarations are instructions handed down by the gods.

TAO HONGJING compiled the present collection of notes taken by YANG XI, XU MI, or his son Xu Hui 許翺 (331–ca. 370) on the instructions addressed to them by the gods, in the years after 490. The “Declarations” are doctrinally less important than the great revealed scriptures of the Shangqing. They do not convey the essential part of the divine message, but either contain the deities’ minor pronouncements, or provide supplementary explanations pertaining to the practice of the major texts. The present text includes a discussion between the gods, YANG XI, and XU MI. The latter figures were the main recipients of the declarations and also addressed questions to the gods.

Among other sources, TAO HONGJING used the Zhenji jing 真跡經, a similar collection, now lost, compiled by GU HUAN. There may well have been further antecedents.

The materials used for the present work are mainly autographs by YANG XI and the two Xu’s. It is sometimes overlooked that Tao was only the compiler of these texts. He himself makes a clear distinction between the revealed texts, which he quotes under the heading of Zhen'gao, and his own commentaries.

The present edition contains a preface by Gao Sisun 高似孫, dated 1223. All other extant editions derive from this version.

There is a certain disorder in the compilation and in the text that may be partially original and partially the result of later modifications. TAO HONGJING divided his work into seven parts, the last two parts containing his own writings and no revealed texts. Originally, the work was divided into ten juan, but as early as the SDZN (seventh century), the first few juan of the book must have been divided into two. There are traces of alterations and additional commentaries from later times. Nevertheless, the work as a whole appears to be well preserved.

The first section (juan 1–4) contains fragments of the written accounts of the nocturnal visits by the gods to YANG XI, and records the hymns and poems sung on these occasions. This first part provided the materials for collections of hymns such as 613 Zhongxian zansong lingzhang and 980 Zhuzhen gesong. It also provided the text of 1428 Shi dichen Donghua shangzuo siming yangjun zhuanji.

The second section (juan 5–8) concerns miscellaneous subjects. Juan 5 is composed of revelations made by Lord Pei 裴君, which are of a slightly different character from other Shangqing texts. The same part contains a list of Shangqing texts (2a–4b). Juan 6 contains a discussion of the drug Atractylis (zhu 朮) and a number of text fragments that are close to the Buddhist Sūtra in Forty-two Sections (Sishier zhang jing; 5b–12a). Juan 7 and 8 concern the tribulations of the ancestors of the Xu family in the nether world. This part is closer to the traditions of the Way of the Heavenly Master than to those of the Shangqing school.

The third section (juan 9–10) is devoted to different minor practices, such as massage, and small rites and details concerning techniques described in the revealed scriptures. Part of this section (9.6a–9a) contains 1319 Dongzhen xi wang mu baoshen qiju jing. Long passages have been reproduced in other works.

The fourth section (juan 11–14) is entirely devoted to the description of Mount Maoshan 茅山 and its history. The major part of this text was revealed by Lord Dinglu 定錄君, the second Mao brother. It contains an original hagiographic text, partly composed of local legends. Part of this text is composed of questions XU MI asked the gods and of the answers he received. Questions and answers are dispersed throughout the text. The section has provided the materials for juan 6 and 13 of 304 Maoshan zhi and for numerous hagiographic collections.

The fifth section (juan 15–16) concerns Fengdu, the world of the dead. One of its sources appears to have been a Fengdu ji 酆都記. The division into two juan is quite arbitrary, occurring as it does in the middle of a text on the judges of hell.

The sixth section (juan 17–18) assembles the personal archives of YANG XI and the Xus, that is, fragments of their correspondence, quotations, and accounts of dreams.

The seventh section (juan 19–20) is the only one written entirely by TAO HONGJING himself. He explains his methodology, describes the history of the texts, their alterations and falsifications, and gives the genealogy of the Xu family.

The Zhen'gao is a key source of information for establishing the authenticity of Shangqing scriptures and provides essential explanations for their comprehension. A great number of Taoist made use of it.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ishii Masako, Kōhon Shinkō; idem, “Shinkō no seiritsu”; idem, Dōkyō gaku no kenkyū; idem, “Shinkō to Shijūnishō-gyō”; idem, Shinkō; Mugitani Kunio, Shinkō sakuin; Robinet, La révélation du Shangqing, chap. 3; Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao Chan, chap. 2; Wang Liqi, “Zhen'gao yu chenwei”; Yoshikawa Tadao, Rikuchō dōkyō no kenkyū; Zhong Laiyin, Changsheng busi de tanqiu.

Isabelle Robinet

Taiqing jinyi shenqi jing 太清金液神氣經

3 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

882 (fasc. 583)

“Scripture of the Taiqing Heaven of Liquified Gold and Divine Qi.” The work begins with alchemical recipes that may predate the Shangqing revelation. These recipes come from a Document of the Supreme Sovereign (Taihuang lingce 太皇靈策; 2a) and were transmitted by the zhenren of Pure Void (Qingxu zhenren 清虛真人) Wang Bao 王褒, WEI HUACUN’s teacher. One of the formulas is similar to a prescription found in 1376 Shangqing taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing 2.9a–18a.

Juan 2 contains recipes (2.4a and 6b), some of the names of which resemble those mentioned in BPZ 11.186 and 15.250. On 2b there is a recipe quoted from a Tianhuang wen 天皇文.

The final juan is composed entirely of texts also found in 1016 Zhen'gao. This part is said to be the work of a disciple who, during the 430s, copied these texts in the house of Du Daoju 林道鞠.

This is the earliest anthology of fragments of the revealed texts. The remarks in the preface suggest that it was compiled around 430.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Strickmann, “The Mao Shan revelations,” 25, n. 46; Strickmann, Le taoïsme du Mao Chan, 64.

Isabelle Robinet

Daoji lingxian ji 道跡靈仙記

18 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

597 (fasc. 330)

“Annals of Transcendent Immortals, [Abstracted] from the Traces of the Tao.” The title of this collection is inspired by that of the lost Daoji jing 道跡經. It is entirely composed of texts found in 1016 Zhen'gao 14–16.

Isabelle Robinet

Dengzhen yinjue 登真隱訣

3 juan

Compiled and annotated by TAO HONGJING 陶弘景, between 492–514

421 (fasc. 193)

“Secret Instructions for the Ascent as a Zhenren.” This was originally a voluminous work divided into seven main sections (see 1016 Zhen'gao 19.1b). TAO HONGJING began its compilation shortly after his retreat to Maoshan 茅山 in 492 (3.25a bears the date 493); and although the text must have been essentially completed by 499, Tao continued to work on it until the second decade of the sixth century. The number of juan, given as twenty-four by Tao’s nephew Tao Yi 陶翊 around 502 (see Huayang yinju xiansheng benqi lu 華陽隱居先生本起錄, cited in YJQQ 107.9b), was twenty-five in Song times. The Chongwen zongmu also lists a version in sixteen juan (VDL 143).

Tao’s sources for this compendium, of which only three juan are extant, were essentially the same as those he used for his “Declarations of the Zhenren” (1016 Zhen'gao), that is, the Shangqing revelations recorded in the autograph of YANG XI and the two Xus. But whereas the purpose of the “Declarations” was mainly documentary, the “Secret Instructions” provided a practical manual for the adept. To this end, TAO HONGJING compiled a series of exercises derived in part from the various revelations of the Zhen'gao, in part from the methods of the zhenren of the Shangqing Heaven recorded in the appendices to their biographies, and in part from the scriptures (jing 經) themselves. He furnished all these exercises with meticulous commentaries.

The first juan of the present fragment includes parts of a technique for visualizing the Nine Palaces in the human head. This technique was originally attached to the hagiography of Su Lin 蘇林 (the first part of which is transmitted as Xuanzhou shangqing Sujun zhuan 玄洲上卿蘇君傳 in YJQQ 104.1a–4b). The second juan presents a number of individual revelations orally transmitted by the various zhenren to Yang and the Xus (cf. 1016 Zhen'gao 9, 10). The third juan contains instructions for reciting 331 Huangting neijing (3.1a–5b; Tao questions the authenticity of this part) and prescriptions concerning the liturgy of the Heavenly Masters tradition, both of which formed originally part of the biography of WEI HUACUN (3.5b–27a).

The scope and richness of the original work were far greater than this fragment. Aside from the manifold meditation techniques typical of the Shangqing tradition, the Dengzhen yinjue also offered comprehensive guidance for making and using drugs (“Fushi pin 服食品”; cf. especially the quotations from Dengzhen yinjue 7 in SDZN 3 and 4.4b), as well as for the techniques of metamorphosis (shijie 尸解). One of the sources for the latter practice (see TPYL 665) was a scripture titled Shijing jingguang zangjing lianxing zhenjing 石精金光藏景鍊形真經, abbreviated Jianjing 劍經, to which TAO HONGJING also refers in 1016 Zhen’gao (e.g., 14.18b and 16.13b; a lengthy excerpt of this work is preserved in TPYL 665). One section of this work dealt with talismans and diagrams (“Futu jue 符圖訣”; see 2.15a; it constituted juan 6 of the original “Ascent as a Zhenren”). Another section concerning rules, “Zunjie xu 遵戒序,” formed juan 2 of the original work (cf. 2.14b). A Dunhuang manuscript (Stein 3750) that is undoubtedly based on another work by TAO HONGJING (Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 331) refers to a juan that purportedly gave advice to hermits living in the mountains (Xunshan dingshi juan 巡山定室卷; Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō, 721, lines 18–20). Two further chapter headings of the original work are given in SDZN 8.5b, “Ligong pin 立功品” (merits), and in SDZN 7.15b, “Shiri quanci jue 時日詮次訣” (almanac). Other parts probably included Tao’s “Table of the Ranks and Functions in the Pantheon” (167 Dongxuan lingbao zhenling weiye tu), a similar diagram of the structure of the celestial regions of the universe (cf. 1128 Daomen jingfa xiangcheng cixu 2.1a–6b), and an annotated inventory of the Shangqing scriptures (cf. 104 Shangqing dadong zhenjing yujue yinyi 12a–b; 304 Maoshan zhi 9.1a–b). Furthermore, 424 Shangqing mingtang yuanzhen jingjue (q.v.) can be safely regarded as a former part of the Dengzhen yinjue. The Dunhuang manuscripts Stein 4314, Stein 6193, Pelliot 2751, and Pelliot 2732 (treated individually below) may also be considered as belonging to the same original work.

As the citations in 300 Huayang Tao yinju neizhuan 2.11b suggest, the final part of TAO HONGJING’s protracted work on the Dengzhen yinjue seems to have consisted of autobiographical notes in which the author recorded events extending up to the year 514.

A preface by Tao to this work is preserved in 1050 Huayang Tao yinju ji 1.19b–21a.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ishii Masako, “Tōshin inketsu.”

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Addendum

1. Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2732: This manuscript fragment is the middle part of a scroll. It has no identifying marks or indication of title. Its amply annotated text describes a number of different techniques of visualization and massage in the Shangqing tradition. These techniques are also described in juan 9 and 10 of TAO HONGJING’s 1016 Zhen’gao. They are daily exercises for the prevention or healing of illnesses. These techniques were not yet incorporated into the framework of a comprehensive scripture (jing 經) but handed down in loose sequence by the immortals of the Shangqing Heaven in the form of oral transmissions.

Since this manuscript does not, as far as the sequence of text or commentary is concerned, tally completely with the corresponding passages in 1016 Zhen’gao—nor does it show greater overlappings with juan 2 of 421 Dengzhen yinjue, which is otherwise rather similar in content—Ōfuchi Ninji (Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 185) has concluded that it must be a fragment of the Zhenji jing 真跡經, compiled by GU HUAN around 465, on the basis of the same recorded revelations from the Shangqing that TAO HONGJING collected later in his Zhen’gao.

There exists no evidence, however, that GU HUAN annotated his facsimile edition of the original manuscripts (his concern was to reproduce the autographs by tracing). Moreover, TAO HONGJING states in his appendix to the Zhen’gao 19.8a that GU HUAN did not integrate these individual transmissions into his work. Tao, by contrast, included them not only in his documentary compilation of the Zhen’gao but also, as evidenced by the extant juan 2, in his Dengzhen yinjue. There his aim was to describe these techniques once more with a detailed and, above all, practice-oriented commentary (see 1016 Zhen’gao 9.7b).

As Ōfuchi states, lines 1–15 of the manuscript, including the commentary, tally exactly with 421 Dengzhen yinjue 2.20a5–20b6, the concluding section of the method for the absorption of mist (fumu fa 服霧法), and the beginning of the so-called black-white technique (xuanbai fa 玄白法). Exactly at this point, the manuscript Pelliot 2732 shows a break by abruptly running on with a line of commentary concerning the “visualization of the image of the sun in a diseased hand” (cun rixiang zai jishou 存日象在疾手; cf. 1016 Zhen’gao 10.15a–b). Presumably due to this break, further passages were lost that had been congruent with the continuing passages in 421 Dengzhen yinjue. On the other hand, it cannot be excluded that the present second juan of the fragmentary Dengzhen yinjue was originally longer. Given the completely identical passages at the beginning of the commentary, it seems, contrary to Ōfuchi’s opinion, reasonable to regard manuscript Pelliot 2732 as a further fragment of the Dengzhen yinjue that continues the portion forming the extant juan 2 (See Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō Zurokuhen, 395–97).

2. Dunhuang manuscripts Stein 4314, 6193, and Pelliot 2751: These three manuscripts together constitute a fragment of a juan, the beginning of which has not been preserved (see Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 183–84). While it lacks a title, manuscript Pelliot 2751 (the longest fragment) bears a final note: “Instructions on practicing the Purple Writ [Ziwen 紫文],” which in fact refers only to the first part of the text (lines 1–199). The text describes various meditative exercises from the so-called [Lingshu] ziwen [靈書] 紫文, one of the original manuscripts from the Shangqing scriptural corpus. These exercises are for absorbing the elementary energies of the sun and the moon and for controlling the hun 魂 and po 魄 souls (see 1016 Zhen’gao 5.3b, 5.4b, 9.24b, 18.5a–b). The main text in this section corresponds completely to 639 Huangtian shangqing jinque dijun lingshu ziwen shangjing 8a–14a. On the basis of this scripture, we can infer that the missing passages at the beginning of our scroll must have been “Tun riqi fa 吞日氣法 (4a–6a), “Taiwei yin riqi kaiming lingfu 太微飲日氣開明靈符” (6a–b), and “Tun yuejing fa 吞月精法” (6b–8a).

The second section deals with the visualization of nine deities and their incorporation into the organs of the human body in a kind of spiritual reenactment of ontogenesis (jiuzhen fa 九真法, lines 200–378), as well as with the visualization of cosmic triads in the form of colored clouds (sansu yun 三素雲) in eight meditative steps (badao biyan fa 八道秘言法, lines 422–95). These two techniques belonged within the compass of another scripture from the early Shangqing revelations, the Jiuzhen zhongjing 九真中經 (see 1016 Zhen’gao 5.1b–2a, 14.16b, 18.5b). In comparison to the extant version of these methods in 1376 Shangqing taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing 1.2a–15a, certain parts of the text from Dunhuang show a distinctly terser form as well as variants (lines 231–32 of the main text, for example, are not found in the Daozang version).

Lines 378–421 contain an interpolation, with calendar instructions on the jiuzhen fa from Shengxuan ji 昇玄記 (cf. TPYL 660.4b, quoting 421 Dengzhen yinjue; 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing 5a), that has also been preserved in 1351 Dongzhen taishang feixing yujing jiuzhen shengxuan shangji 11a–13b.

From the subtitle, “7. Instructions on Practicing the Jiuzhen [zhongjing],” in line 200 of the manuscript, Ōfuchi concluded that the fragment had originally represented a complete work in seven sections on a long scroll, of which more than five of the preceding sections were lost. However, he failed to notice the striking similarity of the commentary to TAO HONGJING’s style and approach, as exemplified by 1016 Zhen’gao and 421 Dengzhen yinjue.

The following parallel strongly supports this impression: concerning the details about the divinities of the body, Tao refers in 421 Dengzhen yinjue 2.5a to his commentary on the “practice of the twenty-four spirits” (ershisi shen fa 二十四神法; cf. also 1016 Zhen’gao 5.11a, 5.13a, 9.2a–b; a version of this practice is preserved in 405 Shangqing zijing jun huangchu ziling daojun dongfang shangjing), which he may have also explained within the framework of his Dengzhen yinjue. Virtually the same reference in the same context appears also in the commentary of the manuscript Pelliot 2751, line 245.

Thus we may conclude that the Dunhuang manuscript does not represent an independent Ziwen xingshi jue 紫文行事訣 in one juan with seven sections, but rather the fragment of a juan from the Dengzhen yinjue that contained the subsections six (Ziwen) and seven (Jiuzhen zhongjing) within a larger chapter (on visualization, cunxiang 存相?) of that work. If we take into account the abbreviated rendering of some passages and, especially in the second part of the fragment, the relatively brief annotations, it is also possible that the Dunhuang copy, similar to 424 Shangqing mingtang yuanzhen jingjue (q.v.), already represents a somewhat revised version of Tao’s original text (see Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō Zurokuhen, 382–94).

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Zhoushi mingtong ji 周氏冥通記

4 juan

By Zhou Ziliang 周子良 (497–516); annotated and edited by TAO HONGJING 陶景弘 (517)

302 (fasc. 152)

“Mr. Zhou’s Records of His Communication with the Invisible World.” This work is the written legacy of TAO HONGJING’s disciple Zhou Ziliang. In his visions, Zhou had met, along with certain higher zhenren also known from 1016 Zhen’gao, a number of lesser immortals from the subterranean Cavern-Heavens of Maoshan. He kept a diary about these meetings.

Zhou’s generally sketchy but sometimes detailed (juan 1–3) records, covering a period of sixteen months, were found by TAO HONGJING in a mountain cave at Maoshan 茅山, where Zhou had hidden them—apparently shortly before he took his own life. Tao arranged and annotated the material, which included the recipe for an elixir that possibly caused Zhou Ziliang’s death (4.19a–20b). Tao wrote an introduction containing Zhou’s biography (remarkable especially for the dramatic account of Zhou’s suicide on 1.3b–4a), and in early 517 he presented the work, divided into four juan, to the emperor. The letter of presentation by Tao and the imperial note in reply are attached to Zhou Ziliang’s biography.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bokenkamp, “Answering a summons.”

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Shangqing mingtang yuanzhen jingjue 上清明堂元真經訣

10 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

424 (fasc. 194)

“Instructions for the Scripture of Xuanzhen in the Mingtang.” The title refers only to the first part (1a–6a) of the present work. It describes the visualization of a Jade Maiden named Xuanzhen 玄真 in the sun and moon and her subsequent entry into one of the palaces of the head, the Mingtang. Except for an interpolated passage on 4b–5b, taken from 1016 Zhen’gao 9.18a–b, the method derives from the technical appendix to the hagiography of Mao Ying 茅盈 and his brothers, a text of the original Shangqing corpus attributed to Li Zun 李遵 (see 1016 Zhen’gao 8.2a). Only the first part of this hagiography has been preserved in YJQQ 104.10b–20a.

The second part of the present work (6a–10a) is based similarly on a meditation technique, the absorption of the Cloud Shoots of the four directions (fu siji yunya shenxian shangfang 服四極雲牙神仙上方), that formed originally part of the biography of Wang Bao 王褒, hao Qingxu zhenren 清虛真人, composed and revealed by WEI HUACUN. The narrative part of this biography, which also belongs to the oldest Shangqing scriptures (see 1016 Zhen’gao 12.13b; 14.17b), is given in YJQQ 106.1a–8a.

Conspicuous is the continuous and sometimes detailed commentary. Its style and approach are reminiscent of TAO HONGJING’s. The critical remark (8a) about an insertion in the original manuscript written in a hand other than YANG XI’s should be viewed in light of the fact that Tao did possess the original manuscript of Wang Bao’s biography, which otherwise was entirely in YANG XI’s hand (see 1016 Zhen’gao 20.2b). The identification of the different handwriting as ding 丁 corresponds to the criteria laid down by Tao in his appendix to Zhen’gao 19.6a.

Citations from the lost fourth juan of 421 Dengzhen yinjue in SDZN 10.3a and 3.20a–21a show that Tao did include the set of instructions presented in the present text. It should be noted, however, that SDZN 3.20a–21a reproduces the first sentences of the second part of our work (on the absorption of the Cloud Shoots) with two comments by TAO HONGJING that cannot be found in our present version. This fact may be explained by a final remark (10a) in our text: “The commentary, where not absolutely related to the practice [of the present instructions], has been abridged.”

We conclude that the present text is in all likelihood a fragment of 421 Dengzhen yinjue.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Schafer, “The Jade Woman of Greatest Mystery.”

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Shangqing mingtang xuandan zhenjing 上清明堂玄丹真經

6 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1381 (fasc. 1043)

“True Book of the Hall of Light and the Dark Cinnabar.” This is a small manual for visual meditation according to some well-known methods from the Shangqing tradition. The beginning of the text is missing but can be reconstituted from 140 Shangqing wozhong jue 3.1a–b3. There the relevant passage is called “Practical Recipes Transmitted by Lord Su,” which shows that the first part, which concerns the Way of the Hall of Light (mingtang zhi dao 明堂之道), was considered to have been revealed by Su Lin 蘇林. Parallel text excerpts can be found in 421 Dengzhen yinjue 1.8a–10a and 1314 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing 13b–25b. The latter source has many passages in common with our text (including a reference to a now lost passage of 254 Dadong jinhua yujing on page 15a). Robinet’s claim (in La révélation du Shangqing, 420) that it entirely reproduces two sections of 1314 Suling jing, be it in abridged form, can, however, not be substantiated. It would seem more plausible that both versions have a common origin in an unknown, now lost, ancient scripture.

Next to the meditation on the Hall of Light (a place in the brain, residence of three deities) there is also the method of the Dark Cinnabar, which is a more advanced form of visual meditation on different places in the head.

Kristofer Schipper

1.B.2.e Rituals and Rules

Taishang jiuzhen mingke 太上九真明科

23 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1409 (fasc. 1052)

“The Sworn [ming here has the sense of meng 盟] Code of the Nine Zhenren.” The identity of these gods is not indicated. Perhaps they are those of 1376 Shangqing taishang dijun jiuzhen zhongjing. The present text is found in its entirety in 1314 Dongzhen taishang suling dongyuan dayou miaojing 46b–end. The WSBY quotes it under the title of Suling jing, which could imply that it was originally part of that scripture and was detached from it at a later date. The same text is also found in 1345 Dongzhen taishang daojun yuandan shangjing.

We have here a systematic presentation and elaboration of the code of rules expounded by the Shangqing scriptures and their transmission. Juan 3 of 184 Taizhen yudi siji mingke jing is an even more expanded version of the same material. A large number of Shangqing texts are mentioned. However, some of the more important and authentic ones, such as the Basu jing (see 426 Shangqing taishang basu zhenjing), are not found here.

The code is divided into three main parts. The first part (2b–8a) gives rules about delays to be observed between two subsequent transmissions, the time of abstinence and retreat of master and disciple, and the nature and quantity of gifts to be presented to the master.

The second part (8a–12a) enumerates various ritual faults to be avoided: failing to confess one's sins before practicing Taoist exercises, infringing the rules of purity, or omitting the preparatory observances.

The final part (12a–18b) tells how to atone for sins, whether committed by the disciple or his ancestors. Atonement consists in offerings to the rivers of the underworld and in prayers. At the end we find a number of hymns addressed to the four major gods of the Shangqing school.

Isabelle Robinet

Dongzhen taishang shanghuang minji dingzhen yulu

洞真太上上皇民籍定真玉籙

6 fols.

1341 (fasc. 1031)

"Precious Register on which are Fixed the [Names of] the Zhenren of the Population Record of the Most High Supreme Sovereign, a Dongzhen Scripture." A Shanghuang lu 上皇籙 is mentioned among the texts received by Lord Pei (see Qingling zhenren Peijun zhuan 清靈真人裴君傳 in YJQQ 105.23a–b, and the separate article on 1032.105). The present text is quoted in 184 Taizhen yudi siji mingke jing 2.5a–b, in a passage devoted to the works revealed to Lord Pei. The title of our work is given in WSBY 47.10b (see Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 228).

The major part of the present work is occupied by a sermon pronounced by the Most High Lord Lao to the Green Lad (Qingtong jun 青童君) on the notion of repentance and the practice of confession (cankui 慚愧). The overall tone of the discourse is Buddhist and has no apparent relationship to the register presented at the end (4b–6a).

Kristofer Schipper

Shangqing taiwei dijun jiedai zhenwen fa 上清太微帝君結帶真文法

2 fols.

By LU XIUJING 陸修靜 (406–477)

1293 (fasc. 1009)

"Rites of Girding with the True Writ of the Imperial Lord of Supreme Tenuity."

A subtitle tells us that this short ritual is also called the Text [to be pronounced] at the Transfer of the Girdle, and that it comes from the Scripture of the Transfer of the Girdle of the Supreme Tenuity (Taiwei jiaodai jing 太微交帶經). This scripture undoubtedly corresponds to 257 Dongzhen taiwei huangshu jiutian balu zhenwen, the self-proclaimed eighth jian of a Taiwei huangshu 太微黃書, a Shangqing text. It contains the True Writ, in talismanic writing, which is copied on a piece of striped cloth (wen 紋), white for men and purple for women, nine inches wide and nine feet long, to be wrapped around the waist.

A note given at the beginning of the text states that it is an authentic work by Master Lu [Xiujing] 陸先生真本 and that it belongs in the fourth section of the Dongzhen division, where it occupies the thirty-first jian. This important bibliographic indication is partially confirmed by the catalogue of Dongzhen (Shangqing) scriptures in 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 5.1a–2b. The latter is divided into four sections and lists the Transfer of the White Cloth and the Purple Cloth (Shangqing baiwen jiaodai 上清白紋交帶, Shangqing ziwen jiaodai 上清紫文交帶) as rites for confirmation into the highest grades of the Shangqing ordination. This information accords with the present text. The meaning of the reference to a thirty-first jian, however, is unclear.

The text of the writ and its transcription are not given here but in 257 Taiwei huangshu. Here are found only a few indications regarding the preparations and offerings for the ritual, and three short prayers, presumably to be pronounced at the ceremony of confirmation.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang qiuxian dinglu chisu zhenjue yuwen 太上求仙定錄尺素真訣玉文

31 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

128 (fasc. 59)

"Precious Writs and True Formulas on (Prescribed) Lengths of Silk, Determining the Rank of Those Who Seek Immortality." A collection of sacred writs from a number of ancient scriptures of the Shangqing and Lingbao canons, here collected as a document for transmission on ordination and, as such, kept by Xi wang mu 西王母, the Royal Lady, Golden Mother of the Western Fortress, as she is called in the line giving the name of the author of the text (1a).

At the beginning of the collection, we find a model certificate for the transmission. It states that the ordinand, having already obtained the investiture in the sacred liturgy of the Great Sworn Alliance (dameng shangsheng lingke 大盟上聖靈科; see 1241 Chuanshou sandong jingjie falu lieshuo 1.2a), is now entitled to receive the Secret Characters on the Lengths of Silk (Chisu mizi 尺素密字). This statement implies that the transmission of the present collection of writs corresponded to an ordination of the Shangqing level.

The hybrid nature of the collection—which includes, on 9b–10a, the Esoteric Sounds (neiyin 內音) of 1 Lingbao wuliang duren shangpin miaojing—makes it unlikely that it is a product of the Taoist institutions of the Tang; it should therefore be earlier.

Kristofer Schipper

Shangqing dongzhen zhibui guanshen dajie wen 上清洞真智慧觀身大戒文

24 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1364 (fasc. 1039)

“Great Rules of Wisdom in Self-Examination.” This set of three hundred rules is the most extensive Taoist code. It is intended for those initiated and ordained into the highest levels of the Shangqing tradition. In this quality and context, it is quoted in extenso in WSBY 45.

Lagerwey (Wu-shang pi-yao, 272, n. 6) remarks that the present set of rules may have been created in imitation of 456 Taishang dongxuan lingbao sanyuan pinjie gongde qingzhong jing so as to give the Shangqing canon its own code of precepts. Schmidt (“Die Hundertachtzig Vorschriften,” 156) has shown, moreover, that both codes are expanded elaborations of the same model, the ancient One Hundred and Eighty Rules of Lord Lao, the Heavenly Master libationers’ code (see 786 Taishang laojun jingliu). The present set adopted no less than seventy-seven rules from the latter code. The first part of the three hundred rules contains also one hundred and eighty items, in clear imitation of the ancient set. That part corresponds here to a first grade of perfection. The next group contains only thirty-six rules, and the third and final section, eighty-four. In fact, the number of distinct rules is smaller, as many are repeated as injunctions against inciting others to commit the same fault. For instance, we find one rule that states: “He who studies the Tao should not drink wine” (rule 3). Another rule says: “He who studies the Tao should not encourage others to drink wine” (rule 4). In adopting this procedure, our text imitates 456 Sanyuan pinjie gongde qingzhong jing, from which it has borrowed no less than ninety-six rules.

The last part consists entirely of so-called “commemorations” (nian 念) prescribing numerous topics for mental concentration. Initially, these set thoughts concerned good deeds and intentions, but later they also dealt with Taoist ritual practice. Toward the end of the text, these commemorations become mystical: “He who studies the Tao should concentrate on [nian] traveling to the Gold Portal of the Shangqing Heaven in order to pay homage to the Most High zhenren” (16a). These mystic practices belong to the Shangqing tradition.

In addition to the rules, we find in a second part of the text a discourse on their virtues and on their ritual recitation, for which a lamp should be installed and a special hymn should be sung when lighting it (21a–b).

As shown by Schmidt (“Die Hundertachtzig Vorschriften,” 156–57), these three hundred commandments have continued to be transmitted in Taoist monastic organizations until the present day. They were adopted by the Quanzhen 全真 order, which revised them and transmitted them on ordination into the highest grades of their order. A copy of the text with its corresponding ordination certificate was collected by Hackmann in the Shangqing guan 上清觀 near Qingdao and published in 1931.

Kristofer Schipper

Shangqing yuanshi pulu taizhen yujue 上清元始譜錄太真玉訣

10 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1365 (fasc. 1039)

“Precious Instructions of the Most High Zhenren on the Register of the Primordial Beginning of the Shangqing Tradition” This text contains a ritual for salvation from the Three Evils (san’e 三惡). The evil powers are here assimilated with the Three Corpses (sanshi 三尸) and the Five Sufferings (wuku 五苦). The subtitle, “Deliverance from the Form and Disappearance through Transformation in Flowing Light and Jade Radiance” (Jiexing dunbian liujing yuguang 解形遁變流景玉光), uses typical Shangqing terminology (see, for instance, 1359 Shangqing danjing daojing yindi bashu jing 1.7a) as it figures in discussions of the technique of liberating oneself from the limits of corporeality (shijie 尸解).

The work probably existed already in the fifth century, since it served as a source for Yan Dong’s 嚴東 (fl. 485) commentary in 87 Yuanshi wuliang duren shangpin miaojing sizhu 2.40a–b; 2.43a–54a. Although it is difficult to allocate the work to one of the distinctive traditions of that time (judging from its liturgical components, it seems to be connected more closely with the Lingbao tradition), it has been reckoned among the Shangqing texts since at least Tang times (446 Shangqing zhongjing zhu zhensheng bi 7.1b; see also 508 Wushang huanglu dazhai licheng yi 28.14a–15a) and was probably related to 1387 Shangqing yuanshi gaoshang yuhuang juitian pulu.

A special feature of this ritual, for which lights are installed for the Nine and the Thirty-two Heavens, is the use of a medium onto whom the physical complaints in the body of the beneficiary of the ritual are to be transferred (7b: shengkou daixing 生口代形). The live substitute—a passage (10a) in the text advises that one not choose ugly or inferior persons—obtains the possibility to acquire merits and to become an aspirant for a clerk's post under the Three Officials (sanguan 三官).

A part of the text, which reveals a lacuna on 4b, is also found in YJQQ 81.1a–5a.

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

1.B.3 Lingbao

Thirty years after the first Shangqing revelations, in the same town of Jurong 句容 where GE HONG had lived, and on nearby Maoshan where YANG XI had had his hermitage, GE CHAOFU, Hong's grandnephew, made a vital contribution toward the renewal of Taoism through the creation of an updated scriptural canon. Whereas the Shangqing revelations had accomplished the synthesis between the traditions of the mystery cults of the south and the Way of the Heavenly Master, the new Lingbao scriptures attempted to integrate yet another important aspect of Chinese religion of those times: Buddhism (see Zürcher, "Buddhist influence on early Taoism"). A synthesis was obtained not so much by the blending of doctrines as through integration on the liturgical level.

This integration was founded on the ritual traditions of the south: the rites for the establishment of the altar on which the gods descend to partake in the offerings and incarnate themselves in a medium for the duration of the ritual. Lingbao 靈寶 (originally also written 靈保) is an ancient southern term for medium and shaman (see Kaltenmark, "Ling-pao," 576–79). The staking out of the ritual area entailed the use of five talismanic writings (wufu 五符). Holy mountains were sacred areas par excellence, and an excursion, whether in flesh or spirit, to these dwellings of gods and ancestors necessitated the possession of the Medium's Five Talismans, Lingbao wufu 靈寶五符, which GE HONG valued so much. Bokenkamp ("Sources") has shown convincingly that the books left behind by GE CHAOFU's granduncle were of primary importance in elaborating the new synthesis.

Like the Shangqing revelations, the Lingbao canon also incorporates parts of the liturgical practice of the Way of the Heavenly Master, to which it considers itself superior. According to TAO HONGJING (1016 Zhen'gao 19.11b) and MENG ANPAI (1129 Daojiao yishu 2.6b), the scriptures produced by GE CHAOFU during the Longan period of the Jin dynasty (397–402), became the foundation of the liturgical practice of Taoism. This practice, which continues to the present day, combines the great liturgical paradigm of the Retreat (zhai 齋), the Lingbao traditions of the south, and the protocols for the presentation of memorials of the Heavenly Masters, with the recitation of scriptures and the circular pradaksina dance of Buddhism.

Again, like the revelation of the Shangqing scriptures, the work of GE CHAOFU must have touched off a wave of supplementary texts and imitations. Here, too, LU XIUJING established the catalogue of canonical scriptures that were to be considered as the basis for ordination into the rank of a master entitled to conduct the Lingbao Retreat (sandong fashi 三洞法師). Lu's catalogue, the Lingbao jing shumu 靈寶經書目, has been preserved in several sources. First, we have the list in 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 4.8a–9a (here entitled Lingbao zhongmeng jingmu 靈寶中盟經目 and including a few additional works), also found in the Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2337 of the Sandong fengdao kejie yifan 三洞奉道科誠儀范. Another Dunhuang manuscript is Pelliot 2256, which Ōfuchi, who has studied both manuscripts (Ōfuchi Ninji, "On Ku Ling Pao Ching"), identifies as being part of a lost work by SONG WENMING (active 549–551) called Tongmen 通門 or Tongmen lun 通門論. Another version is found in 508 Wushang huanglu dazhai licheng yi 1.5a–7a. Ōfuchi and Bokenkamp ("Sources") have reconstructed the list of canonical scriptures and identified them among the texts transmitted in the Ming Daozang of 1445. Lu's catalogue, as completed by Song, is divided into two main parts: nineteen canonical scriptures and eight texts of instructions and commentaries, presumably of a later date. With one exception, the texts are presented here in the sequential order of their occurrence in the Liu-Song catalogue. As in the case of the Shangqing scriptures, the text of the most famous scripture, the Lingbao duren jing 靈寶度人經 (number 15 of the catalogue), has come down to us incorporated into a work of the Song period (960–1279). This work is 1 Lingbao wuliang duren shangpin miaojing, to be fully discussed in part 3.B.

The most complete study of the canonical Lingbao scriptures to date is Bokenkamp, "Sources of the Ling-pao scriptures."

1.B.3.a The Canonical Lingbao Scriptures

Lingbao wuliang duren shangpin miaojing 靈寶無量度人上品妙經 1

20 fols.

ca. 400

1 Lingbao duren jing 1 (fasc. 1)

“Most Excellent and Mysterious Book of the Marvelous Jewel That Saves Innumerable Human Beings.” This Book of Salvation (Duren jing 度人經), as it is generally known, is the most prominent scripture of the liturgical Lingbao tradition. It occupies the preeminent place in the Taoist canon, where it stands as the opening juan of the first text, the expanded sixty-one chapter version of the Song (960–1279; see section 3.B.6).

The scripture, spoken by the Tao, is divided into three parts. It begins with a long introductory nidāna-narrative that gives a detailed description of the original revelation and its marvelous efficacy. It states that in the past the sacred scripture appeared in the heavenly spheres of the nascent universe and was bestowed on the Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning (Yuanshi tianzun 元始天尊). He then promulgated the text by reciting it ten times. The entire pantheon of gods and saints of the Ten Directions (the eight points of the compass, the zenith, and the nadir) converged at the place of recitation. Here the Yuanshi tianzun suspended a pearl, the size of a small grain, in the void and made the myriad gods enter inside. After the tenfold recitation, the Tianzun transmitted the scripture to “me” (wo 我), meaning here both the Tao (or Daojun 道君) and the individual adept.

The revelation restored the universe to its original sinless state. Everyone henceforth cultivated their inborn goodness and no longer killed, injured, coveted, exhibited jealousy, debauched, robbed, or hated other beings. Nor did anyone abuse language by proffering either flattering or injurious words. Everyone loved each other, and all became close as kin. Not only all the living were saved, but also all ancestors.

The first part closes with instructions for the recitation of the scripture, which should be done in an oratory (shi 室, meaning jingshi 靜室) while burning incense. The formula given for the Opening of the Incense Burner (falü 發爐) rite (5b) is adapted from the Heavenly Master liturgy.

The core of the scripture is the second part (6a–14b). The title of Yuanshi wuliang duren shangpin miaojing 元始無量度人上品妙經 is repeated here. This part contains the essence of the scripture by revealing the “secretly rhyming sounds of hidden names of the great gods of the Thirty-two Heavens and of all other divine beings.” The recitation of the scripture activates this entire pantheon, including the Demon Kings and other celestial guardians.

The third part contains the revelation of the Innumerable Sounds of the Secret Language of the Great Brahman [Energies] of the Heavens (“Zhutian zhong dafan yinyu wuliang yin 諸天中大梵隱語無量音”; 17a–end). Here are found the stanzas on the creation of the universe, named Marvelous Writings of the Primordial Beginning (compare 22 Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing, q.v.). The stanzas of the Thirty-two Heavens are given here in three series: the higher, the middle, and the lower, totaling twelve hymns.

The date and authenticity of this text as an early Lingbao scripture are beyond doubt. The earliest known commentary to the Duren jing is that by Yan Dong 嚴東 (fl. 485) in 87 Yuanshi wuliang duren shangpin miaojing sizhu. Ōfuchi Ninji (“On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 51) has argued that the first nidāna-narrative part is not annotated by Yan and that it should therefore be a later addition, but his argument is not convincing.

The Duren jing has been immensely important in Taoist liturgy. It borrows from Buddhism not only many elements of form, vocabulary, and style, but also its very function as a text to be recited repeatedly for salvific ends, a function taken from the practice of Indian sūtra-reading and mantra-recitation. The prescribed tenfold psalmody has provided the framework for innumerable ritual performances. The esoteric aspect of the “sacred sounds and hidden names” has, moreover, inspired a great many mystical elaborations. This text corresponds to number 15 of the Lingbao corpus.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Fukui Kōjun, “Reihōkyō no kenkyū.”

Kristofer Schipper

Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing

元始五老赤書玉篇真文天書經

3 juan

ca. 400

22 (fasc. 26)

“Scripture on the True Writs of the Five Ancients of the Primordial Beginning, Red Writings in Celestial Script on Jade Tablets.” This scripture is also known under a number of variant titles, for example, Wupian zhenwen 五篇真文 or Dongxuan chishu jing 洞玄赤書經. Originally divided into two juan, it is one of the basic texts of the early Lingbao canon.

The True Writs came spontaneously into being even prior to the Primordial Beginning, launched the cosmogony, and have ever since been guarantors of the cosmic order. They are called “red writings” because they were refined in the fire of the Southern Heaven (1.1b). They form the core of this scripture, which reproduces them fu that help to ban demons and escape cosmic catastrophes, some can again be traced back to 388 Wufu xu 3.12a-14a. Furthermore, the scripture states the reason for establishing the six months of fasting and the ten fast days of each month: at these times the deities gathered in the various heavenly palaces and sent emissaries to earth to examine the offenses and merits of the people. Therefore it was especially during these times that one had to fast and observe the precepts (2.17b-3.7b) (fig. 15).

FIGURE 15. The True Writs of the East
(22 1.7b-8a)

The preface to the present scripture, quoted in the first half of the seventh century (1132 Shangqing dao leishi xiang 3.6b; 1129 Daojiao yishu 10.3b), is no longer extant. This text corresponds to number 1 of the Lingbao corpus.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kobayashi Masayoshi, "Reihō sekisho gohen shinbun."

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Taishang dongxuan lingbao chishu yujue miaojing

太上洞玄靈寶赤書玉訣妙經

2 juan

ca. 400

352 (fasc. 178)

"Lingbao Scripture of the Jade Instructions on the Red Writing" This text forms part of the early Lingbao canon (Ōfuchi Ninji, "On Ku Ling Pao Ching," 41-42, 46).

in "celestial script," a kind of seal script (zhuanwen 篆文; 1.7b-30a). For each of the Five Directions there exists a number of characters that, divided into four groups each, are inscribed in the various celestial palaces and have a fourfold effect: they register the names of the adepts on lists of immortality, warrant the correctness of the cosmic processes, dominate the demons, and control the divinities of the water in order to prevent floods. In addition, there are magic symbols (fu) for the Five Directions, taken from 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu 3.9b-11b (cf. Bokenkamp, "Sources," 454-56). The description of the Five Ancients (1.31a-35a) corresponds also, mostly verbatim, to 388 Wufu xu (1.11b-14b). Of another series of

It is complementary to 22 Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing, providing essentially explanations on how to put the heavenly revelations therein into practical use. In Ōfuchi's opinion, it originally comprised only one juan. However, the text itself (2.4b) and also 22 Yupian zhenwen 3.15b indicate a division into two juan.

The revelations of this scripture are addressed to a certain Wang Longci 王龍賜, exhorting him to save all people in the Ten Directions of space. The revelations begin with two series of Lingbao precepts (identical with 177 Taishang dongzhen zhihui shangpin dajie 1b-3a). A ritual for the redemption from sin follows. This is the Tou sanyuan yujian 投三元玉簡, in which the divinities of the Three Origins (Heaven, Earth, and Water) are supplicated by casting (tou 投) messages to them inscribed on wooden tablets (1.5a-8a). The subsequent part (1.8b-21a) is an elaboration on 22 Yupian zhenwen 1.7b-30a. It gives a rendering of the True Writs in terrestrial script (for textual differences, see Kobayashi Masayoshi, "Reihō sekisho gohen shinbun," 24-28) and explains various practices for their use. The instructions that follow for swallowing the fu of the Five Emperors and making a bamboo stick, into which the fu are sealed, refer to 22 Yupian zhenwen 1.35a-39b. The next paragraph has also been taken from this source.

Juan 2 contains—in addition to an avadāna story of worthy deeds in previous existences, probably adopted from the Longshi nü jing, 909c-910a (see Bokenkamp, "Sources," 474-75)—several other practices that have no direct counterpart in 22 Yupian zhenwen, for example, the ingestion of the Five Shoots (shi wuya 食五牙) in which the Five Ancients are visualized and, after they have been transmuted into the qi of the respective direction, incorporated by the adept and directed to the corresponding viscera (2.4b-14a). Not only the prologue, but also the fu with the names of the heavens and final formulas of invocation together with instructions for swallowing the qi are found—with slight variants—in 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu 1.11b-12a, 3.14b-16a, 3.21a-22a. The sacrifice (jiaojì 醮祭) to the five Lingbao emperors (2.20a-28b) is also based on 388 Wufu xu 3.4b-7b. Our text closes with directions for the ceremony for the transmission of the True Writs and magic symbols.

The commentary, which occasionally gives additional instructions, was probably written together with the scripture itself, since 1124 Dongxuan lingbao xuanmen dayi 11b already states that its date was not known with certainty.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kobayashi Masayoshi, "Reihō sekisho gohen shinbun."

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Dongxuan lingbao wulao shezhao beifeng guimo chishu yujue

洞玄靈寶五老攝召北酆鬼魔赤書玉訣

7 fols.

ca. 400

1297 (fasc. 1009)

“Jade-Instructions on the Red Writing of the Five Ancients about Summoning the Demons of [the Underworld] Beifeng.” This text corresponds to 352 Taishang dongxuan lingbao chishu yujue miaojing 1.24b–31a. The editor possessed only this fragment of the original work, since he remarks at the beginning: “Regrettably this version is incomplete (yuan que 原闕). A search for [the remainder] and the editing of a complete version still remain to be done.” This text and the preceding one correspond to number 2 of the Lingbao corpus.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Taishang dongxuan lingbao kongdong lingzhang 太上洞玄靈寶空洞靈章

Six Dynasties (220–589)

Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2399

“Marvelous Stanzas of the Void Caverns.” This scripture of the canonical Lingbao corpus is missing from the Ming Daozang. A large part of the text has, however, been recovered from the Dunhuang manuscripts (see Ōfuchi Ninji, “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 47, and Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō, Zurokuhen, 2–8).

The manuscript Pelliot 2399 contains 245 lines of sixteen characters. This is approximately equivalent to twelve folios in the 1926 reprint of the Ming Daozang and appears to represent the entire scripture, with the exception of the opening sentences. The title of the scripture is given at the end of the manuscript and is identical to that found in the catalogue of the canonical Lingbao scriptures, the Lingbao jingmu 靈寶經目.

The text opens with the description of a festive gathering and banquet at the court of the Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning (Yuanshi tianzun 元始天尊). There each of the sovereigns (di 帝) of the Thirty-two Heavens in turn sings a hymn extolling the blissful beauty and joy that reigns in their respective divine precincts, a meritorious deed that saves countless creatures. These stanzas (zhang 章) occupy the major part of the present scripture. The final part of the text is again in prose and describes the delights and paradise-like conditions resulting from the recitation of the scripture by gods and humans alike.

Like most other stanzas in the Lingbao scriptures, the present thirty-two hymns were incorporated in liturgy, to be sung during the rites of circumambulation. WSBY 29 contains the complete text of the hymns for this very purpose (see Bokenkamp, “Sources,” 479). The present text corresponds to number 3 of the Lingbao corpus.

Kristofer Schipper

Dongxuan lingbao yujing shan buxu jing 洞玄靈寶玉京山步虛經

10 fols.

ca. 400

1439 (fasc. 1059)

“Lingbao Scripture on Pacing the Void at Jade-Capital Mountain.” This work belongs to the original Lingbao corpus. It is listed in the first part of the Lingbao jingmu 靈寶經目 as Shengxuan buxu zhang 昇玄步虛章 (Stanzas on Ascending to the Mysterious and Pacing the Void). The initial part of the text, describing the celestial regions, shows in its present version distinct differences from the quotations in WSBY and 1123 Yiqie daojing yinyi miaomen youqi 2b, 11a. The core of the work is made up of ten stanzas that describe the ascent to the celestial Mount Yujing (where the Lingbao scriptures are concealed) and the gathering with immortals and zhenren, during which, via the recitation of the scriptures to the accompaniment of Taishang, all suffering is eliminated. The stanzas are followed by several hymns (three of which were adapted from the Shangqing tradition; cf. Bokenkamp, “Sources,” 443–45) in praise of the Lingbao scriptures. A short biography of GE XUAN (also quoted in 1123 Yiqie daojing yinyi miaomen youqi 26b) concludes our text.

The practices of visualization (3a), like those concerning the circumambulation of the altar (gaozuo 高座; cf. 524 Dongxuan lingbao zhai shuo guang zhu jie fa deng zhu-yuan yi 11b), and of the chanting of the stanzas during the Lingbao Retreat are similar to the ones prescribed in 425 Shangqing Taiji yinzhu yujing baojue 5b–6a, 7b, 9b. The stanzas and some of the hymns are cited—with some variations—in LU XIUJING’s ritual 528 Taishang dongxuan lingbao shoudu yi 38b–41a, 23b–25a in connection with the transmission of the Lingbao canon. Furthermore, hymns from the present work can also be found in two other scriptures from the ancient Lingbao corpus, 344 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhihui benyuan dajie shangpin jing 7b–8a and 425 Shangqing Taiji yinzhu yujing baojue 18a–20a.

An annotated edition of the Yujing shan jing quoted in 1132 Shangqing dao leisbi xiang 3.1b is no longer extant. The present text corresponds to number 4 of the Lingbao corpus.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Schipper, “A study of Buxu.”

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Dongxuan lingbao ziran jiutian shengshen zhang jing

洞玄靈寶自然九天生神章經

15 + 2 fols.

ca. 400

318 (fasc. 165)

"Stanzas of the Life Spirits of the Nine Heavens." One of the most fundamental texts of the Lingbao corpus, its present version having been slightly altered as a result of later additions. The Nine Treasure Stanzas (8a–9b) appear to be a later addition (see Ōfuchi Ninji, "On Ku Ling Pao Ching," 47, and the next article on 165 Lingbao ziran jiutian shengshen sanbao dayou jinshu). The original version, that is 1a–8a and 9b–14b, is given in YJQQ 16.

The scripture can be divided into three parts. The first part (1a–4b) describes the eras that have preceded our present world and that were governed in succession by the Three Treasures: Tianbao 天寶, Lingbao 靈寶, and Shenbao 神寶. These figures represent the Three Primordial Qi or Pneumata, assimilated to the Three Caverns (sandong 三洞) and the Three Pure Ones (sangqing 三清). They create the Ten Thousand Things. This cosmogony is similar to the development of the fetus, and, therefore, the Intendant of the Nine Heavens (Jiutian Sima 九天司馬) chants these hymns every time a child is born. By analogy, the disciple may recite them and thus assemble the entire pantheon in his or her body and consecrate it.

The second part (5a–8a) tells of the revelation of the hymns by the Yuanshi tianzun 元始天尊, in order to save the Seed People (zhongmin 種民) at the forthcoming apocalypse of the imminent sexagesimal year 21 (jiashen 甲申). After this nidāna-style introduction, the third part (8a–15a) presents the nine hymns, each one corresponding to one of the Nine Heavens, followed by poems by the Taiji zhenren 太極真人.

An appendix features the tale of a miracle that occurred at the beginning of the Song dynasty as a result of the recitation of the present scripture. There exist three commentaries to this work (396, 397, and 398).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kobayashi Masayoshi, "Kyūten shōshin shōkyō no keisei to Sandō setsu"; Gauchet, "Un livre taoïque, le Cheng-chen king."

Kristofer Schipper

Lingbao ziran jiutian shengshen sanbao dayou jinshu

靈寶自然九天生神三寶大有金書

9 fols.

ca. 400

165 (fasc. 73)

"Golden Writing from the Dayou [i.e., a palace in the Yuqing Heaven] of the Three Treasures [i.e., the three divinities Tianbao 天寶, Lingbao 靈寶, and Shenbao 神寶]." The text is identical with 318 Dongxuan lingbao ziran jiutian shengshen zhangjing 1a–9b, where the present title figures as a subtitle, except that the stanzas of the Nine Heavens and the two hymns of Taiji zhenren 太極真人 are not included.

In YJQQ 16.1a, Sanbao dayou jinshu is used as an alternative title for the whole Jiutian shengshen zhang jing. A Yuan commentary (398 Dongxuan lingbao ziran jiutian shengshen zhang jing zhu 1.1b), however, applies this title only to the part of the Jiutian shengshen zhang jing that describes the genesis and the propagation of the nine stanzas. This text and the preceding one correspond to number 5 of the Lingbao corpus.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

FIGURE 16. The fu of the Western direction (671 1.6b–7a). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/666)

Taishang wuji dadao ziran zhenyi wucheng fu shangjing

太上無極大道自然真一五稱符上經

2 juan

ca. 400

671 (fasc. 352)

"Supreme Scripture of the Most High Boundless Great Tao and the Spontaneously [Created] True-and-One Symbols of the Five Correspondences." This scripture forms part of the original Lingbao canon. It is listed in the first part of the Lingbao jingmu 靈寶經目 as having one juan. Citations in WSBY and SDZN as well as in the Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2440 correspond to the present text but do not indicate a division into two juan. Thus the latter division was probably not introduced before the late Tang (618–907; Ōfuchi Ninji, "On Ku Ling Pao Ching," 37, 47–48; Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 20–26; Zurokuhen, 10–22).

The core of the scripture is the revelation of the five symbols that are correlated to the Five Planets, Five Peaks, Five Viscera, and so on, and their practical application by Taoist masters and lay believers (baixing 百姓) for the healing of diseases (1.3a–11b; fig. 16). Juan 2 describes the practice of carving male and female figurines from the roots of the zhangju 章拒 plant. These figurines function as helpers and establish contacts with the Eight Archivists (bashi 八史), who in their turn enable humans to communicate with the gods (2.1a–8a). Engraving the fu contained in this scripture onto heavy stones is recommended as a simplified method for lay believers, from the emperor down to the common people. The twenty-four Lingbao diagrams (2.11b–12b) that one is to receive after the fu come from 1407 Dongxuan lingbao ershi sheng tujing. The present text corresponds to number 6 of the corpus.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Taishang lingbao zhutian neiyin ziran yuzi* 太上靈寶諸天內音自然玉字

4 juan

ca. 400

97 (fasc. 49)

“Lingbao Scripture on the Esoteric Sounds of the Spontaneously Created Jade-Characters in the Various Heavens.” The text belongs to the early Lingbao canon and is listed in the Lingbao jingmu as having two juan. But probably by the sixth century it was divided into four juan. The present version is possibly incomplete (cf. Ōfuchi Ninji, “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 37, 48).

The work reveals the names of the Thirty-two Heavens (eight in each of the four directions) and eight jade characters in celestial script that are scattered in each of the heavens (1.1b–14a). These characters, intended for the salvation of the believers and their ancestors, are in the “hidden language of the great Brahma” (dafan yinyu 大梵隱語). The text gives details about the celestial palaces, gates, and so on. where the characters are located, their functions, the times at which the adept is to write and ingest these characters as well as the effects of this practice (1.15a–2.18b). The second half of the text provides the “terrestrial reading” and explains both the meaning of the individual jade characters, giving for each heaven a “cavern-stanza” (dongzhang 洞章) into which the eight characters are interwoven, and illustrates the effect of their recitation.

The names of the Thirty-two Heavens and the 256 jade characters are identical with 1 Lingbao wuliang duren shangpin miaojing 1.7b–9b, 1.16b–17b. The present text corresponds to number 7 of the Lingbao corpus.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhihui zuigen shangpin dajie jing

太上洞玄靈寶智慧罪根上品大戒經

2 juan

Ca. 400

457 (fasc. 202)

“Lingbao Scripture on the Supreme Great Rules of Wisdom Concerning the Roots of Guilt.” The term zuigen 罪根 (roots of guilt) denotes bad deeds and offenses against the religious precepts; these transgressions lead to hell.

This scripture, considered by Ōfuchi as possibly incomplete, is part of the early Lingbao canon (see his “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 37, 42, 48). Its first juan describes the transmission of the scripture from the Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning to the Most High Lord of the Tao. The Heavenly Worthy explains the gradual decline of humanity in the course of the five kalpas—from the original blissful state down to the introduction of registers of sin—and lists five series of precepts (1.4a–9b): the Ten Precepts for creating good karma, the Ten Superior Prescriptions, the Ten Evils (to be avoided), and the Twelve Rules to be observed. The latter can be also be found in 177 Taishang dongzhen zhihui shangpin dajie 2b–4b.

In juan 2, the Heavenly Worthy visits the worlds in the Ten Directions of space, where he sees people suffering in hell. From the different deities he learns about the causes of their suffering and by what penitence they may be reborn in a particular form after a determined period of time (cf. 455 Taishang xuanyi zhenren shuo santu wuku quanjie jing). Souls be saved from hell, especially by following the methods outlined in the Mingzhen ke (i.e., 1411 Dongxuan lingbao changye zhi fu jiuyou yugui mingzhen ke). The present text corresponds to number 8 of the Lingbao corpus.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Taishang dongzhen zhihui shangpin dajie* 太上洞真智慧上品大戒

16 fols.

ca. 400

177 (fasc. 77)

“Great Superior Rules of Wisdom.” The classification in the Dongzhen division, as indicated by its title, must be a later alteration since in early works like Lingbao jingmu 靈寶經目 and WSBY this scripture is entitled “Dongxuan 洞玄 [lingbao 靈寶].”

Often simply named Dajie jing, it can be regarded as one of the basic collections for rules and precepts within the Lingbao tradition. It describes the transmission of six series of rules from the Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning to the Most High Lord of the Tao. These are the Ten Precepts (1b–2b) together with the Twelve Rules to be Observed (2b–4b). Anyone who accepts them obtains the grade of an Adept of Pure Faith (qingxin dizi 清信弟子; cf. 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 4.5a; the subsequent Rules for Blocking the Six Sense Organs [6a–7a] also pertain to this grade). Then follow the Rules for Salvation of Living Beings (7a–8a), the Exhortations to the Ten Good Deeds (8a–9b), and finally seven Rules Concerning the Retribution of Merits (13b–15b).

Passages from this scripture (1a–6a) were adopted in an abbreviated form by LU XIUJING (see 524 Dongxuan lingbao zhai shuo guang zhu jie fa deng zhuyuan yi 8a–10b).

For Dunhuang manuscripts of this scripture, see Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Moku-rokuhen, 29–33; Zurokuhen, 30–37. The present text corresponds to number 9 of the Lingbao corpus.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Dongxuan lingbao yulu jianwen sanyuan weiyi ziran zhenjing

洞玄靈寶玉籙簡文三元威儀自然真經

10 fols.

Ca. 400

530 (fasc. 295)

“Tablets of the Jade Register, for the Ceremonial of the Three Principles.” This “True and Spontaneous Scripture” contains only the third and last part—that of the Jade Register of the Median Principle (zhongyuan yulu 中元玉籙)—of the original work, which is one of the fundamental texts of the Lingbao liturgy. The two other parts are the Tablet of the Golden Register of the Superior Principle (shangyuan jinlu jianwen 上元金籙簡文) and the Yellow Register of the Inferior Principle (xiayuan huanglu jianwen 下元黃籙簡文). The Lingbao jing shumu lists a Taishang dongxuan lingbao jinlu jianwen sanyuan weiyi ziran zhenyi jing 太上洞玄靈寶金籙簡文三元威儀自然真一經, which should correspond to the complete scripture. Indeed, as indicated by our text (10a), the three parts (sanbu 三部) contained altogether 240 articles, which amounts to some 80 articles for each part. The present text contains 81 articles, whereas the numerous quotations in WSBY 34–37, 39, 42, 48, and passim (for the Jinlu jianwen), in WSBY 54 (for the Huanglu jianwen), as well as in 507 Taishang huanglu zhaiyi 55 and 56 enable us to supplement several dozens of articles. It should, moreover, be noted that the scripture is listed in 508 Wushang huanglu dazhai licheng yi 1.5b simply as Dongxuan lingbao sanyuan weiyi ziran jing 洞玄靈寶三元威儀自然經, omitting the specification jinlu of the early catalogue. This omission induced Ōfuchi Ninji to reject the authenticity of the present work (“On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 49).

The first part of the scripture dealt, among other things, with the rites for establishing the altar and the protocols for entering or leaving it. The second part, which is preserved here, essentially concerns the rules that govern the relationship between master and disciple. The last part speaks of the rites of salvation through the extirpation of the roots of guilt (badu zuigen 拔度罪根). These are the rites of the Retreat of the Yellow Register (Huanglu zhai 黃籙齋). WSBY 54, containing the classical ritual for this Retreat, is entirely composed of quotations from our scripture (compare also the Dunhuang manuscripts Pelliot 3148, Pelliot 3663, DX 158, reproduced in Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Zurokuhen, 38–42).

The present text corresponds to number 10 of the Lingbao corpus.

Kristofer Schipper

Dongxuan lingbao changye zhi fu jiuyou yugui mingzhen ke

洞玄靈寶長夜之府九幽玉匱明真科

39 fols.

ca. 400

14II (fasc. 1052)

“Liturgy of the Sworn [reading ming in the sense of meng 盟, as does WSBY 51] Alliance with the Zhenren, Kept in the Jade Chest of the Nine Realms of Darkness, in the Department of the Long Night [the regions of death and damnation].” This scripture was revealed by the Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning for the salvation of all beings.

The hells described here are the twelve infernal regions, introduced in 457 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhihui zuigen shangping dajie jing. Those who dwell there are judged according to the Recompenses for the Twelve Meritorious Deeds (shi shan yinyuan 十善因緣) and the Punishment for the Fourteen Evil Acts (shisi zuibao 十四罪報).

The main part of this long text (from 15b onward) is devoted to different rituals for the salvation of the dead. The first ritual is intended for the release from all forms of retribution (zuifu yuandui badu shangpin 罪福緣對拔度上品). This service corresponds to the Retreat of the Alliance with the zhenren, Mengzhen zhai 盟真齋 in WSBY 51, which the faithful should practice at home for more than eighty days a year. Addressing prayers and confessions to the gods of the ten directions, the faithful were to strike the ground with their foreheads and slap their faces (bojia 搏頰) some 660 times during a single service.

A second ritual (25b–37a) aims at delivering the country from all kinds of disasters. This ritual is found in WSBY 53 as the Retreat of the Golden Register (jinlu zhai 金籙齋) and constitutes the earliest Taoist ritual to be performed for the welfare of the state. The sacred area is built around the Five True Writs (wuzhen wen 五真文; see 22 Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing). The participants’ hair is disheveled and their faces are smeared with mud, as in the Retreat of Mud and Charcoal (tutan zhai 塗炭齋; see 1278 Dongxuan lingbao wuguan wen).

At the end of our text there is a short presentation of the rites of Casting Dragons (toulong 投龍) on the occasion of the transmission of the ten scriptures of the Lingbao.

These rites have been further codified and annotated in LU XIUJING's 410 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhongjian wen. The present text corresponds to number 11 of the Lingbao corpus.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhibui dingzhi tongwei jing

太上洞玄靈寶智慧定志通微經

25 fols.

ca. 400

325 (fasc. 167)

"Most High Lingbao Scripture on Wisdom, Fixing the Will and Penetrating the Sublime." This text, with the variant title Siwei dingzhi jing 思微定志經, belongs to the early Lingbao canon. All quotations of the work in WSBY and Bianzheng lun 8.544a correspond with the present text. A quotation in Dunhuang manuscript Stein 1438 (Daojiao yi 道教義; Ōfuchi Ninji, Tōnkō dōkyō: Zurokuhen, 735, line 30), which Ōfuchi claims to be missing in our text, can be reconstructed almost in its entirety from the diagram on 6a–b (fig. 17). A Dunhuang manuscript of the Siwei dingzhi jing (Pelliot 5563; Ōfuchi Ninji, Tōnkō dōkyō: Zurokuhen, 53) shows only minor variants to 18b–20a of the present version.

The main issue of the text concerns the transmission of a two-part contract in the form of a cosmic diagram (liangban lunzhuan tu 兩半輪轉圖) and of the Ten Precepts to the zhenren Zuoxuan 左玄真人 and Youxuan 右玄真人 by Lingbao tianzun. Interspersed are a number of parables patterned after the Buddhist avadāna, such as the account on the previous existence of the two zhenren as a charitable married couple (9a–15b), as well as various hymns. Buddhist influence is explicit in this text: the first five of the Ten Precepts correspond to the pañca-sila, while the tenth precept is a formulation of the Mahāyānist bodhisattva vow. Taoism and Buddhism, represented by Zuoxuan zhenren and Youxuan zhenren, are understood as being "two ways leading to one goal" (er tu gui yi 二塗歸一). The difference seems to be of a formal kind: as opposed to the Buddhists, who from the beginning renounce all worldly possessions, the Taoist adepts must provide pledges (faxin 法信) for their ordination. The present text corresponds to number 12 of the Lingbao corpus.

FIGURE 17. The Memory Palace for meditating on the Tao and for the practice of joining the two parts (325 6a–b).

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhenyi quanjie falun miaojing

太上洞玄靈寶真一勸誡法輪妙經

6 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

346 (fasc. 177)

"Scripture of the Wheel of the Law to Encourage [Good] and Prohibit [Evil Deeds]." The present text is the first of four fragments that belonged originally to a single work entirely devoted to karma and retribution. The other fragments are: 348 Taishang xuanyi zhenren shuo quanjie falun miaojing, 455 Taishang xuanyi zhenren shuo santu wuku quanjie jing, and 347 Taishang xuanyi zhenren shuo miaotong zhuan shen ruding jing. These last three texts are found as a single book among the Dunhuang manuscripts (Stein 1605 and Stein 1906; see Ōfuchi Ninji, "On Ku Ling Pao Ching," 50). The beginning of the work, which is lacking in those manuscripts, must correspond to the text we have here. The whole, therefore, can be identified as the Scripture of the Wheel of the Law [Expounding] Sins and Blessings (Falun zuifu 法輪罪福) in three juan, as listed in the Lingbao jing shumu 靈寶經書目.

The text describes the circumstances of the revelation of the Scripture of the Wheel of the Law to Taiji zuo xiangong 太極左仙公 (GE XUAN). While the saint is practicing the Tao on Mount Tiantai 天台, three zhenren of the Most High Mysterious One (Taishang xuanyi zhenren 太上玄一真人) visit him. They are his divine Masters of Transmission (dushi 度師), whereas the Taiji zhenren 太極真人 Xu Laile 徐來勒 is his guarantor (bao 保). Each of the three zhenren reveals one part of the practice, which forms the subject of the texts in the next three articles.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang xuanyi zhenren shuo quanjie falun miaojing

太上玄一真人說勸誡法輪妙經

7 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

348 (fasc. 177)

“Scripture of the Book of the Wheel, Spoken by the Zhenren of the Most High Mysterious One.” This text continues the preceding 346 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhenyi quanjie falun miaojing.

The revelation of the Wheel of the Law has a marvelous efficacy that enables all beings to leave the cycle of transmigration and enter nirvāṇa (miedu 滅度). Through their asceticism, the true hermits move the Void Sovereign, Xuhuang 虛皇, who, after innumerable kalpas, bestows on them the present scripture. Humans of all ways of life can enter into samādhi thanks to this revelation. Lay people, by their religious practice, may obtain Delivery of the Corpse (shijie 尸解). All persons, priests or lay, inspired by the teachings of the Great Vehicle (fa dacheng zhi xin 發大乘之心) can gain merit and salvation by lighting oil lamps, abandoning their riches, giving donations to the poor, and by sacrificing a part or the totality of their bodies. The text closes with three rhymed gāthās and an epilogue.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang xuanyi zhenren shuo santu wuku quanjie jing

太上玄一真人說三途五苦勸誡經

11 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

455 (fasc. 202)

“Scripture of Encouragement and Prohibition, [in order to Escape from] the Three [Bad] Destinies and the Five Sufferings.” This is the second chapter of the Book of the Wheel of the Law (Falun jing 法輪經), revealed by the second zhenren of the Mysterious One (see the two preceding articles).

First, the Tao expounds the laws of retribution. Thereupon, He (i.e., the Tao) leaves the heavens eight times through the gates of the eight directions and discovers humans submitted to the severest tortures in hell. The devas who administer these regions explain to him that those beings atone for their sins. The merciful Tao announces the salvation of all, thanks to his Wheel of the Law and the teachings of Exhortations and Prohibitions. Through the eight gates opened by the Tao, all will enter into nirvāṇa. At the end, there is a short epilogue on meritorious deeds, as well as three rhymed gāthās.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang xuanyi zhenren shuo miaotong zhuan shen ruding jing

太上玄一真人說妙通轉神入定經

9 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

347 (fasc. 177)

“Scripture of Entering Samādhi of Marvelous Perception and Conversion of the Spirit, Spoken by the Zhenren of the Most High Mysterious One.” This is the final chapter of the Falun jing 法輪經 (see the three preceding articles).

This part consists essentially in the enumeration of forty-five commemorations (nian 念) to guide the mind toward concentration on good deeds and universal salvation as in Mahāyāna Buddhism (see Zürcher, “Buddhist influence,” 112).

At the end of the text, we find, as usual, instructions concerning the transmission of the scripture and the necessary pledges of precious objects. Finally, there is a passage devoted to the merits of reciting the scripture, which enables the disciple to overcome all dangers and to become an immortal in the Palace of the Grand Bourne (Taiji gong 太極宮). This text and the three preceding ones correspond to number 14 of the Lingbao corpus.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang zhutian lingshu duming miaojing 太上諸天靈書度命妙經

19 fols.

ca. 400

23 (fasc. 26)

“Most High Miraculous Book of Salvation in the Numinous Writing of the Numerous Heavens.” This text belongs to the original Lingbao scriptures. Citations in WSBY, SDZN, and in Buddhist works correspond to the present text, although some of them are considerably abridged or give variant readings (compare, e.g., Xiaodao lun 9.150b with our text, 14b–15a).

The Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning reveals this scripture in the five paradisiacal regions in order to preserve for all eternity the good fortune the inhabitants of these realms have enjoyed since the revelation of the Lingbao scriptures in the mythical Longhan 龍漢 era. Otherwise it might disappear in the periodic epochs of decline. Now, too, the peoples of remote border regions, to whom the blessings of a revelation had never before been extended, are at last included in the scheme of universal salvation. At the end of the “greater and smaller eras,” lesser teachings—such as gymnastics (daoyin 導引), Tending Life (yangsheng 養生) practices, and the talismans and diagrams of the Taiqing tradition and the Taiping dao jing 太平道經—will also perish, while the scriptures of the Three Caverns shall outlive all catastrophes. The text concludes with four stanzas addressed to the Four Heavenly Rulers (sitian diwang 四 天帝王) which form the core of the revelation. This text corresponds to number 16 of the Lingbao corpus.

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Taishang dongxuan lingbao miedu wulian shengshi miaojing

太上洞玄靈寶滅度五鍊生尸妙經

19 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

369 (fasc. 181)

“Scripture of Nirvāṇa [Obtained] by the Fivefold Refinement of Living Beings and Corpses.” This work contains the revelations of the sacred writs insuring the repose, purification and salvation of the dead in their tombs.

These writs, reproduced here in sacred characters (zhenwen 真文), correspond to the esoteric sounds of the heavens (zhutian neiyin 諸天內音; see 97 Taishang lingbao zhutian neiyin ziran yuzi). The writs must be copied on five stones and buried at the edges and in the center of the tomb. Each writ is accompanied by a talismanic order (fuming 符命) in the name of the Law of Nüqing, the ancient Code of Alliance with the zhenren (Mengzhen jiutian Nüqing wen 盟真九天女青文).

The present work appears to be incomplete. Two versions have been found among the Dunhuang manuscripts (Pelliot 2865 and Stein 298) that contain an appendix. It includes a yellow memorial (huangzhang 黃章) to be presented at the time of the burial of the inscribed stones and a few accounts of the efficacy of this rite (see also 1292 Huangzeng zhangfa).

On the practice of the ritual in connection with requiem services (qianshen yi 遷神儀) during the Tang dynasty (618–907), see DU GUANGTING, 507 Taishang huanglu zhaiyi 57.1b, quoting the liturgist ZHANG WANFU. The present text corresponds to number 17 of the Lingbao corpus.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang dongxuan lingbao sanyuan pinjie gongde qingzhong jing

太上洞玄靈寶三元品戒功德輕重經

38 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

456 (fasc. 202)

“Scripture of Great and Minor Merits, and the Classified Rules of the Three Principles.” A large part of the text is quoted in WSBY 44. This quotation corresponds to the Rules of the Three Principles, which are divided into three groups of sixty interdictions, each group being placed under the aegis of one of the Three Officials (sanguan 三官).

The first part of the work gives a detailed description of the administrative configuration. Each sphere of the universe (Heaven, Earth, and Water) contains one palace and three prefectures (fu 府). Each prefecture has either twelve offices (for Heaven) or fourteen (for Earth and Water), for a total of one hundred and twenty. Each office keeps records on merits and sins. The accounts are verified on the fifteenth day of the first, seventh, and tenth moons. Then the names of those who have merited long life are transcribed on a Green Register (qingbu 青簿) and a Jade Calendar (yuli 玉曆). Those who shall go into the Nine Realms of Darkness (jiuyou 九幽) have their names inscribed on the Black Book (heibu 黑簿). This entire administration is present not only in the heavens but also inside the human body.

The text often refers to the authority of Nüqing 女青, the Pole Star (beiji 北極), who has created the institutions of the Three Officials and the code of prohibitions. It also refers to the ritual of the Alliance with the zhenren (Mingzhen kefa 明真科法; see 1411 Dongxuan lingbao changye zhi fu jiuyou yugui mingzhen ke, number 11 of the corpus), as well as to the precepts of wisdom (Zhihui shangpin 智慧上品; see 457 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhihui zuigen shangpin dajie jing, number 8 of the corpus). Finally, for the ritual of pardon of sins, our text refers to a Sanyuan xiezui fa 三元謝罪法, which may correspond to 417 Taishang dadao sanyuan pinjie xiezui shangfa. The present text corresponds to number 18 of the Lingbao corpus.

Kristofer Schipper

Dongxuan lingbao ershisi sheng tujing 洞玄靈寶二十四生圖經

48 fols.

ca. 400

1407 (fasc. 1051)

“Lingbao Scripture on the Diagrams of the Twenty-four Vital Energies.” This scripture of the ancient Lingbao corpus is obviously modeled on earlier texts since not only its title but also the names of the twenty-four individual diagrams are given in almost identical form in the works listed in BPZ 17 and 19 (see Bokenkamp, “Sources,” 458–60).

After ingesting the talismans for introspection (Dongxuan neiguan yufu 洞玄內觀玉符), Housheng Lijun 后聖李君, the ruler over the saints of the future world (cf. 442 Shangqing housheng daojun lieji), has a vision of the original cosmic configuration of the Twenty-four Qi or Pneumata, manifest in three superimposed divisions of Eight Effulgences. These are projections of the vital energies of his own body, and appear as sacred diagrams of characters written in the sky (fig. 18). The present text represents Lord Li’s record of his meditative experience. Set to music, the diagrams are also rendered in the form of twenty-four hymns (plus a twenty-fifth, serving as the basis for the others). Twenty-four fu are used to invoke the corresponding divinities in the three centers of the body. They are followed by the formula for transmission together with the secret names of the five māras (魔王) acting as guarantors during transmission, and finally by a three-part register (lu 錄) of all subordinate physical divinities.

FIGURE 18. Four of the Eight Superior Effulgences of the vital energies (1407 6b–8b). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/1388)

The application and benefit of the twenty-four different diagrams are discussed in 671 Taishang wuji dadao ziran zhenyi wucheng fu shang jing 2.11b–12b.

LU XIUJING refers to the present work as a fundamental register of the Lingbao tradition, on which he bases the rite of exteriorization of the officials (chuguan 出官) within the ritual of transmission he himself authorized (see 528 Taishang dongxuan lingbao shoudu yi, preface and 13b–19a). The present text corresponds to number 19 of the Lingbao corpus.

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Taishang lingbao wufu xu 太上靈寶五符序

3 juan

Eastern Jin (317–420)

388 (fasc. 183)

“The Five Fu, Powerful Treasure of the Most High.” The word xu in the title, normally translated “preface,” refers rather to the text as such (Kaltenmark, “Quelques remarques,” 5). This and other features of the text, according to Kaltenmark, betray its close relationship to the apocryphal weishu 緯書 commentaries of the Han. In its present form, however, it postdates GE HONG (283–343), whom it mentions (2.22b) and quotes (3.5a). The title does not correspond to the content of the extant work, for the text no longer deals exclusively with the famous Five Fu but constitutes an anthology of Taiqing Taoism—that is, Taoism of the Han dynasty and Three Kingdoms period (206 B.C.–A.D. 265).

FIGURE 19. The Lingbao talisman of the north (388 3.11b).

This is the Taoism of the great myths concerning, in particular, the transmission of the Five Fu by the mythical ruler Yu 禹 (1.1a–11a, 3.1a–3a); the quest for the explanation of the Book of the True One by the Yellow Emperor (3.16b–22a); formulas (juan 2) and Lord Lao’s revelations (3.13a); the Offering, including meat and wine (3.3a–7b); the body with numerous souls, lacking system, but made in the image of nature (1.19b–25a); and the seekers of immortality, hermits who enter the mountains to collect medicinal plants (1.15b–16a). The Five Fu themselves seem to have been especially used to protect the adept in the mountains, for they are preceded by a table of auspicious days for “entering the mountain” (3.3b–9a; the same information is also found in BPZ 17) (see fig. 19).

As Isabelle Robinet has shown, the antiquity of the main parts of the Wufu xu is confirmed by its close connection with the Sanhuang wen 三皇文 and with such texts as 1168 Taishang laojun zhongjing (Robinet, La révélation du Shangqing, 1:26–34). It was only much later that the Wufu xu was linked to the so-called “new” Lingbao texts—no doubt in order to lend them an aura of greater prestige (Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 234). This text corresponds to number 20 of the Lingbao corpus.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bokenkamp, “Sources,” 450–58, 483–84; CGF 64–66; Kaltenmark, “Ling-pao”; idem, “Quelques remarques sur le T'ai-chang Ling-pao wou-fu sin”; Kobayashi Masayoshi, “Taijō reihō gofu jo.”

John Lagerwey

Shangqing taiji yinshu yujing baojue 上清太極隱注玉經寶訣

20 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

425 (fasc. 194)

“Precious Instructions on the Jade Scriptures, a Secret Commentary by the [Zhenren of the] Supreme Pole.” This scripture belongs to those of the Lingbao canon transmitted to GE XUAN in eleven juan (see Ōfuchi Ninji, “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 40, 53). The present text, to which LU XIUJING also refers in 528 Taishang dongxuan lingbao shoudu yi 38a–b (cf. 3a of the present text), has presumably not been preserved in its entirety: thirteen citations are given in WSBY, but one of them (37.1a) can no longer be found in our text.

The work deals with the ritual prescriptions for the transmission, recitation, copying, and so on, of sacred scriptures. The division of these scriptures into categories is of great interest. Thus the Dongzhen group of the Three Caverns (sandong 三洞) is said to comprise the Dadong zhenjing 大洞真經 and, directly related to it, the Xiaomo zhihui jing 消魔智慧經, as well as the Feixing yujing 飛行玉經. The Lingbao scriptures fall into the Dongxuan 洞玄 division, while the Sanhuang wen 三皇文 belong to the Dongshen 洞神 division. The prefix Shangqing 上清 is conferred on all scriptures of the Three Caverns. They fit into the higher category (shangpin 上品), and together they have their place of honor in the north. For the scriptures of the middle category (zhongpin 中品) no titles are listed, but they include all texts that do not belong to the main scriptures of the Three Caverns. Their place of honor is in the east (11a–b). The records of the personal attainments of the immortals (xianren benye zhuan 仙人本業傳), collected under the title Scriptures on the Traces of the Tao (Daoji jing 道跡經), form a final category with its place of honor in the west (13b).

The Daode jing 道德經 has a special status. Although its transmission is unrestricted, it is ranked with the higher category and is venerated together with the scriptures of the Sandong in the north.

The present text thus describes a division of the Taoist scriptures that gives no priority to the Maoshan tradition and does not even consider it as a separate entity. The same concept of the Three Caverns can also be found in other works belonging to the early Lingbao canon: 532 Taiji zhenren fu lingbao zhaijie weiyi zhujing yaojue 12a–b, 19a–20a; and 1114 Taishang dongxuan lingbao benxing suyuan jing 10b–11a. The present text corresponds to number 21 in the Lingbao corpus.

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhenwen yaojie shangjing

太上洞玄靈寶真文要解上經

16 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

330 (fasc. 167)

“Supreme Scripture with Essential Explanations on the Most High Lingbao Writs.” This text belongs to the early Lingbao canon, more precisely, to the eleven juan of texts purportedly transmitted to GE XUAN. It is quoted in WSBY 32.18a and Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2455, Lingbao ziran zhaiyi 靈寶自然齋儀 (Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Zurokuhen, 146, line 32). Rather than offering a commentary on the Five True Writs of the Lingbao tradition, our text deals with the liturgical practice centering on them.

An introductory account on the genesis of the Five True Writs, which plainly relies on 22 Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing 1a–2b, is followed by an enumeration of the twelve universal virtues of the cosmic symbols (shier de 十二德) and the twelve vows (shier yuan 十二願). The latter, as well as the subsequent invocations addressed to the protective deities of the Five Directions (weiling shenzhou 衛靈神咒), are basic elements of the typical Lingbao ritual (see, e.g., 528 Taishang dongxuan lingbao shoudu yi 10a–11b). Also basic ritual are the statements of repentance and the requests for pardon addressed to the Ten Directions (chanxie shifang 懺謝十方; a variant of these addresses is found, e.g., in 1411 Dongxuan lingbao changye zhi fu jinyou yugui mingzhen ke 17b–24a). The hymns, as well as directions for paying homage to Donghai qingtong jun 東海青童君 and Dadao yuchen jun 大道玉晨君 at the end of the text, are borrowed from the early Maoshan literature (see 1016 Zhen'gao 3.9a–b; 3.16a–b, 9.15a–b). This text corresponds to number 22 of the Lingbao corpus.

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Taishang taiji taixu shang zhenren yan taishang Lingbao weiyi dongxuan zhenyi ziran jing jue 太上太極太虛上真人演太上靈寶威儀洞玄真一自然經訣

Six Dynasties (220–589)

Dunhuang manuscripts Pelliot 2356, 2403, and 2452

“Instructions Concerning the Spontaneous Scriptures of the True One, for the Ceremonial of the Lingbao, as Expounded by the Superior Zhenren of the Great Ultimate and Void.” Among the present three manuscript fragments, presumably of the same work, only one (Pelliot 2452) gives a title at the end of the text, and that reads simply: “Instructions Concerning the Scriptures for the Ceremonial of the Lingbao, First Part” (Lingbao weiyi jing jue shang 靈寶威儀經訣上). Ōfuchi Ninji (Tonkō dōkyō, Zurokuhen, 727) identifies the manuscripts as parts of the now lost Lingbao scripture, the long title of which is found in the Lingbao jingmu 靈寶經目 preserved in the Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2256. An argument against this identification is the fact that the title as given in Pelliot 2452 mentions a “first part,” whereas according to the Lingbao jingmu the work had only a single juan (compare also 1125 Sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 4.8a–9a).

In all other respects the present text as partially preserved here corresponds to what we may surmise to have been the contents of the lost work. It is transmitted by the zhenren of the Great Ultimate Xu Laile 徐來勒 and deals at least partially with the ceremonies of transmission of the Lingbao scriptures. As Bokenkamp (“Sources,” 484) has remarked, the work was apparently already lost during the Tang or Northern Song dynasties, for it is not included in the list of Lingbao scriptures in the compendium of the Yellow Register rituals collected by the Southern Song Taoist LIU YONGGUANG (508 Wushang huanglu dazhai licheng yi 1.5a–7a).

The manuscript Pelliot 2452 contains the longest fragment, with 104 lines. It begins with a number of hymns sung by great Taoist patriarchs (including Zhang Daoling 張道陵) extolling the extraordinary powers of the present scripture. The remainder, and also the largest part, of the text is devoted to models for written petitions (zhang 章) to be presented during the ceremonies for the transmission of Lingbao scriptures. These documents do not refer to the restrictions that were supposed to limit the frequency of the distribution of the Lingbao texts to once in forty years, but they do mention the sums of money and other offerings to be provided on the occasion. These amounted to not less than 24,000 coins (jinqian 金錢). In addition, the adept had to offer ten gold bracelets to be scattered in the ten directions, and another ten gold bracelets to his or her master.

The transmission of the Lingbao scriptures here is explicitly meant to be made not only to Taoist scholars (daoshi) or lay people, but to Buddhist śramana (shamen 沙門) as well. The text endeavors to assimilate the two faiths, declaring, for instance, that “immortal” (xian 仙) and “Buddha” (fo 佛) have exactly the same meaning, fo being merely a foreign word (huyu 胡語; see Pelliot 2356, line 4). As to the original revelation, Xu Laile gave this work to his disciple GE XUAN, who in turn transmitted it to Zheng Siyuan 鄭思遠 and also to the śramana Zhu Falan 竺法蘭 (Pelliot 2452, lines 90–93). They were then given to GE HONG who divulged them to the world while he was staying on Mount Luofu 羅浮山 during the “sixth year of the Jianyuan 建元 era” (Pelliot 2452, lines 102–4). This date must be a copyist error, as the Jianyuan era lasted only two years (343–344), and because GE HONG died in 343. The present text corresponds to number 23 of the Lingbao corpus.

Kristofer Schipper

Taiji zhenren fu lingbao zhajie weiyi zhujing yaojue

太極真人敷靈寶齋戒威儀諸經要訣

24 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

532 (fasc. 295)

“Instructions from All the Scriptures for the Ritual of the Lingbao Retreat, Expounded by the Zhenren of the Great Bourne.” The Great Lingbao Liturgy 靈寶大法 is performed on given days, sixty times a year, by the gods in Heaven. The Taoists of this world should reverently follow their example.

The present work contains a complete ritual of the Lingbao Retreat (1b–7b), with instructions for its performance. There are also indications for the recitation of scriptures (zhuanjing fa 轉經法) and the lighting of lamps (randeng 然燈) to be performed on various occasions and for different purposes, such as healing (7b–12a).

Among the scriptures to be recited, the first discussed here is the Daode jing 道德經 (12a). Next is mentioned the Dadong zhenjing 大洞真經 in thirty-nine chapters, which “should not be recited in this world” (12b). But the Lingbao scriptures are the ultimate texts of Taoism (Daojia 道家), and instructions are given for their transmission along with the Daode jing (12b–14a).

There follow various instructions on the liturgical organization and orthodox practice. The ancient Heavenly Master practice of feasting the worthy is discussed on 14b, and shamanistic practices are criticized on 15a–16. An important passage discusses the priestly hierarchy. The fundamental ordination remains that of the Heavenly Master liturgy. All priests should be libationers (jijiu 祭酒) and observe the One Hundred and Eighty Rules (baibashi jie 百八十戒; see 786 Taishang laojun jingliu). Those who embrace the life of hermits and receive the scriptures are inducted into an additional ordination as master of one of the Five Peaks, according to the year in which they were born. (For example, those born in the third or fourth denary year (yin 寅 or mao 卯) have an Fundamental Destiny (benming 本命) related to the east and are therefore ordained as Dongyue xiansheng 東嶽先生, and so on. (17a).

The subsequent discussion on sacred books concerns not only the previously mentioned scriptures, but also the Zhuangzi (18b–19a). On 20b, the different offices of the participants in the Retreat ritual are defined. The head officiant is called fashi 法師. Next comes the head cantor (dujiang 都講), the Inspector of the Retreat (jianzhai 監齋), and the three Intendants of, respectively, the scriptures, the incense, and the lamps (sijing 侍經, sixiang 侍香, sideng 侍燈). Other priests, such as the libationers of the Yellow and Red and the Great One (Huangchi taiyi jijiu 黃赤太一祭酒; see 1294 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi, etc.) are permitted to be present but should not actively participate. In general, all Taoists are ranked according to their diocesan ordination (zhilu 治錄).

Final instructions concern meditation during the Retreat and the Ten Commemorations (shinian 十念) for concentration on good deeds. This text corresponds to number 24 of the Lingbao corpus.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhibui benyuan daje shangpin jing

太上洞玄靈寶智慧本願大戒上品經

18 fols.

Fifth century

344 (fasc. 177)

“Lingbao Scripture on the Great Superior Rules and Original Vows of Wisdom.” This text belongs to the group of “new scriptures” revealed to GE XUAN. In the Lingbao jingmu it is listed as Taishang xiaomo baoshen anzhi zhibui benyuan daje shangpin 太上消魔寶身安志智慧本願大戒上品; the WSBY cites it as [Dongxuan] xiaomo jing [洞玄]消魔經, Dongxuan anzhi jing 洞玄安志經, or Dongxuan dingzhi jing 洞玄定志經.

Three Dunhuang fragments (Pelliot 2468, Stein 6394, Pelliot 2400; cf. Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuben, 61–66; Zurokuben, 77–85) of this scripture exist in which Xu Laile 徐來勒 explains to GE XUAN the concepts of karma and retribution: blessings and misfortune are determined by one’s good and evil deeds. Therefore right actions and “original vows” are indispensable. For this purpose fifty-nine vows (4a–7a), prescriptions for ten good deeds (shishan quanjie 十善勸戒; 9b–10b), and the ten sufferings (shihuan 十患; 15a–b) are set forth. In the final paragraph, GE XUAN entrusts his disciple Zheng Siyuan 鄭思遠 (i.e., ZHENG YIN) to transmit the scriptures in accordance with the instructions provided.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Taiqing wushiba yuanwen 太清五十八願文

7 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

187 (fasc. 78)

“Text of the Fifty-eight Vows from the Taiqing [Heaven].” This is not an original work but completely composed of parts from 344 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhibui benyuan daje shangpin jing 4a–15a.

The present text contains mainly fifty-eight vows and the Exhortation to the Ten Good Deeds (shishan quan 十善勸). Whereas 344 Benyuan daje shangpin jing 4a–7a lists the complete series of fifty-nine vows that are to be pronounced in various situations for the salvation of all, our text incorrectly arrives at a number of fifty-eight by fusing the first part of the thirty-fifth with the second part of the thirty-sixth vow. This text and the preceding one correspond to number 25 of the corpus.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Taishang dongxuan lingbao benxing suyuan jing 太上洞玄靈寶本行宿緣經

16 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

III4 (fasc. 758)

“Scriptures on Destiny as Determined by One’s Original Deeds.” This text belongs to the group of “new scriptures” in eleven juan revealed to GE XUAN. On the two significant terms in the title—suyuan (destiny) and benxing (original deeds)—see 1b and 9a. The work is quoted in WSBY as Dongxuan qingwen jing 洞玄請問經, or as Xiangong qingwen jing 仙公請問經, juan two. This alternative title refers to the form the book takes: (Xiangong) GE XUAN queries Xu Laile 徐來勒 about the nature of karmic causality (for full editorial details see Ōfuchi Ninji, “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 31–33, 36; Wang Chengwen, “Dunhuang ben Taiji Zuo xiangong qingwen jing”).

The aim of the text is to encourage the individual to make a vow (yuan 願) to lead a religious life because, as the text abundantly demonstrates by means of both concrete examples and theoretical discussions, fate in this life (benxing) is determined by an individual’s actions in his previous existences (8b).

In addition to defining and defending this concept of ultimate justice, the text outlines the essence of religious life: it refers to the 180 precepts of wisdom (2b; found in 456 Taishang dongxuan lingbao sanyuan pinjie gongde qingzhong jing) and furnishes the Ten Injunctions of the Most High and the Proscription of the Ten Evils (2b–4a), probably taken from 457 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhibui zuigen shangpin daje jing. Alluding to 671 Taishang wuji dadao ziran zhenyi wucheng fu shang jing, our text recalls the story of the revelation of the Lingbao Retreat (zhai 齋) to Zhang Daoling 張道陵 and, in a Mahāyānist perspective, affirms that this is the greatest of all Retreats, because it seeks the salvation of all creatures.

The text also discusses ritual vestments and the recitation and transmission of scriptures. On (12a) is found the locus classicus of the liturgical definition of the term sanbao 三寶. This text corresponds to number 26 of the Lingbao corpus.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Taishang dongxuan lingbao benxing yinyuan jing 太上洞玄靈寶本行因緣經
8 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

III5 (fasc. 758)

“Lingbao Scripture of the Karmic Factors of Causation and Deeds in Previous Existences.” This is one of the “new scriptures” revealed to GE XUAN. The Lingbao jing shumu 靈寶經書目 lists it under the title Xiangong qingwen benxing yinyuan zhongsheng nan 仙公請問本行因緣衆聖難; the WSBY 47.2b quotes it as Dongxuan zhongsheng nan jing 洞玄衆聖難經. However, the first part of the Lingbao jingmu 靈寶經目 also lists a Zhongsheng nan in three juan, marked as “not yet revealed” (for hypotheses about this problem, cf. Ōfuchi Ninji, “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 43–44). Suffice it here to recall that all Lingbao scriptures marked as “not yet revealed” by LU XIUJING did exist by A.D. 570 (cf. Xiaodao lun 9.151b).

In our text, GE XUAN propagates the new Mahāyānist Taoism that calls no longer for individual salvation but for saving others (1b). Merits have to be established before ascension to the Shangqing 上清 Heavens can be attained (2a). GE XUAN gives—in the style of Buddhist avadāna stories—a detailed account of his own former existences in order to illustrate his teaching and the importance of karmic vows (3a–5b). Finally, he reveals three important instructions to Zhang Daoling 張道陵 (8a; for the terms shangqing and sandong 三洞 in the Lingbao tradition and the relation between Zhang Daoling and the Lingbao scriptures, cf. Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 24–26, n. 2).

A complete Dunhuang manuscript of this text (Pelliot 2454) shows considerable textual differences with respect to the Daozang version (cf. Ōfuchi Ninji, Tōkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 66–69). The present text corresponds to number 27 of the Lingbao corpus.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

1.B.3.b Other Early Lingbao Scriptures

Taishang dongxuan lingbao sanyi wuqi zhenjing

太上洞玄靈寶三一五氣真經

7 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

985 (fasc. 618)

“True Scripture on the Three Ones and Five Qi.” This text corresponds to 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu 3.17a–23b. It recounts the story of the Yellow Emperor who wanders to the four extremities of the world to obtain the explanation of the Tianhuang zhenyi jing 天皇真一經. On Emei shan the Yellow Emperor finally meets the Sovereign (huangren 皇人), who reveals to him the secret of the Three Ones (sanyi)—the nihuan 泥丸, the jianggong 絳宮, and the dantian 丹田—and the method for subsisting on the Five Shoots (wuya 五牙). GE HONG tells a shorter version of this myth in BPZ 18.

John Lagerwey

Taishang lingbao tiandi yundu ziran miaojing

太上靈寶天地運度自然妙經

7 fols.

Sixth century

322 (fasc. 166)

“Lingbao Scripture on the Laws of Movement of Heaven and Earth.” This “spontaneously created” scripture is listed in the Lingbao jingmu under the title Tiandi yundu, with the mention “not yet revealed,” but it was in circulation by A.D. 570 (cf. Ōfuchi Ninji, “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 36, 55–56). Quotations in YJQQ and SDZN correspond to the present text.

After an introduction dealing with the cosmic dimensions and the importance of leading a religious life that aims at overcoming the three miseries of age, disease, and death, the scripture stresses that he who wants to obtain the Tao must know the cosmic laws for the occurrence of catastrophes. The ten prophetic stanzas that follow constitute the essential message of the scripture. They announce the end of the jinma 金馬 era (presumably referring to the Sima 司馬 emperors of the Jin dynasty (265–420); compare 1273 Zhengyi tianshi gao Zhao Sheng koujue) and a deluge. Then at the time of the water-dragon (shuilong shi 水龍時), Li Hong (Gongkou Shibazi 弓口十八子) will appear. The only hope of escaping the catastrophe lies in the constant recitation of these verses and in a determined effort to penetrate their meaning. The text closes with rules for the transmission of this scripture.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hikuchi Norataka, “Taijō reibō tenchi undo shizen myōkyō.”

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Dongxuan lingbao xuanyi zhenren shuo shengsi lunzhuan yinyuan jing

洞玄靈寶玄一真人說生死輪轉因緣經

8 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

III9 (fasc. 759)

“Lingbao Scripture on the Karmic Causality of Transmigration, Spoken by the Zhenren of the Mysterious One.” Here Xuanyi zhenren answers the questions raised by the immortal Yundu 仙人雲度 in A.D. 260 on Mount Kunlun 崑崙. He addresses in detail kinship and family bonds, explaining that they are fixed for one life only. One’s subsequent existence depends solely on the merits previously acquired. Although family membership is only temporary, it demands filial piety and, after one’s parents’ death, the four seasonal sacrifices (sishi cisi 四時祠祀; 2a–b). Different forms of rebirth as the result of good and evil deeds are affirmed (3a–6b). The zhenren predicts that during the time of Jin (Jinshi zhi shi 金氏之世) there will be a period of Great Peace when Taoism will flourish. At the end of Jinma 金馬, in the year of the water-dragon, Lord Li (i.e., Li Hong 李弘) will appear as a savior (cf. 322 Taishang lingbao tiandi yundu ziran miaojing 4b–5b). To enter into his presence would be the reward for merits acquired in previous existences (7a).

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Taishang dongxuan lingbao jieye benxing shangpin miaojing

太上洞玄靈寶誡業本行上品妙經

28 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

345 (fasc. 177)

“Marvelous Superior Scripture of the Rules of Conduct, from the Dongxuan Lingbao Canon of the Most High.” The subject of these Rules of Conduct is a Retreat patterned on the rituals of the Three Principles (sanyuan 三元) as well as of those on Mud and Charcoal (tutan zhai 塗炭齋, 26a; see WSBY 50, 52). The contents and subtitle given in 1a, Yuanyi jinzen falun jieye benxing yinyuan shangpin 元一金真法輪誡業本行因緣上品, show that this work is closely related to some of the ancient Lingbao texts, in particular to 348 Taishang xuanyi zhenren shuo quanjie falun miaojing.

When this text was revealed by Yuan [Xuan]yi tianzun 元[玄]一天尊 to the Lord of the Tao, the latter was given the title of Wushang gaoshang dongming da fawang 無上高上洞明大法王. The Tao “speaks” to expound the circumstances of this revelation (1a–2b). At the end of the work, the Tao speaks again to sum up all the salutary effects of the text since its revelation in the cosmic period Dongming 洞明 (28a–b). In its introduction, the text recalls particularly how the Tianzun, before he began the revelation, invited his listeners by pointing to the ten directions of space (yishou zhidian shifang xukong zhi zhong 以手指點十方虛空之中; 2a). Having arrived, the listeners circumambulate the Tianzun three times while burning incense, spreading flowers, and chanting the hymn of buxu 步虛. After taking up their respective places, they ascend to the fields of the Wheel of the Law of the Golden True One, deng jinzen falun zhuchang 登金真法輪諸場 (2b). “I set the Wheel of the Law of the Golden zhenren in motion,” the Tianzun immediately announces, “in order to transform all causes” (3a). The ritual practice that follows enables the adept to be promoted to the rank of Golden zhenren (27a). The Tianzun opens (kai 開) this marvelous book—that is, “begins his predication”—ten times. The first time, he transmits the Rules of Conduct. Then he “opens” Nine Fields: those of the Ten Saints (5b), of the Ten Good Deeds (8b), of the Ten Evil Deeds (10b), and so on. Each opening of a field is followed by a hymn. The origin and power of these hymns are then expounded by the Tianzun to the Lord of the Tao. The fields of the evil ways of the Ten Perversions (17a–18b) are to be considered with special care, since these are the various forms of heterodox cults (guidao 鬼道) from which one is liberated by the teaching.

John Lagerwey

Taishang dongxuan lingbao feixing sanjie tongwei neisi miaojing

太上洞玄靈寶飛行三界通微內思妙經

16 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

III8 (fasc. 759)

“Marvelous Scripture on Penetrating the Subtle and Visualizing the Interior for Flying in the Three Worlds.” After five years of the practices described in this text, one is able, according to the introduction, to “fly in the Three Worlds.” The phrase “penetrating the subtle and visualizing the interior” in the title summarizes these practices.

The text defines itself as the “most marvelous of the Three Caverns” (15b). It is indeed built upon the scriptures of the Three Caverns: its title indicates that it is a Lingbao scripture (note that the term tongwei also appears in the title of 325 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhihui dingzhi tongwei jing). The transmission pledges are the same as those for 671 Taishang wuji dadao ziran zhenyi wucheng fu shang jing and 352 Taishang dongxuan lingbao chishu yujue miaojing (16a; cf. 184 Taizhen yudi siji mingke jing 4.2b–3a), probably because our text, like these Lingbao scriptures, originally included five fu (1b–2b). The adept who uses this book bears, however, a Shangqing title—disciple of the Three Luminaries (sanjing dizi 三景弟子; 8a)—and the book designates itself, in the Shangqing manner, a superior way (shangdao 上道; 1a).

On the other hand, the practices which are described in a series of paragraphs attributed to Taiji zhenren 太極真人 (Xu Laile 徐來勒) recall those found in books of earlier date than the Lingbao and Shangqing texts. We find, in particular, many items from 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu and 1168 Taishang laojun zhongjing: 5a–b, cf. 388 Wufu xu 1.11b–14b; 6b–7b, cf. 388 Wufu xu 1.25a–26a; 10b, cf. 388 Wufu xu 1.19a and 1168 Laojun zhongjing 2.5a; 12b, cf. 1168 Laojun zhongjing 1.11a; 14b, cf. 1168 Laojun zhongjing 2.11a.

John Lagerwey

Taishang lingbao yuanyang miaojing 太上靈寶元陽妙經

10 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

334 (fasc. 168–169)

“Marvelous Scripture of Primordial Yang.” The yuanyang (Primordial Yang) of the title refers to the text as such, to the world and the palace in which the text was revealed, and to the zhenren and the “youths” who use it (cf. 5.1a, 1.3b, 16b, 6.4a, 7.1a). The text defines itself as “the secret reservoir of that which the venerable scriptures in thirty-six sections do not explain” (6.24a) and as the book that “causes to be heard that which has heretofore never been heard,” not even in the “divine charts of the Seven Parts and the essential secrets of the Three Pure Ones” (9.2a, 16b).

A Yuanyang jing was criticized by Tao An at the end of the sixth century (Erjiao lun 141b). Of the five Dunhuang manuscript fragments containing the term yuanyang in their title, the only one that corresponds to our text is undated; it is found in juan 4, which Ōfuchi Ninji (Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 104) rightly thinks belongs instead to 356 Dongxuan lingbao shangshi shuo jiubu shenming jing.

The present text is clearly truncated (10.23a), but it nonetheless forms a coherent whole: entirely devoted to the description of the practice of those who “leave the family” (see especially 1.3a, 10.13b), it begins with religious commandments and vows and ends with “ascension to the Heaven of the Great Net.”

The ten juan, divided into seven sections, are largely given over to comparisons, parables, and dialectics in the Buddhist manner (Falin, Bianzheng lun 8.534b, says that the Yuanyang jing and other Taoist scriptures primarily plagiarize the Fahua 法華 (i.e., the Miaofa lianhua jing) and the Wuliang shou jing. The text uses Buddhist rhetorical techniques and vocabulary to encourage Buddhist practices: compassion, charity, preaching, and recitation of the present text (5.13b, 7.6a, 8.4b). Even the individual adept’s private chapel is given a Buddhist name, the jingshe fangzhang shi 精舍方丈室 (9.21a).

Clearly influenced by the Mahāparinirvāṇa-sūtra, the author aims, by making use of the dialectics of double negation, to resolve all doubt and incomprehension and achieve “permanence, joy, selfhood, and purity” (chang le wo jing 常樂我淨, 6.3a, 9.16b), that is, the “plenitude of words and meaning” (youzi youyi 有字有意, 10.18a). The adept must therefore not consider “the suffering of nonpermanence and such ideas as the nonexistence of the self and of purity as the true meaning” (10.19b). The exhortation to “abandon the idea of self” was but an expedient for “doing away with doubt” (10.20a).

The importance of Buddhist borrowings notwithstanding, Buddhist practices serve in the Yuanyang jing as a preliminary to practices leading to a properly Taoist form of salvation; the recitation of this text was intended simply to prepare adepts to set forth on the True Way. This goal, in any event, is what the end of the book suggests: At first, we see the Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning preparing at dawn on the seventh day of the seventh month to ascend to the Heaven of the Great Net and “enter trance” (ruding 入定; this scene would seem to be a development based on the context of the Heavenly Worthy’s preaching in a part of the Benji jing 本際經; cf. 59 Yuanshi dongzhen jueyi jing 1b). The prospect causes panic and distress to his disciples, and all of them—monks and nuns, Men and Women of Pure Faith alike (10.1b), even the male and female officers of the Twenty-four Dioceses (10.2b: 職 replaces 治, the tabooed personal name of Tang Gaozong)—surround him and beg him to stay. There follows a marvelous description of an offering made to the Heavenly Worthy, seated on a “great throne as high as the Mountain of the Jade Capital” (10.5b), in order to retain him: “Do not abandon us!”

But the Heavenly Worthy does not accede to their pleas. He gives final instructions concerning the fullness of words and meanings and then rebukes his auditors when they beg him to stay and teach his Way: “You ought not to speak so,” he says, but then adds: “I herewith confide (fuzhu 付囑) the supreme, orthodox method to Lord Lao. He will make a great manual (da zhigui 大指歸) for you. Just as the Heavenly Worthy made for all beings a place of refuge (zhigui chu 指歸處), so also will Lord Lao do for you. Like a great king who governs a vast territory, when he makes a tour of inspection, confides the affairs of the nation to a chief minister, so also will the Heavenly Worthy confide all that concerns the orthodox method to Lord Lao” (10.19a).

What is this method? According to a phrase in 9.8b, “the true Way, the methods that are not karmically determined, are the practices of adepts of the Way for swallowing essences (tunjing 吞精) and energy (yanqi 咽氣), inhaling and exhaling (tuna 吐納), absorbing and mounting” (fuyu 服御).

John Lagerwey

Dongxuan lingbao shangshi shuo jiuhu shenming jing

洞玄靈寶上師說救護身命經

12 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

356 (fasc. 179)

“Salvation Scripture Spoken by the Former Master [Immortal of Purple Yang].” The Dunhuang manuscript Stein 482 (seventh century), which carries the title Yuanyang shangjuan zhaodu ji’nan jing 元陽上卷超度濟難經, “Pin diyi 品第一,” corresponds partially to the present text (Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 100). Together with juan 4 of 334 Taishang lingbao yuanyang miaojing, this text was originally part of a vast work that comprised all the fragments of a Yuanyang jing 元陽經 found at Dunhuang. For instance, the manuscript Pelliot 2366 (Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 102) contains sections 16 to 18 of a Taishang yuanyang jing 太上元陽經.

The term (shangshi 上師) in the title refers in general to all masters of previous generations, but here it refers especially to the Immortal of Purple Yang 紫陽仙 (7a) and his master, the Duke-Immortal of Primordial Yang 元陽仙公 (2a). This term is synonymous with shizun 師尊 (6b; see 334 Yuanyang miaojing 4.1a). Before rising up to heaven on the seventh day of the seventh moon of the year renyin 壬寅 (5b), the “senior master” (shangshi 上師) of the zhenren Tiaolin fajing 條林法淨真人 explains to the latter how to make use of the present scripture, which belongs to the first section of the Primordial Yang (Yuanyang shangpin 元陽上品 (1b), in order “to protect the persons and save the lives” of all those who, for a period of five hundred years after his departure, are victims of the gudao 蠱道 sorcery prevalent at those times.

In order to be saved, it suffices to recite this scripture, or, if one is unable to read, to carry it on oneself. All demons that do not listen to his words shall be judged according to the Xuandu guilü 玄都鬼律, says the master (2a–b). Then he gives the names of the seven zhenren [of the Dipper?] whom one may invoke in order to drive away demons. He finally promises to all those who propagate the cult of the present book that they will be reborn in the celestial abode of Wenchang 文昌 (6a).

After the master’s departure, the narrative moves to his disciple, who creates the second section of the book (7b) through the concentration of his thought (jingsi 精思). This act prompts a great gathering of dragon-kings who wish to learn his method, and thereupon the epiphany of the divine master of Primordial Yang himself, when Tiaolin expounds the new section. The revelation of the paradise of Primordial Yang that follows terminates with the appearance of the twenty-five disciples chosen by Tiaolin to perpetuate his work. Among the latter are Zhang Ling 張陵 and Zhang Jue 張角. Sixteen names of the disciples are linked to sections of the Book of Primordial Yang (until number 32).

Juan four of 334 Yuanyang miaojing completes our text. Here we see Tiaolin rise up to Heaven on the seventh day of the first moon (4.3b), and his disciple, the zhenren Jinghui dulin 淨惠度林真人, follows him on the fifth day of the tenth moon. The ascensions of the first three masters coincide with the days of the Three Principles (sanyuan 三元), the very days on which Lord Lao established the Twenty-four Dioceses (see Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 103–104). Like Tiaolin in the present work, Jinghui in the fifth juan of 334 Yuanyang miaojing projects in thought the vision of a paradise where eleven of his disciples dwell (variant readings of the Dunhuang manuscript attribute the sections 33 to 38 to six of these disciples). At the beginning of the juan, the revered master (shizun 師尊) himself creates the vision. At midnight, when he contemplates the Dipper, he sees the Wenchang Palace 文昌宮 open and Laozi appear. The latter descends, first on a green dragon, then on a green horse, introduces himself as the zhenren Li Yuan, Child of the Eastern Sea 東海小童李元真人, and declares that he has been sent by the Congregation of Heavenly Bliss (tianqing hui 天慶會) in order to instruct the disciples, so that they may “later on expound the books of infinite meanings” (wuliang yi jing 無量義經; 4.2b–3a).

John Lagerwey

Dongxuan lingbao benxiang yundu jieqi jing 洞玄靈寶本相運度劫期經

14 fols.

Sixth century

319 (fasc. 165)

“Lingbao Scripture on the Origin and the Appearance of the Cosmic Cycles and Kalpa Periods.” This text is closely related to the fragmentary work 1131 Taishang miaofa benxiang jing and various Dunhuang manuscripts of the Benxiang jing. Apart from a number of stylistic elements, these texts share a peculiar terminology, for example, sanyuan jiue 三元九厄 (nine difficulties of the Three Primordial [epochs], 13b; cf. 1131 Benxiang jing 1.10a); the Buddhist borrowing śrāvaka (shengwen 聲聞, 7b; cf. manuscript Stein 2122, line 1); or the concept of shixian 十仙 (ten [stages of] immortality; analogous to the Buddhist daśabhūmi [shidi 十地], 7b; cf. 1131 Benxiang jing 1.7a–b, 1.14a–15a, and Falin’s polemic against it in Bianzheng lun 8.543b). The description of the primordial paradise on Mount Dongfu 洞浮 is also similar to manuscript Stein 2122, lines 30–74 and Pelliot 3091, lines 1–10, since they share the “spontaneously created characters of the celestial environment and Great Chaos” (tianjing dahun ziran wenzi 天景大混自然文字; 1a–2b).

One of the two citations from chapter (pin 品) 20 of the Benxiang jing (1132 Shangqing dao leishi xiang 3.3a) is contained in the present text (2b). Of another citation from the Benxiang jing in Bianzheng lun 8.543c, only the second half corresponds to a passage in our text 14b. On this admittedly scant evidence, we can surmise either that the present text presents the lacunal chapter 20 of the sixth-century Benxiang jing, originally in at least twenty-three pin, or, more likely, that it has been wrought from various parts of the old Benxiang jing.

The Xiaodao lun 9.147a–150a repeatedly quotes a Jiku jing 濟苦經. These passages show a striking similarity with the part of the present text that centers its cosmological explanations on Mount Kunlun 崑崙 (10b–12a).

The minor and major calamities that occur at fixed intervals and cannot be prevented (rang 穰) constitute another important theme of the present scripture. The sage, however, because of his knowledge of the inherent laws, is able to avoid these calamities, for example, by storing grain when a famine is about to occur (13b). In view of the approach of such times of calamity, the Heavenly Worthy of Lingbao revealed the Shenzhou jing 神咒經 in ten juan to be recited for salvation; especially important are its two juan “Shimo 誓魔” (see 335 Taishang dongyuan shenzhou jing 1) and “Zhouxie 咒邪” (unknown). In case of emergency, it is also advised to invoke the zhenren Yaowang 藥王 and Yaosheng 藥盛 as well as the deities from Yuanyang shangbu 元陽上部 (to be found in 356 Dongxuan lingbao shangshi shuo jiuhu shenming jing), the Lingbao wuliang duren pin 靈寶無量度人品, Dadong zhenjing 大洞真經, Wuliang shenjing 無量神經, Sanmei zhenjing 三昧真經, and Daode jiejie 道德節解 (4b–6a).

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Dongxuan lingbao danshui feishu yundu xiaojie miaojing

洞玄靈寶丹水飛術運度小劫妙經

22 fols.

Sixth century

320 (fasc. 165)

“Lingbao Scripture on the Cosmic Cycles, Small Kalpas, and the Technique of Flying [after the Ingestion of] Elixir-Fluid.” This scripture was probably one of the works listed as “not yet revealed” in the Lingbao jing shumumu 靈寶經書目, Lingbao jingmu 靈寶經目 (see Ōfuchi Ninji, “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 41, 55). It is cited as Xiaojie jing in SDZN.

Its contents show little coherence, touching upon diverse topics such as ritual vestments (fafu 法服; 5b–6b) and the celestial transmission of various scriptures (among others the Dadong zhenjing 大洞真經 in thirty-nine chapters 大洞真經三十九章; 14b–15b). It explains how to survive the imminent fire-catastrophe of the small kalpa by studying the scriptures of the Three Caverns and practicing the Lingbao Retreat.

There are different methods for adepts who live in the world and for those who have retreated to the mountains. The latter should also absorb pneuma, swallow elixir, venerate the deities of the Pole Star (beiji 北極), and wear nine fu on their belt (3a–5b). The instructions for making the elixir are revealed by a Shangqing deity, the Lady Wang (Ziwei Wang furen 紫微王夫人).

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Taishang dongxuan lingbao bawei zhaolong miaojing

太上洞玄靈寶八威召龍妙經

2 juan

Sixth century

361 (fasc. 180)

“Lingbao Scripture on the Eight Daunters and Summoning the Dragon Deities.” A Bawei zhaolong jing in one juan is listed in the Lingbao jingmu as “not yet revealed.” Thus the present text is probably one of the scriptures that are said to have existed by 570 (cf. Ōfuchi Ninji, “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 37, 55). The earliest quotations from it are found in SDZN and 1132 Shangqing dao leishi xiang.

This scripture offers the means to survive the minor and major kalpas unharmed, to avert floods and droughts by influencing the water deities, and to render the venom-spewing Eight Daunters 八威 harmless. In order to achieve this end, one should climb a mountain on the eight seasonal days (bajie ri 八節日) and summon the nāgarāja (longwang zhangren 龍王丈人 of the seas [1.2a–4a], and one should on four days each year (sishi 四時) cast tablets of prayer into the waters (tou shuijian 投水簡; 1.4b–6b). During the Lingbao Retreat, tablets of the Eight Daunters (bawei cewen 八威策文) must be worn on the belt, in order to summon the dragon-kings and zhenren and to dispel the demons. The ritual for the transmission of this scripture concludes juan 1. Juan 2 contains mainly an exaltation of the dragon lord (longjun 龍君) and propagates the idea of the Mahāyāna as well as various theoretical concepts (e.g., the four ways of conduct [sixing 四行] and the Three Worlds [sanjie 三界]; 2.9b ff.). The term bawei ce [wen] can be found in 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu 3.12b and 22 Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing 2.1a–2b.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Yuanshi tianzun shuo bianhua kongdong miaojing

元始天尊說變化空洞妙經

17 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

37 (fasc. 28)

“Marvelous Scripture of the Transformations in the Empty Cavern.” Kongdong is a term for the realm of transcendence, and bianhua refers to the translation into immortality by rising up to Heaven (see 17a).

The text opens with a description of a heavenly audience. Dressed in full ritual garments, carrying bells at his waist and a sword on his back, the Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning drives his chariot to the Seven Jewel Forest in the country Xina 西那. Surrounded by Superior zhenren, he orders the Wulao shangzhen 五老上真 and Xiandu zuogong 仙都左公 to open the precious casket, to unroll the Five True Scriptures, and to chant the present text. When this manifestation of the Correct Way of the Three Heavens has driven away the demons of the Six Qi, the Heavenly Worthy orders the Wulao and Zuogong to reveal the Essentials of the Eight Ways of the Transformations in the Empty Cavern (3b). This revelation concerns secondary rites, by contrast with visualization rites, that represent the “superior way” (shangdao 上道; 12b). These secondary rites are linked to the celestial assizes that take place on the Eight Station days or Articulations (bajie 八節), that is, during the meteorological transformations marking the transition of the seasons. Each of these assizes lasts three days. The adept first performs an ablution; at noon, he enters his chamber; at midnight, bare-chested, facing north, he makes a confession; and, after having addressed the divinity concerned by means of prayer, he swallows a fu. Each of these fu induces one of the Eight Beams of the Celestial Chariot (bajing yuyu 八景玉輿; 3b) to arrive. The adept must also paint these fu on silk and carry them on his body. Among the days of the Eight Articulations, spring and autumn equinoxes are of particular importance because they are days when the Celestial Origin (tianyuan 天元) itself “judges the living and punishes the sinners.” The Celestial Origin will not accept the confession of an adept who might subsequently commit an offense. The adept is not permitted to practice these Retreats of Purification (qingzhai 清齋) during the days of the Eight Articulations, but, by anticipation, on the days of his own destiny (benming 本命) or also on the sexagesimal days 1 and 42 (jiazi 甲子 or gengzi 庚子) (17a).

John Lagerwey

Taishang dongxuan lingbao sanyuan yujing xuandu daxian jing

太上洞玄靈寶三元玉京玄都大獻經

29 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

370 (fasc. 181)

“Great Offering in the Capital of Mystery on [Mount] Jade Capital for the [Days of the] Three Principles.” The version of this text discovered among the Dunhuang manuscripts (Stein 3061; cf. Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 80) bears a title that corresponds better to the contents of our work than that of the present edition: “Great Offering in the Capital of Mystery on Jade Capital [Mountain, for the Day] of the Median Principle [zhongyuan 中元].” See 1312 Taishang dadao yuqing jing 3.9a, where that ritual is mentioned. The present text deals with the offering performed on the day when officers of the Earth examine the accounts of the dead. Thanks to this offering “to the saints, and the Taoists who, during this day and this night, recite this book,” the hungry ghosts will be delivered (20a–b).

Everything concerning the days of the Three Principles (sanyuan 三元)—lines 31–32 of the Dunhuang version (Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 81) as well as 26a ff. at the end of the Daozang edition—seems to have been added to the original text. It is likely, according to the division of the work as indicated by the commentator (5b–6a), that pages 21a–22b have also been added.

According to Xuan Yi (fl. 684–704), the author of the work was a Taoist named Liu Wudai 劉無待 (Zhenzheng lun 569c). Liu is said to have written this book in the seventh century in order to imitate the Yulan pen 盂蘭盆. Because our text is already quoted in the Yiwen leiju (4.80), compiled in 624, Yoshioka Yoshitoyo (Dōkyō to Bukkyō 2:238) suggests that Liu Wudai might be the author of the “expanded” version of the Daxian jing in the Daozang. However, the quotation found in the Yiwen leiju is much closer to the Daozang version than to the Dunhuang manuscript. The expanded text and the commentary both seem to date from the sixth century. Both the first of the ten commandments found in one of the added sections (“banning the killing of living beings for the purpose of offering illicit sacrifices to the deities and demons of the Six Heavens”; 26b) and the allusion to the myth of the Conversion of the Barbarians (huahu 化胡), which appears in the commentary (21b–22a), belong to this period. The name of the birthplace of Lord Lao is given by the commentator as the Commandery of Chen (Chenjun 陳郡; 21b). This name was used to designate the locality only during the Liu Song and Hou Wei periods.

John Lagerwey

1.B.3.c Doctrinal and Liturgical Works

Of the eight texts presented below, four are works by the great patriarch and liturgist LU XIUJING. A fifth text (524 Dongxuan lingbao zhai shuo guang zhu jie fa deng zhuyuan yi), although compiled at a later date, is composed of excerpts from his works. This group of texts aptly illustrates the importance of Lu in the formation of the Taoist liturgy of the Middle Ages, which was dominated by the Lingbao Retreats he codified and propagated. Lu's greatest influence lies in this field. The Daozang contains only two other works by Lu, a brief Shangqing transmission ritual (1293 Shangqing taiwei dijun jiedai zhenwen fa) and the Heavenly Master doctrinal work 1127 Lu xiansheng daomen keliu for laymen.

As is already clear from the latter work, and is constantly borne out by the texts presented here, the Lingbao liturgy does not break away from the mainstream of the Way of the Heavenly Master. The officers remain first and foremost Zhengyi libationers. The initiation into the newly revealed Lingbao scriptures constitutes a higher level, demanding imposing and costly ceremonies, as described in 528 Taishang dongxuan lingbao shoudu yi. These initiations may well have been intended for members of the ruling classes.

Taishang dadao sanyuan pinjie xiezui shangfa 太上大道三元品戒謝罪上法
16 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

417 (fasc. 192)

“Superior Method for Seeking Pardon for Sins against the Classified Precepts of the Three Origins.” The present service for the confession and expiation of sins is related to 456 Taishang dongxuan lingbao sanyuan pinjie gongde qingzhong jing. The latter work, one of the earliest Lingbao scriptures, mentions rites of pardon called Sanyuan xiezui fa 三元謝罪法 (37b); that ritual, in all likelihood, corresponded to the present text.

The text under review, which is incomplete in some places, has been reproduced in WSBY 52 under the title Sanyuan zhai (see Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 159–61).

This ritual of Retreat was performed within the Pure Room on the days of the Three Principles, that is, the fifteenth day of the first, seventh, and tenth moons. At each stage of the performance, the participants knocked their heads upon the ground and struck their faces (koutou zibo 叩頭自搏), more than 1,800 times in the course of a single service.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang dongxuan lingbao fazhu jing 太上洞玄靈寶法燭經

10 fols.

By LU XIUJING 陸修靜 (406–477)

349 (fasc. 177)

“Scripture of the Beacon of the Law.” This is a collection of ten sermons aimed at explicating the significance of the Retreat. The sermons were given in order to prepare the adepts for the services.

Thanks to a note in 524 Dongxuan lingbao zhai shuo guang zhu jie fa deng zhuyuan yi, we know that the present work was written by LU XIUJING, and that these sermons were indeed read before each major performance of a service, beginning with the sugi 宿啓.

The sermons open with the words: “Thus speaks the Tao . . .” In reality, these are not revealed texts but “words of the Tao” as foundation of all reason, to be pronounced by the officiant as a spiritual preparation before entering the sacred area (2b).

Each sermon approaches the Retreat from a different viewpoint, but all end with a sentence from the Daode jing 道德經.

Kristofer Schipper

Dongxuan lingbao wugan wen 洞玄靈寶五感文

8 fols.

By LU XIUJING 陸修靜 (406–477)

1278 (fasc. 1004)

“The Five Sentiments [of Gratitude].” This work contains the text of a sermon on the sentiments of gratitude that should be harbored by those who participate in the Retreat of Mud and Charcoal (tutan zhai 塗炭齋). The author explains that he wrote this sermon in order to bolster the spirits of his disciples, with whom he performed such a Retreat in the year 453. The ritual was rigorously executed, in ascetic circumstances, during a period of several months.

Following the sermon, the present text gives an outline of different Retreat services (zhong zhaifa 衆齋法). First, there are the Shangqing 上清 Retreats, which correspond to the practices of the Fast of the Heart (xinzhai 心齋) and the Ataraxy (zuowang 坐忘) described by Zhuangzi. Next come the nine kinds of Lingbao Retreats, beginning with that of the Golden Register (jinlu zhai 金籙齋) and ending with the Teaching Retreat (zhijiao zhai 指教齋). This last service is to be performed by Libationers (jijiu 祭酒) and their students (lusheng 籙生). We find, in this outline, a classification analogous to that of the division of the scriptures into Three Caverns (sandong 三洞) introduced by Lu.

At the end of the outline, classified separately, we find the famous Retreat of Mud and Charcoal of the Three Origins (sanyuan tutan zhai 三元塗炭齋) for the expiation of sins. The commentary stresses the great merits, proportionate to the sufferings endured by the participants, that can be obtained through its performance. The sacred area must be installed in the open air, and the officiants, their faces smeared with mud and their hair disheveled, are chained to the pillars that stake off the area. With their hands bound behind their backs, a piece of jade in their mouths, and stretched out face down on the ground, they ceaselessly beat the earth with their heads, asking for forgiveness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Translation in Verellen et al., "Daoist religion," 404–6.

Kristofer Schipper

Dongxuan lingbao zhai shuo guang zhu jie fa deng zhuyuan yi

洞玄靈寶齋說光燭戒罰燈祝願儀

18 fols.

Attributed to LU XIUJING 陸修靜 (406–477)

524 (fasc. 293)

"Observations on the Lingbao Retreat, [Especially on] Lights, Beacons, Rules, Punishments, Lamps, and Vows." The present work on the rites of the establishment of the altar and the preparation of the Retreat is mentioned in 508 Wushang huanglu dazhai licheng yi 16.18a as having been written by LU XIUJING. The same source gives an abstract of the contents, which correspond, in general, to the parts of the present work dealing with the Bestowal of the Ten Rules, the Selection for Offices, and the Promulgation of Commandments and Punishments (7b–16a). But a quotation in 508 Licheng yi 16.18b of a work identified as our text does not resemble the present version. A note in our text (7b), states that "the present work was entirely constituted from a selection of the works by Lu Xiujing." Thus it is due to a later compiler.

The present work, containing nothing that refers either to lamps or to vows, does not correspond to the topics mentioned in the title. The book begins with a sermon titled "Jueguang zhai waishuo 燭光齋外說" (Free Remarks to Illuminate the Retreat; 1a–5a) based on a quotation from the Zhuangzi. Next, there is another sermon, "Fazhu xu 法燭序" (Prologue to the Beacon of the Law), which is one of the ten sermons in 349 Taishang dongxuan lingbao fazhu jing. The version given here has been amended, no doubt to meet the demands of the compiler, who was reconstituting from different sources a lost work by the great liturgist.

Since at the time of the compilation of 508 Licheng yi the original work appears to have been extant, the present reconstitution must be rather late. We know that as early as DU GUANGTING (850–933) the rites of the first evening of the Great Retreat services were the subject of much controversy (see 507 Taishang huanglu zhayiyi 53.1a– 4a)—hence the importance of a treatise on this subject placed under the authority of LU XIUJING.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhongjian wen 太上洞玄靈寶衆簡文

13 fols.

By LU XIUJING 陸修靜 (406–477)

410 (fasc. 191)

"The Tablets of the Precious Jewel." Disciples, when they passed through the successive stages of initiation and ordination, made oblations of wooden tablets (here called the Tablets of the Precious Jewel) accompanied by golden dragons, in order to announce their new status to the divine powers. These rites were called the Casting of Tablets and Dragons (tou longjian 投龍簡).

The protocol for these rites, which LU XIUJING presents here, draws on many sources, some of which can be identified. Foremost among them is 1411 Dongxuan lingbao changye zhi fu jiuyou yugui mingzhen ke. In fact, all rituals for the Casting of Tablets and Dragons refer to one paragraph (37b–38a) of this scripture. The True Writs (zhenwen 真文) to be copied on the tablets, as well as the many other texts to be read during the ritual, come from 352 Taishang dongxuan lingbao chishu yujue miaojing. The latter draws again on 22 Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing (see Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 232–33).

The rites concern the initiation into the Lingbao tradition on two successive levels. The first level is called the Median Oath (zhongmeng 中盟) and is confirmed by the transmission of the Covenant of Spontaneity (ziran quan 自然券). The second level is called the Great Oath (dameng 大盟; compare 528 Taishang dongxuan lingbao shou-du yi).

The oblation for the Median Oath involves one tablet, to be addressed to the Official of Water (Shuiguan 水官). For the Great Oath, one has to present three tablets, to be deposited ("cast") on a mountain, in water, and in the earth. This last tablet should be buried in the disciple's house. This ritual has to be repeated at least three times.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang dongxuan lingbao shoudu yi 太上洞玄靈寶授度儀

2 + 53 fols.

By LU XIUJING 陸修靜 (406–477)

528 (fasc. 294)

"Ritual for the Transmission [of the Corpus] of Lingbao [Scriptures]." Through the conferral of the two registers (lu 籙) that represent the quintessence of all the Lingbao scriptures, the disciples are ordained (du 度) and receive the title of master.

In the presentation (biao 表) that stands at the beginning of the present work, and that LU XIUJING addresses to the Great Master of the Mystery (xuanzhong dafa shi 玄中大法師, the name used in the Lingbao liturgy for Laozi), Lu declares that seventeen years after his own initiation, he had collected thirty-five juan of revealed scriptures related to the Great Lingbao Liturgy (Lingbao dafa 靈寶大法): "The ancient scriptures revealed by Yuanshi [tiansun], and those received by the Duke-immortal [xiangong 仙公, that is, GE XUAN], those that have appeared at the present time and that are authentic, amount altogether to thirty-five juan." This number corresponds to that of the corpus of texts included in Lu's catalogue, counting both the "old" and the "new" scriptures, of which the concluding remarks of the Lingbao jing shumu found at Dunhuang says: "The authentic texts today make up thirty-five or thirty-six juan" (see Ōfuchi Ninji, "On Ku Ling Pao Ching," 41, and compare Kobayashi Masayoshi, "Ryū Sō ni okeru Reihōkyō, 105–6). Lu continues by saying that there is not yet an appropriate ceremonial for the transmission of these scriptures. Lu composed the present "complete and annotated ritual" (licheng yizhu 立成儀注), for which he implores divine benediction, drawing on Lingbao scriptures such as the [Bamboo Slips] of the Golden and Yellow Register (cf. 530 Dongxuan lingbao yulu jianwen sanyuan wei yi ziran zhenjing), the "Liturgy of the Sworn Alliance with the Zhenren" (1411 Dongxuan lingbao changye zhi fu jinyou yugui mingzhen ke), the "Jade Instructions on the Red Writing" (352 Taishang dongxuan lingbao chishu yujue miaojing), and finally the Spontaneous Book of the Real One. The latter probably corresponds to the Zhenyi ziran jing jue (see the article on Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2356).

The transmission of the Lingbao corpus is symbolized by the transfer of two registers, the True Writs in Five Tablets (Lingbao wupian zhenwen 靈寶五篇真文; see 22 Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing) and the Five Talismans (see 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu). The transmission includes, moreover, the registers of the Three Times Eight Effulgences (Sanbu bajing 三部八景; see 1407 Dongxuan lingbao ershi sheng tujing) and the Inner Sounds of All Heavens (Zhutian neiyin 諸天內音; see 97 Taishang lingbao zhutian neiyin ziran yuzi). Finally, the ordinand receives the Tablets of Commandment of the Eight Authorities (Bawei cewen 八威策文), which he carries fastened to his belt, and the Staff of Commandment (cezhang 策杖). On these last two symbols, see 352 Taishang dongxuan lingbao chishu yujue miaojing 1.23a–26b.

LU XIUJING's transmission ritual is a grandiose ceremony. In principle, it should be performed on a holy mountain. In the sacred area, precious pledges of gold and silk abound. The two main registers are unrolled and placed on a table in the open air, during the whole night of the Nocturnal Audience (suqi 宿啓), which is the first part of the service (4a–7b). If the wind blows the registers away, the ceremony has to be stopped and can recommence only after an interval of at least three days. If the same thing happens three times in succession, the disciple cannot be ordained (4a). On the morning after the suqi, the ceremony of the Great Oath (dameng 大盟) takes place. The transfer of the registers is made in exchange for the precious pledges (38a). A circular Pacing the Void (buxu 步虛) dance celebrates this solemn moment. Thereupon the master of the ordination recites the Ten Precepts (41b), and the disciple pronounces the oath of secrecy (43b) and receives his ordination certificate (43b). Finally, in keeping with the liturgy of the Heavenly Master tradition, a memorial is presented to Announce the Merit (yangong 言功; 46a–49a). Following the Great Oath ceremony, there is the ritual of the Casting of Tablets (toujian 投簡; 50b–52a). A more complete version of this ritual is given by LU XIUJING in 410 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhongjian wen.

On page 49a, there is a passage indicating the officiating master's residence. It gives, as indications to be completed, such-and-such a prefecture (fu 府), district (xian 縣), and monastery (guan 觀). The present text must therefore have been revised either in Tang or Song times.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kobayashi Masayoshi, "Reihō sekisho gohen shinbun"; idem, "Ryū Sō ni okeru Reihōkyō."

Kristofer Schipper

Dongxuan lingbao shengxuan buxu zhang xushu

洞玄靈寶昇玄步虛章序疏

14 fols.

614 (fasc. 334)

"Commentary on the Stanzas for Ascending to Mystery and Pacing the Void."

The antiquity of the present commentary on a part of 1439 Dongxuan lingbao yujing shan buxu jing can be inferred from its reference to the latter as the eighth juan of the third section of the Lingbao jingmu 靈寶經目 (1b). Both the title given here to that scripture, Taishang shuo xuandu yujing shan jing 太上說玄都玉京山經, as well as the alternative title given elsewhere in the commentary also correspond to the indications provided by the Lingbao jingmu (see Ōfuchi Ninji, Tōkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 365).

The fact that the commentary does not concern the hymns in the second part of 1439 Buxu jing suggests that these hymns were not part of the original text. Indeed, the author of the present commentary criticizes the obtuseness of those who had changed the term xuandu 玄都 (Mysterious Capital) into dacheng 大乘 (Great Vehicle) at the end of the third hymn (8a). The incriminated term does indeed figure, as indicated, in 1439 Buxu jing (4a). The "new books," those to which the name of GE XUAN is linked, were the first to advance the Taoist doctrine of the Great Vehicle (see Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 22), and the second part of 1439 Buxu jing presents itself as belonging to the revelation to GE XUAN. Since our commentator is opposed to the “new books,” the present text must have been written after, presumably not long after, their appearance, that is, around A.D. 430 (see Ōfuchi Ninji, “On Ku Ling Pao Ching,” 42).

The commentary, in itself, contains little of note. It does show, however, that there existed already in the Six Dynasties (220–589) an esoteric interpretation of the Lingbao texts, relating their entire discourse and practice to the body of the adept. The first line, for example, “We bow our heads to hail the Most High,” is interpreted to mean: “One opens one’s heart and causes the fire of the wisdom of the Most High to consume the outward appearance of the body and thus purify it.” This interpretation explains why the author says earlier that “the mountain [of the Jade Capital] is the body; it is also the body of the Most High” (4b). From the beginning of these hymns the adept “embodies” the Most High, “who is like unto a human being” (2a).

John Lagerwey

Taishang dongxuan lingbao erbu chuanshou yi 太上洞玄靈寶二部傳授儀

10 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1295 (fasc. 1009)

“Ritual for the Transmission of the Two Parts of the Lingbao [Diagram].” The reference is probably to the two complementary parts of the geometrical diagram given in the Book of Penetrating Meditation through Concentration (Siwei dingzhi liangban tuju 思微定志兩半圖局). This diagram is given in 325 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhihui dingzhi tongwei jing 6a–b, a text of the ancient Lingbao canon that WSBY 34.9a–b and 46.7a–b quotes under the title of Siwei dingzhi jing 思微定志經.

The text of the present ritual is similar, in places even identical, to that of 522 Dongxuan du lingbao ziran quanyi. The latter is well attested in early Tang (618–907) sources; it refers to the administrative division of fu 府, whereas our text, in a corresponding passage, has jun 郡, an administrative division of the Six Dynasties.

The transmission, which entails the division of the diagram (6a) and the adoption of Ten Precepts (shijie 十戒; 8b), corresponds to one of the degrees of the Lingbao ordination. The Ten Precepts, which are given also in 325 Tongwei jing 7b–8a, correspond to the Ten Precepts of the Heavenly Worthy and the Fourteen Ways of Deportment (Tianzun shijie shisi chishen pin 天尊十戒十四持身品, in 459 Dongxuan lingbao tianzun shuo shijie jing). For unknown reasons, the present text gives only nine of the ten precepts, omitting the ninth (interdiction of seeking vengeance); it also amends a number of others, changing the prohibition of adultery into that of lewd thoughts and the interdiction of drunkenness into total abstinence from alcohol. The present transmission, therefore, presumably concerns the ordination of novices as monks.

The ordination ritual of our text is mentioned in 1237 Sandong xiudao yi 6a, and in a note by DU GUANGTING in 507 Taishang huanglu zhaiyi 55.18a, quoting the daoshi Zhang Chengguang 張承光. The same note is reproduced in liturgical manuals of the Song such as 508 Wushang huanglu dazhai licheng yi 20.10a. These manuals maintain the “contract of the diagram” as part of the Lingbao ordination (see 1221 Shangqing lingbao dafa 29.12a–14b).

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang dongxuan lingbao toujian fuwen yaojue

太上洞玄靈寶投簡符文要訣

30 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

395 (fasc. 185)

“Elementary Instructions on the Written Symbols for the Casting of Tablets according to the Lingbao Tradition.” The first and only bibliographic mention of this text, in one juan, is found in Chongwen zongmu 10.6a (VDL 87). But the work, which is based exclusively on the literature of the ancient Lingbao canon, may have been compiled at a considerably earlier date.

When compared with the early texts, our version features some variant readings, such as Hengshan 衡山 (25b) for the Southern Peak, instead of Huoshan 霍山, as in the early texts. There are also several apparent transcription errors (11b3, 21b8). Pages 7b–8a offer a brief outline of the method for absorbing the five Cloud Shoots (fu wu yunya 服五雲牙; derived from 352 Taishang dongxuan lingbao chishu yujue miaojing 2.4b–14a). This outline is followed by the remark that this method (together with the associated written symbols, fuwen 符文) will be given in full in another juan. Both the fuwen and the instructions on the method are found in 17a–24b of the present version of the work, which at least since the eleventh century had been presented in one juan.

The contents of the present work are connected only in part with the ritual of the Casting of Tablets (toujian), already set forth in 352 Chishu yujue miaojing 1.5a–16b and then definitively formulated by LU XIUJING (410 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhongjian wen). The symbols reproduced for this purpose are based on the cloud-seal characters in 22 Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing.

The other themes of this text (without exception taken from 97 Taishang lingbao zhutian neiyin ziran yuzi) fall outside the framework of this ritual but still focus on the reproduction of celestial symbols in a ritual context.

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

1.B.4 Texts of the Dongshen Division

The third part of LU XIUJING's canon was called "penetrating divinity" (Dongshen 洞神). Its fundamental text was the Writ of the Three Sovereigns (Sanhuang wen 三皇文), now lost, a document in sacred talismanic characters, which, according to GE HONG, had once been obtained by the Yellow Emperor (see BPZ 18.296). For GE HONG this writ and its complement, the Image of the True Form of the Five Sacred Mountains (Wuyue zhenxing tu 五嶽真形圖), were the most powerful of all Taoist talismans. GE HONG had received them from his master ZHENG YIN, zi Siyuan 思遠 (d. 301), a scholar who had obtained the books that had once belonged to GE HONG's famous granduncle GE XUAN (d. 244; see BPZ 4.62 and 19.303–305). GE XUAN himself had been the disciple of Zuo Ci 左慈, zi Yuanfang 元方 (fl. early third century: see Hou Han shu 82B.2747).

Chen Guofu (CGF 72–73) identifies the Sanhuang wen known to GE HONG as the Xiaoyou jing 小有經 version, as opposed to the new so-called Dayou jing 大有經 version, which was revealed during GE HONG's lifetime. This new version was found in 301 in a cave on the Song shan 嵩山 by BAO JING (260–330?), governor of Nanhai 南海 (modern Canton; see YJQQ 4.10b and 6.11b; the latter passage has been identified as coming from the now lost Xuanmen dayi 玄門大義, a doctrinal work of the early seventh century).

BAO JING was GE HONG's father-in-law (CGF 76) and the master of the famous hermit XU MAI, the elder brother of XU MI, the main recipient of the Shangqing jing 上清經. Thus, BAO JING's Dayou jing version may in several respects be considered as the forerunner of the wave of "revealed" rewriting of ancient texts that produced the Shangqing and Lingbao scriptures. This may be the reason LU XIUJING attributed one of the divisions of the Catalogue of the Three Caverns (Sandong jing shumumu 三洞經書目) to BAO JING's scripture.

Unlike the Shangqing and Lingbao catalogues, no trace remains of Lu's list of the Dongshen jing 洞神經. It seems, however, that the corpus was quite small, comprising only four juan. Lu transmitted the texts to Sun Youyue 孫遊嶽, who passed them on to TAO HONGJING. Tao "analyzed the different currents to which these texts belonged and rearranged them into 11 juan," one for each of the Three Sovereigns, and one for each of the Eight Emperors (badi 八帝; see YJQQ 6.12). This arrangement of the Dongshen division is confirmed in WSBY 30.3a, and it is found again, enlarged to fourteen juan by the addition of three rituals, in 803 Taishang dongshen sanhuang yi, the ritual for the transmission of the Dongshen canon. In a similar way, 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 4.7b indicates that in order to be ordained a master of the Dongshen division, adepts had to possess the fourteen juan of the Dongshen jing. Of these, only the two juan of 640 Dongshen badi miaojing jing have survived. The reason for the loss may be that the Sanhuang wen was burned by imperial order in 646. It was replaced in the canon by the Daode jing 道德經 (CGF 77), as is still the case in the Ming Daozang.

The Image of the True Form of the Five Sacred Peaks was also transmitted by TAO HONGJING along with the Sanhuang wen (see 1281 Wuyue zhenxing xulun and Dunhuang manuscripts Stein 3750 with Pelliot 2559). Another ancient text related to the Sanhuang wen that has been preserved is 767 Taishang tongling bashi shengwen zhenxing tu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Andersen, "Talking to the gods"; Fukui Kōjun, Dōkyō no kisoteki kenkyū; Liu Zhongyu, "Sanhuang wen xintan"; Ōfuchi Ninji, Dōkyōshi no kenkyū, 277–342.

Taishang tongling bashi shengwen zhenxing tu

太上通靈八史聖文真形圖

14 fols.

Third–fourth century A.D.

767 (fasc. 534)

"Image of the Sainly Writ and the True Form of the Eight Archivists for the Spiritual Communication with the Most High." The Eight Archivists are the spirits of the Eight Trigrams. The interpretation of the term shi 史 may be deduced from the name of the trigram kun 坤 in the system of the present text. It is given alternately as zhuxia 柱下 and zhushi 柱史, both of which are short forms of the title zhuxia shi (literally, "scribe beneath the pillar"), and both of which are also used as names for Laozi, the archivist of Zhou (see Hou Han shu 59.1908–9 and YJQQ 3.3a). The ancient office of zhuxia shi is variously defined as that of a censor or archivist, and the title is used also as the name of a star in the Central Palace (possibly Draconis), said to be occupied with the "recording of offenses" (jiguo 記過; Jin shu 11.289). The practices related to the Eight Archivists are described in the present text as taking place beside a pillar at the center of the hall (tangshu 堂樞), where two archivists are thought to be permanently on duty (13a).

The present text describes a technique of divination based on summoning the Eight Archivists by means of fu and comprising the presentation of offerings (ji 祭) to the spirits. This technique was known to GE HONG, who in a discussion of the different forms of divination refers to the practice of making the Eight Archivists arrive by means of offerings (jizhi bashi 祭致八史; BPZ 15.248), and who in the list of the books in his master's library includes the title, "Image of the Eight Archivists" (Bashi tu; BPZ 19.305). It is entirely possible that the present text is in fact the work that was known to GE HONG. In any case, there is little doubt that a large part and perhaps all of the work is ancient, predating at least the period around A.D. 400, when the newly revealed Lingbao corpus was propagated by GE CHAOFU, the great-nephew of GE HONG. This early date appears from a comparison of the present work with one of the central texts of the Lingbao corpus, 671 Taishang wuji dadao ziran zhenyi wucheng fu shangjing (see also the Dunhuang version of this text, Pelliot 2440; Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Zurokuhen, 10–22).

The first juan of 671 Wucheng fu shangjing describes the five basic Lingbao fu, and the second juan centers on some practices related to the Eight Archivists and associated with a Bashi zhenxing tu 八史真形圖 (2.12a). The latter title is included in the list of the twenty-four images of the Lingbao corpus, given at the end of the second juan. The same list is found in 1407 Dongxuan lingbao ershi shengtu jing, with hymns praising each image, and it is clearly related to GE HONG's catalogue (see Bokenkamp, "Sources," 459–60). In 671 Wucheng fu shangjing the title of the fu for communicating with the Eight Archivists is given as Xuandong tongling fu 玄洞通靈符 (2.12a, 11b), corresponding to the central set of fu in the present text (5b–9a), where the title of each includes the same phrase. The actual fu of the Eight Archivists are not included in 671 Wucheng fu shangjing, but it should be noted that the style of the version in the present text closely resembles that of the five Lingbao fu in the opening part of 671 Wucheng fu shangjing, a fact that becomes even more apparent when one turns to the Dunhuang manuscript version of this work. It seems that the two sets of fu together correspond to the Bawei wusheng fu 八威五勝符, mentioned by GE HONG (BPZ 19.7a; note that the term wusheng fu 五勝符 [Talismans of the Five Victories] is predominant in the Dunhuang version of 671 Wucheng fu shangjing, in spite of the term wucheng 五稱 [Five Denominations] in the title). It may be added that the thirteen Bawei wusheng fu are praised in the Tang dynasty 803 Taishang dongshen sanhuang yi 10b–11a, in a hymn that contains the line pianmu xuandong 篇目玄洞 ("they belong under the heading Xuandong"). Note that GE HONG's catalogue includes a Xuandong jing 玄洞經 in ten juan, 1185 Baopu zi neipian 19.5a.

The names of the Eight Archivists are the same in 671 Wucheng fu shangjing as in the present text, and the manner and purpose of relating to them is described in similar terms. The main differences are that in 671 Wucheng fu shangjing the fu of the Eight Archivists are presented as secondary in relation to the five Lingbao fu (2.1a, 11a–b), and the names of the eight spirits are combined with those of the buddhas and bodhisattvas of the Ten Directions—an arrangement that necessitates the addition of the two collective terms, bajing 八精 and bashi 八史, as the names of the two spirits of the center (2.5b–6b). These elaborations are clearly derivative with respect to the tradition of the present text, in which, furthermore, we find no indication of an influence from the Lingbao tradition. The two instances where the term tongling 通靈 in the names of the above-mentioned fu is replaced by lingbao (8b) are of little consequence. On one hand, the term lingbao was in use independently of and well before the appearance of the Lingbao corpus; on the other, it might have slipped in during the later transmission of the present text. In any case, it is inconceivable that the system of the present text could have been derived from the Lingbao context as defined by 671 Wucheng fu shangjing. We may conclude that the present book is, if not necessarily the source of 671 Wucheng fu shangjing, then at least a version closely related to that source.

The book is divided into two parts. In the first part (1a–5b), which has no separate title and may lack the beginning, the basic technique of divination through communication with the Eight Archivists is described. The spirits are said to be divided into couples, Zhushi 柱史 (spirit of the trigram kun) being the wife of Lingang 臨罡 (spirit of the trigram qian 乾), and so on. Each couple descends into a person's home for a period of three days, followed immediately by the descent of the next couple, and so on through a cycle of twelve days. If one wishes to consult these spirits, one must first fast for a period of 100 days, then place a set of eight fu written on wooden tablets in the eight directions (3b–4a). On the day of the descent of a couple, one must arrange offerings for the two spirits at the left door-pivot (hushu 戶樞) of the main hall of the house. The adept must call out the names of the spirits and may then ask them questions on any subject, including the future. Women should address the female spirit, and men the male, and the spirits will then respond by speaking to the adepts or by inspiring knowledge within their hearts. It may be noted that a particular value is ascribed to the concerted practice of man and wife, likened to the union of qian and kun, in a later part of the book (12b; cf. the early Zhengyi ritual preserved in 1294 Shangqing huangshu guodu yi).

The second part of the book (5b–14a) is entitled "Bashi tongling fu 八史通靈符" and presents the somewhat different level of practice associated with the Xuandong tongling fu (see above). This part also contains many references to the protective and exorcistic functions of the Eight Archivists. The legend of the transmission of the fu is told by the Yellow Emperor, to whom all the passages of this second part of the book are attributed (in the first part only one passage (1b) opens with this attribution). The Yellow Emperor relates that he received the fu from "Lord Li, the senior master" (i.e., Laozi), who saw them in the Big Dipper, and who is also said to have brought them to the barbarians of India (hu 胡; 5b and 13a). The fu are referred to as stellar (xingfu 星符), and they are described as being governed by the stars of the Dipper (6a–9b). The Eight Archivists are found both at a pillar of the main hall in people's homes and in the Dipper, as subordinates of the Lord of the Dipper (Doujun 斗君; 13a–b) (fig. 20).

FIGURE 20. Fu of the Eight Archivists (767 3b). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/760)

such tablets are functionally equivalent to statues of the gods. Offerings are presented to the fu (11a), and each of the Eight Trigrams is said to be governed by “the fu of one star” (9b). Furthermore, in the first part of the text—following the presentation of the eight fu to be displayed in the eight directions of the ritual area—an additional eight fu are presented as actual pictures of the gods. These eight fu are also divided into pairs, and it is stated that on the three days corresponding to the couple in question the fu “descend and are present in people’s homes” (4a–5a).

The two sets of eight fu in the first part of the book are found with some variations in 1202 Dongshen badi yuanbian jing 13b–16a. This book, which appears to belong to the second half of the Tang dynasty (618–907), is part of the Dongshen canon.

The practices related to the Eight Archivists form part of the common stock of early methods, drawn upon by all the Taoist traditions that were established in the course of the Six Dynasties. As testified by 671 Wucheng fu shangjing, these practices were to some extent adopted into the Lingbao corpus, and in the Zhengyi 615 Chisong zi zhangli we find the fu of the Eight Archivists mentioned in a list of mixed registers (zalu 雜錄; 4.22b). It was only during the later part of the Six Dynasties that these practices were classified as Dongshen, and in texts of the Tang dynasty this classification is unequivocal (see, e.g., 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 4.7b). We find no trace of such classifications in the present text. When qualified at all, the officiant is referred to merely as a daoshi, and the rules of transmission stipulate simply that the recipient should be a worthy person. However, one may not pass the fu on

When a question is addressed to them, they return to the Dipper to consult the registers of fate (10a and 12a). The same journey may be undertaken by a superior person and daoshi, whose name has already been entered in the register of immortals in the constellation. When such a person wears the fu, the spirits will attach themselves to his body, and after a period of three years he will ascend to heaven (5b–6a).

The relationship between the fu and the deities they represent is remarkably direct in this text. Each of the Xuandong tongling fu is referred to as the “spirit tablet” (shenzhu 神主) of the spirit in question. It should be noted that in present-day popular religion indiscriminately, and in all cases one should announce their transmission to the spirits by “making offerings to the fu, while [placing oneself] under the Dipper” (Jifu douxia 祭符斗下; 13a–14a).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Andersen, “Talking to the gods.”

Poul Andersen

Wuyue zhenxing xulun 五嶽真形序論

25 fols.

Late Six Dynasties (220–589)

1281 (fasc. 1005)

“Introductory Treatises to the [Image] of the True Form of the Five Sacred Mountains.” This work is a collection of four texts concerning the legends and rites surrounding this famous talisman. The first text (1a–18a) tells the story of the revelation of the talisman by the goddess Xi wang mu 西王母 to Emperor Wu of the Han dynasty, describes the paradisiacal islands of the immortals, and tells of the later transmission of the holy image. A long quotation in 1241 Chuanshou sandong jingjie falu lüeshuo 1.14b–18a shows that, in spite of its heterogeneous aspect, this text forms a single piece. In his commentary on 1016 Zhen’gao, TAO HONGJING refers twice to a Wuyue xu, once on the subject of the biography of Feng Junda 封君達 and once on that of the islands of the immortals (1016 Zhen’gao 10.23a and 14.20a). Both references agree with passages (on pages 16b and 8a–14b) of this first text, which probably constitutes the original version of 292 Han wudi neizhuan and 598 Shizhou ji, as well as of 293 Han wudi waizhuan.

The second text (18a–19b) contains two documents for the ritual of transmission of the talisman (shoutu jiwen 受圖祭文). These two written prayers are attributed to ZHENG YIN. They are related to the Rites of Transmission of the Image of the Five Sacred Mountains (Shoushou Wuyue tu fa 授受五嶽圖法) preserved among the Dunhuang manuscripts (Stein 3750 and Pelliot 2559).

These rites are quoted in 1240 Dongxuan lingbao daoshi shou sandong jingjie falu zeri li 5a–b as having been edited by TAO HONGJING himself (cf. Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 331–32). They mention the fact that the ordinand should copy not only the holy image, but also the introduction (xu 序), and that the latter text would occupy fourteen to fifteen sheets of paper (Stein 3750, lines 25–26). This number agrees with the length of the first text of the present work, another indication that it was the original introduction.

The third text (19b–21b) is called “Instructions for Use by Mr. Bao [Jing],” and the last (21b–25b) is a preface to the Image of the Five Sacred Peaks attributed to Dongfang Shuo 東方朔. This last text is also reproduced in 441 Dongxuan lingbao wuyue guben zhenxing tu 1a–4b.

The texts contained in the present work, together with an excerpt from the above-mentioned rites of transmission, are reproduced in YJQQ 79.

Kristofer Schipper

Shoushou wuyue tufa 授受五嶽圖法

Shoushou sanhuang fa 授受三皇法

Sixth century

Dunhuang manuscripts Stein 3750 and Pelliot 2559

“Rituals for the Transmission of the [Writs of the] Three Sovereigns.” These two texts are rituals for the transmission of the sacred talismans of the Sanhuang wen 三皇文 tradition. Both manuscripts are fragments of the same scroll, which must have been considerably longer. The rituals were probably written or edited by TAO HONGJING (see Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 331–32). A petition (Stein 3750, line 43) starts with the mention of the Tianjian 天監 era of the Liang dynasty (502–519).

The Stein manuscript begins with the final part of the rites of transmission for the Xiyue gong jinshan fu 西嶽公禁山符 and other talismans that belonged to a lesser degree of initiation (see 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 4.7b. Next follow the rites of transmission of the Image of the True Form of the Five Sacred Mountains (Wuyue zhenxing tu 五嶽真形圖). Tao’s commentary notes that these rites were transmitted by ZHENG YIN and GE HONG.

The rites for the transmission of the Sanhuang jing are incomplete. Tao notes at the beginning of his commentary that all versions current in his time came, in principle, from BAO JING and GE HONG but that some are of uncertain origin. He states that he grouped them all together in ten juan (see Ōfuchi Ninji, Dōkyōshi no kenkyū, 308, for a detailed discussion).

Kristofer Schipper

Dongshen badi miaojing jing 洞神八帝妙精經

32 fols.

Probably sixth century

640 (fasc. 342)

“Scripture of the Wondrous Essence of the Eight Emperors, of the Dongshen Canon.” The book is a compilation of some of the basic material of the Dongshen canon, which formed during the Six Dynasties around the original Sanhuang wen 三皇文 in three juan (see Ōfuchi Ninji, Dōkyōshi no kenkyū, 298–317). A fourteen-juan list of the Dongshen scriptures, entitled “Dayou lutu jingmu 大有錄圖經目,” is included in 803 Taishang dongshen sanhuang yi 5a–b, a Tang dynasty (618–907) text.

The format of this list corresponds to the discussion of the Dongshen jing found in a passage from the Xuanmen dayi 玄門大義, a text of the transition period between the Sui (581–618) and Tang dynasties (YJQQ 6.11a–12a; see also Xiaoyou jing xiaji 小有經下記, in YJQQ 9.9a). It is stated there that the Dongshen jing in eleven juan included one juan transmitted to each of the Three Sovereigns (i.e., the original Sanhuang wen) and one transmitted to each of the Eight Emperors, and that the number of fourteen juan was reached by the addition of special ritual texts. In the above-mentioned list, juan 4–11 of the Dongshen jing are associated with the Eight Emperors, and juan 4–6 are listed as the three parts of the Badi miaojing jing 八帝妙精經. The Xuanmen dayi attributes the arrangement of the Dongshen jing in eleven juan to TAO HONGJING (YJQQ 6.12a) and quotes “part six” (diliu 第六) of the Dongshen jing (SDZN 8.32a). Another quotation from this part six, apparently derived also from the Xuanmen dayi, is given in YJQQ 6.10b and is found verbatim in the present book (16a). It thus seems likely that the work dates at least to the late Six Dynasties.

The group of texts associated with the Eight Emperors is commonly referred to as the Eight Enquiries (basuo 八索; YJQQ 4.10a–b; 6.12a; 9.9a). The Shangshu xu 尚書序 by Kong Anguo 孔安國 defines the term basuo as referring to “expositions concerning the Eight Trigrams” (Shisan jing zhushu 114b; see also YJQQ 100.4b, 8b). It may be noted that another surviving part of the Dongshen jing, 1202 Dongshen badi yuanbian jing (corresponding to juan 7 to 9 of the list in 803 Sanhuang yi), centers on divinatory practices related to the Eight Archivists (bashi 八史) who are defined as the essences of the Eight Trigrams. However, none of these practices is included in the present book, which furthermore makes no reference to the Eight Emperors except in the title.

The text begins by presenting some basic elements of the Dongshen tradition, for instance, techniques of meditation on the Three Ones (sanyi 三一), the supreme deities of the human body (2b–4b), and the hymns entitled “Yangge jiuzhang 陽歌九章” (4b–6a), used in connection with ritual circumambulations (see WSBY 38.3b–4a and 1283 Taishang dongshen xingdao shoudu yi 4b–5b). The largest part of the text is taken up by a separate work entitled Xicheng yaojue sanhuang tianwen nei dazi 西城要訣三皇天文內大字 (12a–29b), which includes a series of ninety-two fu (17a–28b), divided into three parts and presented as a version of the original Sanhuang wen in three juan. A note under the title of this work identifies it as “the ritual practices and the established forms [licheng 立成] [of the Sanhuang fu] of the Immortal of the Western City” (i.e., Wang Yuan 王遠; 12a). And in a short passage immediately following the fu, the ritual instructions accompanying the fu are said to represent “the practices of Lord Wang” (Wangjun shixing; 29a). This description seems to refer to the work entitled Xicheng shixing 西城施行, which may well be the Xicheng yaojue 西城要訣 of the present text. A Xicheng shixing is mentioned in the Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2559 (see Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 331–32; Zurokuhen, 721–25). It is described there both as a work in one juan containing “the essentials of summoning [spirits] for inspection” (by means of fu), and as an addition to the main corpus of Sanhuang fu in ten juan (Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Zurokuhen, 724.100–1).

The note following the title says that the Xicheng yaojue was written down by the disciple of Wang Yuan, Bo He 帛和. In the following text, which leads up to the presentation of the fu, he relates how in 100 B.C. the master, after a three-year period of waiting, transmitted to him the “essential Way,” consisting of the Sanhuang tianwen dazi 三皇天文大字 and the formulas for the making of elixir of the Taiqing zhongjing 太清中經 (15b). The basis for this account would seem to be the biography of Bo He in Shenxian zhuan 神仙傳 (see, e.g., 596 Xianyuan bianzhu 2.17b–18b and TPYL 663.6b). The circumstances of the transmission are described in a different way in this biography, but there, too, the master is Lord Wang of Mount Xicheng, and the same texts are mentioned (with the addition of the Wuyue tu 五嶽圖).

A similar account, concerning, however, only the Sanhuang wen and the Wuyue tu, is found in 1185 Baopu zi neipian 19.8a–b. It explains that those who are destined to attain the Tao may enter a holy mountain and through the practice of meditation obtain a vision of the fu, following the example of Bo He. However, at the time of the late Six Dynasties (220–589) the transmission of the Sanhuang fu was associated more particularly with the name of BAO JING (see also Erjiao lun 8.141b on the “fabrication” of the Sanhuang jing by BAO JING during the years 291–299). The author of the Xuanmen dayi speculates that perhaps GE HONG in fact received the tradition from two different sources (YJQQ 6.12a; 1129 Daojiao yishu 2.7a).

The problem of different lines of transmission resulting in separate versions of the tradition is reflected in the present text, which concludes with a spurious quotation from BPZ, entitled “Secret Words of Baopu zi” (29b–32a). It is not clear whether this passage originally formed part of the immediately preceding Xicheng yaojue or was written especially for the present text. The “secret words” refer to “the Established Forms (licheng) written down in this place,” that is, in the section of the Xicheng yaojue presenting the fu (31a). The reduced format of this version of the Sanhuang fu contrasts with the information derived from BAO JING that the Tianwen sanhuang dazi comprised 40,000 words; the passage also states that GE HONG, in addition, received the essential Way of the Three Writs (sanwen yaodao 三文要道; apparently a version in four juan comprising fewer than the 40,000 words mentioned) from BAO JING (31a and 32a).

It should be noted that in the above-mentioned passage of the Xicheng yaojue, on the ritual instructions accompanying the fu, the directions found under the first nine fu in the present text are said to be different from those found in the Inner Scripture of Lord Bao (Baogong neijing 鮑公內經; 29a). We may compare the material found in WSBY 25, entitled “Essential Usages of the Sanhuang Tradition” (Sanhuang yaoyong 三皇要用) and said to be derived in its entirety from the Dongshen jing. The last part of the juan (25.9b–10b) gives instructions for the nine fu that are partly identical with those in the present text (though omitting some of the indications of accompanying fasts). A widely different series of instructions for nine fu related to the same group of deities is found in a preceding part of the same juan (3b–5a). Furthermore, we find that a passage at the beginning of this juan of the WSBY (2b.1–2) corresponds to a quotation in TPYL 676.8b from a Sanhuang xumu 三皇序目 (which may quite likely be the same as the Xumu attributed to BAO JING and quoted in the Xuanmen dayi; see YJQQ 6.10b–11b). Note also the correspondence between the title of a section of this juan, “Zhuguan qingtai zhi fu 朱官青胎之符” in WSBY 25.7b–8a, and the title “Qingtai fu 青胎符” for a part of the main corpus said in Pelliot 2559 to be transmitted by Bao and Ge (Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Zurokuhen, 724.100, 120). Thus it seems likely that the opening parts of this juan were derived from a BAO JING version of the Dongshen jing.

Poul Andersen

1.B.5 Other Revealed Scriptures

A certain number of important revealed scriptures of the Six Dynasties were not selected by LU XIUJING as canonical texts in his Sandong jing shumu 三洞經書目, perhaps for several reasons. Some texts, like the Taiping jing 太平經, had not yet been rewritten or adapted in Lu’s time (see part 1.B.6). Once it was adapted, it obtained canonical status as the Taiping division of the Sui and Tang Daozang. Other texts, like the Shengxuan neijiao jing 昇玄內教經 and the Dongyuan shenzhou jing 洞淵神咒經, may have been left out because, unlike the Books of the Three Caverns and the Scripture of the Great Peace, their prototypes were not part of the library of GE HONG but belonged instead to the texts of the Way of the Heavenly Master. They were probably produced by sectarian movements. They never obtained separate divisions in the canon, even in Tang times.

Taishang dongyuan shenzhou jing 太上洞淵神咒經

20 juan

Late Eastern Jin (317–420); preface by DU GUANGTING 杜光庭 (850–933)

335 (fasc. 170–173)

“Scripture of Divine Incantations of the Abyssal Caverns.” This work is the principal apocalyptic text of medieval China. The term shenzhou 神咒 (divine incantations) suggests the work’s oral aspect. The scripture presents itself as revealed by the Tao to a worthy recipient whose mission it was to transmit it in order to save mankind from the imminent end of the world. The work's confused and highly repetitive style confirms its oral, mediumistic origins. Even the book's title is not definitively stated. It presents itself as the Scripture of the Innumerable (Wuliang jing 無量經; 1.1a), the Marvelous Scripture of the Central Mystery of Shangqing (Shangqing zhongxuan miaojing 上清中玄妙經; 2.1a), the Scripture of Divine Incantations (Shenzhou jing 神咒經; 3.2b), the Book of Samādhi (Sanmei jing 三昧經) and the Scripture of Great Exorcism (Daqu jing 大驅經; 5.1a; 10.1a), among other titles. Although the text contains no evidence as to the identity of its medium-recipient, a few elements indicate that it was produced by a fervent religious movement, a sect active in the Jiangnan region (south of the Yangzi) at the beginning of the fifth century.

The oldest versions of the Shenzhou jing are found among the Dunhuang manuscripts (Pelliot and Stein collections). These versions emanate from a text that comprised ten juan (see Ōfuchi Ninji, Tōkō dōkyō: Zurukuben, 519–63, which gives the best reconstruction of the Dunhuang version of the Shenzhou jing). Two manuscripts (Pelliot 3233 and 2444) — corresponding to juan one and seven, respectively — contain colophons dated 664 that state this copy of the work was made in a metropolitan monastery (the Lingyin guan 靈應觀) by order of Emperor Gaozong for the crown prince Li Hong 李弘, the son of Wu Zetian (r. 684–704), named after the Taoist messiah. The characters yuan 淵, min 民, shi 世, and zhi 治 in these two manuscripts are substituted in deference to the names of Tang emperors. During the first half of the sixth century, the Shenzhou jing was known as a ten-juan scripture (see 319 Dongxuan lingbao benxiang yundu jieqi jing 4b–5a), and 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 4.6b, at the beginning of the Tang, still refers to the version in ten juan. The Shenzhou jing maintains this form until the end of the Tang (618–907). It appears as such in the other Dunhuang copies dating from the seventh and eighth centuries, as well as in a reference in DU GUANGTING's 590 Daojiao lingyan ji 12.9b–10a (YJQQ 119.7a–7b). Historical references found in these first ten juan allow us to date the original Shenzhou jing to the beginning of the fifth century. There are several allusions to Liu Yu 劉裕 (363–442), founder of the Liu Song dynasty (e.g., 1.3a, 9b), as well as typical Six Dynasties terms such as suolu 索虜 (2.8a), an expression used in the south to designate northern barbarians.

At the beginning of the Five Dynasties, DU GUANGTING expanded the text into twenty juan. This is the basic text of the Shenzhou jing found in the Daozang edition. It comprises the same ten juan (apart from some variations) of the Dunhuang versions, plus eight later juan from the Tang period and two additional juan (19 and 20) that are contemporary with the scripture's original ten-juan nucleus.

The Daozang edition opens with a preface by DU GUANGTING that refers to the wood-block printing of the work that he commissioned (preface, 3b). The title Heavenly Master Transmitter of Truth (chuanzhen tianshi 傳真天師) that appears in the list of Du's titles in the note preceding his preface allows us to date Du's edition to the first decades of the tenth century. This title was bestowed on him by Wang Yan 王衍 (r. 918–926), the second ruler of the Shu 蜀 kingdom, at a ceremony of reciprocal investiture in 923 (see Verellen, Du Guangting, 178).

Du's preface attributes the Shenzhou jing's revelation to a certain Wang Zuan 王纂, a Taoist at Mount Maji 馬跡山 (part of the Maoshan range), at the end of the Eastern Jin (before 316). Though this attribution cannot be accepted for the purpose of dating the present scripture, it may nevertheless have a certain foundation. The lineage of masters associated with the Shenzhou jing might have claimed Wang Zuan as their spiritual ancestor. This order's existence is attested by the beginning of the Tang (cf. 1125 Dongxuan lingbao sandong fengdao kejie yingshi 5.3b and 445 Dongxuan lingbao sanshi minghui xingzhuang juguan fangsuo wen 3a). Du no doubt received the order's original Shenzhou jing as well as the related liturgical texts (penitential rituals and rituals for requesting rain) that are found in his edition. These rituals (some of which are also found as independent texts in the Daozang) were transmitted to the Shenzhou jing masters (shenzhou shi 神咒師; also called masters of the Law of the Great Religion of the Samādhi and of the Divine Incantations of the Abyssal Caverns [Dongyuan shenzhou dazong sanmei fashi 洞淵神咒大宗三昧法師]) when they were ordained (see 1125 Kejie yingzhi and 445 Fangsuo wen, mentioned above).

The "Scripture of Divine Incantations of the Abyssal Caverns" presents itself as the Book of books, the absolute, supreme scripture. It is, in fact, at the same time a prophylactic text, a liturgical manual, a repository of all the deities, a demonological repertory, a contract shared by adepts and masters of the Three Caverns (sandong fashi 三洞法師; the Shenzhou jing's highest clerical rank), and a passport for salvation. But its fundamental raison d'être is the prophetic, apocalyptic message it contains. This message has its foundation in a Taoist theological setting. The Shenzhou jing's ideology and liturgy are rooted in the Heavenly Masters organization.

The present text includes all the characteristics of apocalyptic drama. Its vision can be summarized as follows: The end of the world is imminent; it corresponds to the completion of a cosmic era, a Great Kalpa. The final deluge will be preceded by calamities that will occur in particular years of the sexagesimal cycle: wars; invasions; brigandage; social, political, and family dissolution; meteorological disorders; trials; imprisonments and official punishments; oppression of the people by tyrannical officials; fires; floods; bad harvests; famines; witchcraft and sorcery; and, above all, the extraordinary spread of countless diseases. All these afflictions will be brought on by gigantic armies of many kinds of demons (gui 鬼 and mowang 魔王) that are mostly the souls of the dead. Their proliferation will be the result of the people's moral corruption. Instead of conforming to the true religion (the religion of the Three Caverns, that is, Taoism, of which the Shenzhou jing says it is the highest representative), the people commit sins, are swayed by heterodox cults and shamanism, and sacrifice domestic animals to offer blood to the demons that bring on disasters and adversity.

The deluge will occur in the fifty-fourth year (jiashen 甲申) of the sexagesimal cycle in order to purify the universe by ridding it of all these evil creatures. These apocalyptic predictions are repeated again and again throughout the first ten original juan of the work. Little place is left for expressions of hope or descriptions of a utopian life. Salvation is promised for all the faithful who have been converted to the Law and who show their full devotion to the correct way by conforming to the liturgical prescriptions and by practicing active proselytism. The elect or Seed People (zhongmin 種民) will constitute a new immortal race in the paradisiacal kingdom of Great Peace ruled by the Perfect Lord Li Hong. This savior will appear in a renchen 壬辰 year, eight years after the end of the world.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The literature on the Shenzhou jing is extensive. See Mollier, Une apocalypse taoïste, and references there.

Christine Mollier

Taishang dongshen dongyuan shenzhou zhibing kouzhang

太上洞神洞淵神咒治病口章

36 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1290 (fasc. 1008)

“Oral Petition for the Healing of Diseases, in the Dongyuan Shenzhou Tradition, of the Taishang Dongshen Division.” The early chapters of 335 Taishang dongyuan shenzhou jing expressly prescribe the liturgical practice of kouzhang 口章, the oral petition. The present text is representative of the context of the movement that produced this scripture. There are many similarities in the lists of deities and demons, and one passage of 335 Shenzhou jing (10.7b–8a) gives a description of the presentation of an oral memorial for healing purposes that is close to the ritual we have here.

The ritual, which shows no direct influence of the Lingbao liturgy, is performed at the home of the patient by a master who has received the Heavenly Master ordination (4b), in conjunction with an Offering to the Five Emperors (jiao wudi 醮五帝; 28a–b).

The fact that this text was classified as part of the Dongshen division is also an important indication of its early inclusion into the Taoist canon (see general introduction).

Although the text mentions the characteristic cheek slapping (bojia 搏頰) as an expression of contrition, rites of repentance do not play the same dominant role here as in the Lingbao liturgy. Instead, a vast number of gods and demons are conjured up, and misdeeds committed by ancestors are annulled (jie 解).

This is an important text for the study of the Shenzhou ritual and for the history of Taoist liturgy in general.

Kristofer Schipper

Dongzhen taiji beidi ziwei shenzhou miaojing 洞真太極北帝紫微神咒妙經

12 fols.

Eastern Jin (317–420)

49 (fasc. 29)

“Marvelous Book of the Spells of the God of the Pole Star, Emperor of the North of the Supreme Ultimate, a Dongzhen Canon.” Under this rather unlikely title has been preserved a fragment of an ancient and important eschatological work that has no links with the Dongzhen (i.e., the Shangqing) scriptures but is instead close to the early parts of 335 Taishang dongyuan shenzhou jing. Like the latter, the present text refers to itself as Sanmei jing 三昧經 (3a; compare 335 Shenzhou jing 8.9a and passim). Stylistically, the short paragraphs introduced as revelations, as well as the vocabulary and phraseology, are similar. The text speaks of the current period as the Great Jin 大晉 (9b) and mentions invasions by barbarians (10a).

The text begins with a subtitle (pin 品) that applies to the entire juan, which implies that it is but a section of a larger work. Paragraphs 2–12 (2a–10b) contain revelations concerning the disasters to come during the ten final years of the sexagesimal cycle, from jiayin 甲寅 to guihai 癸亥. Presumably, the complete work covered the entire sixty years and was therefore composed of six juan. The Chongwen zongmu 10.6b lists a Beidi shenzhou jing 北帝神咒經 in ten juan, which may well correspond to the present work. This Beidi shenzhou jing is listed as lost in 1430 Daozang quejing mulu 1.14a.

The revelations are presented as spoken by the Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning, and on page 6b the cult of the Three Heavenly Worthies is mentioned. This text may therefore be contemporary to the Lingbao scriptures, but it is not included in LU XIUJING’s list of canonical books.

Kristofer Schipper

Dongxuan lingbao feixian shangpin miaojing 洞玄靈寶飛仙上品妙經

5 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

381 (fasc. 182)

“Marvelous Scripture on Flying Immortals.” During a heavenly meeting where the “predication on Earth” of the Sanmei wuliang shenzhou dajing 三昧無量神咒大經 is discussed, the audience asks the Heavenly Worthy what to do about “the superficial and inconstant world of today, where most people believe neither in Taoist methods nor in the teaching of the Three Caverns” (1b), notwithstanding the imminent cataclysm.

The words of the Tao (daoyan 道言) provide the answer, tracing back the history of salvation. Anyone aspiring to immortality must renew it. First one has to receive the registers, beginning with those linked to the Yellow and Red Talismans (huangchi zifu 黃赤紫符), belonging to the Heavenly Master tradition, then those of the Three Caverns and, finally, the Divine Formulas (shenzhou 神咒) that destroy demons and save people (2a). After receiving the scriptures and the corresponding registers, the adept has to observe the calendar of the fasts. These fasts must not be practiced by an adept alone but in community with others (2b). The Tao continues with a litany of fifty-one actions that enable one “to become a Flying Immortal.” Among these fifty-one actions, “the keeping of the fasts is the first” (4a).

The present scripture is then revealed. During this revelation, an altercation takes place between an immortal and a zhenren. The Heavenly Worthy declares the zhenren to be in the right and banishes the immortal to the moon, where he must “cut the cassia tree” (4b). This incident provokes a question from the immortal King of the Flying Skies concerning the hierarchy of merits. The Heavenly Worthy tells him that his answer will be an oar, a bridge of good karma, a good field of merit. All the saints, here gathered, have performed meritorious actions since the first year of the Opening of the Light (kaiguang 開光). Thus they have “gradually obtained access to the fruits of the Supreme Tao” (5b). In the heavenly hierarchy there are “nine grades” (jiupin 九品) of immortals, zhenren, and saints. Everyone can become a saint. The accumulation of merits is comparable to the building of a tower.

The scripture is mentioned in 335 Taishang dongyuan shenzhou jing (20.25a). The beginning of our text seems to draw inspiration from this work, which mentions the Sanmei texts (6.6b).

John Lagerwey

Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhonghe jing 太上洞玄靈寶中和經

10 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1120 (fasc. 759)

“Scripture of Central Harmony.” This is a longer recension of the treatise on cosmic harmony (zhonghe 中和), the first part of 789 Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie kejing (1a–12a). The entire text of this treatise is reproduced here as “spoken by the Tao” (daoyan 道言). Some passages are interchanged, notably the one that begins “The Tao manifests [itself] through spontaneity . . .” (dao chu ziran 道出自然; 8b), which in the original version constitutes the final part of the text (10a). The changes are often quite revealing with respect to the evolution of Taoist doctrines in the early middle ages.

Although the present work claims to be a Lingbao scripture, it is not mentioned among the texts of that corpus. It must, however, be anterior to the Taishang dongxuan lingbao shengxuan neijiao jing (see the next article), as the latter’s seventh juan contains elements borrowed and adapted from it (see 1122 Taishang lingbao shengxuan neijiao jing zhonghe pin shuyi shu).

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang dongxuan lingbao shengxuan neijiao jing

太上洞玄靈寶昇玄內教經

Originally 10 juan

Six Dynasties (220–589)

Dunhuang manuscripts Pelliot 2990 (juan 5); Pelliot 2560 (juan 6); Pelliot 3341 (juan 7); Stein 6310; Pelliot 2474; Pelliot 2326; Stein 3722 (juan 8); Pelliot 2750 and Pelliot 2430; Stein 4561 (juan 9); Stein 6241; Pelliot 2343 (juan 10); and fragments: Pelliot 2391; Pelliot 2445; DX 5177; DX 901; Stein 107; and DX 2768

“Scripture of the Esoteric Doctrine of Ascent to Mystery.” This long scripture presents itself as a superior revelation, superseding the earlier Lingbao corpus. In the beginning of juan seven (see 1122 Taishang lingbao shengxuan neijiao jing zhonghe pin shuyi shu 1a), Zhang Daoling 張道陵 beseeches the Most High Lord Lao to reveal the esoteric doctrine (neijiao 內教), whereupon the latter promises to tell him “what the Scripture of the Five Tablets has not yet conveyed.” This Wupian jing 五篇經 is the first and leading text of the Lingbao corpus, namely, 22 Yuanshi wulao chishu yupian zhenwen tianshu jing. In other parts of the present text, the Lingbao scriptures are characterized as the exoteric doctrine (waijiao 外教) and, as such, contrasted with the neijiao of the present scripture (Pelliot 2445, lines 56–58)

The esoteric doctrine is a perfect Buddho-Taoist hybrid. Juan 5 is called “The Return of the Good Conqueror” (Shansheng huanguo pin 善勝還國品) and presents the revelations by a bodhisattva (dashi 大士) of that name on his return from the Western Regions. Other similar, and even more specific, elements from the myth of the Conversion of the Barbarians (huahu 化胡) are found in juan 8 (entitled “The Revelation of the True Commandments” [Xian zhenjie pin 顯真戒品]), as well as in many other parts of the work. The instructions are addressed to Taoists as well as Buddhists, to daoshi and śramaṇa alike (Pelliot 2343, line 7). This is the ultimate revelation. None of the other scriptures, except the Daode jing 道德經, are to be considered as valid (Pelliot 2343, lines 92–95).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ōfuchi Ninji, Tonkō dōkyō: Mokurokuhen, 122–28; Zurokuhen, 251–291; Wan Yi, “Dunhuang ben Shengxuan neijiao jing.”

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang lingbao shengxuan neijiao jing zhonghe pin shuyi shu

太上靈寶昇玄內教經中和品述議疏

43 fols.

Six Dynasties (220–589)

1122 (fasc. 759)

“Annotated Edition of the Chapter on Central Harmony [zhonghe] in the Scripture of the Esoteric Doctrine of the Ascent to Mystery [Shengxuan neijiao jing].” The present text, shorn of its undated commentary, constitutes the seventh juan, the only part extant in the Ming Daozang, of the scripture originally comprising ten juan and quoted as such in WSBY 46.1a–3b (Lagerwey, Wu-shang pi-yao, 145). The complete work, which 1430 Daozang quejing mulu indicates as missing, still existed in Song times (960–1279; VDL 170–71). A number of juan have been retrieved among the Dunhuang manuscripts (see preceding article).

The present chapter takes its title and part of its contents from the earlier pseudo Lingbao scripture 1120 Taishang dongxuan lingbao zhonghe jing. It copies and adapts the latter’s Five Commandments (3b–4a, corresponding to 4a–b in the present text), as well as numerous other phrases and passages. The commandments are found in WSBY 46.1a–3b as Shengxuan wujie 昇玄五戒.

The fact that 1120 Zhonghe jing constitutes a rewriting of the early Heavenly Master treatise 789 Zhengyi fawen tianshi jiaojie kejing points to a filiation that might explain why the Shengxuan neijiao jing is considered a revelation to the First Heavenly Master, Zhang Daoling 張道陵.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Yamada Takashi, Kōhon Shōgenkyō.

Kristofer Schipper

1.B.6 The Taiping jing

Taiping jing 太平經

170 juan (missing: juan 11–34, 38, 52, 56–64, 73–85, 87, 94–95, 115, 119–170)

Reedited during the late Six Dynasties (220–589)

1101a (fasc. 746–755)

“Scripture of the Great Peace.” The term taiping 太平 occurs from early Han times (206 B.C.–A.D. 220), characterizing the result of good government. The work expounds cosmological theories and moral precepts for the improvement of the state and of the world in general.

This text was originally divided into ten parts, numbered according to the Celestial Stems (jia 甲, yi 乙, bing 丙, ding 丁, etc.). Each part comprised seventeen juan, containing an unequal number of chapters (pian 篇). According to a table of contents found in a Dunhuang manuscript (Stein 4226; see below), the number of pian of the entire scripture totaled 366.

The questions of the provenance, authorship, and transmission of the present version of the Taiping jing are beset with difficulties and have been the subject of much research since the 1950s (reviewed in Beck, “The date of the Taiping jing”). Although the text undeniably contains much ancient material (see Tang Yongtong, “Du Taiping jing shu suojian”; Wang Ming, “Lun Taiping jing chao jiabu zhi wei”; idem, Taiping jing hejiao; Ōfuchi Ninji, “Taihei kyō no raireki”; Kaltenmark, “Ideology of the Taiping jing”; and Kandel, Taiping jing), there is also ample proof that this version corresponds to a late Six Dynasties rifacimento (see Fukui Kōjun, “Taihei kyō”), its author being one Zhou Zhixiang 周智響, who presented the work to the throne in the years 569–583, most probably in 572, as this was a renchen 壬辰 year of great prophetic significance (Yoshioka Yoshitoyo, Dōkyō to Bukkyō 2:130–31).

A work with the term taiping in its title is first mentioned in several places in the Han shu in connection with the events of the years 33 B.C. to A.D. 9. Called Scripture of the Great Peace and the Conservation of the Origin According to the Calendar of the Officials of Heaven (Tianguan li baoyuan taiping jing 天官曆包元太平經), this work was said to have been revealed by the immortal Chijing zi 赤精子 and to have contained instructions for the renewal of the heavenly mandate of the dynasty (Beck, “Date,” 155–57; Kandel, Taiping jing, 3–23).

The traditions surrounding the present Taiping jing all center, however, on a second revealed text bearing the title Book of the Great Peace with Blue-Green Headings (Taiping qingling shu 太平清[青]領書). It was presented to the Han throne in 166 as having been obtained from a holy man named Gan Ji 干吉 (or Yu Ji 于吉) from Langye 琅邪 (Shandong). Fan Ye 范曄 (398–446; Hou Han shu 30B.1084) adds the information that Gan Ji's book comprised 170 juan and that he "obtained it at the Quyang 曲陽 springs" (probably in Shandong).

Taoist sources identify Gan Ji as a zhenren of antiquity. According to the preface to the One Hundred and Eighty Rules of Lord Lao (Laojun yibai bashi jie 老君一百八十戒, in 786 Taishang laojun jinglü 2a–4a; this text antedates A.D. 400; see Schmidt, "Die Hundertachtzig Vorschriften"), the Way of the Great Peace (Taiping zhi dao 太平之道) and the Teachings of Great Purity (Taiping zhi jiao 太清之教) were first revealed to the world during the reign of King Nan 赧 of the Zhou (315–256 B.C.). At that time, Lord Lao came to Langye and transmitted to Gan Ji the Taiping jing in 170 juan and ten parts. The above-mentioned 786 Taishang laojun jinglü reproduces the One Hundred and Eighty Rules along with the Precepts of Xiang'er (Xiang'er jie 想爾戒), and there is indeed a certain resemblance between the two codes of conduct. Rao Zongyi (Laozi Xiang'er zhu jiaozheng, 98–102, and "Xiang'er jiujie yu sanhe yi") has demonstrated the relationship of the Xiang'er precepts and the Xiang'er commentary of the Laozi with the Taiping jing. The preface to the table of contents of the Taiping jing in the Dunhuang manuscript quotes Xiang'er as saying that because there were so many impostors the Tao recorded the Threefold Harmony (sanhe 三合), in order that the truth might be discerned. This Threefold Harmony is then defined as the combination of the teachings of the Daode jing, the Taiping jing, and the Way of the Heavenly Master (manuscript Stein 4226, lines 47–50). The short account of the history of Taoism given in 1205 Santian neijie jing (4a–b) speaks of a Taiping dao jing that Lord Lao bestowed on Gan Ji (as well as on a certain Li Wei 李微 from Shu 蜀) as a forerunner of the Way of the Heavenly Master.

Thus, from the third through the fifth centuries, the Taiping jing (like the Xiang'er texts) was transmitted by the Way of the Heavenly Master. The 1243 Zhengyi fawen taishang wailu yi (an early Heavenly Master text) quotes the Taiping jing. A first citation on page 4a does not occur verbatim in the parts of the Taiping jing that have come down to us, but it is similar in style and enumerates six classes of superior beings (shenren 神人, zhenren 真人, xianren 仙人, daoren 道人, shengren 聖人, xianren 賢人), which are also found, in reversed order, in juan 71.8a of the present Taiping jing. A second, longer quote in 1243 Wailu yi 13b–14a shows affinities with Taiping jing 42.1a–b.

About 570, Zhen Luan refers, in Xiaodao lun (Guang hongming ji 9.15a), to the Taiping dao jing as lost. The disappearance of the Taiping jing at the end of the Six Dynasties (220–589) period is also documented elsewhere. The Xuanmen dayi 玄門大義 (YJQQ 6.15a–b, where on 6.1a it is given the variant title Daomen dalun 道門大論), dating from the beginning of the seventh century, speaks of two versions of the Taiping jing formerly in existence: the original scripture transmitted to Gan Ji, which was entirely lost; and a version transmitted by the Way of the Heavenly Master, of which only some fragments remained. The latter version was called the Scripture of the Great Peace Pervading the Ultimate (Taiping dongji jing 太平洞極經) and once had 144 juan. Again according to the Xuanmen dayi, a new version, complete in 170 juan, had become current in recent times. This was due to the "rediscovery," during the reign of Emperor Xuan of the Chen dynasty (569–583), of a miraculously preserved copy. It was "found" by the above-named Zhou Zhixiang, a disciple of Zang [Xuan]jing 藏[玄]靜, the author of a commentary to the Laozi (see 725 Daode zhenjing guangsheng yi, preface 3a). Zhou afterward lectured on the text in the capital and received the title of Taiping fashi 太平法師; "since then, the book has become widespread."

There are other stories surrounding the "rediscovery" of the Taiping jing during the latter part of the Six Dynasties period. These stories show, in accordance with the preface and postface of the table of contents in the Dunhuang manuscript Stein 4226, a marked involvement with the Shangqing tradition (see Yoshioka Yoshitoyo, Dōkyō to Bukkyō 2:7–114). GE HONG's library contained two versions of the Taiping jing; one was the 170-chapter edition in ten parts. It is also known that the Shangqing tradition transmitted many texts of the Way of the Heavenly Master. Yoshioka's conclusion is therefore that the new version mentioned by the Xuanmen dayi (which must correspond to that of the Dunhuang manuscript as well as our text) was obtained through the combination of the then still extant fragments of the original scripture of Gan Ji on the one hand, and of the Taiping dongji jing on the other (Yoshioka Yoshitoyo, Dōkyō to Bukkyō 2:103–4). The present text of the Taiping jing calls itself repeatedly Dongji jing (see Kaltenmark, "Ideology," 25), and the Taiping dongji jing is therefore a plausible source. We have virtually no information, however, about the original Taiping jing other than that, like the "rediscovered" version as well as the present one, it comprised 170 juan. This fact does not prove Yoshioka's hypothesis correct but only renders the new version more suspect.

The Dunhuang manuscript with the table of contents of the new version carries the title "Second Juan of the Taiping Division" (Taiping bu dier juan 太平部第二卷; critical edition in Yoshioka Yoshitoyo, Dōkyō to Bukkyō 2:14–63), which means that it was copied from the Taiping division of the Taoist canon, probably for the purpose of an ordination ceremony (see Schipper, "Taoist ordination ranks," 143). The manuscript does not observe the Tang taboo for zhi 治, which makes it unlikely that it was taken from the Taoist canon of the Tianbao (742–756) era. This leaves only the early seventh century as the date terminus ante quem.

Finally, there is an unsigned Tang dynasty postface of the present version of the Taiping jing. It is called Taiping jing fuwen xu 復文序, and the Ming editors placed it at the beginning of 1102 Taiping jing shengjun bizhi, although it exclusively concerns our text. The fuwen 復文 to which the title refers are the talismanic fu 符 writings that occupy juan 104 to 107 and that are considered, like the similar True Writs (zhenwen 真文) of the Lingbao tradition, the core (benwen 本文) of the revealed text. This postface traces the history of the Taiping jing back to Zhou Zhixiang and indicates that the present version corresponds to the one he “rediscovered.”

From the foregoing it follows that Zhou most probably used whatever was left at his time of the version transmitted by the Way of the Heavenly Master, the Taiping dongji jing. This text he rewrote and enlarged considerably in order to make it into a 170-juan book (cf. Yoshioka Yoshitoyo, Dōkyō to Bukkyō 2:141–46). Other, older versions did survive for a long time along with the new text (this may explain why a Taiping jing is marked as lost in 1430 Daozang quejing mulu), and thanks to a number of quotations from these older versions, it is possible to see how the new version was made. What remains from the older versions shows a concise classical style and a precise argumentation, while the corresponding passages in the present version are never fully identical; instead they are expanded, verbose rewritings, drawn out and repetitive in the extreme (compare SDZN 1.21b–23a and 1101a 45.7b–10b, passim). Furthermore, the available original material appears to have been spread out thinly throughout the book, which has “chapters” of only one or two pages in length. It seems likely that the talismanic fuwen texts were added in order to make the Taiping jing correspond to the other prestigious revealed texts of medieval times, and thus to justify its place in the framework of the liturgical organization as the canon of a Taiping division (bu 部).

Nevertheless, the rifacimento does contain much old material, which, if properly handled, can yield important insights, as Kaltenmark has shown, into the ideology of the Han Taiping jing.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Lai Chi Tim, “Shipping Zhongguo xuezhe guanyu Taiping jing de yanjiu”; Li Gang, “Lun Taiping jingchao”; Li Yangzheng, “Taiping jing shifou chaoxi Sishi'er jingzhang yi”; Lin Fu-shih, “Lun Taiping jing de zhuzhi yu xingzhi”; Petersen, “The Taipingjing and the A.D. 102 clepsydra reform”; Wang Ping, Taiping jing yanjiu.

Kristofer Schipper

Part 2

Sui, Tang, and Five Dynasties

2.A Texts in General Circulation

2.A.1 Philosophy

2.A.1.a Commentaries on Ancient Philosophers

The Tang dynasty (618–907) witnessed a substantial production of commentaries on ancient Taoist philosophical works, with Laozi's Daode jing occupying the first place. By the middle of the eighth century, some thirty Daode jing commentaries, written after the beginning of the Tang, were in existence. This activity is hardly surprising, in view of Laozi's adoption as ancestor of the ruling Li 李 clan and the subsequent imperial reverence bestowed upon the Daode jing, declared in 747 the most important of all canonical texts.

The significance of this corpus of commentaries is manifold. Texts such as 677 Tang Xuanzong yuzhu Daode zhenjing, 678 Tang Xuanzong yuzhi Daode zhenjing shu, and 679 Tang Xuanzong yuzhi Daode zhenjing shu—together constituting twenty-eight juan of commentary, subcommentary, and commentary to the subcommentary on the Daode jing—testify to the zeal with which Emperor Xuanzong (r. 712–756) and his circle promoted the Taoist worldview. One century and a half after Xuanzong's demise, the influence of his commentaries had not yet waned, as is evident from DU GUANGTING's (850–933) massive fifty-juan 725 Daode zhenjing guangsheng yi.

Whereas a number of authors associated with so-called Chongxuan 重玄 or Double Mystery—the leading Taoist intellectual trend in the first half of the Tang dynasty (see the introduction to part 2.A.1.b)—presented their ideas in the form of dialogic treatises or other autonomous works, others expounded their theories in commentatorial form. This is the case with Li Rong's 李榮 722 Daode zhenjing zhu and CHENG XUANYING's subcommentary to GUO XIANG's Zhuangzi commentary, in the 745 Nanhua zhenjing zhushu. The influence of Chongxuan learning is also evident from Zhao Zhijian's 趙志堅 719 Daode zhenjing shuyi and Xuanzong's commentaries to the Daode jing. The Daode jing commentaries of Xuanzong, Li Rong, and CHENG XUANYING, together with those by HESHANG GONG and YAN ZUN, were compiled in the early tenth-century 711 Daode zhenjing xuande zuanshu. This compendium is also of considerable importance for the reconstruction of texts (in casu the commentaries by YAN ZUN and Li Rong) that had been presumed lost or were only partly transmitted.

The late Tang and Wudai (907–960) trend to synthesize Taoist and Confucian values, which found its most systematic expression in Luo Yin's 羅隱 1135 Taiping liangtong shu, is reflected in Lu Xisheng's 685 Daode zhenjing zhuan. Wang Zhen's 王眞 713 Daode jing lunbing yaoyi shu is interesting in that it offers an interpretation of the Daode jing as a manual on strategy.

Daode zhenjing zhu 道德真經註

4 juan

By Li Rong 李榮; seventh century

722 (fasc. 430)

"Commentary on the Daode jing." Li Rong, hao Renzhen zi 任眞子, was a famous Taoist monk originally from Sichuan who lived in the second half of the seventh century. He played an important part in controversies between the Buddhists and the Taoists. Li was also the author of commentaries on the Zhuangzi, now lost, and on the Xisheng jing 西昇經. The latter is partially preserved in 726 Xisheng jing jizhu.

This commentary on the Laozi is incomplete, ending with chapter 36. It is possible to recuperate some of the missing text from quotations found in 711 Daode zhenjing xuande zuanshu. The present commentary can be classed with commentaries of the Chongxuan 重玄 (Double Mystery) school, along with those of CHENG XUANYING on the Zhuangzi and the Laozi (cf. 745 Nanhua zhenjing zhushu), which were strongly inspired by the Mādhyamika: The Tao of the Center is neither you 有 (being) nor wu 無 (nonbeing) (1.9b), but you and wu merged into one (2.11a); it is neither one nor triple, but one and triple (2.10a); it is mystery upon mystery, rejection upon rejection (2.10b; see also 1.4b); it is rejection of all analytical reasoning and then the rejection of that rejection—total forgetfulness. It consists of "nonattachment to either of the two components" (4.3a), that is, to either of the two opposing elements wu and you, unity and multiplicity, and so on, and even to nonattachment itself.

As the mystical search proceeds it passes through the dialectic process and then the conjunction of opposites where all thought is banished.

Isabelle Robinet

Tang Xuanzong yuzhu Daode zhenjing 唐玄宗御註道德真經

4 juan

Attributed to Emperor Xuanzong; between 732 and 735

677 (fasc. 355)

"Imperial Commentary on the Daode jing by Tang Xuanzong." Xuanzong was initiated into Taoism in 721 by SIMA CHENGZHEN, himself the author of 1035 Daoti lun, a commentary, in its own way, on the Daode jing. Our text is listed as comprising two juan (see the subcommentary 679 Tang Xuanzong yuzhi Daode zhenjing shu 9a and VDL 153). It is followed by a subcommentary, also by the emperor, in which he explains and elaborates his earlier commentary. Xuanzong's commentary is characterized by the division of the Laozi into four juan, two corresponding to the part devoted to the Tao, the other two to that of the De. For this division he was criticized (701 Daode zhenjing kouyi). The subcommentary does not maintain this division.

The text is distinguished by a marked tendency toward mysticism and reflects the influence of many carefully studied sources. Certain phrases of the HESHANG GONG commentary are textually repeated (Laozi 12, 15, 17, 22, 36, 41, et al.), but the commentary as a whole employs quite a different approach.

Here we find the mystic theme of total forgetfulness (jianwang 健忘), the renunciation of all material, intellectual, and social possessions, the rejection of desire and learning (1.14b and Laozi 23 and 27) and even of purity (1.18b). This betrays the unmistakable influence of the Chongxuan 重玄 school and comes well within the bounds of SIMA CHENGZHEN's writings, particularly of his Daoti lun. Also present is the notion of fen 分 (fate; 4.4b.6b), developed by GUO XIANG and adopted by CHENG XUANYING, which is prefigured in HESHANG GONG's suo 所 (place). Fen is here coupled with the idea of yong 用 (use or function): to each his proper function (yinyong 應用; Laozi 21, 23, 28). Xuanzong praises the Taoist virtues of feminine receptivity (Laozi 16) and of wuwei 無爲 (Laozi 38, 43), but he also defends Confucian ideals, reinterpreting ren 仁 (humanity) to mean "undifferentiated love." (This view was later to be strongly opposed by Zhu Xi 朱熹 [1130–1200]). The rites are understood as a beginning of the return to the Tao when conduct has become inadequate (Laozi 38).

On the metaphysical level the text maintains the distinction between the coarser planes of beings (cuyou 粗有) and the marvelous plane of nonbeing (miaowu 妙無), a distinction inspired by Buddhism but adopted by the commentators of the Chongxuan school. However, the text reestablishes the balance between wu 無 and you 有 (in particular in 1.12b. 16b, 24b) and between absolute and relative truth (Laozi 25 and 40). The "median qi" is that of Harmony and the One, which is the source of yin and yang; this is the "marvelous qi" that must be kept within oneself and by which everything exists (Laozi 39, 52).

This commentary is replete with quotations from and references to the classics (particularly the Yijing, the Spring and Autumn Annals, and the Zhuangzi). Because of its reliance on the classics, the work can be considered a link between the Xuanxue 玄學 and the Neo-Confucian schools. In this respect, Xuanzong's text quotes the famous phrase of Xizi, which was to become a cornerstone of Neo-Confucianism: "the metaphysical is the Tao, the physical the tools" (xing er shang zhe weizhi dao, xing er xia zhe weizhi qi 形而上者謂之道形而下者謂之器).

This commentary has been reproduced in several collections, in particular in 706 Daode zhenjing jizhu, 711 Daode zhenjing xuande zuanshu, and 724 Daode zhenjing jiyi.

Xuanzong's commentary and subcommentary inspired especially a lengthy further subcommentary by DU GUANGTING, 725 Daode zhenjing guangsheng yi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Fujiwara Takao, "Tō Gensō gyosei"; Hung, "A bibliographical controversy"; Imaeda Jirō, "Genso kōtei no Rōshi"; Mugitani Kunio, "Tō Gensō Dōtoku shinkyō chūso"; Wang Zhongmin, Laozi kao.

Isabelle Robinet

Tang Xuanzong yuzhi Daode zhenjing shu 唐玄宗御製道德真經疏

10 juan

Attributed to Emperor Xuanzong (r. 712–756)

678 (fasc. 356–357)

"Commentary on the Daode jing by the Tang Emperor Xuanzong." Xuanzong's subcommentary to his own commentary 677 Tang Xuanzong yuzhu Daode zhenjing contains either six or eight juan, depending on the edition (cf. the subcommentary 679 Tang Xuanzong yuzhi Daode zhenjing shu 3a and VDL 152). According to the Jixian zhuji 集賢注記 (in Yuhai 53.11b) this work was composed by a number of literati and Taoist masters. On the whole it simply expands and paraphrases the commentary that precedes it, indicating its many classical references.

This text also contains references to the classics, particularly the Yijing and the Zhuangzi. These quotations are glossed in turn by DU GUANGTING in 725 Daode zhenjing guangsheng yi. The commentary is also found in 724 Daode zhenjing jiyi.

Isabelle Robinet

Tang Xuanzong yuzhi Daode zhenjing shu 唐玄宗御製道德真經疏

4 juan

Attributed to Emperor Xuanzong (r. 712–756)

679 (fasc. 358)

"Commentary on the Daode jing by the Tang Emperor Xuanzong." This commentary on Xuanzong's subcommentary on the Daode jing (677 Tang Xuanzong yuzhu Daode zhenjing and 678 Tang Xuanzong yuzhi Daode zhenjing shu) has been attributed (see VDL 153) to Qiao Feng 喬諷 (950), but it is no more than an extract from DU GUANGTING's commentary on the commentary of Xuanzong (compare, for example, 1.6a–b with Du's 725 Daode zhenjing guangsheng yi 8.1a–7a).

The work is in some disorder. The preface (1a–4a) repeats part of DU GUANGTING's preface and the beginning of his commentary. The remainder of the preface to the present text repeats 725 Guangsheng yi 1.1b. The first sentences of the commentary (1.1a–3b) are an interpolation from CHENG XUANYING's commentary.

DU GUANGTING's text is sometimes placed in the present text under the classification "subcommentary" (shu 疏), "commentary" (zhu 注), or, as by DU GUANGTING himself, "meaning" (yi 義). Occasionally, as in 1.12a–b, two headings are used as if they corresponded to different works, yet they in fact both refer to DU GUANGTING's text. In this instance, a passage has been divided and the two parts transposed.

Isabelle Robinet

Daode zhenjing zhuan 道德真經傳

4 juan

by Lu Xisheng 陸希聲 (fl. 889–904)

685 (fasc. 368)

"Commentary on the Daode jing." Lu Xisheng also wrote commentaries on the Yijing and the Spring and Autumn Annals. The preface to the present work is found in YJQQ 1.13a–16a. Another, almost identical version of this commentary exists in the Zhihai. Our commentary (1.5b) is cited in 695 Daode zhenjing jijie 1.10a–b.

It is only because Laozi was misunderstood that his work has been judged incompatible with the teachings of Confucius, states the author in his preface. He places Laozi beside the great figures of Confucianism, Fu Xi 伏羲 and Wen Wang 文王. The preface thus evokes the general orientation of the commentary.

By and large, the work constitutes a section-by-section paraphrase of the Laozi. sections 32, 63, and 64, are divided into two parts; sections 42 and 43 are combined; section 54 precedes 53. The result is a translation of the text into a more accessible and explicit language, by which the commentator seeks to demonstrate that the doctrines of Laozi and Confucius have much in common.

The usual themes of the mystical interpretations of Laozi are found here: the contrasting notions of principle (li 理) and things (shi 事), essence (ti 體) and function (yong 用) correspond to the "nameless" and the "named" (1.1b–2a) and to Tao and De (3.17a); heart-mind (xin 心) and traces (ji 跡; 2.23a) and intrinsic nature (xing 性) and passions (qing 情) correspond to beings (you 有) and nonbeings (wu 無; 1.1a–4b). These contrasting notions merge into total forgetfulness (jian wang 健忘; 2.23a) and the return to intrinsic nature (fu xing 復性), and these in turn lead to the state of great harmony (datong 大同; 1.3a–b).

The Spirit of the Valley and the Mysterious Female are the symbols of this fusion (1.6b), the mainspring of an endless chain of action and reaction. By means of this chain, rule by nonaction is made possible and invulnerability is assured (3.18a).

The above may explain why the commentary abounds in quotations taken from the Confucian classics, in particular from the Yijing and the Book of Rites and at times from the Analects, with the exclusion of the writings of other schools. Section 47 of the Daode jing, “Without Going Beyond His Doors He Understands the World,” is explained by the Confucian formula of the expansion of love and knowledge from what is near to what is far through personal introspection (Daxue 3.12b–13b). The commentaries on section 32 (“On the Nameless”) and section 56 (“Those Who Speak Do Not Know . . .”) are each made the occasion for a discourse on the rectification of names (2.15b–16b).

Isabelle Robinet

Daode zhenjing xinzhuzhu 道德真經新註

4 juan

By Li Yue 李約 (fl. 810)

692 (fasc. 375)

“New Commentary on the Daode jing.” According to PENG SI (commentator on the 709 Daode zhenjing jizhu zashuo) and Dong Sijing 董思靖 (commentator on the 705 Daode zhenjing jijie), this commentary dates from the Tang dynasty (618–907; see 709 Jizhu zashuo 1.4b and 705 Zhenjing jijie third preface, 3a). The present text (4.6b) is quoted by CHEN JINGYUAN in 714 Daode zhenjing cangshi zuanwei pian 9.11a. It is mentioned in Song catalogues VDL 106. The reading Na 納 in the name Li Na, given as the author of a commentary of the Laozi mentioned in Tongzhi, “Yiwen lue,” 5.1b, is probably an error for Yue 約.

The commentary is divided into chapters, thirty-seven for the Daojing and forty-one for the Dejing (chapters 43 and 44 are combined, as are chapters 48 and 49, and 68 and 69).

As the author explains in his preface (1a–b), the originality of this commentary lies primarily in the punctuation adopted in chapter 25.2.6b: Instead of “Humanity models itself on Earth, Earth on Heaven . . .,” the author reads “One who models oneself on Earth is just like Earth, one who models oneself on Heaven, is just like Heaven; this is the law of nature.” This sentence thus accords with that which speaks of the four Greats (Humanity, Earth, Heaven, and the Tao).

Interpretation in terms of cultivation of one’s person (zhishen 治身) takes precedence over metaphysical interpretations, as in 2.3b, 7b. The Tao is simply the void, nonbeing (wu 無; 3.3b). Any connotation of wu and you 有 as being and nonbeing is ignored. HESHANG GONG’s interpretation of the Dark and the Female is accepted as possible (1.4a); one also finds a vitalistic interpretation (3.9a) with a quotation from the Huangting jing 黃庭經. Immortality is the survival of the spirit, or spirits, beyond the body, not physical immortality (2.12a–b). Life is defined as the spirit (shen 神; 4.8b) that abides in the heart-mind, provided the latter is empty (4.8b).

Isabelle Robinet

Daode zhenjing zhigui 道德真經指歸

7 juan

Attributed to YAN ZUN 嚴遵 (59–24 B.C.); subcommentary attributed to Gushen zi 谷神子

693 (fasc. 376–377)

“Return to the Meaning of the Tao.” Apart from this text, originally in fourteen juan, YAN ZUN wrote a commentary on the Laozi in two juan, which is extant. The question of the authenticity of this Zhigui has been the subject of much debate (see bibliography below).

The main argument against its authenticity is based upon the fact that it is not quoted in ancient texts. All that can be said with confidence is that the present work dates at least from Tang times (618–907).

The commentary exists in two versions. One, in the edition of Hu Zhenheng 胡震亨 (1569–1644), is found in the Bice huihan 秘冊彙函 and in the Jindai bishu 津逮祕書; the other is the present text, which seems to be better preserved than the other versions, for the following reasons:

1. The fact that juan 1–6 are lost is indicated. Unlike the other version, where the chapters are numbered 1 to 6, here they are listed under their original numbers 7 to 13.
2. The present version includes an additional final chapter that is missing in the other versions.
3. This version includes the text of the Laozi, as noted by Lu Deming 陸德明 (556–627) in Jingdian shiwen, by Chao Gongwu 晁公武 (12th c.; see the introduction 1b by Yan Lingfeng, “Bian Yan Zun Daode zhigui lun fei weishu”), and by Fan Yingyuan (13th c.) in Laozi daode jing guben jizhu.

The present version contains two prefaces, or one preface in two parts (the second part in smaller print). They are unsigned. The second preface also appears in Hu Zhenheng’s edition, in the Bice huihan (between 1573–1619), where it stands as the first part of what was considered to be the preface by the subcommentator Gushen zi, an attribution now contested.

Our version has a subcommentary that is in fact limited to a few textual glosses. Gushen zi has not been identified with certainty as its author. Some scholars believe that it could have been written by Feng Kuo 馮廓, or by PEI XING, author of a commentary mentioned in the Tang shu, or perhaps by Zheng Huang 鄭還古; the last two figures were both known as Gushen zi and lived in Tang times.

The notion of the reversibility of opposites, one leading to the other, may be said to be the basis of YAN ZUN’s system of thought. Several postulates accrue from this reversibility: it implies a single source as the basis of all antithetic dualities, and it betokens a state of perpetual flux, an eternal renewal, and a propensity toward a harmonious equilibrium. This single source, this absolute reality, can be neither grasped nor named. All phenomena are no more than vague shadows of this reality. Thus YAN ZUN commends suspended judgment and nonaction.

Furthermore, YAN ZUN draws a kind of cosmogonic picture of his metaphysical approach: the Tao is the Void of the Void; the De is the One and the Void. The One is both existence and nonexistence: as the One of the One, it gives life; as the principle of transformation it achieves the ultimate completion. Two is the Spirit and the non-existence of nonexistence (the wu 無 of the wu). Three is the Great Harmony and the wu from which proceed Heaven and Earth, yin and yang. After these comes the sage or, as the case may be, the pneuma, and then the form or substance (xing 形). In the course of his commentary, the author gives several variants of this picture but always maintains the same dramatis personae: Tao, De, Spirit, Great Harmony.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. Chan, "The essential meaning"; Meng Wentong, "Daode zhigui lun yiwen," 23–38; Robinet, Les commentaires, 11–24, 210–14; Tang Hongxue, "Daode zhenjing zhigui zhujiao"; Wang Deyou, Laozi zhigui; Wang Zhongmin, Laozi kao; Yan Lingfeng, "Bian Yan Zun Daode zhigui lun."

Isabelle Robinet

Daode zhenjing xuande zuanshu 道德真經玄德纂疏

20 juan

Compiled by Qiang Siqi 強思齊 (ninth century)

711 (fasc. 407–413)

"Compendium of Commentaries on the Mysterious Virtue of the Daode jing." This work is preceded by a preface bearing the signature DU GUANGTING (850–933). It should be noted that this preface is dated 964. The preface states that Qiang Siqi lived at the end of the ninth century.

The commentaries provided are those of the Emperor Xuanzong (commentary and subcommentary), HESHANG GONG, YAN ZUN, Li Rong 李榮, and CHENG XUANYING. The title of each section is accompanied by a gloss in two parts: the first part is analytic and is by CHENG XUANYING (compare the Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2517, a fragment of Cheng's commentary). The second part was probably written by Qiang Siqi.

Foreign passages have slipped into the opening pages of the compendium. In 1.2b–3b, the subcommentary by Xuanzong, for instance, is followed by a short passage taken from CHENG XUANYING's introduction to his commentary (see the introduction in the Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 2553). Similarly, the latter part of Li Rong's commentary 1.4a–b was written by WU YUN and is in fact an extract from 1052 Zongxuan xiansheng xuangang lun 1a–b and 5b–6a.

Thanks to this compendium, texts that have been considered lost can be restored. The Xuanzong and HESHANG GONG commentaries are both extant; the missing first part of the YAN ZUN commentary is here preserved.

The same is true for the second half of the Li Rong commentary, also found here. The commentary by CHENG XUANYING has been considered lost, but by comparing his text in our compendium with the subcommentary found in 710 Daode zhenjing zhushu, it has been possible to attribute the latter to CHENG XUANYING.

A close examination of the existing commentaries reveals that they are contained in their entirety in our compendium, with the exception of certain textual remarks (certain variants should be noted; also, for example in 1.9a the remarks found in 722 Daode zhenjing zhu 1.3a are omitted; the textual observations made by CHENG XUANYING in 710 Daode zhenjing zhushu are also omitted in the compendium). Consequently it may now be said that the lost commentaries have been preserved here virtually intact.

The CHENG XUANYING commentary belongs to the school of Double Mystery (Chongxuan 重玄). For a study of this commentary see the bibliography below.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Robinet, Les commentaires, 108–15; see also the article on 745 Nanhua zhenjing zhushu.

Isabelle Robinet

Daode jing lunbing yaoyi shu 道德經論兵要義述

4 juan

By Wang Zhen 王真; presented in 809

713 (fasc. 417)

"The Essential Meaning of the Discussion of Things Military in the Daode jing."

This text is an interpretation of the Laozi as a guide for military action in the broadest sense. The work is preceded by three documents: a covering letter for its presentation to the court, dated 809; the imperial approval; and an explanatory introduction to the work itself. Although Wang's explanations are based on the idea that no section in the Daode jing is unrelated to military affairs, he does not offer a martial exegesis, but affirms that noncontending is the essential message of the Laozi (5a).

The text of the Daode jing is provided integrally only in a few instances; mostly it is paraphrased and semantically explained.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Shima Hajime, "O Shin no Dōtoku kyō heiyō gijutsu."

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Daode pianzhang xuansong 道德篇章玄頌

2 juan

By Song Luan 宋鸞; Tang (618–907)?

977 (fasc. 614–615)

“Hymns on the Chapters of the Way and Its Power.” The author, whose official titles as imperial censor and member of the judicial administration do not disclose precise indications as to the period in which he was active, is otherwise unknown. The present work is listed in the Bishu sheng xubian dao siku jueshu mu (VDL 153) under the title “Leisurely Tunes to the Chapters of the Way and Its Power” (Daode pianmu xianyin 道德篇目閑吟).

In his undated preface, the author seeks to demonstrate the wisdom of Laozi through illustrations of the past, and he declares his intention, in writing the present poetical commentary, to follow the instructions by the reigning emperor for promoting Taoism. It is possible that the emperor in question is Tang Xuanzong. Graphic variants in the preface show that the present work observes Song taboos and thus may have been included in the Song canon.

Following the chapter headings as they appear in the edition of 677 Tang Xuanzong yuzhu Daode zhenjing, Song Luan presents his musings in seven-syllable verse. The poetry is interspersed with quotations from the text of the Daode jing and its commentaries, mainly by Tang Xuanzong and HESHANG GONG, which at times he amends rather freely. Occasionally, the author comments on his own poems by quoting historical anecdotes.

Kristofer Schipper

Daode zhenjing shuyi 道德真經疏義

3 juan

By Zhao Zhijian 趙志堅; Tang (618–907)

719 (fasc. 428)

“Commentary on the Daode jing.” A work of that time in three or four juan by Zhao Zhijian is mentioned in the Song bibliographies (VDL 153). DU GUANGTING, in the preface to his commentary (dated 901) to 725 Daode zhenjing guangsheng yi 3b, speaks of a Master of the Law Zhao Jian, author of a commentary in six juan. The preface to 705 Daode zhenjing jijie 3a, reproducing DU GUANGTING’s preface, gives the name as Zhao Zhijian. These texts therefore seem to refer to the same Zhao Zhijian commentary, dating from the eighth century at the latest. Wang Zhongmin (Laozi kao, 177, 267) speaks of two different commentaries.

The text under consideration here is incomplete. The entire first part (Daojing) in three juan is missing, as well as sixteen chapters of the second part (4.21b and 6.1a).

The content of the commentary, which is centered for the most part on meditation, suggests that this is in fact the work of a Buddhist under the Tang dynasty (618–907).

The author opens each chapter of the Laozi with a résumé, before proceeding with a phrase-by-phrase analysis. His interpretation emphasizes the empty heart-mind (xin 心) as superior to the “correct” heart-mind (zheng xin 正心; 5.16b–17a), as well as sitting in meditation (zuowang 坐忘; 5.25a–b). In 5.5a–b the author develops the theme of the three degrees of contemplation, “being” (you 有), “nonbeing” (wu 無), and “correct contemplation,” which transcends the latter.

In 5.28a–29a the phrase “what stays still is easy to hold” (Laozi 64) is interpreted as referring to tranquility of the heart-mind, which must be maintained before thought and feeling manifest themselves.

Isabelle Robinet

Daode zhenjing guangsheng yi 道德真經廣聖義

50 juan

By DU GUANGTING 杜光庭; preface dated 901

725 (fasc. 440–448)

“Explications Expanding upon the Sage’s [Commentary on the] True Scripture of the Way and Its Power.” The original work comprised only thirty juan (see the preface, 5b). A Song version, also in thirty juan, was entitled Daode jing guangsheng yi (see Chongwen zongmu 5.6b). It is not known, however, whether this discrepancy reflects a difference in substance or in arrangement.

The preface, dated 30 October 901 and undoubtedly composed by DU GUANGTING himself, begins with a legendary account of the Daode jing’s provenance and proceeds to list sixty-one earlier commentators of the scripture. The last entry in this catalogue is the commentary by Emperor Xuanzong (r. 712–756) “in six juan” (cf. below); it is followed by the statement that the present text is an elaboration upon the latter (4a).

The bulk of Du’s “Explications” consists in fact of a subcommentary on the commentary (678 Tang Xuanzong yuzhi Daode zhenjing shu) and on the annotations (677 Tang Xuanzong yuzhu Daode zhenjing) of Emperor Xuanzong, the “sage” in the work’s title. DU GUANGTING introduces this scholiastic feat with quantities of historical and theological material. The first juan analyses phrase by phrase Xuanzong’s decree of 723 announcing the imperial commentaries (1.1b–9a; for the text of the decree see also 677 Daode zhenjing, preface). It continues with a life of the emperor (1.10a–11a) and an outline of the scripture’s teaching in thirty-eight lessons (jiao 教; 1.11b–18b). The following chapter is devoted entirely to the first sentence of the introduction (shiti 釋題) to Xuanzong’s commentary: “‘Laozi’ is the private style (neihao 內號) of the Most High Emperor Xuanyuan.” This phrase gives rise to a treatise on the cosmic origin of the deified Laozi, his revelation of sacred literature, subsequent transformations and epiphanies, and finally his esoteric and hypostatic appellations, as well as on the titles conferred on the deity by early Tang rulers. Two further chapters conclude this broad exposition of Xuanzong's introduction. Du's citation of the text of the introduction ends with the words "six juan in all," a phrase that for obvious reasons is absent from the present ten-juan version of the commentary. Juan 5 of the "Explications" analyses the juxtaposition of the pair "Way" and "Power" and the corresponding division of the Daode jing, as decreed by Xuanzong. With juan 6, finally, begins the work's main task of exegesis, in which DU GUANGTING joins his own extensive explications (yi 義) to both Xuanzong's commentary (shu 疏) and annotations (zhu 注), devoting full chapters to between one and three of the original scripture's eighty-one brief stanzas (zhang 章).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Nakajima Ryūzō, "Jūgenha shokō"; Sakauchi Shigeo, "Dōtoku shinkyō kōshōgi."

Franciscus Verellen

Nanhua zhenjing zhushu 南華真經註疏

35 juan

By GUO XIANG 郭象 (fl. 312) and CHENG XUANYING 成玄英 (fl. 650)

745 (fasc. 507–509)

"Commentaries on the True Scripture of the Southern Florescence." This text of the Zhuangzi has a commentary by GUO XIANG and a subcommentary by CHENG XUANYING. It is preceded by prefaces by each of these commentators. Chapters 2 and 6 of the Zhuangzi are divided into two parts, thus accounting for the thirty-five chapters of the present work.

The commentary and subcommentary were originally published separately. Both were revised by ZHANG JUNFANG (fl. 1028; cf. 737 Nanhua zhenjing zhangju yushi 20b). There are two other extant editions that carry the two commentaries together: the first by Li Shuzhang 黎庶昌 in Guyi congsu 古逸叢書 (Tokyo 1882–1884; the modern critical edition by Cao Chuji and Huang Lanfa is based on this), and the second by Guo Qingfan 郭慶藩 in Zhuangzi jishi (preface dated 1894). The prefaces are also found in 738 Nanhua zhenjing yushi zalu 1.9a–12b.

The Zhuangzi's text here is the version edited by GUO XIANG, that is, the truncated and reorganized version rearranged into thirty-three chapters (pian 篇; see the postface mentioned below). The particular edition of the Zhuangzi in our text seems to be that of CHENG XUANYING, revised by ZHANG JUNFANG (compare the present text 1.10b, 5.3b, 5.17b with 737 Zhangju yushi 8a, 9a, 9b; and 6.9b in our text with 736 Zhangju yinyi 8b).

There exist also several editions of the GUO XIANG commentary, either standing alone or accompanied by textual glosses by Lu Deming 陸德明 (556–627). Variants concern minor points of detail. There seems to be no edition before the Song, although some fragments from the Tang (618–907) are found among the Dunhuang manuscripts. The present form of the GUO XIANG commentary is incomplete (see the critical edition of variants in Wang Shumin, Guo Xiang Zhuangzi). The postface to the commentary is missing. It was rediscovered in the Kōzanji in Kyoto and has been edited by Fukunaga Mitsuji (Sōshi, postface, 4) and Takeuchi Yoshio ("Rōshi to Sōshi," 247 ff.). Zhang Zhan's 張湛 (fl. 370) quotations from this commentary in 732 Chongxu zhide zhen jing sijie are slightly different (compare, for example, our text 6.10b and 5.58b with 732 Sijie 9.27b and 9.16b–17a, etc.). A number of errors of attribution are to be noted: the words of 34.7a, for example, are CHENG XUANYING's and not those of GUO XIANG (this passage is not in Lu Deming's version).

On the basis of remarks made in Shishuo xinyu 4.17, GUO XIANG was long held to have plagiarized Xiang Xiu 向秀 (ca. 221–300). Many scholars have shown this allegation to be false (see, in particular, Fukunaga Mitsuji, "Kaku Shō no Sōshi zhū to Kō Shū no Sōshi zhū"). For conclusive proof, one need refer only to Lu Deming's quotations, in his Jingdian shiwen, of the commentary by Xiang Xiu. CHENG XUANYING was a notable Taoist master from the middle of the seventh century who also wrote commentaries on the Daode jing 道德經 and Duren jing 度人經 (cf. 87 Yuanshi wuliang duren shangpin miaojing sizhu). The subcommentary by Cheng existed independently of GUO XIANG's commentary (cf. the bibliographical chapters of the Jiu Tang shu 47.2029, where Cheng's subcommentary is mentioned as comprising twelve juan, and of the Song shi 205.5180, where it is listed in ten juan).

Cheng states in his preface (4b) that he had assembled the Zhuangzi's text into thirty chapters. Our edition, therefore, does not correspond to its original form. His quotations of GUO XIANG's commentary sometimes also differ from the present text (cf. 20.10b; 21.14b).

This subcommentary, like the Daode jing commentary by the same author, is much marked by Mādhyamika doctrine and belongs to the commentaries of the Chongxuan 重玄 or Double Mystery school. The mainspring of this school is the "middle-Tao" that stands equidistant from affirmation and negation. The second of the double xuan 玄 consists of rejecting all notions, not only the notion of the distinction between affirmation and negation, but also the notion of the two merging together and thus annihilating any trace of duality, and even the notion of that which lies beneath the unifying of complementary opposites. The technique of the Double Mystery school is to proceed in two stages: the first is "forgetfulness," or the rejection of all emotional or conceptual opposites; the second is forgetfulness and rejection of the first rejection. This double rejection is the meaning given in chapter 20 of the Zhuangzi to the sentence “I place myself between usefulness and uselessness; this resembles but is not [the Tao]: there one is not freed from all shackles” (22.1b–2a).

According to CHENG XUANYING, when Zhuangzi uses the term “useful,” he means “nonuseful” action, which is nonaction; between the two is the Tao of the middle. Although Zhuangzi keeps his distance from the two extremes, he remains in the “middle-one” and thus he has not rejected the middle. “This resembles the Tao, but it is not the true Tao.” Zhuangzi continues, “But for those who take the Tao and De as their mount and go freely wandering, it is not the same.”

Cheng adds the commentary: “He has rejected the two extremes and moreover has forgotten the “middle-one,” he has rejected and again rejected, xuan, and again, xuan.”

The Buddhist technique of the Four Terms (the affirmation of being or existence [you 有]; the affirmation of the contrary [wu 無]; the simultaneous affirmation and rejection of the two) is specifically expounded in juan 2 of our text, more methodically and more explicitly than in CHENG XUANYING’s commentary of the Laozi. Cheng’s choice of GUO XIANG’s commentary as his point of departure is perfectly logical. GUO XIANG had already worked upon the notions of rejection and forgetfulness and had provided an exact outline of this mechanism of double rejection when he wrote: “reject the affirmation, then reject that rejection: reject and again reject until nonrejection is attained” (8.7b).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cao Chuji and Huang Lanfa, Nanhua zhenjing zhushu; Robinet, “Kouo Siang”; Wang Shumin, Guo Xiang Zhuangzi.

Isabelle Robinet

Tongxuan zhenjing 通玄真經

2 juan

Commentary by Xu Lingfu 徐靈府, hao Moxi zi 默希子; completed between 809–815

746 (fasc. 520–522)

“True Scripture of Communion with Mystery.” This title was bestowed on the Taoist philosophical work Wenzi 文子 simultaneously with the canonization of the four disciples of Laozi—Zhuangzi 莊子, Liezi 列子, Wenzi 文子, and Kangcang zi 亢倉子—in 742 (Tang huiyao 50.866).

The Han shu 30.1729 lists a Wenzi in nine pian 篇, whereas the Sui shu 34.1001 lists a book of the same title in twelve juan and records the loss of the text in nine pian. These facts, added to the observation that the extant Wenzi shows influences from the Huainan zi 淮南子 (see 1184 Huainan honglie jie) and even from its early commentaries (Wang Shumin, Zhuazi jiaozheng, 493–539), have led to the conclusion that the received text is a drastic rewriting of the “Proto-Wenzi” and has to be dated between the third and fourth century (a commentary to the new version was written by Zhang Zhan 張湛, fl. 370; see Kandel, Wen tzu, 26).

The 1973 excavation in Dingzhou 定州 (Hebei) of the textual fragments of the original Wenzi on bamboo confirms this conclusion. The latest date on the bamboo slips is 56 B.C. It was found that the dialogue originally took place between the instructing Wenzi and King Ping 平王 (of Zhou?), and not, as handed down traditionally, between Laozi and the inquiring Wenzi. Moreover, the questions that have been transmitted to us through the later text were originally formulated as answers, and the answers as questions.

In spite of these discrepancies, there also seem to have been parallels between both versions (see the publications of Hebei sheng wenwu yanjiu suo Dingzhou Hanjian zhengli xiaozu listed below). On the other hand, comparisons with the Dunhuang fragment Pelliot 3768 (see Wang Zhongmin, Dunhuang guji xulu, 245–57) and a passage in YJQQ 91.1a–11b show that the rewritten Wenzi continued to undergo considerable modification.

The text had previously been commentated in the fourth century by Zhang Zhan (this commentary, mentioned above, is now lost), by Li Xian 李暹 (sixth century, also lost), and possibly by Zhu Bian 朱弁 (on the date of the latter, see the following article on 749 Tongxuan zhenjing). In its present form, the received text of the Wenzi seems to date back to Xu Lingfu. Xu completed his commentary on Mount Heng 衡山 between 809 and 815 (see the preface). In his commentary, he generally limits himself to terse paraphrases that closely follow the wording of the text. In contrast to the Song printed edition—which has no preface and of which juan 9, 11, and 12 have been only partially preserved—the Daozang edition is complete. A comparison undertaken by Zhang Yuanji 張元濟 (1866–1956) has revealed numerous textual differences of varying importance with respect to the Song edition (see his appendix of 1936 to the edition of the Tongxuan zhenjing in Sibu congkan 四部叢刊).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hebei sheng wenwu yanjiu suo Dingzhou Hanjian zhengli xiaozu, “Dingzhou Xi Han Zhongshan Huaiwang mu zhujian Wenzi shiwen/ jiaokan ji/ zhengli he yiyi”; Kandel, Wen tzu; Le Blanc, Le Wen Zi; Shima Hajime, “Jo Reifu no Tsūgen shinkyō chū.”

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Tongxuan zhenjing 通玄真經

7 juan

By Zhu Bian 朱弁, hao Zhengyi 正儀

749 (fasc. 525–526)

“True Scripture of Communion with Mystery.” A commentary on the Wenzi in twelve juan by Zhu Bian (var. Zhu Bing 并, Zhu Qi 棄, and Zhu Xuan 玄) is first mentioned in Bishu sheng xubiandao siku qieshu mu. The Junzhai dushu zhi 11.476, which gives the name as Zhu Xuan and indicates twelve juan, no doubt refers to the present work, but dates it to the Tang dynasty (618–907). The entry mentions the earlier loss of the section “Fuyan 符言” Wenzi (4), which is said to have been replaced in some versions by the corresponding portion from Xu Lingfu’s 徐靈府 commentary (see the article on 746 Tongxuan zhenjing and VDL 93).

Our present version preserves only seven juan of Zhu’s commentary (juan 4 and 7 were drawn from Xu Lingfu) and claims that Zhu lived during the Song (960–1279). Yet the fact that Zhu is said to have served as subprefect of Jinyun 縉雲 in Guazhou 括州 (Zhejiang) points rather to the Tang, more specifically to a date between 758 and 769, the period during which Jinyun was administered as a subprefecture of Guazhou (renamed Chuzhou 處州 after 769).

As far as any comparison is possible (juan 5), Zhu’s main text seems to be closer to the Dunhuang manuscript Pelliot 3768 (see Wang Zhongmin, Dunhuang guji xulu, 245–57) than to Xu Lingfu’s version. Reconstructing the lost portions of Zhu’s commentary is partly possible on the basis of the “old commentary” in juan 9 of the Wenzi zuanyi 文子續義 version from the Yongle dadian 永樂大典, which is not by Xu Lingfu (see the article on 748 Tongxuan zhenjing zuanyi).

Zhu Bian’s commentary gives priority to the cosmic-mystical aspects of the text over its political implications. For him, the central theme is finding the way back to one’s nature (xing 性) and one’s innermost principle (li 理) in perfect harmony (shun 順) with the phenomena of the universe (wuxiang 物象).

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hebei sheng wenwu yanjiu suo Dingzhou Hanjian zhengli xiaozu, “Dingzhou Xi Han Zhongshan Huaiwang mu zhujian Wenzi shiwen/ jiaokan ji/ de zhengli he yiyi”; Le Blanc, Le Wen Zi.

2.A.1.b Tang Philosophical Texts (General)

As far as Taoist philosophy is concerned, the Tang dynasty is primarily a time of synthesis. Two important trends, reflected in most of the works in this section, are discernable. The first trend, now generally known as Chongxuan 重玄 or Double Mystery, flourished during the seventh century and continued to exert its influence as late as the tenth century. Leading figures of this new development in Taoist mysticism, such as CHENG XUANYING and Li Rong 李榮, often expressed their views in the form of commentaries on the Daode jing or the Zhuangzi. Hence, their works are treated in the previous section of this book. Works in the form of dialogic treatises, authored by other figures, have also been preserved, such as 1048 Xuanzhu lu and 1035 Daoti lun. The path proposed by Double Mystery (the name originates in the line xuan zhi you xuan 玄之又玄 from the first chapter of the Daode jing) combines the mystical potential of the Taoist classics with the views and methodology of Mādhyamika philosophy. The attainment of union with the Tao necessitates an act of “twofold obscuring” or “twofold rejecting,” which leads to the eventual surpassing all contradictions, as between vulgarity and wisdom, being and nonbeing, duality and nonduality. Although Taoist masters of the late seventh and the eighth centuries, like SIMA CHENGZHEN and WU YUN, cannot be properly considered representative of Chongxuan learning, their works in this section (1026 Tianyin zi, 1036 Zuowang lun, 1038 Xinmu lun, and 1052 Zongxuan xiansheng xuangang lun) bear witness to its influence.

The second trend, which gained in importance after the rebellion of An Lushan 安祿山 (755–757), was far less concerned with Taoist and Buddhist mysticism, reflecting instead an increasingly critical attitude toward socio-political matters, all the while continuing the old search for accommodation of China’s two native systems of thought, Confucianism and Taoism. Good examples of this trend are Wang Shiyuan’s 王士源 Kangcang zi, which was later renamed 669 Dongling zhenjing, and Luo Yin’s 羅隱 1135 Taiping liangtong shu. Also 1044 Huashu, though ideologically much more complex than the works just mentioned, partly reflects this trend. Sometimes, as in the case of 1027 Sulü zi, Taoist influence is tenuous at best.

One text that falls outside the major tendencies in Tang thought is 1028 Wuneng zi. Violently anti-Confucianist and hardly influenced by Buddhism, it is one of the few Tang works to offer a faithful elaboration of the most radical elements of classical Taoist philosophy.

Taishang dongxuan lingbao fashen zhilun 太上洞玄靈寶法身製論

3 fols.

Tang (618–907)

462 (fasc. 203)

“Regulations for the Body of the Law.” The term fashen, which is not explained in this short text itself, is borrowed from Buddhism, where it denotes the highest of the three bodies of Buddha (trikāya): the embodiment of absolute truth (dharmakāya). The work 1129 Daojiao yishu 1.3a–8a contains a section on this term, mainly quoting

9 Taishang yicheng haikong zhizang jing and Benji jing 本際經 from the Sui and Tang dynasties. Around the same time, other Taoist works frequently use this term in the expression chujia fashen 出家法身 which seems to be synonymous with simply chujia (monk, Taoist; e.g., 336 Taishang dongxuan lingbao yebao yinyuan jing 1.3b–4b).

This latter meaning of fashen seems to apply to the present title. In eight paragraphs the text provides basic rules, mainly of a general kind, for the conduct of Taoists. Sanctions for offenses against these rules are temporary suspension (jingu 禁錮), or exclusion from the diocese and annulment of the register (duozhi xuelu 奪治削錄). Especially the common practice of seeking to gain merit by releasing living beings (fangsheng 放生) at certain times in the fifth month is denounced, because the animals were first caught for this purpose. The text also briefly refers to the detailed rules by LU XIUJING.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Xuanzhu ge 玄珠歌

4 fols.

By Tongxuan xiansheng 通玄先生; tenth century

573 (fasc. 320)

“The Song of the Mysterious Pearl.” The author has not been identified with certainty. Chongwen zongmu 9.15a seems to suggest that Zhang Jianming 張薦明 (fl. 939) is the author (cf. LZTT 46.8a). The thirty didactic verses describe the Mysterious Pearl.

The radiance of the pearl represents the completeness of the human being. If the “original spiritual forces” and the “original completeness” diminish and are finally lost, humans also lose the Mysterious Pearl. In this song, the Mysterious Pearl is an entity that may be apprehended by meditative means. However, it is endangered by a profane attitude of mind and a negligent way of life. The text explains that the undiminished presence of the Mysterious Pearl produces most favorable effects, especially the “ascension to a state of perfection.”

Florian C. Reiter

Xuanzhu xinjing zhu 玄珠心鏡註

10 fols.

By Hengyue zhenzi 衡嶽眞子; Five Dynasties (907–960)

574 (fasc. 320)

“The Commentary on the Mysterious Pearl and the Mirror of the Mind.” This text comments upon two poems, “Shouyi shi” (On the Preservation of the One; 1a–6a) and “Dadao shouyi bao zhang” (The Precious Stanza about the Preservation of the One by the Great Tao; 6a–10b). Concerning their origin, see 575 Xuanzhu xinjing zhu, which predates this work. Hengyue zhenzi is probably to be identified with CHEN SHAO-WEI (see 1017 Daoshu 31.1a). The Chongwen zongmu 9.14a lists this commentary.

This commentary contains an abridged version of the poems, which appear in the commentary of 575 Xuanzhu xinjing zhu. Special emphasis is laid on the meaning of xin 心 (mind) as mirror (cf. 1017 Daoshu 37.2b), and on the meaning of the scale. The latter measures, by means of meditation, the success of the endeavor of “embracing the original [Being] and preserving the One” (10a). At the end of this work there are passages that differ from the respective section in 575 Xuanzhu xinjing zhu. Hengyue zhenzi criticizes statements by Taoists of his time who made pretentious claims about their successes. This commentary distinguishes five phases of time that demarcate the progressive improvements of the state of mind. In the end, there should be a complete absence of any influences of the outside world. Consequently, the physical conditions would improve according to a succession of seven phases; the last phase is said to be far beyond the Three Worlds (10b).

Florian C. Reiter

Xuanzhu xinjing zhu 玄珠心鏡註

36 fols.

Commentary by Wang Sunzhi 王損之; edited by Zhangsun Zi 長孫紫, hao Juzé 巨澤; Tang (618–907)?

575 (fasc. 320)

“The Commentary on the Mysterious Pearl and the Mirror of the Mind.” This work was written by Wang Sunzhi and transmitted by Zhangsun Zi (see the preface, dated 817). It contains two poems with commentaries, and is listed in Bishu sheng quesu mu 2.31b (VDL 134). The account of the history of the poem “Shouyi shi” (On the Preservation of the One) is the same as in Taiping guangji 67.414–16. It had been revealed by Cui Shaoxuan 崔少玄, who was the wife of Lu Chui 盧陲. Being an exiled secretary of the Jade Emperor, she gave that poem to her husband just before her return to the heavens. However, her husband was unable to understand the poem. In Shaanxi he happened to meet Wang Sunzhi, who explained the poem and wrote an appropriate text, for which he designed the title Xuanzhu xinjing. It is this text that is here presented as “commentary.” A second poem with a similar title is said to stem from the same source (30a ff.). Neither the preface of this work nor Taiping guangji 67 mention that poem. It is likely that this edition of Xuanzhu xinjing zhu was compiled after 817.

The commentary connects the topic of the preservation of the Original One or the “Buddha mind” (xinyin 心印) with meditative and physiological concepts. The Original One or the Pure Yang is the Mysterious Pearl.

Florian C. Reiter

Dongling zhenjing 洞靈真經

30 fols.

Attributed to Gengsang Chu 庚桑楚

669 (fasc. 349)

"True Scripture of the Communion with the Divine." The origin of this philosophical work is directly related to the honors conferred by Tang Xuanzong (r. 712–756) on the ancestor of the dynasty (Laozi), his four disciples (Zhuangzi 莊子, Liezi 列子, Wenzi 文子, Kangcang zi 亢倉子), and the writings attributed to these figures. The book Kangcang zi (or Gengsang zi 庚桑子) was first mentioned when the emperor, in early 742, recommended it to the Central Chancellery (zhongshu menxia 中書門下) for verification and revision. The intention was to grant it the title Dongling zhenjing and then to use it, together with the other three newly canonized works, as an examination text in the Taoist institutes of the empire (Chongxuan xue 崇玄學). The actual author of the present work was the hermit Wang Shiyuan 王士源 [元] (fl. 742) from Yicheng 宜城 (Hubei). Wang took the chapter "Gengsang chu 庚桑楚" from the Zhuangzi as a starting point and, using other philosophical writings, created a new work comprising nine chapters (pian 篇; see Xin Tang shu 59.1518; Meng Haoran ji, preface by Wang).

Although scholars opposed the state-authorized promulgation of the book (Meng Haoran ji, preface by Wei Tao 韋滔 [750]; Zizhi tongjian waiji 1.16b–17a, citing Feng Yan 封演 [fl. 742–805]), the Kangcang zi soon began to circulate in various versions, differing mainly in its division into juan. However, no officially certified version of the text was established by the imperial library (Bishu sheng 秘書省) until 1117 (Tongjian changbian jishi benmo 127.4b).

Phonetic explanations of the archaic characters typical of the text are also found in the edition commentated by He Can 何璨 (for details see the article on 747 Dongling zhenjing).

The brief biography of Gengsang Chu preceding the Daozang edition of the text comes from 163 Xuanyuan shizi tu (q.v.). The woodcut print depicting the philosopher (fig. 21) may be based on ZHAO MENGFU's illustration of Zhang Junxiang's 張君相 (1254–1322) edition of the same work.

FIGURE 21. Gengsang zi (669 1a). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/664)

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Tianyin zi 天隱子

6 fols.

By SIMA CHENGZHEN 司馬承禎 (647–735)

1026 (fasc. 672)

"Master Hidden in the Heavens." This book's title is the name of an unknown immortal and its legendary author. SIMA CHENGZHEN, twelfth patriarch of the Shangqing school (not the thirteenth as stated in the colophon), is considered the author only of the commentary. It is mentioned in the Song bibliographical catalogues (VDL 84); one version is said to have included an appendix on the Three Palace method, which is not found in present text. Quan Tang wen 924.17a–b contains only the preface.

The book is divided into eight paragraphs: the first three are of a general nature; the last five correspond to the five stages of liberation until complete deliverance (4b). The first stage, liberation by faith, is attained by fasting and observance of interdictions: abstinence from cereals, nourishing oneself by the qi, massage, and self-discipline curbing all excess. The second stage, liberation by emptying the mind, is achieved by retreating to a room where the half-light and atmosphere are conducive to a balance of yin and yang influences.

The third stage, liberation through knowledge, is the fixing of the spirits by the heart-mind (xin) and visual meditation on the body. Next comes the stage of seated meditation, "sitting and forgetting" (zuowang 坐忘), through which the adept attains stillness and, finally, forgetfulness, both of himself and everything around him. This is liberation through concentration.

These four stages or liberations lead to the deliverance by the spirit (or of the spirit): this deliverance is the One of the Yijing; the "all things being equal" of the Zhuangzi; the Daode of the Laozi and the tathatā (zhenru 眞如) of the Buddhists. It leads to the state, earthly or heavenly, of immortality (xian 仙).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Köhn, "The teaching of T'ien-yin-tzu."

Isabelle Robinet

Sulü zi 素履子

3 juan

By Zhang Hu 張弧; Tang (618–907)

1027 (fasc. 672)

“Master Plain Conduct.” As the short preface explains, the title of this work derives from the tenth hexagram of the Book of Changes—lǚ 履 (“to tread,” “to conduct”)—where it is said that “he whose conduct is plain (simple, unadorned) can go forth without blame.” Zhang Hu’s book was written as a warning against forgetting this rule of conduct.

About the author, little is known. Apparently, Zhang Hu once held the titles of court gentleman for ceremonial service (jiangshi lang 將仕郎) and probationary case reviewer in the Court of Judicial Review (shi dali pingshi 試大理評事).

The Daozang edition is now the oldest printed version of the Sulü zi. The text can also be found in a half dozen other collectanea, the earliest being the Fanshi qishu 范氏奇書 from the Jiajing period (1522–1565).

The Song catalogues that mention this work (see VDL 131) consider it to be Confucian, and they have every reason to do so. Of the fourteen sections of the book, only the first two (on the Way and its Virtue) are clearly Taoist in inspiration, and even here the Confucian influence is easily recognizable. Zhang Hu then proceeds to elucidate a number of Confucian values, such as loyalty, filial piety, benevolence, righteousness, wisdom, trustworthiness, etiquette, and music. The book concludes with Zhang Hu’s observations on the nature of wealth and nobility, poverty and lowliness, peace and crisis. Anyone familiar with Zhou and Han Confucianism will have to look hard for original contributions in the Sulü zi. At best, our text is to be viewed as one of the less interesting examples of the Tang dynasty tendency to synthesize Confucian and Taoist thought.

Jan A. M. De Meyer

Xuanzhen zi waipian 玄真子外篇

3 juan

By Zhang Zhihe 張志和 (fl. 757–762)

1029 (fasc. 672)

“Supplementary Book of the Master of the Obscure Truth.” Xuanzhen zi 玄真子 is one of the bynames and also the title of a philosophical book of Zhang Zhihe (see Xin Tang shu 196). According to the author, this appellation means “the truth out of the without truth” (1.3a–b). According to Yan Zhenqing 顏真卿 (709–785), an acquaintance of the author’s, Zhang Zhihe had written a Xuanzhen zi in twelve juan, totalling 30,000 characters (see the biographical notice attached to the end of the text in the edition of Congshu jicheng jianbian 叢書集成簡編 52). The present text is composed of only about 7,000 characters. It is uncertain whether it is a fragment of the long lost book in twelve juan, or a supplement. The bibliographical treatise of the Xin Tang shu contains two references to the Xuanzhen zi under the same author’s name, one in twelve juan and the other in two juan, without giving precise details about the contents of or the relationship between the two texts. The Zhizhai shulu jieti 9 refers to a version in the present format.

The three juan of the book bear the following subtitles: (1) “Bixu 碧虛” (Blue Void); (2) “Yuezhao 鸞鷲” (Celestial Bird); and (3) “Tao zhi ling 濤之靈” (Spirit of the Waves). These titles are the names of characters and form the opening words of the respective chapters. The texts consist of dialogues and discussion on cosmological and philosophical subjects among imaginary characters. The inspiration of the book seems to derive from the Zhuangzi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chen Yaodong, “Xuanzhen zi banben yuanliu kao.”

Kwong Hing Foon

Liuzi 劉子

10 juan

Commentary by Yuan Xiaozheng 袁孝政

1030 (fasc. 673–74)

“Book of Master Liu.” This text contains fifty-five paragraphs dealing with literary, philosophical, and political subjects. Several editions of this work show variants as to text and title (e.g., the Tang Liuzi 流子). The book has been attributed to different authors, including Liu Xie 劉勰 (ca. 462–522) and Liu Zhou 劉晔 (514–565). Lin Qitan and Chen Fengjin have presented a critical study of the many editions of the Liuzi and also of the extant Dunhuang fragments Pelliot 2546, 3562, and 3704. According to their research, the original Liuzi can be traced back to Liu Xie (see Lin Qitan and Chen Fengjin, Liuzi jijiao, 339–42).

This edition of the Liuzi has to be appreciated in connection with the commentary by Yuan Xiaozheng (Tang period [618–907], adjutant in Bozhou 播州). According to Lin and Chen (Liuzi jijiao, 8), it is most likely that this edition had been printed before the Zhengtong period (1436–1449). The attribution of the Liuzi to the author Liu Zhou is usually based on a preface ascribed to him that is no longer extant. Yuan Xiaozheng’s commentary elucidates each paragraph.

The commentary contains explanations of terms or expressions. It also provides documentation based on examples taken from historical records. Especially the last paragraph of this book refers to Taoism, under the heading “Jiuliu” (Nine Classes of Teachings; 10.13a–b). This is the only section that could actually justify the incorporation of this learned collection into the Taoist canon. The Linzi neither represents any specific branch of Taoism nor refers to religious or liturgical matters.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arndt, Meister Lius Traktate; Lin Qitan and Chen Fengjin, Linzi jijiao.

Florian C. Reiter

Daoti lun 道體論

1 + 32 fols.

Transmitted by Tongxuan xiansheng 通玄先生; tenth century?

1035 (fasc. 704)

"Discourse on the Way and Its Substance." The Song catalogues that list this work (VDL 154) do not mention an author. Tongxuan xiansheng is variously identified as SIMA CHENGZHEN, ZHANG GUO, and Zhang Jianming 張薦明 (fl. 939). The preface is concerned only with matters of content and offers no clues as to authorship or date. However, a comparison of the Daoti lun with the writings of SIMA CHENGZHEN and ZHANG GUO and with the evidence about Zhang Jianming in the Xin Wudai shi (34.369–71) and in LZTT (46.8a–b) suggests that the authorship of the Daode jing exegete Zhang Jianming is fairly probable. Our text has been preserved only in the Daozang.

The Daoti lun is divided into three parts: "Lun Laozi Daojing shang 論老子道經上" (On Laozi's Scripture on the Way, Part One), "Wendao lun 問道論" (On Questions Regarding the Way), and "Daoti yi 道體義" (The Meaning of the Way and its Substance). It is presented in the form of a dialogic treatise (yulu 語錄). In its explanations of philosophical categories such as Way and virtue (daode 道德), Way and matter (daowu 道物), being and nonbeing (yowwu 有爲), names and actuality (mingshi 名實), vacuity and being (kongyou 空有), et cetera, it betrays a strong influence of the Double Mystery (Chongxuan 重玄) learning of the early Tang, and thus of Buddhist (Mādhyaṃika) philosophy.

Jan A. M. De Meyer

Zuowang lun 坐忘論

20 fols.

Attributed to SIMA CHENGZHEN 司馬承禎 (647–735)

1036 (fasc. 704)

"Treatise [on the Art] of Sitting and Forgetting." The title is a reference to the passage on the Fast of the Heart (xinzhai 心齋) in chapter 6 of the Zhuangzi. The expression zuowang 坐忘 has become synonymous with "meditation." In 1026 Tianyin zi, by the same reputed author, the same term denotes the fourth and next to last stage prior to the deliverance of the spirit, or "liberation through concentration."

The YJQQ 94 reproduces this text in extenso, but there the end of the seventh section is quite different, and the conclusion (zuowang shuyi 坐忘樞翼) is missing altogether. The YJQQ gives no indication of authorship.

1017 Daoshu 2.1a–4a includes a condensed version of the Zuowang lun, apparently abstracted from the text as we have it here. Almost all major Song catalogues list the work (see VDL 109). The Xin Tang shu places it under the name of SIMA CHENGZHEN, but the Bishu sheng catalogue (Bishu sheng xubian dao siku quesu mu) attributes it to WU YUN. The question of its authorship remains uncertain.

The present edition is due to an otherwise unknown Zhenjing jushi 眞靜居士, who commissioned its printing (see the preface).

The Zuowang lun explains the principles of the practice of the Tao in seven parts. It advocates renunciation of the world and its luxuries and the adoption of a stoical attitude. Changes of fate should be accepted as inevitable and as sent from Heaven. The longest section is the third, on the "concentration of the heart" (shouxin 收心). This concentration leads to the "emptiness of the heart-mind," which implies a total void: the mind should be free from any contingencies, even of "emptiness," which still is a "place" (see 3b). The last section, devoted to "attaining the Tao" (dedao 得道), makes a distinction between two kinds of "attainment": the more profound form produces an unchanging body, the body of the "divine humans" (shenren 神人), who have a spiritual body when they are hidden and a spirit similar to qi when they manifest themselves. The more superficial attainment is that which gives the "deliverance through the corpse"; here it is only the heart that "obtains" wisdom. This wisdom, however, uses the body, which therefore remains subject to corruption. The concluding section is in fact an adaptation of 400 Dongxuan lingbao dingguan jing zhu (also reproduced in YJQQ 17), an early Tang scripture, which further raises the problem of the authenticity of the Zuowang lun in its present form.

An inscription of the Tang dated 829, by the female Taoist master Liu Ningran 柳凝然, contains a presentation of a Zuowang lun in one juan and seven sections (that is, in the same arrangement as the present text) by a Taoist named Zhao Jian 趙堅, a contemporary of the author of the inscription (see Chen Yuan et al., Daojia jinshi lue, 176). Chen Yuan does not hesitate to title it "The Zuowang lun of Master White Cloud" (Boyun xiansheng Zuowang lun 白雲先生坐忘論), that is, of SIMA CHENGZHEN. The fact, however, that its text differs widely from the present version further increases our doubts as to the work's attribution.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Köhn, Seven steps to the Tao.

Isabelle Robinet

Xinmu lun 心目論

4 fols.

1038 (fasc. 704)

"Discourse on the Heart and the Eyes." The unnamed author is the Tang Taoist and poet WU YUN (d. 778). The present version is identical to the text in Wu's collected works, 1051 Zongxuan xiansheng wenji 2.16a–19b (q.v.).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kohn, "Mind and Eyes."

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Sanlun yuanzhi 三論元旨

1 + 20 fols.

Late Tang (618–907) or Five Dynasties (907–960)?

1039 (fasc. 704)

"The Original Purport of the Three Arguments." The three in the title has different connotations: it refers not only to the three subsections of our text—"Daozong 道宗" (The Principle of the Way), "Xuwang 虛妄" (Falsities), and "Zhenyuan 真源" (Sources of Verity)—but also to the original unity of Way, mind, and nature (dao 道, xin 心, xing 性), and to the unity of spirit, vital energy, and essence (shen 神, qi 氣, jing 精).

From the preface, nothing factual about date and authorship can be gleaned, except that the author had been a recluse for many years. IIII Taixuan zhenyi benji miaojing is quoted regularly, indicating that our text is not older than the early Tang. A reference to the Zhuangzi as the Nanhua jing 南華經 indicates that the Sanlun yuanzhi must have been written after 742, when the Zhuangzi was canonized as the Nanhua zhenjing. The Sanlun yuanzhi has been preserved only in the Daozang.

It is clear that the Sanlun yuanzhi is deeply influenced by the Chongxuan 重玄 learning of the early Tang. A recurring theme is the attainment of union with the Tao. Leading to this union are three forms of meditation (sanding 三定), corresponding to three stages of being, in ascending order: immortal, zhenren, and sage (shengren 聖人). The importance of the equal cultivation of both spirit and vital energy through meditation and gymnastics (daoyin 導引) is emphasized. Our text posits the unity of spontaneous nature (ziran 自然) and Buddhist causality (yinyuan 因緣), a feature also characteristic of 1035 Daoti lun.

Jan A. M. De Meyer

Huashu 化書

6 juan

Attributed to TAN QIAO 覃峭, zi Jingsheng 景昇 (fl. ca. 880–950)

1044 (fasc. 724)

"The Book of Transformations." This text was first circulated as the work of Song Qiqiu 宋齊丘 (zi Zisong 子嵩) under the title Qiqiu zi (see Siku quanshu zongmu tiyao 117.2464–65). It is mentioned in several Song bibliographies with this author (VDL 83), and the Shuofu 42 edition of the introductory part of the book (the prefaces and table of contents) opens with a preface by Song Qiqiu dated 930, in which he claims credit for the book. Song Qiqiu (d. 959) was an official in the state of Wu and associated with Li Bian 李昇, the governor of Jinling 金陵 (present Nanking). In 937 he assisted Li Bian in establishing the Southern Tang dynasty, with its capital in Jinling, and he also held office during the reign of the second emperor of the dynasty (see Xin Wudai shi 62–63). Li Bian appointed Song Qiqiu military governor (jiedu shi 節度使) of Hongzhou 洪州 (present-day Nanchang), the capital of Jiangnan West. Song Qiqiu built a large mansion in his home village (near Hongzhou) and established himself there as a great lord, surrounded by scores of diviners and magicians (see Ma Ling's Nan Tang shu 20 and Jiangnan yeshi 1–2).

The idea that Song Qiqiu had in fact stolen the Huashu from a Taoist by the name of TAN QIAO was put forward by CHEN JINGYUAN in a preface dated 1060 and likewise included in Shuofu 42. CHEN JINGYUAN relates the story of the theft as told to him by Zhang Wumeng 張無夢 (952?–1051), who repeats a conversation with his master, CHEN TUAN (d. 989). CHEN TUAN refers to TAN QIAO as a master and friend (shiyou 師友), and states that Tan wrote the book while living on Zhongnan shan 終南山. Passing through Jinling on his way to Maoshan 茅山, Tan met Song Qiqiu and entrusted him with the book, in order that he should write a preface and transmit the book to posterity. Song, however, first plied Tan with drink, then tied him in a bag and threw him into a deep abyss, whereafter he proceeded to circulate the Huashu as a work of his own. A shorter version of the preface, without the fantastic details in connection with the theft, is found in LZTT 39.17b–18b, appended to the biography of TAN QIAO. The actual biography derives from 295 Xu xian zhuan 3.17b–18b, by Shen Fen 沈汾 of the Southern Tang dynasty. It is included also in YJQQ 113B.41a–42a and does not mention the Huashu. The biography confirms, however, that TAN QIAO retired first to Zhongnan shan and thereafter visited the sacred mountains throughout China.

The notion that TAN QIAO might be identical with TAN ZIXIAO, the founder of the Tianxin zhengfa 天心正法 (see the article on 566 Shangqing tianxin zhengfa), is not found in Song sources. See, for instance, 606 Nanyue zongsheng ji 5a–b and Fozu tongji 42.392c, which both give short accounts of the appearance of the book, based on the preface by CHEN JINGYUAN. The identification is also implicitly denied in the Yuan dynasty LZTT, which includes separate biographies of the two persons and mentions the Huashu only in connection with TAN QIAO. Such denial is also the case for 781 Xuanpin lu 5.13b–14a, which records a summary of the book made by a man who settled on Lushan 廬山 around 962. However, in texts of the late Ming dynasty (1368–1644) the two names consistently refer to the same person, and the earliest surviving local histories relating to Quanzhou (according to all sources, the native place of TAN ZIXIAO, the founder of the Tianxin zhengfa) include biographies in which TAN ZIXIAO is described as the author of the Huashu and with the family background mentioned in 295 Xu xian zhuan 3.17b–18b. See Quanzhou fu zhi 65.38a–b and the Min shu 7.11a–12a. The latter text includes the biography in the geographical section, under the description of Qingyuan shan 清源山, the sacred mountain immediately to the north of Quanzhou, claiming that TAN ZIXIAO cultivated the Way at the Zize dong 紫澤洞 cavern near the top of the mountain. The claim is frequently repeated in later topographical works of the area, but it does not appear to be supported by sources earlier than the Ming dynasty.

The attribution of the Huashu to TAN ZIXIAO is generally accepted in Taoist sources since the late Ming dynasty, for instance in a preface by Wang Yiqing 王一清 (fl. 1592), who wrote a commentary to the book. For this, see the Daozang jiyao edition of the Huashu, which gives Zixiao zhenren 紫霄真人 as the hao of the author but retains the zi Jingsheng of TAN QIAO. The Xu Daozang edition of the book, 1478 Huashu, does likewise. The attribution to TAN ZIXIAO was accepted by Yu Jiayi, on the basis that TAN ZIXIAO, on his way from Quanzhou to Lushan, passed through Nanking in the years 943–957 and therefore may be taken to be identical with the TAN QIAO who, in CHEN JINGYUAN's preface, is said to have met Song Qiqiu in Nanking (Yu Jiayi, Siku tiyao bianzheng, 846–47). One might add that TAN ZIXIAO was living on Lushan (on Zixiao Peak, from which he seems to have taken his name) when Song Qiqiu was installed in Hongzhou, not far from the mountain. Lushan was by far the most important religious center of the area, and no doubt many followers of Song Qiqiu were connected with the mountain. The Lushan zhi 1.46b–47a quotes a Yuyu lu 圍余錄 for an anecdote mentioning Song Qiqiu's frequent visits to Lushan.

The contents of the Huashu give no cause to doubt its attribution to TAN ZIXIAO. The philosophy of the book, with its deduction of techniques from the emptiness of the Tao (as realized within the body of the practitioner), agrees with the methods of the Tianxin zhengfa. The few specific techniques mentioned are all consistent with its teachings: fuhui 伏虺 (the subduing of snakes; 2.1a), wuji 巫祭 (offering through mediums; 2.2b); and xiangfu (the use of “imitative symbols”; 4.7a). The latter are described as exorcistic in function and involve the “entwining of arms and locking together of fingers.” The commentary of Wang Yiqing identifies these practices as techniques for the transformation of the spirit through instructions for finger pricking and through walking the guideline (qiajue bugang bianshen zhi shu 掐訣步罡變神之術), that is, the kind of practices for which TAN ZIXIAO was particularly noted (see Ma Ling's Nan Tang shu 24.162–63). Note also that the term Zhengyi 正一 is given special emphasis (1.6b–7a), in accordance both with the title Zhengyi xiansheng given to TAN ZIXIAO by the ruler of Min (see 566 Shangqing tianxin zhengfa), and with the general affiliation of the Tianxin zhengfa.

The Huashu is philosophical and literary in a form that evokes the early Taoist philosophers. It addresses itself to the general reading public and was printed in a large number of editions (see Chang Bide, Shuofu kao, 258–59). The philosophy of the book is markedly influenced by Buddhism, see especially juan 1, entitled “Daohua 道化” (Transformations of the Tao). All creation is said to be founded in emptiness, and the phenomena of the world are seen as transmutable, relative, and illusory. By a return to emptiness one may transcend the world of changes and transform oneself into something lasting. Compare the biography of TAN ZIXIAO in LZTT 43.8a–11a, where he is said to have constantly explained to his disciples that his teaching was based on the Zhuangzi and Liezi, and that it was in perfect accord with the central philosophy of Buddhism. He says that he had studied the Buddhist scriptures since his youth, and he attacks those Taoists who opposed themselves to Buddhism: rejecting Buddhism is also turning one's back to the fundamental meaning of Taoism.

It may be noted that the discussions of morality, found in juan 3–4, are to a large extent Taoist justifications and reinterpretations of traditional Confucian virtues. It is clear that the book participates in the trend toward a unification of the three teachings, manifested already in the early part of the tenth century and represented, for instance, by CHEN TUAN, the famous friend of TAN QIAO (on their relationship, see the preface by CHEN JINGYUAN and also Lin Shengli, “Zixiao zhenren”).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Didier, “Way Transformation”; Ding Zhenyan and Li Sizhen, Huashu; Lin Shengli, “Zixiao zhenren Tan Qiao kaolie.”

Poul Andersen

Huashu 化書 (譚子化書)

6 juan

Attributed to TAN QIAO 覃峭, zi Jingsheng 景昇 (fl. ca. 880–950)

1478 (fasc. 1170)

“The Book of Transformations.” The heading gives Zixiao zhenren 紫霄真人 as the hao of the author, thus conflating him with TAN ZIXIAO (fl. 936–976), the founder of the Tianxin zhengfa 天心正法 (see 1044 Huashu). The present edition has a table of contents but is otherwise identical to 1044 Huashu (and to the Daozang jiyao edition, derived from a copy of the Daozang kept at Wudang shan 武當山). The section headings and ordering are slightly at variance with those of the table of contents found in Shuofu 42, which apparently represents a Xinghua lu 興化路 version printed in 1330–1332 (see Chang Bide, Shuofu kao, 259).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Didier, "Way Transformation."

Poul Andersen

Haike lun 海客論

23 fols.

1045 (fasc. 724)

"The Sea Traveler's Discourses." This is an abridged version of 266 Jinyi huandan baiwen jue (tenth century; q.v.).

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Xuanzhu lu 玄珠錄

2 juan

By Wang Hui 王暉, hao Xuanlan 玄覽 (626–697); compiled by Wang Daxiao 王大霄, zi Taixiao 太霄 (b. ca. 671)

1048 (fasc. 725)

"Record of the Mysterious Pearl." The term xuanzhu 玄珠 (Mysterious Pearl), as the preface (3b) by Wang Xuanlan's disciple Wang Daxiao explains, is a courteous reference to Wang Xuanlan himself.

The preface contains fairly detailed data about the master's life and considerable literary output, now lost but for the 120 or so entries recorded here, culled from private notes made by Wang Xuanlan's interlocutors and compiled in the form of a dialogic treatise (yulu 語錄). The material dates from Wang's forties and fifties, when he liked to engage in philosophical debate. Wang, who started out as a soothsayer and a diviner, instructed himself in Mahāyāna texts, the Daode jing, YAN ZUN's 693 Daode zhenjing zhigui (first century B.C.), and works on immortality. He was almost fifty when he was finally ordained a daoshi. Perhaps this absence of a regular teacher explains his sometimes highly original views. The Xuanzhu lu has been preserved only in the Daozang.

Essential to Wang's system of thought is his unconventional interpretation of the first line of the Daode jing, from which he isolates the kedao 可道 and the changdao 常道. The changdao produces Heaven and Earth, which are eternal; the kedao (or "private dao," sidao 私道) produces all beings, which are mortal. This theory enables Wang to find an answer to the following paradox: If the Tao is fundamentally different from all beings, then how can all beings cultivate the Tao? And if Tao and beings are identical, then where is the necessity for all beings to cultivate the Tao? It is possible, according to Wang, for one to cultivate one's own "private Tao" and to ascend to the constant, eternal Tao. The way to reach this goal is to practice "sitting in oblivion" (zuowang 坐忘), which became a prominent feature in the works of SIMA CHENGZHEN, who was one generation younger than Wang Xuanlan.

Wang's idealistic system of thought is heavily influenced by Buddhism, in particular by the school of "consciousness only." Parallels with the roughly contemporary Hai-kong jing 海空經 are legion. Our text is one of the best examples of the Tang dynasty tendency to merge Taoist and Buddhist thought, better known as the Double Mystery (Chongxuan 重玄).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Zhu Senpu, Xuanzhu lu jiaoshi.

Jan A. M. De Meyer

Zongxuan xiansheng xuangang lun 宗玄先生玄綱論

26 fols.

By WU YUN 吳筠, posthumous title Zongxuan xiansheng 宗玄先生 (d. 778) 1052 (fasc. 727)

Wu zunshi zhuan 吳尊師傳

2 fols. (appendix to 1052)

By QUAN DEYU 權德輿 (between 802–810)

1053 (fasc. 727)

"Arcane Principles of Master Zongxuan." This work is an outline of Taoist thought, written by WU YUN for the Emperor Xuanzong (r. 712–756). The text is preceded by a memorial that states it was presented to the throne in 754 (Xuanzong's reply is preserved in Quan Tang wen 37.12b).

The Xuangang lun is considered one of WU YUN's most outstanding works by his biographer QUAN DEYU (see 1053 Wu zunshi zhuan 2a). The latter refers to the work in three sections, which corresponds to the present text, but the Chongwen zongmu lists the title twice, once in three juan, the second time in one juan (VDL 98). Other bibliographies also mention either one juan or three juan, but the latter designations actually refer to the three sections (cf. VDL 98). The three sections are further subdivided into subsections (zhang 章), each with its own heading.

The first section is titled "Ming Daode" (Clarification on the Tao and the De). It comprises nine subsections dealing with the various manifestations of the Tao in the universe and within humanity: the Primordial Qi, the True One, taiji 太極, yin and yang, movement and quiescence, being and nonbeing, etc. At the end of the section, there is also some criticism of Confucianism: the practice of Confucian virtues is considered unsuitable for a monarch, because the Confucianists are incapable of comprehending the profound meaning of the teachings of the sages (8b).

The second section, entitled “Bian fazhao” (Explanation of the Doctrine), comprises fifteen subsections. It describes the sacred origin of the scriptures and the order in which they should be studied: Zhengyi 正一, Dongshen 洞神, Lingbao 靈寶, Dongzhen 洞真. This account is followed by a discussion of methods employed for self-purification and the accumulation of merit through the observance of moral precepts. Immortality, for WU YUN, can be attained by meditation and mental concentration, by practicing compassion and observing religious rules rather than by simply ingesting elixirs.

The third and last section is entitled “Xining zhi” (Fixing the Will and Mind on Immortality). It comprises nine subsections, all presented in yulu 語錄 (recorded conversations) form. The dialogue between WU YUN and an interlocutor dwells on the reasons so few attain immortality. The arguments put forth are similar to those in the “Shenxian ke xue lun” (1051 Zongxuan xiansheng wenji 2.9b–16a).

The appendix, 1053 Wu zunshi zhuan by QUAN DEYU, is a short biography of WU YUN and traces his Taoist career at Emperor Xuanzong’s court. The biography is reproduced virtually verbatim in Jin Tang shu 192 and forms the primary material for all subsequent biographies of WU YUN (cf. LZTT 37.96b–10b, 304 Maoshan zhi 15.10b, etc.).

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Taiping liangtong shu 太平兩同書

2 juan

By Luo Yin 羅隱, zi Zhaojian 昭諫 (833–910)

1135 (fasc. 767)

“The Identity of Both.” The term liangtong 兩同 in the title has two different meanings. Besides hinting at Luo Yin’s attempt to show that Confucianism and Taoism are compatible, it also refers to the ten chapter headings, all of which consist of two antithetical concepts, such as strength and weakness, profit and loss, order and disorder, and so on. The idea, then, is that a faulty interpretation of a certain concept easily leads to the actualization of its opposite. The term taiping 太平 was added before the second half of the twelfth century, possibly because of Luo Yin’s relation to LÜQIU FANGYUAN (d. 902), author of 1101b Taiping jing chao.

In half of the Song catalogues that list the Liangtong shu (VDL 111) not Luo Yin but WU YUN (d. 778) is given as the author. This discrepancy is the result of the existence of two Liangtong shu (see Xin Tang shu 59.1540 and Song shi 205.5208), one by WU YUN and one by Luo Yin. Comparison with the extant works of both writers indicates that the present text is the work of Luo Yin. Zhizhai shulu jieti 10.15b lists it under the title Zhurong zi liangtong shu 祝融子兩同書, another indication of Luo Yin’s authorship, as the Luo clan was reputed to have descended from the mythical emperor Zhurong.

Although Song dynasty prints of Luo Yin’s poetic works are still extant, this is not the case of the Liangtong shu. The present text is preserved (in some cases only in fragments) in the Ming editions Xu baichuan xuehai 續百川學海 and Shuofu. Yong Wenhua consulted these editions with another Ming copy from Fan Qin’s 范欽 (1506–1589) Tianyi ge 天一閣 when he compiled his Luo Yin ji. The Liangtong shu version on which Yong Wenhua based himself for his critical edition, however, is not a Ming but an early Qing (1644–1911) copy, namely, the text as it appears in juan 8 of the Luo Zhaojian ji 羅昭諫集. This work is now preserved in the Siku quanshu 四庫全書, which also contains another version of our text, as a separate work in the zajia 雜家 section. The Luo Zhaojian ji, which was already mentioned in the twelfth-century Suichu tang shumu 72, acquired its definitive form in a 1670 print made by a certain Zhang Zan 張瓚, who had previously combed the Hangzhou region for all existing old editions of Luo Yin’s works. This version of the Liangtong shu is superior to all others, including the Daozang edition (the oldest) of which Yong Wenhua was apparently unaware. The Daozang edition shares many insignificant textual variants with the other Ming editions. Fragments of our text also appear under the name Lingbi zi 靈璧子 in the Ming collections Zhuzi huihan 諸子彙函 and Zhuzi gangmu leibian 諸子綱目類編.

Our text has not been fully preserved. The tenth chapter, which, like chapters 6 through 9, should end with a quotation from Confucius, actually ends in midsentence. Probably, not more than one or two dozen characters are missing.

The Taiping liangtong shu’s emphasis is on the art of governing. Its most interesting aspect is Luo Yin’s diverse attempts to prove the basic compatibility of Taoist and Confucian values, for example, by praising historical figures who in their own actions exemplified both Taoist and Confucian values; by illustrating certain themes with quotations from both Taoist and Confucian sources; and by explaining concepts normally associated with one school through the use of terms normally connected with the other school. Our text is arguably the most systematically elaborated example of a trend—often motivated by anti-Buddhist sentiments and by no means uncommon during the latter half of the Tang—toward the unification of Taoism and Confucianism. The fact that the first five Liangtong shu chapters end with a quotation from Laozi does not imply the precedence of Taoism over Confucianism. Luo Yin’s basic interest rather resembles the Confucian “rectification of names” (zhengming 正名). Though he does his best to incorporate as many Taoist values as possible, he is also careful to exclude Zhuangzi's relativistic and so-called primitivistic elements, apparently concerned lest Taoist "radicalism" place a strain on any lasting Confucian-Taoist synthesis.

Jan A. M. De Meyer

Taishang laojun qingjing xin jing 太上老君清靜心經

3 fols.

1169 (fasc. 839)

"Scripture by the Most High Lord Lao on Purity and Quietude of the Heart." This text, which also figures in YJQQ 17.13b–15b under the title Laojun qingjing xin jing, basically corresponds to 620 Taishang laojun shuo chang qingjing miaojing but is simpler in style. Whereas its counterpart includes an epilogue, the present scripture concludes with a gāthā and promises of rewards for the recitation and keeping of the scripture.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Dongling zhenjing 洞靈真經

3 juan

He Can 何瓌 [榮], commentator

747 (fasc. 522)

"True Scripture of the Communion with the Divine." He Can's commentary on the Kangcang zi 亢倉子 (see the article on 669 Dongling zhenjing) was first bibliographically recorded in Junzhai dushu zhi (VDL 82). A comparison of two citations in TPYL 344.7b and 350.3a with the present work (1.26a–b) shows, however, that it already existed—with some variants—in the tenth century.

No details about the author of this commentary seem to have been available to Song (960–1279) and post-Song bibliographers, but the Yongle dadian 10286.14b–15a contains a preface, nowhere else preserved, by the grand academician (taixue boshi 太學博士) He Can, of the [Hou] Jin dynasty (936–946). According to this source, a certain Liu Tiancong 劉天從, who kept a copy of the Dongling zhenjing in his private collection, asked He Can for an introduction so that he could have the work printed. However, no mention is made of He having written the commentary on this occasion. The author of the present pithy lexical-semantic explanations and interpretation of the text already had various versions of the Kangcang zi at his disposal (see, e.g., 1.13a, 1.24b, 1.25a, 2.11a). The phonetic annotations interspersed in the main text are also found in the above mentioned citations in TPYL, but since they appear in 669 Dongling zhenjing as well, they cannot be firmly attributed to He Can. A folio containing phonetic explanations (yinyi 音義) is preserved in a printed Song edition of this commentary (five juan, in Sibu congkan 四部叢刊); its author cannot be determined beyond doubt, nor is it possible to identify it confidently with the Kangcang zi yinyi 亢倉子音義 in one juan listed in the bibliographic chapters of the Song shi (205.5178).

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

Wuneng zi 無能子

3 juan

Written in 887

1028 (fasc. 672)

"Master Incompetent." The preface to this text states that it was written by a friend of Wuneng zi. However, the information it provides about the date of the writing of the text is so detailed that it is probably the work of Wuneng zi himself. Our text was written in Zuofu 左輔 (modern Dali, east of Xi'an) between 26 March and 22 April 887, while Wuneng zi spent most of his time in bed. The author, who apparently had held an office but went to live in obscurity with a family he befriended, the Jing 景 clan, chose not to reveal his real name. None of the names mentioned in Wuneng zi permit the identification of the author.

Most important Song catalogues (VDL 143) list the Wuneng zi in three juan, Song shi 205.5180 giving one juan instead. Although in some editions of our text eleven of the thirty-four subsections are marked as missing, one can safely assume that the work has been preserved in its entirety: possibly as a result of the author's whim, some subsections are split up into two, three, or four paragraphs. The number of additional paragraphs thus created corresponds exactly to the number of subsections marked as missing.

Six Ming dynasty collectanea—namely, Shier zi 十二子, Ershi jia zishu 二十家子書, Zi hui 子彙, Qieqiean chujian shiliu zi 且且菴初箋十六子, He zhu mingjia pidian zhuzi quanshu 合諸名家批點諸子全書, and Zhuzi huihan 諸子彙函—contain the Wuneng zi, sometimes in heavily truncated form, as in the case of the Zhuzi huihan, which reproduces only five of the thirty-four chapters and in its table of contents erroneously lists the Wuneng zi as a Sui dynasty (581–618) text. This edition is interesting, however, as it contains a short but not unsympathetic remark on the present text by the Neo-Confucianist Cheng Hao 程顥 (1032–1085). The oldest edition of Wuneng zi, predating the earliest other Ming prints by about a century and the only one to contain the full table of contents, is the present version in the Daozang. The compilers of the Siku quanshu, who used a copy of this text from Fan Qin's 范欽 (sixteenth century) Tianyi ge 天一閣 library, stated that they included the Wuneng zi only because of the scarcity of Tang books. They failed to indicate the age of the "old copy" (jiuben 舊本) at their disposal (Siku quanshu zongmu tiyao 146.50a).

Formally, the three juan of our text differ. Juan 1, which opens with the important essay “On the Transgressions of the Sage” (shengguo 聖過), sketches the basis of Wuneng zi’s philosophy; juan 2 offers elaborations in the form of fictitious dialogues between historical figures, arranged chronologically from King Wen of the Zhou to the third-century hermit Sun Deng 孫登; juan 3 consists of dialogues between Wuneng zi and his friends and family, together with a few parables.

Whenever Wuneng zi is mentioned in works on Chinese thought, it is almost invariably in the context of classical Chinese anarchism. Wuneng zi’s precursors were Laozi, Zhuangzi, Liezi, Ruan Ji 阮籍 (210–263), and GE HONG’s contemporary Bao Jingyan 鮑敬言. Actually, what this iconoclastic work aims at is the total annihilation of traditional or conventional ideas and practices, which are nothing but arbitrary fabrications of the so-called sages of antiquity. Toward the end of the book, even the conventions of language itself are shattered (3.7a–8b). Another interesting argument concerns the impossibility of physical death (since the body consists of originally dead material) and hence the futility of the quest for physical immortality (1.5a–b). Noteworthy is the Wuneng zi’s repeated insistence upon “no-mind” (wuxin 無心) as the solution to human suffering.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Wang Ming, Wuneng zi jiaozhu.

Jan A. M. De Meyer

Gushen fu 谷神賦

8 fols.

By Zhao De 趙德, zi Daxin 大信, hao Dashui yiren 大水逸人 (early ninth century)

262 (fasc. 121)

“Rhapsody of the Valley Spirit.” The Daozang edition of this otherwise unknown annotated fu-rhapsody indicates the author with the words “Tianshui yiren Daxin zhu 天水逸人大信註.” The character tian must be an error for da. Song bibliographies such as Tongzhi yiwén lüè state that the work was written by Zhao Daxin 趙大信 (see VDL 110), which allows us to identify the author, either of the text of the rhapsody or of the commentary, as Zhao De, hao master Dashui (Dashui xiansheng 大水先生), a presented scholar (jinsshi 進士) of the late Tang, who retired at an early age in his native region of Chaozhou. When Han Yu 韓愈 (768–824) was exiled to Chaozhou in 819, Zhao was put in charge of coastal defense and also taught at the school that Han had established, greatly enhancing the standard of learning in the region. Quan Tang wen 622.6b preserves Zhao’s preface to a collection of writings by Han Yu.

The rhapsody takes its title and main theme from a passage in Daode jing 6. From there the author develops his mystical vision of the Primordial Womb (yuanbao 元胞) and the realization of the immortal embryo within the body. The thought of the author shows the influence of 31 Huangdi yinfu jing. The annotations follow the text closely and elucidate it; they are likely by the same hand.

Kristofer Schipper

Chisong zi zhongjie jing 赤松子中誠經

12 fols.

Tenth century

185 (fasc. 78)

“Scripture of the Central Rules by Chisong Zi.” This text is first listed in Chongwen zongmu 9.2b. The Bishu sheng xubiandao siku queshu mu 2.34b gives the variant title Chisong zi bajie lu 八戒錄 and ascribes the authorship to CHEN TUAN (871–989). This attribution is not confirmed anywhere in Chen’s biographies. In Song times (960–1279), further variant titles are attested: Chisong zi jie, Chisong zi zhongjie pian 篇 (cf. VDL 110), and Chisong zi jing (cf. Xishan xiansheng Zhen wenzhong gong wenji 35.551–552). Possibly, the present text was inspired by a passage in 1185 Baopu zi neipian 6.5a–b, which contains a brief summary of a Chisong zi jing with similar contents.

An account of marvelous cures due to Chisong zi’s central rules figures as a preface to the present work. A variant of this story is found in 1167 Taishang ganying pian 4.1b–2a.

The text itself is composed as a dialogue: in response to questions put forth by the Yellow Emperor, Chisong zi explains the relation between one’s individual actions and their consequences. Each person has a star that watches over him or her and that diminishes his or her original lifespan of 120 years upon each offense (1a–b); thus Chisong zi gives numerous rules of conduct and exemplifies the effects of good and evil deeds.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Yoshioka Yoshitoyo, “Sekishōshi chūkaikyō to kōka shisō.”

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

2.A.1.c The Yinfu jing and Its Commentaries

Despite its controversial origin and obscure content, the Yinfu jing 陰符經 has been influential among both Taoist and Confucian thinkers. Tradition places its origin variously in the Warring States period (475–221 B.C.), or in the Jin or Northern Wei (386–534) dynasty. At the opposite extreme, Zhu Xi 朱熹 (1130–1200) and other Song scholars took the skeptical view that the scripture actually originated with Li Quan 李筌 (fl. 713–741), the main commentator featured in this section. The fact that the Yinfu jing is quoted in the Yiwen leiju, however, shows that it existed at least by early Tang times (618–907). It is presented here in a version that probably dates to the first half of the eighth century (31 Huangdi yinfu jing).

Interpretations of the Yinfu jing have ranged between the domains of military and political philosophy, on the one hand, and physiological alchemy, on the other, giving rise to numerous commentaries. The Song catalogue Tongzhi, “Yiwen lüe,” lists thirty-nine titles. In this section, Li Quan’s collection of annotations ascribed to ancient authors and completed by his own (108 Huangdi yinfu jing jizhu) is followed by his contemporary ZHANG GUO’s 112 Huangdi yinfu jing zhu, which takes issue with Li Quan’s views in 108 Huangdi yinfu jing jizhu. The next item, 110 Huangdi yinfu jing shu, appears to be wrongly ascribed to Li Quan. It is based on DU GUANGTING’s early tenth-century account of Li Quan’s encounter with the Old Woman of Lishan 驪山老母. This mysterious immortal not only revealed an “authentic” explication of the scripture to Li, but also confirmed its supposed antiquity. DU GUANGTING was himself the author of a now lost commentary on the Yinfu jing.

Huangdi yinfu jing 黃帝陰符經

2 fols.

Eighth century?

31 (fasc. 27)

“The Yellow Emperor’s Scripture of the Hidden Contracts.” This text deals with the cosmic forces and principles, and also with their seen or unseen influences in the human world. There are three paragraphs: “The Immortal Embraces the One: This means Tao”; “Enriching the State and Pacifying the People: This means Fa”; and “Strengthening the Troops and Fighting Victoriously: This means Shu.” These subtitles combine the aspects of “civil culture” (wen 文) and “military means” (wu 武). Bibliographies classify this text either as “military” or “Taoist” (see VDL 139, 140; Reiter, “Scripture of the Hidden Contracts”). The present text represents the long version comprising about 400 words, whereas tradition ascribes 300 words to the Yinfu jing (see 110 Huangdi yinfu jing shu, preface 1b). Another text, 113 Huangdi yinfu jing jie offers an interpretation of this discrepancy, connecting Xi wang mu 西王母 and the Yellow Emperor with the revelation and transmission of the Yinfu jing (in 400 words). Chu Suiliang’s (596–658) Tang Chu Henan Yinfu jing moji reproduces the long version. There is some dispute as to the authenticity of Chu’s work (see Yu Jiayi, Siku tiyao bianzheng 1178–80). Ouyang Xun’s (557–641) Yiwen leiju 88.1507 quotes one sentence of a text with the title Yinfu that can be found in the present work (1a). It is therefore likely that a Yinfu jing was extant in the sixth century. However, the above-mentioned three subtitles appear for the first time around 750, in a text traditionally attributed to Li Quan 李筌 (see 110 Huangdi yinfu jing shu). It should be noted that most phrases quoted elsewhere from the Yinfu jing do appear in this text.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Li Dahua, “Lun Yinfu jing chansheng”; Miyakawa Hisayuki, “Inbukyō”; Rand, “Li Ch’üan”; Reiter, “The ‘Scripture of the Hidden Contracts’”; Xiao Dengfu, Huangdi Yinfu jing.

Florian C. Reiter

Huangdi yinfu jing jizhu 黃帝陰符經集註

14 fols.

By Li Quan 李筌 (fl. 713–741)

108 (fasc. 54)

“The Collection of Commentaries on the Yellow Emperor’s Scripture of the Hidden Contracts.” This work contains explanations that are said to have been transmitted by Yi Yin 伊尹, Taigong 太公, Fan Li 范蠡, Guigu zi 鬼谷子, Zhuge Liang 諸葛亮, Zhang Liang 張良, and Li Quan 李筌. The preface, attributed to Zhuge Liang, connects the text with the Yellow Emperor, but it does not give the traditional information about the Old Woman of Lishan 驪山 that figures prominently in 110 Huangdi yinfu jing shu.

The “long version” (in approximately 400 words, see 31 Huangdi yinfu jing) of the Yinfu jing is not divided into the customary three paragraphs (cf. 110 Huangdi yinfu jing shu). The distribution of commentaries through the text is uneven. The commentaries by Li Quan are comparatively substantial; however, do not match the commentaries attributed to that author in 110 Huangdi yinfu jing shu. Li Quan’s commentaries in the present collection prompted ZHANG GUO to write his own (see 112 Huangdi yinfu jing zhu) in order to refute Li Quan’s opinion, which confirms Li Quan’s authorship of the commentaries attributed to him in this collection. The compilation of the collection itself can be attributed to Li Quan. His name occupies the last and chronologically most recent position at the end of the long series of authors. Li Quan offers naturalistic interpretations that seem to be based on historical events or on data referring to military and political actions.

Florian C. Reiter

Huangdi yinfu jing zhu 黃帝陰符經註

11 fols.

By ZHANG GUO 張果 (first half of the eighth century)

112 (fasc. 55)

“Commentary on the Yellow Emperor’s Scripture of the Hidden Contracts.” According to 295 Xu xian zhuan 2.4b–6a, ZHANG GUO died at the beginning of the Tianbao period (742–756). Since the present text mentions neither the title nor hao that were bestowed onto Zhang by the emperor in 734 (cf. Jiu Tang shu 8.200), his commentary was probably written before that date. His biography in Jiu Tang shu 191 tells us that he wrote the Yinfu jing xuanjie 玄解. In the Song catalogues, the present text is listed under the title Yinfu jing taiwu zhuan 太無傳 (see VDL 140). Zhang mentions in his preface that several commentaries to the Yinfu jing existed already, none of which was satisfactory. He condemns especially the commentary by Li Quan 李筌, a contemporary of his. As Zhang states, he happened to find a Yinfu zhuan in the Taoist canon (daojing zang 道經藏), the date and author of which were unknown. He rearranged it and also included his own annotations (in which he mainly limits himself to harshly attacking Li Quan). Both Zhang and Li based their commentaries on the long version of the Yinfu jing (comprising 443 and 437 characters, respectively). In fourteen instances, Zhang criticizes Li's interpretation, referring each time to Li's commentary in 108 Huangdi yinfu jing jizhu. For one of his points of criticism (1a), compare Li Quan's preface to the Yinfu jing quoted in Junzhai dushu zhi 11.487–89. The present work is also found, with slight variants, in YJQQ 15.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Huangdi yinfu jing song* 黃帝陰符經頌

7 fols.

By Yuanyang zi 元陽子; Tang (618–907)?

311 (fasc. 161)

“The Yellow Emperor's Scripture of the Hidden Contracts [Interpreted] in Hymns.” In this work, Yuanyang zi relates the Yinfu jing to alchemical practice in thirty-nine hymns in seven-character lines. Bibliographic mention of this interpretation is found in the Tongzhi, “Yiwen lüe,” 5.5a. The main text (417 characters) is divided into three sections with the usual headings. The Daozang jiyao edition of this work shows an interpolation in the main text (for a discussion of this passage, see 124 Huangdi yinfu jing zhujie 2b–3a); the commentary is identical.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Tianji jing* 天機經

8 fols.

Probably Tang dynasty (618–907)

1190 (fasc. 874)

“Scripture of Natural Opportunities.” Also known under the titles Tianji zi 天機子 and Yinfu tianji jing 陰符天機經 (VDL 84, 140), this text is in fact one of the numerous 31 Huangdi Yinfu jing 陰符經 commentaries.

The preface, studded with quotations from the Book of Changes, summarizes the contents but contains no factual information as to date or authorship. Junzhai dushu zhi 11.489–90 considers it to be the work of Li Quan 李筌 (mid-eighth century). Our text has been preserved only in the Daozang, where it is also found in YJQQ 15, appended as an explanatory work to the Yinfu jing. Daozang jinghua lists the work under the title Yinfu tianji jing.

Tianji jing is divided into nineteen subsections, each elucidating one term from the Yinfu jing. The stress is on statecraft and strategy, with sporadic references to longevity. The wise man, according to our text, becomes invincible by scrutinizing signs from nature and humanity, by knowing when to advance and when to retreat, by understanding the interplay of yin and yang, and by responding to opportunities (yingji 應機). The Book of Changes and Daode jing are quoted frequently, but echoes of Mencius (5a) and GUO XIANG (6b) are likewise present.

Jan A. M. De Meyer

2.A.1.d Commentaries on the Zhouyi cantong qi and Related Scriptures

The essential theoretical framework for this section is provided by the Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契, the Guwen longhu jing 古文龍虎經, and the Jinbi jing 金碧經. Because of their problematic dating, these texts are discussed here rather than in part 1. The three texts, together with the so-called Wu xianglei 五相類, are closely related, so much so that they are often combined in different sequences. An example is 905 Cantong qi wu xianglei biyao, a book in which the main text is the Wu xianglei, in supposed sequence with the Zhouyi cantong qi. Other works, such as 1017 Daoshu, give a Cantong qi in three chapters (sanpian 三篇). In these works, the second chapter is a Cantong qi ascribed to a certain Caoyi zi 草衣子, also known as Lou Jing 婁敬, of the Han dynasty, while chapter 3 in fact corresponds to the Jinbi jing. Still other works—such as 999 Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契 with the commentary of Yin Changsheng 陰長生—consider (preface 1a) that the Cantong qi was produced out of the Guwen longhu jing. In order to throw some light on these difficulties, we shall discuss the different texts in turn, beginning with the one that is best known today.

The Zhouyi cantong qi (Concordance of the Three according to the Book of Changes of the Zhou Dynasty) is a short treatise in verse and prose that endeavors to explain the alchemical process in terms of the cosmology of the Yijing. This book is ascribed to WEI BOYANG, a legendary immortal. The attribution is based on Wei's hagiography in the Shenxian zhuan 神仙傳, presumably written by GE HONG: “Wei Boyang made the Cantong qi wu xianglei together in two scrolls. The discourse is like a commentary on the Zhouyi but in fact he borrows its divination symbols [yaoxiang 爻象] in order to discuss the meaning of the making of the elixir. However, the Confucian scholars [ru 儒者] did not understand matters related to immortality and therefore often wrote commentaries [explaining the text] in yin-yang [sexual] terms. They thus completely lost sight of its deeper meaning" (Shenxian zhuan in YJQQ 109.6a-b).

This passage is rather problematic. It is uncertain whether the title Cantong qi wu xianglei denotes one or two distinct works. The explanation given of its contents and its misuse by Confucian scholars suggests a subsequent addition, as it closely fits the later, Tang (618–907) version of the work but not at all the earlier one (see below). Moreover, yin-yang commentaries of the work existed in Tang times (see van Gulik, Sexual life in ancient China, 80–81). Indeed, the whole text translated above seems doubtful, given that GE HONG mentions WEI BOYANG in his BPZ 19.306 as the author of a work simply called Neijing 內經. The very historicity of WEI BOYANG is open to question. His legend as reported in the Shenxian zhuan is devoid of facts; it contains only an anecdote about the way WEI BOYANG tested the resolve of his disciples by pretending to die after taking his alchemical elixir. In fact, Boyang is the name of Laozi (see Seidel, La divinisation de Lao Tseu, 7, 29–30), and according to Laozi's biography in Shiji 63.2142, his son Zong 宗 became commander in Wei 魏. Moreover, the very passage translated above is also found in the BPZ 3.46, again in connection with Laozi. Hence, as Fukui Kōjun observes (in "A study of Chou-i Ts'an-t'ung ch'i," 26), "Wei Boyang" can be read as "Boyang from Wei" and therefore as referring to an avatar of Laozi.

The most significant reason, however, to question the relation of the present Zhouyi cantong qi with a legendary WEI BOYANG and an ancient stratum of Taoist alchemy is that the text as we know it is not quoted in any form before the Tang dynasty. A commentary to the Yijing called Cantong qi must have existed, since the Jingdian shiwen 2.1a by Lu Deming 陸德明 (556–627) quotes a commentary by Yu Fan 虞翻, a scholar of the end of the Han dynasty (206 B.C.–A.D. 220): "The Cantong qi says: 'the graph has sun and thereunder moon 日月爲易.'" This brief clause can indeed be found in 999 Zhouyi cantong qi 1.10a.1, but there it is part of a sentence that reads, "the sun and the moon alternate, hard and soft complete each other 日月爲易, 剛柔相合." Yu Fan was a Confucian scholar known for his commentaries on the apocrypha (wei 緯); the Cantong qi he quotes must have been an apocryphal commentary on the Yijing and not a Taoist book on alchemy. Therefore, the present version of the Cantong qi places what must have been a definition of the character yi 易 in a context of cyclical alternation and alchemical process. It is also doubtful that the text Yu Fan referred to was the same as the present Cantong qi because the clause cited is too short to be conclusive. A second instance where a Cantong qi is mentioned is in 1016 Zhen'gao 12.8b, where in his commentary TAO HONGJING quotes a Yi cantong qi 易參同契 concerning the story of a certain Chunyu Shutong 淳于叔通. This person obtained methods for calculating future events, which enabled him to be appointed fangshi 方士 as well as mayor of the capital Luoyang. It is not entirely clear whether the "calculations" in question were contained in the book of Yi itself, but it stands to reason to suppose that there was a direct relationship, which again shows that the original Cantong qi was an apocryphal commentary on the Yijing and concerned prognostication, not alchemy. However, this obvious fact has not prevented many prefacers of editions of the present alchemical work to quote, mostly indirectly, this passage of the Zhen'gao in an attempt to reconstruct its textual history.

A final indication of the fact that the original Cantong qi was a work of prognostication and calculation is provided by a quotation in the Yanshi jiaxun 17, "Shuzheng 書証." Here the author Yan Zhitui (531–ca. 590) cites the Cantong qi as saying: "A man carrying an announcement makes [the character] 'to create' 以人負告爲造." He then goes on to criticize what he terms "the nonsensical utterances of the prognosticators and calculators 數術謬語." Again, this criticism is a clear indication that the original work was related to the art of shushu 數術 and not to alchemy. In modern times, the textual scholar Ma Xulun 馬敘倫 (1884–1970), in Dushu xiaoji 2.34, accords with our argument that an apocryphal Yijing commentary called Cantong qi must have existed. He goes on to emend the quotation in the Yanshi jiaxun in a contrived way to make it correspond to a passage in the actual Cantong qi (see Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao, 354).

In this light, it would be useful to find evidence in the surviving Yiwei 易緯 apocrypha of a relationship with the Cantong qi. Although there are some obvious parallels, these may be explained by the similarity of the subject matter. Also the author of a counterfeit Cantong qi would certainly have tried to imitate the still existing Han Yiwei texts, such as the Qianzuo du 乾鑿度 (in Yiwei bazhong 1.5b–6a). In short, there is no conclusive evidence that a Cantong qi as we have it today existed before Tang times.

The earliest mention of the present Cantong qi may well be a short treatise by the daoshi Liu Zhigu 劉知古 entitled Riyue xuanshu lun 日月玄樞論 (in Quan Tang wen 334.13a–21a). There is also a memorial (biao 表) presenting this work to the throne. Both mention the Cantong qi in the context of the practice of alchemy and as the fundamental text of this mysterious art. Liu Zhigu states that many people already used this book but failed to understand it. In his research on the origins of the Cantong qi, Liu mentions GE HONG's Shenxian zhuan, as well as other authors. He quotes the preface of an edition of the Longhu jing 龍虎經 by a certain Mr. Xiao 蕭; more of this text can be found today at the beginning of the preface of 999 Zhouyi cantong qi, attributed to Yin Changsheng 陰長生. Although it does not tell us much about the book by Mr. Xiao, it does show that Liu Zhigu was referring to texts that were related to the lore of the Cantong qi as we have it today.

Liu, according to his biography in LZTT 32.2a–3b (probably based on the now lost Gaodao zhuan 高道傳; cf. 1248 Sandong qunxian lu 1.10b–11a), became a Taoist during the Longshuo era (662–663) and left this world in 743. Since he was esteemed by SIMA CHENGZHEN, the likely period for his treatise and its presentation to the throne would be the reign of Xuanzong (712–757).

Another work of the same period, the Chuxue ji, contains a quotation (23.549) that corresponds to a sentence in the Cantong qi. The sentence in question is found in chapter 79 of 1002 Zhouyi cantong qi fen zhang tongzhen yi 3.1a (cf. Fukui Kōjun, “A study of Chou-i Ts’an-t’ung ch’i,” 27). The earliest of the annotated versions of the book, that of Yin Changsheng 陰長生 (999 Zhouyi cantong qi), should also date from this period (see Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao, 377). This early commentary is followed by that of PENG XIAO, 1002 Zhouyi cantong qi fen zhang tongzhen yi, dated 947. As the title indicates, Peng (whose real family name was Cheng 程) divided the text into chapters. His edition would remain the standard for later times, and most of the subsequent studies are based on it.

All these facts bring us to the conclusion that the received Cantong qi did not come into being before the middle of the Tang dynasty. This conclusion vindicates the many opinions that have been voiced in the past expressing doubt as to the authenticity of the text. As early as the beginning of the thirteenth century, a local official from Fujian—Bao Zhongqi 鮑仲祺, zi Wozhi 澣之—expressed his disbelief (see 1002 Zhouyi cantong qi fen zhang tongzhen yi). As to the way the present Cantong qi defines itself, we have seen that here, too, the different versions offer conflicting accounts. One of the persistent themes, however, from Liu Zhigu to the preface in the Yin Changsheng edition and beyond, is that there exists a close relationship between the Zhouyi cantong qi and the Guwen longhu jing (also titled Guwen longhu shangjing 上經).

The Guwen longhu (shang) jing is not known before the Tang. A close stylistic resemblance between this work and the Cantong qi is evident. Both texts are essentially in rhymed verse, both speak of alchemy, and many of the technical terms are similar. This resemblance is especially manifest for the first part of the Cantong qi (the first juan in the PENG XIAO edition), in which, in many instances, we find wordings and meanings almost identical with corresponding phrases in the Longhu jing. A close comparison shows, however, that the Yijing vocabulary, so prevalent in the Cantong qi, is absent from the Longhu jing. In many places, instead of typical Taoist terms and names such as Yuanjun 元君 and Xuannü 玄女, the Cantong qi has Zhongni 仲尼 and Shengren 聖人. Other transpositions are zhonggua 衆卦 for zhongshi 衆石 (juan 1).

The most conclusive evidence that the Cantong qi is a sequel and an enlargement of the Longhu jing, however, is that at the end of the Longhu jing the author indicates that further information about the practice can be found in a text called Huoji 火記 (Notes on Fire). In fact, says the final paragraph, the Longhu jing is but a supplement to this Huoji, and therefore it was not the author’s purpose to repeat the information contained therein. The corresponding passage in 999 Cantong qi (1.38b) is a clear amplification of this passage, but far more verbose and devoid of any clear message. It states that the indications of the Huoji “in six hundred chapters” were not comprehensible to the vulgar, but that true sages used them, and that they were explained here, lest the Tao not be transmitted. This is a classical case of amplification (yanchu 演出). Indeed, the text of the Longhu jing is clear and straightforward in discussing the hierogamy of the dragon and the tiger, whereas the Cantong qi discusses the same topic but more awkwardly, having to match the imagery of the Taoist cosmological process with that of the Yijing.

The study of the relationship between the two works could be pushed further. For instance, in 887 Zhang zhenren jinshi lingsha lun, the author, Zhang Jiugai 張九垓 (fl. 750), repeatedly cites the Longhu jing, while in fact his quotations correspond to the Cantong qi, but with a number of variants. On page 2b, the quotation in the Longhu jing reads: “The White Tiger is the hinge; the Green Dragon mates with it 白虎爲敖樞，青龍與之俱。” These two clauses can be found in 999 Cantong qi (1.33b), but in a different context: “The moon crescent is modeled on the crucible. The White Tiger is the hinge. The mercury sun is like flowing pearls. The Green Dragon mates with it 偃月法爐鼎，白虎爲敖樞，汞日爲流珠，青龍與之俱。” It is the same text, but two sentences have been added. Moreover, these sentences are in the part of the Cantong qi that comes after the passage on the Huoji, where the correspondence with the received Longhu jing ends. A quotation of the Cantong qi in Zhang’s work (887 Jinshi lingsha lun, 8a) cannot be found in the present versions. Many more instances illustrate the complex relationship between these texts.

Another work of the same group is the Jinbi jing, which also comes in many versions. One of the oldest may be the 904 Jinbi wu xianglei cantong qi in three juan with a preface and a commentary ascribed to Yin Changsheng 陰長生. In conclusion, we may say that in the middle of the eighth century there existed a cluster of texts with the titles Longhu jing, Zhouyi cantong qi, and Jinbi jing that formed the bases of the present three works.

During the Southern Song, the Cantong qi became popular, and many of the greatest scholars, including Zhu Xi 朱熹 (1130–1200), tried their hand at writing commentaries on it. The Longhu jing, meanwhile, lost favor. The Cantong qi was frequently reprinted at government expense (gongku banxing 公庫板行). The work’s great popularity turned the homeland of WEI BOYANG, the region of Guiji 會稽 (Shaoxing 紹興, Zhejiang), into a center for practitioners of Inner Alchemy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Jin Zhengyao, “Jinbi wu xianglei cantong qi”; Fukui Kōjun, “A study of Chou-i Ts’an-t’ung ch’i”; Pregadio, Zhouyi cantong qi; Xiao Hanming, “Tang Wudai sanzong shu qi”; Yang Xiaolei, “Zhouyi cantong qi kaoshu.”

Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契

3 juan

Attributed to Yin Changsheng 陰長生 (an immortal of the Former Han period, 206 B.C.–A.D. 9); Tang (618–907)

999 (fasc. 621)

“Concordance of the Three according to the Book of Changes of the Zhou Dynasty.” This is a commentary to the Cantong qi 參同契 by a legendary immortal who is considered to have been the disciple of Ma Mingsheng 馬鳴生. The work is mentioned in the Tongzhi, “Yiwen lüe” (see VDL 139). The text is not divided into chapters (zhang 章), unlike 1002 Zhuoyi cantong qi fen zhang tongzhen yi by PENG XIAO (q.v.).

According to the preface, a certain “Xu zhenren 徐真人,” from Beihai 北海 and a retainer (congsshi 從事) to the magistrate of Qingzhou 青州 (both places are in today’s Shandong), wrote the Gu longhu shangjing 古龍虎上經 (Old Superior Book of the Dragon and the Tiger). Later, WEI BOYANG wrote a commentary to this work that he titled Wu xianglei 五相類. The work by Xu and the commentary by Wei together were then called Cantong qi 參同契.

It must be noted that this first part of the preface is similar to, and at places identical in wording with, the Treatise on the Mysterious Axis of the Sun and the Moon (Riyue xuanshu lun 日月玄樞論 in Quan Tang wen 334.13a–21a) by Liu Zhigu 劉知古 (see introduction to part 2.A.1.d). In this document, the passage concerning Xu zhenren is presented as part of the preface of the commentary to the “Longhu 龍虎” (this must be the Guwen longhu jing 古文龍虎經) by a certain Mr. Xiao 蕭. It is unclear which version is the original. Another version of a similar story involving the same Xu zhenren is given in 905 Cantong qi wu xianglei biyao 1a.

Chen Guofu (Daozang yuanliu xukao, 377) considers, on the basis of various sources quoted, that the present text cannot be earlier than the Tang dynasty (618–907). The sources in question include the Jinhai 金海 by Xiao Ji 蕭吉, quoted in 1.21b and 1.25a; the Yisi zhan (1.24a, 25b; 2.2b, 3b); and the Shenshu lingxia 神樞靈轄, quoted in 2.27b and 34a. The commentary also quotes a certain Wang Fusi, for instance in 1.18b, and it shows many variant readings in comparison with the 1002 Tongzhi yi by PENG XIAO (colophon dated 947). These variants suggest that the present text is older than 1002 Tongzhen yi and therefore could be from the middle of the Tang and, thus, one of the earliest editions of the Cantong qi.

The legendary alchemist Yin Changsheng is mentioned by GE HONG (BPZ 3.47) among those immortals who swallowed only half a dose of elixir so as to remain on Earth. He has a biography in the Shenxian zhuan (in Taiping guangji 8.53–55). Part of the alchemical work 880 Taiqing jingyi shendan jing is attributed to him, and that part (juan 2), if not a Han work, is certainly early. Another later and far more elaborate version is found in YJQQ 106.21b–24a, followed by an “autobiographical note” (Zixu 自敘; 24a–b). The source of the YJQQ text cannot be identified, but the text shows that Yin was popular during the Tang. None of these biographies, however, link Yin in any way to the Cantong qi or the Gu[wen] longhu jing. Many commentaries beside the present one are also attributed to Yin Changsheng 陰長生, for instance 904 Jinbi wu xianglei cantong qi, 906 Yin zhenjun jinshi wu xianglei, and 226 Zi yuanjun shoudao chuanxin fa. All of these are Tang works.

Yuan Bingling

Zhouyi cantong qi fen zhang tongzhen yi 周易參同契分章通真義

3 juan

By PENG XIAO 彭曉 (Cheng Xiao 程曉), zi Xiuchuan 秀川, hao Zhenyi 真一子; Dated 947 (see colophon to 1003)

1002 (fasc. 623)

Zhouyi cantong qi dingqi ge mingjing tu 周易參同契鼎器歌明鏡圖

12 fols.

By PENG XIAO 彭曉; colophon dated 947

1003 (fasc. 624)

“Penetrating the Real Meaning of the Concordance of the Three according to the Zhou Book of Changes, Divided into Chapters,” followed by “Song of the Tripod” and “Image of the Shining Mirror.” The Daozang lists “Penetrating the Real Meaning” and the additional texts “Song of the Tripod” and the “Image of the Shining Mirror” as two separate books, whereas in fact they form a single work. At the end of 1003 (11a–12a), a colophon signed by PENG XIAO gives the date of 947.

The Daozang version here is based on the printed edition made by Bao Zhongqi 鮑仲祺, zi Wozhi 澹之, in 1208. Bao was a local official in charge of agricultural affairs in Jianyang 建陽 county in northern Fujian, the region where the famous Masha 麻沙 editions were produced. Bao’s colophon can be found in 1003 6b–8a, but from his own words as well as from textual annotations following the different chapters (e.g., 1002 1.19b and 1003 3b) it can be ascertained that the two parts constitute a single work.

Bao based his edition of the Cantong qi on two previous editions. For the main text he used the critical edition established eleven years earlier by Zhu Xi 朱熹 (see 1001 Zhouyi cantong qi). As to PENG XIAO’s commentary, he availed himself of the edition made by Zheng Huan 鄭煥 from Lin’an 臨安 (Hangzhou). Since this edition had many errors, he also consulted numerous other versions (7a). It seems that Zhu Xi’s work on the Cantong qi was already printed when Bao made his edition, and Bao tells us that in his time many more editions were current, which must indicate that the book was popular indeed. Bao does, however, express his misgivings as to the authenticity of the Cantong qi and suggests that it must have existed before the Five Dynasties period (1003 7b). This comment makes him the earliest critic of the alleged antiquity of the Cantong qi on record.

PENG XIAO's commentary is recognized as the authoritative version of the Cantong qi. Peng came from Yongkang 永康 in Northern Sichuan and was a daoshi who also served as an official during the Hou Shu 後蜀 dynasty (934–965). According to the Shu taowu 蜀樵機, quoted in LZTT 43.7b–8a, PENG XIAO's surname was Cheng 程. He was a Taoist of the Feihe shan 飛鶴山 in the Changli 昌利 diocese. After having passed the examinations, he became prefect of Jintang 金堂, near Chengdu. At the end of his life he was promoted to the honorary post of gentleman of the Board of Sacrifices (cibu yuanwai lang 祠部員外郎). He died in 955.

According to the Zhizhai shulu jieti (see VDL 112), PENG XIAO's commentary was printed for the first time, it seems, at Magu shan 麻姑山, and the text of the Cantong qi, which he divided into ninety chapters, was followed by his own "Mingjing tu" (Image of the Shining Mirror), as well as by his biography, with the title Xiuchuan zhuan 秀川傳. This biography is no longer extant in the present edition. Here we find only a colophon (xu 序; 1003 11a–12a) dated 947, where Peng gives his definition of the name Cantong qi, explaining that can stands for za 雜, tong for the homophone tong 通, and qi for he 合. Thus the title means, Peng states, that the principles of all alchemical works are here comprehensively explained and that their meanings are all in agreement with each other. The key to the fundamental meaning of alchemy is to understand all terms as symbolical (xiang 象) and related to the cosmological process. The colophon ends with a quote of Yin Changsheng 陰長生 to the effect that one should not talk about success or failure but be fully concentrated on the practice; only then can the transformation of the elixir be hoped for. A similar sentence can be found in the preface of 999 Zhouyi cantong qi, which shows that PENG XIAO knew this work and that therefore it must be older.

PENG XIAO also wrote commentaries to the Yinfu jing and other works. Most of these commentaries are no longer extant. The YJQQ 70 has his Huandan neixiang jin yaoshi [huolong shuihu lun] 還丹內象金鑰匙[火龍水虎論], which according to Peng's preface was written after he completed his commentary on the Cantong qi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Fukui Kōjun, "A study of Chou-i Ts'an-t'ung ch'i"; Qing Xitai, Zhongguo daojiao shi, 2: 511–23.

Yuan Bingling

Zhouyi cantong qi zhu 周易參同契註

2 juan

Five Dynasties (907–960)?

1004 (fasc. 624)

"Commentary on the Concordance of the Three according to the Zhou Book of Changes." This anonymous commentary to the Cantong qi 參同契 contains only the first part of the main text, and more precisely, that part in Yin Changsheng's 陰長生 version that occupies the first juan (see 999 Zhouyi cantong qi). The author explains in his undated preface that he considers only this part to be the authentic work of WEI BOYANG and that the rest of the text of the Cantong qi is only a commentary by Chunyu Shutong 淳于叔通 (see introduction to part 2.A.1.d).

According to the study that Chen Guofu (Daozang yuanlin xukao, 377–79) made of this text, a number of place names it uses came into use only during the Tang (618–907) and the Five Dynasties (907–960). The present Daozang edition omits one stroke in the character kuang 匡, in observance to the Song (960–1279) taboo. The edition on which this version was based should therefore date from that period.

In general, the commentary is close to Yin Changsheng's, but the text has even a greater number of lacunae.

Yuan Bingling

2.A.1.e Commentaries on Lingbao Scriptures

Dongxuan lingbao wuliang duren jingjue yinyi 洞玄靈寶無量度人經訣音義
9 fols.

By ZHANG WANFU 張萬福 (fl. 713)

95 (fasc. 48).

"Formulas and Glosses on the Book of Salvation [Duren jing]." ZHANG WANFU quotes from a number of ancient Lingbao scriptures on how to recite the Duren jing, and how to meditate on certain parts. The present text (7b–9a) gives not only the pronunciation of certain terms but also their meaning.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang dongxuan lingbao dagang chao 太上洞玄靈寶大綱鈔

3 fols.

By LÜQIU FANGYUAN 閻丘方遠, hao Xuandong xiansheng 玄洞先生 (d. 902)

393 (fasc. 185)

"Outline of the Lingbao Tradition." Here LÜQIU FANGYUAN, himself a Taoist master of the Shangqing tradition ("Tianzhu guan ji" [dated 900], 782 Dadi dongtian ji 3.3b; for biographical details, see 295 Xu xian zhuan 3.4a–6a), first explains the five kalpas in relation to the Five Elements before briefly describing the transmission of Lingbao scriptures from the time of the Yellow Emperor to that of LU XIUJING. LÜQIU also mentions Emperor Xuanzong's (r. 712–756) initiatives that changed the name of Taolin 桃林 district to Lingbao district and that founded Lingbao monasteries. The Duren jing 度人經 is considered the essential scripture within the fifty-eight-juan Lingbao canon.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Dongxuan lingbao dingguan jing zhu 洞玄靈寶定觀經註

8 fols.

Tang (618–907)

400 (fasc. 189).

"Book of Intent Contemplation, of the Dongxuan Lingbao Canon, with a Commentary." This is a short doctrinal treatise on samādhi. The text is known only in conjunction with its commentary and is reproduced in extenso in YJQQ 17.6b–13a, but without the short colophon of the present version. This colophon is signed by an unknown Lingxu zi 冷虛子 and dated with the cyclical characters renshen 壬申. The present title is given in the Junzhai dushu zhi, which mentions that it was listed in the Handan shumu 邯鄲書目 of 1049 (VDL 112).

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang laojun shuo chang qingjing jing zhu 太上老君說常清靜經註

36 fols.

Attributed to DU GUANGTING 杜光庭, hao Guangcheng xiansheng 廣成先生

(850–933)

759 (fasc. 533)

"Commentary on the Scripture of Perpetual Purity and Tranquility." The attribution to DU GUANGTING cannot be maintained because of various anachronisms in this work. The most conspicuous example (27b) is the allusion to Ding Shaowei 丁少微 (fl. 978) and CHEN TUAN (871–989). Hence this commentary is not likely to date prior to the late tenth or the eleventh century. However, DU GUANGTING was familiar with the Qingjing jing and cites it in 783 Yongcheng jixian lu 1.11b.

Compared to 620 Taishang laojun shuo chang qingjing miaojing our main text shows only insignificant variants. The comprehensive commentary that groups the individual sentences according to criteria of contents and that favors the Daode jing 道德經 and [726] Xisheng jing 西昇經 in its citations also affirms the basic equality of Taoism, Buddhism, and Confucianism (15b; 16a–b).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mitamura Keiko, "Taijō rōkun setsu jō seijō kyō chū ni tsuite."

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Zhutian lingshu duming miaojing yishu 諸天靈書度命妙經義疏

15 fols.

Tang (618–907)

98 (fasc. 50)

"Commentary on the Miraculous Book of Salvation in the Numinous Writing of the Numerous Heavens." This text is a free philosophical interpretation of 23 Taishang zhutian lingshu duming miaojing, with strong Buddhist overtones. It provides no clue as to its date or provenance.

According to the author's view, the Heavenly Worthy of Primordial Beginning's renewed revelation aims at making the inhabitants of the five paradises conscious of the relative and illusory nature of happiness in life—which they deem to be everlasting (wu chang 無常, xiechang 邪常)—thus leading them toward the realization of the truly eternal (zhenchang 眞常).

Understanding that the blessed existence is merely based on the residue force (yushi 餘勢) resulting from the earlier revelation of the Lingbao scriptures is, according to this commentary, the first step to overcoming (du 度) sensory perception (shiming 事命) and karma (yeming 業命) and to breaking through to one's true nature (zhenxing 眞性) and original destination (daoming 道命).

Ursula-Angelika Cedzich

2.A.2 Divination and Numerology

This section contains four works on topomancy and astrology that can all be dated to the Tang-Song transition period (tenth century). The 282 Huangdi zhaijing, a manual on the siting of dwellings, is followed by a set of works on astral divination: the Star Scripture (287 Tongzhan daxiang li xingjing), a descriptive astronomy cum astrology; and the two closely related Observatory Scriptures, 288 Lingtai jing and 289 Chengxing lingtai biyao jing, which feature a divination practice based on the Twenty-eight Stellar Mansions and a ritual against baleful celestial influences, respectively.

Huangdi zhaijing 黃帝宅經

2 juan

Late Tang (618–907)

282 (fasc. 135)

“Yellow Emperor’s Scripture on Dwellings.” This is a topomantic work devoted to the determination of the influence of dwellings and sites in general on human destiny (1.1a). It is not mentioned in any bibliographic catalogue before the Siku quanshu zongmu tiyao (109.1a–b). In their entry on the present work, the Siku compilers provide a brief overview of this type of topomantic literature, which can be traced back as far as the Han shu, “Yiwen zhi,” 30.1774, which mentions a Gongzhai dixing 宮宅地形. In their view, the Huangdi zhaijing can be considered one of the oldest extant treatises on mantic arts.

Our text is divided into two juan, supplemented by explanatory notes. The beginning of the first juan (1.1a–2b) is a kind of unannotated introduction to the whole work; the remainder is a general exposition on topomantic techniques, dotted with quotations, mainly from the Yijue 易訣 by Xu Jun 許峻 of the Han. The second juan consists of a presentation and commentary on two diagrams representative of yang and yin dwellings (see fig. 22). All the quotations in this part derive from a “Book” (on dwellings?), presumably an earlier work that is also quoted in juan 1 in both the notes (1.3b) and the text (1.8a).

Juan 1 provides a list of twenty-nine topomantic works, ten of which have indications of authorship. The most recent authors mentioned are Li Chunfeng 李淳風 (602–670) and SIMA CHENGZHEN (655–735, called Sima tianshi 司馬天師). The earliest possible date for the compilation of this text is thus the late eighth century, or somewhat later, since the author, who addresses the “topomancers of recent times” (jintai xuezhe 近來學者; 1.2a), considers the above-mentioned texts as representing the “old system” (guzhi 古制; 1.1b).

The text dates probably from the late Tang (618–907) or Five Dynasties period (907–960), since a copy of juan 1 is attested in the Dunhuang manuscripts (Pelliot Chinois 3865). It is also totally unrelated to the southern tradition that took an important part in shaping modern geomancy as we know it today and that became widespread from the Northern Song (960–1127) onward. None of the twenty-nine mentioned works are references for the modern tradition. Moreover, our text does not mention the compass (luopan 羅盤) and the three differently shifted arrangements of the twenty-four positions; it also postulates an absolute priority of calendrical calculation over real-site observation and analysis. In the present system, the auspiciousness or balefulness of the topomantic position (zhai zhi xingnian 宅之行年) depends on the relationship of the seasonal cycle and sexagesimal binomials with the indices pertaining to the twenty-four positions.

FIGURE 22. The spatial orientation and siting of yang dwellings (282 2.1a–b).

The Huangdi zhaijing is included at the beginning of the first of the thirty juan devoted to topomancy in the Gujin tushu jicheng (juan 651).

Marc Kalinowski

Tongzhan daxiang li xingjing 通占大象曆星經

2 juan

Tang (618–907)

287 (fasc. 136)

“Scripture on the Stars, with the Descriptive Almanac of their Basic Divinatory Symbols.” Better known among specialists as the Star Scripture (Xingjing 星經), this work appears as a descriptive and illustrated catalogue of the stars or constellations belonging to Chinese uranography (see fig. 23). The entries are mostly in an oracular style, lending the work the aspect of a handbook of judiciary astrology, and warranting the full title in the present Daozang edition.

FIGURE 23. The constellations of the Four Auxiliaries (sifu 四輔), the Six Periods (liujia 六甲), and the Gouchen 鉤陳 pole (287 1.1a–b).

The Star Scripture is mentioned for the first time in the Tongzhi, “Yiwen lüe,” 44.12b, in three juan. The larger number of juan is no reliable indication of the state of the work at the time, since the edition described in Siku quanshu zongmu (110.25b–26a), today in the Tianyi ge 天一閣 collection, comprises six juan, despite the fact that it is a simple reedition of the Daozang text. All extant editions, whatever their title or attribution, are actually copies corresponding to the Ming Taoist canon, which is therefore the oldest prototype. The Sibu zonglu tianwen bian (“bubian” 49b) mentions a Yuan printed edition without describing or identifying it.

The present text suffers from many lacunae. The first sheet is missing, and only 162 of the 283 known constellations are included. The entries’ order is congruent with the natural succession of the Twenty-eight Stellar Mansions (xin 宿), distributed seven to each direction. Entries 1 to 100 deal with the seven eastern xin and neighboring constellations; 101 to 162 with the northern xin and neighboring constellations. Entry number 101 is preceded by an introduction on the northern xin, which confirms that such was indeed the original order of the work and that lacunae are mostly due to the loss of the second part, dealing with constellations of the western and southern quarters.

When compared with the star catalogues preserved in Tang literature (see Needham, “Astronomy,” 197–98), especially with the Kaiyuan zhanjing 開元占經 of the early eighth century (juan 60–63 and 65–70), the present work shows obvious similarities both in style and content. The oracular formulas are often identical with the exception that where the Kaiyuan zhanjing presents itself as a compilation of supplementary materials, the Tongzhan daxiang li xingjing almost always adduces its own authority. It can be safely assumed that the present work was written during the Tang (618–907). This dating is further confirmed by some elements of internal criticism, for which see the entry in Siku quanshu zongmu. In his Han shu yiwen zhi shibu 2:1502, Yao Zhenzong 姚振宗 argues that its integration into the Daozang should date from the Tang or, at the latest, from the Song (960–1279).

Marc Kalinowski

Lingtai jing 靈臺經

21 fols.

Tang (618–907)

288 (fasc. 136)

The “Scripture of the Transcendant Terrace.” The term lingtai (transcendant terrace) in the title of this work denotes, in the Chinese scientific tradition, any kind of observatory tower for astronomical, meteorological, or other purposes. This text is a fragment of an astronomical treatise of unknown origin. The Tongzhi, “Yiwen lüe,” 44.14a lists a Lingtai jing in three juan.

The present version includes only four headings, numbered 9 to 12. A commentary explains that headings 1 to 8 are lost. Heading number 10 (3a–14b), the most important, is devoted to the description of a divination practice using a set of twenty-eight palaces, certainly linked to the Twenty-eight Stellar Mansions (xin 宿). The text can be dated with some certainty to the beginning of the tenth century, on the basis of its similarities with another treatise that immediately follows it in the Daozang: 289 Chengxing lingtai biyao jing.

The mantic world evoked by the procedures preserved in this text betrays a strong influence of astrocalendric calculations of Indian origin that were widespread in China during the second half of the Tang (618–907), including the system of the nine luminaries (jiuyao 九曜) and the Greek zodiac. Titles quoted in the text belong to the Greco-Indian astrological corpus, like the Duli [yusi] jing 都例經 (4b), introduced into China between 785 and 805 (see also the entry on 289 Biyao jing), and the Simen jing 四門經 (1b; see Zhizhai shulu jieti 12.373), which also dates from the Tang (see Xin Tang shu, “Yiwen zhi,” 3.1548).

One peculiarity worth mentioning is the advanced Sinification of the system of the nine luminaries, among which the typically Chinese Tianyi 天一 and Taiyi 太一 are used in place of jidu 計都 (ketu) and luohou 羅侯 (rāhu).

Marc Kalinowski

Chengxing lingtai biyao jing 秤星靈臺祕要經

7 fols.

Tang (618–907)

289 (fasc. 136)

“Scripture on the Essential Secrets of the Transcendant Terrace for Appraising the [Influence of] Celestial Bodies.” The title paraphrases heading 11 in the preceding work, 288 Lingtai jing, “Appraising the Influence of the Celestial Bodies” (chengxing lifen 力分; 14b).

The text is as fragmentary as the preceding one (see 6a for a reference to missing passages), with which it shares a common lexical and theoretical background. Frequent quotations from a Jiuzhi jing 九執經 (2a, 3b, 4a) confirm the obvious filiation with Indian astrocalenderic traditions; the Jiuzhi li 曆 (Calendar of the Nine Planets) was introduced to China in 718.

A short introduction by the author was fortuitously preserved in the shape of a commentary to a quotation from the Renlun jing 人倫經 (1a-b). It explains how the transmission of the astrological ritual described here, going back to Guo Pu 郭璞 (276-324), passed through Yixing 一行 (eighth century) and his contemporary Li Quan 李筌, who noted it down in their Bisi jing 筆斯經. The author claims to have deleted this part of the text while editing it around 894-897, lest sorcerers (shiwu 師巫) put it to illicit use. He ends by saying that over the years he changed his mind and was now ready to publish a separate edition of this very part. It can thus be assumed that the received version was written in the first decades of the tenth century.

The treatise is clearly divided into two parts: the first part (1a-4b) describes a protection ritual against baleful celestial influences and forms a kind of appendix to the divinatory procedure outlined in 288 Lingtai jing. It may be noted that the ritual includes the chanting of Taoist scriptures such as the Duren jing 度人經 and the Xiaozai jing 消災經 (3a).

The second part (5a-7a) has two paragraphs (the first paragraph being followed by a commentary) and deals again with the mantic world of the nine luminaries. The title of the second paragraph, “Dongwei dashu 洞微大數,” anticipates a divinatory method that seems to have taken form under the Song (960-1279); the earliest known source of this method is a work in the Daozang: 1485 Ziwei doushu (q.v.; this work stipulates the equivalence of ziwei 紫微 and dongwei 洞微). More generally, the procedures in both the present text and 288 Lingtai jing present many similarities with those in 1485 Ziwei doushu that may represent reformulations by later Song innovators.

Marc Kalinowski

2.A.3 Medicine and Pharmacology

If a distinction can be made in the history of Chinese medicine between an earlier period of “Taoist medicine” and a later period of “Confucian medicine,” then the Tang (618-907) witnessed the final flourishing of the former. Both SUN SIMO, at the beginning of the dynasty, and WANG BING, at its later stage, made immense contributions toward the preservation and the upgrading of Chinese medical science. Sun’s work is related mainly to herbal drugs and symbolical therapy, whereas both Wang’s work on the Huangdi neijing suwen 黃帝內經素問 (see part 1.A.3) and his later studies, such as the 1023 Suwen liuqi xuanzhu miyu listed here, concern mainly acupuncture and questions of theory. From Sun’s work and other minor texts assembled here one can see how closely Tang medicine was related to Tending Life practices. The reader is therefore invited to consult also part 2.A.4.

Sun zhenren beiji qianjin yaofang mulu 孫真人備急千金要方目錄

2 juan

1162 (fasc. 799)

Sun zhenren beiji qianjin yaofang 孫真人備急千金要方

93 juan

By SUN SIMO 孫思邈 (581?-682); revised by Lin Yi 林億 and others; eleventh century

1163 (fasc. 800-820)

“Essential Priceless Prescriptions for All Urgent Ills, by Zhenren Sun.” This is an important medical handbook in 232 sections that contain 5,200 articles concerning the main aspects of practical medicine. The title of the work is not new. The Sui shu, “Jingji zhi,” 34.1045 quotes a Qianjin fang 千金方 in three juan by Fan Shiying 范世英.

According to Nathan Sivin, this great work of SUN SIMO was written between 650 and 659. There are three main editions of the book: one dating from the Northern Song period, which is very incomplete; another from the Song, and the present Daozang edition (see Okanishi Tameto, Song yiqian yiji kao 2:584 ff.; Ma Jixing, Zhongyi wenxian xue).

The first two juan are edited separately under the title “Table of Contents of the Sun zhenren beiji qianjin yaofang.” In addition to the table of contents, this part contains two prefaces and an introduction.

The first preface is signed by Gao Baoheng 高保衡, Sun Qi 孫奇, Qian Xiangxian 錢象先, and Lin Yi, members of the bureau charged with the revision of medical texts, founded on imperial order in 1056. For their work of revision and editing, they requested that the secretary of the imperial cabinet collect public and private manuscripts of the Qianjin fang, as well as the books of the Taoist canon. Having first presented the sources used by SUN SIMO for his handbook, the prefacers briefly describe the sequence of the sections of the work.

The second preface is by SUN SIMO himself, who explains the reasons for writing this work and the meaning of the title. The introduction that follows is composed of two parts: (1) ten articles for guidance written by Sun himself and originally placed at different places in his work, but assembled here by the editors; and (2) a number of corrections made by Lin Yi and his collaborators. Their work consists mainly in the unification of names, remedies, and medical terminology; a modernization of the measures given in the recipes; a reordering of chapters and recipes; and the correction of faulty characters.

The main part of the work deals with drug therapy (juan 2 to 78), beginning with prescriptions for diseases of mother and child. At the end of each prescription, variants for dosage or ingredients are indicated in small characters. These indications have been borrowed from later sources and are certainly due to Lin Yi and his collaborators. In addition to the prescriptions of classical Chinese medicine, the work contains a number of Taoist remedies, such as the use of incantations or talismans. There are also a few references to the alchemical work of SUN SIMO. Between 618 and 626, a dragon is said to have presented Sun with a book called Canon for the Absorption of Water (Fushui jing 服水經), which the author abstracts here. The book describes a form of exorcism that uses a Sanskrit dhārāṇī.

Juan 79 and 80 are devoted to dietary rules. Juan 81 to 83 are on the arts of Tending Life. These chapters use large parts of the lost Yangsheng yaoji 養生要集, which is also used in 1427 Taiqing daolin shesheng lun.

At the end of the work, there is a part devoted to pulse taking and acupuncture. The system expounded here is that of the Jiayi jing 甲乙經, revised by Zhen Quan 甄權 of the Tang in his Mingtang renxing tu 明堂人形圖.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ma Jixing, Zhongyi wenxian xue, 161—65; Sakade Yoshinobu, “Son Shibo”; Sivin, Chinese alchemy.

Catherine Despeux

Suwen liugui xuanzhu miyu 素問六氣玄珠密語

17 juan

By WANG BING 王冰, hao Qixuan zi 啓玄子; 762

1023 (fasc. 665–667)

“Secret Instructions on the Mysterious Pearl of the Six Qi in the Basic Questions.” The work is mentioned in Yu Mao’s Suichu tang shummu under the title Miyu 密語 (see VDL 134). WANG BING, the editor and commentator of the Huangdi neijing suwen, announced in his preface to 1018 Huangdi neijing suwen buzhu shiwen that he wrote a Xuanzhu miyu 玄珠密語, which he clearly identifies as a work on prognostication (1018 Buzhu shiwen, xu 1b). This text seems to have been originally part of WANG BING’s commentary but appears here as a separate work. As indicated in the title, it is a detailed treatise on energy cycles (qiyun 氣運) in the universe and in the human body.

Kristofer Schipper and Yuan Bingling

Taishang zhouhou yujing fang 太上肘後玉經方

5 fols.

By Lu Zunyuan 盧遵元, hao Xiaqi zi 霞栖子; ninth century

847 (fasc. 573)

“Vade Mecum of Recipes from the Jade Book of the Most High.” This small collection consists of eight prescriptions, each linked to one of the Eight Recipes and attributed to a famous immortal. The text is mentioned in Song catalogues (see VDL 86) and reproduced in YJQQ 74.13a–19a. There the name of the author is given as Lu Daoyuan 盧道元.

The author is not known from other sources. In the preface, he traces the transmission of the recipes to the god Donghai qing tong jun 東海青童君, who dictated them to a certain Chaoju zi 巢居子. The latter recorded them and gave them to Hanqi zi 寒棲子 during the Chang’an era (701–704). Hanqi zi passed them on to the author in 792, who transmitted them in turn to a Mr. Shi 施, alias Yinqi zi 隱棲子, “in the yiwei 乙未 year of the Baoli era (825–827).” In fact, this era does not comprise a yiwei, but only a dingwei 丁未 year. It is probable that there has been a graphic confusion between yi 乙 and ding 丁.

Each prescription carries a colophon relating its origin. For instance, the fifth recipe is said to have been found in a cavern on Mount Heming 鶴鳴 in Sichuan, whereas the sixth was culled from a Xianmen zi jing 羨門子經. The latter title is mentioned in the catalogue Sanguo yiwenzhi 三國藝文志 4.84a.

The YJQQ version is more explicit than the present text with respect to the origins of the recipes. Moreover, the YJQQ reproduces the Eight Trigrams at the head of each of these recipes. For the sixth recipe, the YJQQ version gives a variant.

Catherine Despeux

Shenxian fushi lingcao changpu wan fangzhuan 神仙服食靈草菖蒲丸方傳

5 fols.

Tang (618–907)

844 (fasc. 573)

“Recipes and Stories Concerning Calamus and Ganoderma Pills.” This is a small treatise on the different ways of gathering and preparing herbal medicine from these two species, how to ingest them, their efficacy, and historical examples of people who benefitted from them. The introduction gives the date Dali 14, which corresponds to 779.

Kristofer Schipper

FIGURE 24. Imaginary herbs for medical meditation—the Immortal Beauty and the Yellow Shoot (932 17a–b). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/925)

Boyun xianren lingcao ge 白雲仙人靈草歌

20 fols.

Tang (618–907) or Five Dynasties (907–960)

932 (fasc. 597)

“Song of the Divine Herbs, by the White Cloud Immortal.” This is an illustrated catalogue of fifty-five medicinal plants, with annotations in rhymed verse (see fig. 24). One entry lacks an illustration.

Boyun xianren (White Cloud Immortal) is an appellation for SIMA CHENGZHEN (667–735). The present work, however, is quoted only in the Chongwen zongmu (see VDL 100), and without attribution. The book must therefore have been written between the eighth and tenth centuries.

The herbs have a wide range of properties. Some are used in operative alchemy, in mollifying or fixing minerals. Others have therapeutic virtues or help to prolong life. The preface to the catalogue is stated to be lost.

Catherine Despeux

Zhong zhicao fa 種芝草法

4 fols.

Tang (618–907)

933 (fasc. 597)

“Method of Planting Cryptogams.” This is an undated text; it quotes as its source the instructions given by Laozi in another text, also undated: 1206 Shangqing mingjian yaojing, paragraph 7, which carries the subtitle “Laozi’s Jade Casket Containing the Scripture on Growing Cryptogams: A Secret of the Divine Immortals” (Laozi yuxia zhong zhongzhi jing shenxian bishi, diqi 老子玉匣中種芝經神仙祕事第七).

These two texts are similar in content, but many textual divergences between them suggest that our text may well be an inexact copy of 1206 Mingjian yaojing and 1245 Dongxuan lingbao daoshi mingjing fa, a text that repeats 1206 Mingjian yaojing in many instances. To take two examples among many, 2b of our text compared to 1206 Mingjian yaojing 10b shows discrepancies in the wuxing 五行 table of correspondences; and 3a and 4a compared with 1206 Mingjian yaojing 10a–13a reveal evidence of faulty copying.

The text stipulates that immortality may be obtained only by the absorption of the four cryptogams of the cardinal points, cultivated according to the instructions given. These instructions provide for every detail of the growth, harvesting, and preparation of the cryptogams for medical purposes. These plants, of themselves, command all the tellurian, vegetable, mineral, and cosmological essences used in other methods in the quest for immortality. Most of the plants, minerals, ceremonies of harvesting, and laws governing each cryptogam in rhythm with the universe that are mentioned in our text are also found in the BPZ, particularly in juan 11, “Xianyao 仙藥.”

Pauline Bentley Koffler

Shangqing mingjian yaojing 上清明鑑要經

12 fols.

Tang (618–907)

1206 (fasc. 876)

“The Scripture of the Essentials of the Clear Mirror.” This text contains instructions for the preparation and use of seven methods for attaining immortality, presented in seven short paragraphs: (1) meditation by means of mirrors; (2) the polishing of such mirrors; (3) alchemical prescriptions; (4) celestial flower-wine; (5) selected healing plants for making pillows, and identification of the nine-knotted magistral staff; (6) prescriptions for such pillows, and their accompanying fu; (7) cultivation of cryptogams governed by the cardinal points.

It is possible that in deference to the Song taboo of the name of Gaozong (jing 鏡) the term jian 鑑 was substituted in the title for the more usual mingjing 明鏡. The book was probably written before the Song (960–1279). Paragraphs 1, 2, 4, and 5 (that is, the entire first half of the text, with the exception of page 4b) exist also in YJQQ 48.8a–13b, as well as in the Tang work 1126 Dongxuan lingbao daoxue keyi 2.6b–10a. Moreover, the first two paragraphs of the present work make up the entire text of 1245 Dongxuan lingbao daoshi mingjing fa. As to paragraph 7 of our text, it is the source of 933 Zhong zhicao fa. On close scrutiny, the textual variants that exist between all these versions convey the impression that the present one is the least distorted.

In spite of its title, this book does not appear to have any direct relationship with the Shangqing scriptural tradition. The ingredients of the prescriptions echo the classical sources on those matters (Shennong bencao, BPZ).

Pauline Bentley Koffler

2.A.4 Yangsheng

This section, devoted to Tending Life techniques (yangsheng 養生), is divided into two sections: “miscellaneous practices,” many of which involve breathing exercises in combination with a variety of other methods; and practices that are specifically centered on “respiratory techniques.” The first category comprises dietary techniques (especially abstention from cereals), personal hygiene, gymnastics, massage, divination and calendrical observances, meditation, elixir and physiological alchemy, and magic. The section opens with a short, general treatise on the Primordial Qi or the fundamental life force (yuanyi 元氣). Next comes perhaps the best-known representative of yangsheng literature: 838 Tangxing yanming lu, attributed by tradition alternatively to the scholar of medicine and alchemy TAO HONGJING and to the Tang physician SUN SIMO. This text is followed by another work ascribed to Sun: 837 Zhenzhong ji. Several of the compilations in this section are presented in the form of commentaries on earlier works, such as 402 Huangting neijing yujing zhu, 403 Huangting neijing yujing jingjie, and 432 Huangting neijing wuzang liufu buxie tu on the Book of the Yellow Court (see also 1400–1402), and 763 Laozi shuo wuchu jingzhu on the Five Feasts Scripture. The work 673 Taishang laojun hunyuan sanbu fu, a rare collection of popular talismanic methods, is followed by several works on life-tending magical arts involving invocations, dunjia 遁甲 (hidden period) magic, and mirrors. The discourse in this section ranges from homely advice on everyday lifestyle and the maintenance of good health to abstract philosophical speculation. The respiratory techniques that form the main subject of part 2.A.4.b, and that feature frequently in the other works in this chapter as well, are for the most part based on the theory and practice of Embryonic Breathing” (taixi 胎息) described in Henri Maspero’s “Methods of ‘Nourishing the Vital Principle.’”

2.A.4.a Miscellaneous Practices

Yuanyi lun 元氣論

28 fols.

Tang (618–907)

1032 Yunji qiqian 56 (fasc. 677–702)

“Treatise on the Primordial Qi.” This text is cited as lost in 1430 Daozang quejing mulu 2.6a and must therefore have existed as an independent work. It has, however, been preserved in the YJQQ, where it is placed at the beginning of the chapters concerning bodily exercises, as a kind of introduction. The text observes the Tang taboo of the character zhi 治, replacing it with li 理. There are citations of 31 Huangdi yinfu jing (18b and 24a) and of the “Sanfeng ge 三峰歌” of Luo Gongyuan 羅公遠, which shows that the work dates from the Tang dynasty and was probably composed during the late eighth or early ninth centuries.

The present work is a theoretical treatise on yuanyi 元氣 (Primordial Qi, fundamental life energy), in its relationship to the origin of the universe and the configuration of the human being. The preface (1a–3a) retraces the mythical birth of the universe from the cosmic egg and the ensuing formation of the world and of human life. The later part of the text explains the cosmological system and the corresponding methods of Inner Alchemy (neidan 內丹) and other Tending Life techniques.

Alessandra Lavagnino

Tangxing yanming lu 養性延命錄

2 juan

Attributed to TAO HONGJING 陶弘景 (456–536)

838 (fasc. 572)

“Records Concerning Tending Life and the Lengthening of Life.” This is a collection of instructions for healthy living; food; fasting and prayer; breathing exercises for healing; massage; gymnastics; and sexual therapy.

The present work is mentioned in Song catalogues such as the Bishu sheng xubian-dao siku qieshu mu with attribution to TAO HONGJING (see VDL 159). The preface of the present edition notes, “Some say that this book was compiled by Sun Simo.” This attribution may be due to the fact that the Tongzhi, “Yiwen lue,” lists a work with a similar title, also in two juan, which it ascribes to Sun, whereas the Bishu sheng catalogue lists a Yangsheng zalu 養生雜錄 in one juan by the same author (VDL 159).

The present text is given, in an abridged form, in YJQQ 32. There the unsigned preface does not contain the note on the alternative attribution of the text to SUN SIMO, nor does it mention the division of the book into two juan of three paragraphs each, which may imply that those two details were added later. The wording of the preface suggests the authorship of TAO HONGJING, as does the style, but this similarly does not exclude the possibility of a deliberate imitation.

The author states in the preface that he studied all texts on the art of Tending Life, from the mythical emperors up through the Wei and Jin dynasties, and that he relied on the Yangsheng yaoji 養生要集 by Zhang Zhan 張湛 (fl. 370), Zhi Dun 支遁 (alias Daolin 道林), Zhaiping 翟平, and Huangshan 黃山. In fact, one third of the section on gymnastics and massage here consists of extracts from the Yangsheng yaoji (see Despeux, "Gymnastics").

The book is composed of numerous quotations, many containing the words of Pengzu 彭祖. These words may have come from a Pengzu yangxing jing 彭祖養性經 in one juan, mentioned in the Sui shu, "Jingji zhi," 34.1043. Parts of this latter text can also be found in 1163 Sun zhenren beiji qianjin yaofang by SUN SIMO, in the section 81.9b–17b of that work which bears the title "Tending Life according to Daolin," and is therefore probably based on the above-mentioned work by Zhang Zhan. Other parts of our text can also be found in 837 Zhenzhong ji, also by SUN SIMO (compare, e.g., the passages in 1.5b and 1.10b of our text with 837 Zhenzhong ji 2b and 3a–b, respectively). Moreover, the third paragraph of juan 1 of our text corresponds to 1427 Taiqing Daolin shesheng lun 9. The latter work corresponds in turn to juan 81 of 1163 Qianjin yaofang. The description of the Six Qi given in our text (2.3a) is identical to the one found in 836 Shenxian shiqi jingui miaolu 5b. The passage on the Play of the Five Animals (wuqin xi 五禽戲; 2.7a–b) corresponds to a passage in 821 Taishang laojun yangsheng jue 1.1a–2a.

This work appears to be a reconstitution dating from the late Tang dynasty (618–907) and drawing on materials on yangsheng techniques found mainly in the works of SUN SIMO.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mugitani Kunio, Tōsei enmei roku kunchū; Zhu Yueli, "Yangxing yanming lu kao."

Catherine Despeux

Zhenzhong ji 枕中記

27 fols.

Tang (618–907)

837 (fasc. 572)

"Notes to Be Kept inside the Pillow." This is a collection of various methods for Tending Life. The Chongwen zongmu (VDL 115) attributes it to SUN SIMO (d. 682). YJQQ 33.1a–12a has a Shenyang zhenzhong fang by SUN SIMO of Taibo shan, with a preface, that corresponds to the beginning of the present text (approximately 1a–10a).

The other parts of the text are quoted in Jingshi zhonglai daguan benzao 6 and 12 (dated 1108), indicating that in the early Song it had already its present form. However, an editorial mistake caused a fragment of 850 Xiuzhen bilu to take the place of a part of the original text (10a–13a), which continues from 13b onwards. The author mentions a journey to Sichuan in 649 (21a), which is confirmed by Sun's biography in LZTT 29.12b.

The present book is a patchwork of quotations and methods taken from Six Dynasties compilations and divided into two main parts: (1) recipes for Tending Life (1b–10a), offering general thoughts, prohibitions, gymnastics, and breathing exercises, with a brief overview of Embryonic Breathing (which is criticized in 820 Taiqing tiaopi jing); (2) methods concerning the harvest, fabrication, and ingestion of the most common mineral or vegetable concretions, so as to keep the intestines free after having "chased the Three Worms" (13b–27b). Details are provided on the rites to perform when ingesting the drugs.

Jean Lévi

Huangting neijing yujing zhu 黃庭內景玉經註

3 juan

By Bo Lüzhong 白履忠, hao Liangqiu zi 梁丘子 (fl. 722–729)

402 (fasc. 190)

"Commentary on the Precious Book of the Inner Landscape of the Yellow Court."

This is a commentary on 331 Taishang huangting neijing yujing, by the court Taoist Bo Lüzhong. Bo's biography in Tang shu 192.5124 mentions the present work. The original preface has been preserved in YJQQ 11.1a–b, where it is followed by the preface to the Wucheng zi 務成子 commentary (1b–9b). In our present edition, this sequence is reversed: the Wucheng zi preface occupies 1a–3a; Bo's original preface is on 3a–b; and they are merged into a single text called "Formula (for Reciting) the Huangting neijing yujing." Both prefaces are again reproduced in the version of the present work included in 263 Xiuzhen shishu 55–57, but there they are presented as being entirely the present author's work. Bo's commentary is complete, giving due attention to each detail, whether of a practical or of a mystical nature, and drawing on a large number of primary and secondary sources in support of the interpretations. Its inclusion in a great number of Song libraries (VDL 88) demonstrates its popularity.

Kristofer Schipper

Huangting waijing yujing zhu 黃庭外景玉經註

2 juan

By Bo Lüzhong 白履忠, hao Liangqiu zi 梁丘子 (fl. 722–729)

263 Xiuzhen shishu 58–60 (fasc. 131)

“Commentary on the Precious Book of the Outer Landscape of the Yellow Court.” This is Bo Lüzhong’s commentary to 332 Taishang huangting waijing yujing, preserved only in the Xiuzhen shishu collection. The work reads like a sequel to Bo’s 402 Huangting neijing yujing zhu, as it bases most of its interpretations on the system of the latter. This dependence is especially apparent in the fact that the present text places all major dwellings of the gods in the head (for instance, the “marvelous root” [linggen 靈根] is identified with the tongue on 58.2b) instead of in the lower belly and the sexual organs, which seems to be what the original meaning of the Waijing yujing indicates. Among the deities of the body, Laozi is especially prominent, and the whole commentary can be read as a guide to visualizing an Inner Old Master.

Kristofer Schipper

Huangting neiwai yujing jingjie 黃庭內外玉景經解

11 fols.

By Jiang Shenxiu 蔣慎修 (Tang [618–907])

403 (fasc. 190)

“Commentary on the Precious Book of the Inner and Outer Landscapes of the Yellow Court.” This is a commentary on the two versions of the Huangting jing. The present text is only a fragment of the original work by Jiang in ten juan (see Tongzhi, “Yiwen lüe,” 5.5b; VDL 147). Jiang is unknown elsewhere, but, judging from his title, he may have been a daoshi at a Tang (618–907) court. This is a detailed philosophical commentary drawing on classical Taoist sources.

Kristofer Schipper

Huangting neijing wuzang liufu buxie tu 黃庭內景五臟六腑補瀉圖

2 + 22 fols.

By Hu Yin 胡愔; preface dated 848

432 (fasc. 196)

“Chart on the Procedures for Filling and Emptying the Six Receptacles and Five Viscera according to the the Inner Landscape of the Yellow Court.” This is a short, illustrated treatise on the Five Viscera and their corresponding qi-breaths (fig. 25).

The work is mentioned in a Song catalogue (VDL 147). It is also reproduced, without illustrations, in 263 Xiuzhen shishu 54. That version is titled Huangting neijing wuzang liufu tu and it is preceded by the same preface, except for the omitted date. The main texts of the two versions show major divergences: The passage 4a–b in 263

肝臟圖

FIGURE 25. The Green Dragon of the liver (432 10a). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/429)

Xiuzhen shishu is absent from the present text; conversely, the section 2b–3a here is missing in 263 Xiuzhen shishu. The discussion concerning the heart is entirely different in the two versions. The present work is also related to 1402 Shangqing huangting wuzang liufu zhenren yuzhou jing, which, in its edition in YJQQ 14, features the same illustrations (compare, for example, 7b–8b here with YJQQ 14.6b–7b, and 263 Xiuzhen shishu 54.4a–5b with 1402 Yuzhou jing 2b–3b). These different versions all constitute fragmentary and no doubt partially corrupted elaborations of the same basic material (see also 819 Taishang yangsheng taixi qijing).

In his preface the author explains that he had selected and ordered a set of Taoist texts for the initiation of novices. The categories indicated in the preface correspond exactly to those found in the text: illustrations, glosses, pathology and medication, therapeutic breath-swallowing, seasonal taboos, and gymnastics.

Jean Lévi

Shangqing huangting yangshen jing 上清黃庭養神經

10 fols.

Tang (618–907)

1400 (fasc. 1049)

“Book on the Nourishment of the Spirits of the Yellow Court, a Supreme Purity Scripture.” The present text is listed in the Tongzhi, “Yiwen lüe” (see VDL 148). Moreover, YJQQ 14 contains a Huangting dunjia yuanshen jing the first three pages of which are the same as this text. The first part sets out a system combining meditation on the spirits of the body, as prescribed by the Book of the Yellow Court (see 331 Huangting neijing yujing and 332 Taishang huangting waijing yujing), with the worship of the gods of the sexagesimal cycle and the so-called dunjia 遁甲 or “hidden period” magic. As such, the title of the YJQQ version seems more appropriate. However, after the first three pages, which both texts have in common, the YJQQ version, beginning at the end of page 3b, contains a treatise on the Five Viscera and the different ways to nourish them that is similar to 1402 Shangqing huangting wuzang liufu zhenren yuzhou jing (q.v.), whereas our text is from the beginning to the end devoted to the cult of the gods of the sexagesimal cycle. All these texts must have a common background. In spite of the Shangqing epithet, there is no clear relationship with the scriptural canon of the same name.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang huangting zhongjing jing 太上黃庭中景經

13 fols.

Commentary by Li Qiansheng 李千乘; late Tang (618–907)?

1401 (fasc. 1050)

“The Book of the Central Landscape of the Yellow Court of the Most High.” This is a sequel to the two other versions, the “Inner” and the “Outer,” of the Book of the Yellow Court, 331 Taishang huangting neijing yujing and 332 Taishang huangting waijing yujing. It carries a second title: Huang-Lao huangting jing 黃老黃庭經. But this mention of “Huang-Lao” (the Yellow Emperor and Laozi) was probably intended to give the book an antique aura. Its description of the inner world is also more straightforward and picturesque than that of other versions. The work is listed in the bibliographical chapters of the Song shi and in the Tongzhi; these chapters also mention the commentator (see VDL 147).

Li Qiansheng is unknown. His name is preceded, at the beginning of the text, by his ordination title of Shangqing yuanming zhenren 上清元命真人, which was current during the Tang. His extensive glosses draw on a variety of well-known sources, all classical but not exclusively from the Shangqing canon. The Yijing 易經 is quoted on page 5b and again on 9b. The Dadong jing 大洞經 is also often referred to, which suggests a late Tang date.

Kristofer Schipper

Shangqing huangting wuzang liufu zhenren yuzhou jing

上清黃庭五藏六府真人玉軸經

12 fols.

Tang (618–907)

1402 (fasc. 1050)

“Precious Scroll of the Zhenren on the Six Receptacles and Five Viscera of the Yellow Court of Shangqing.” This work is a short treatise on the visualization of the Five Viscera, with illustrations (see fig. 26). A related text, though with different illustrations, is found in YJQQ 14.3b–14a. The latter’s illustrations are identical to those in 432 Huangting neijing wuzang liufu buxie tu, the contents of which again recall the present work. The beginning of the YJQQ version is truncated and the text has been conflated with a Huangting dunjia yuansheng jing that does not correspond to the Daozang work of the same title, 873 Huangting dunjia yuansheng jing. In fact, this version (YJQQ 14) seems to be a different elaboration of 432 Buxie tu. The version in 263 Xiuzhen shishu 54 incorporates extensive passages of the present work (54.10b of the Xiuzhen shishu corresponds to 5b of our text) that do not feature in the extant edition of 432 Buxie tu. Moreover, both 263 Xiuzhen shishu and the present text contain numerous identical passages.

An abridged version of the present work is also found in 819 Taishang yangsheng taixi qijing 5b–7b.

Jean Lévi

Laozi shuo wuchu jing zhu 老子說五厨經註

2 + 5 fols.

By Yin Yin 尹愔; presented in 736

763 (fasc. 533)

“Commentary on the Five Feasts Scripture Pronounced by Laozi.” Yin Yin (d. 741), a prominent Taoist and Confucian scholar under Emperor Xuanzong (r. 712–756), served variously as imperial remonstrator (jianyi dafu 諫議大夫), abbot of the Suming guan 肅明觀 temple in Chang’an, and Jixian yuan 集賢院 academician (see Xin Tang shu 200.5703; Cefu yuangui 53.16b–17a; Makita Tairyō, Gikyō kenkyū, 364). The presentation date at the end of the author’s preface is preserved only in the edition of this commentary in YJQQ 61.5b–10b, where it is titled Wuchu jing qifa 氣法.

FIGURE 26. The Red Bird, spirit of the heart (1402 3b). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/1383)

The short Five Feasts Scripture itself is entirely preserved within this commentary. It does not appear independently in the Daozang (for another edition of the scripture, see Zangwai daoshu 6:58; in that version, Yin Yin’s introductory paragraph appears at the end). The scripture comprises five stanzas consisting of four five-character lines each. The YJQQ edition shows that the five stanzas were associated with the Five Directions of space: east (lines 1–4), south (lines 5–8), north (lines 9–12), west (lines 13–16), and center (lines 17–20). Taoist “kitchen banquets” (chu 廚) were originally communal feasts that constituted an important part of the liturgical system of the Heavenly Master movement (see Stein, “Spéculations mystiques et thèmes relatifs aux ‘cuisines’”). In the present work, the five kitchens are assimilated with the Five Viscera (wuzang 五臟), and the concept of the ritual banquet is recast in terms of physiological alchemy. In his introductory paragraph (1a), Yin Yin relates the harmonization of vital energy (qi) to the satisfaction of the Five Viscera, which in turn balances the Five Spirits (wushen 五神). As a result of realizing these conditions, desire is eliminated. "In this scripture," says Yin, "obtaining provisions for the Five Viscera is likened to seeking food in the kitchen. Hence the reference to Five Kitchens." Commenting on Yin Yin's interpretation, DU GUANGTING claims more explicitly that practicing this scripture will enable the adept to stop eating (590 Daojiao lingyan ji 12.2b).

DU GUANGTING also states (590 Daojiao lingyan ji 12.2b) that the Wuchu jing formed part of the Taiqing bu 太清部 section, that is, the third of the Four Supplements (sifu 四輔), containing alchemical works, in the Tang Taoist canon. A second commentary, according to Du, had been written by Yin Yin's contemporary Zhao Xianfu 趙仙甫 (fl. 732; see Yuhai 53.11b). The same scripture, titled Sanchu jing 三厨經, was also contained in the Buddhist canon of the Tang period (see Kaiyuan shijiao lu 18.672a). The Buddhist version is, moreover, represented by a set of Dunhuang manuscripts (studied in Makita Tairyō, Gikyō kenkyū, 351–61) and is still found in the Taishō canon (T 85, no. 2894). Its five stanzas or incantations, arranged in the Buddhist version in the spatial order east-south-center-west-north (Stein 2673; Makita 354–55), were characterized by DU GUANGTING as "spell gāthā" (zhouji 咒偈; 590 Daojiao lingyan ji 12.2b). It seems likely that the scripture, with its Buddho-Taoist content and quasi-magical use, originated as a late Six Dynasties (220–589) Tantric "book of spells" (zhoujing 咒經; cf. Makita Tairyō, Gikyō kenkyū, 367, and Strickmann, "The Consecration sūtra"). In Tang times (618–907), the text was fiercely disputed by the Taoist and Buddhist communities, as borne out by DU GUANGTING's tale of alleged Buddhist plagiarism, which claims to document the origin of the separate Buddhist version circulating at that time (see 590 Daojiao lingyan ji 12.2b–3b, and Verellen, "Evidential Miracles," 250–51).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Makita Tairyō, Gikyō kenkyū, 345–68; Mollier, "Les cuisines."

Franciscus Verellen

Siqi shesheng tu 四氣攝生圖

28 fols.

Late Tang (618–907)?

766 (fasc. 534)

"Illustrated [Method] of the Four Energies for Conserving One's Health." At the end of the unsigned and undated preface (page 3b), the title of the present work is given as Siqi shesheng tu 四季攝生圖, reading "Four Seasons" instead of "Four Energies." Several Song catalogues, such as the Chongwen zongmu, quote the work under the present title (see VDL 96), stating that it was written by the daoshi Liu Ding 劉鼎. A number of people with this name can be identified for the Tang (618–907) and Wudai (907–960) periods, but none of them is known to have been a daoshi.

The work describes and depicts the viscera (wuzang 五臟, liufu 六腑) and their functions, linking them to the seasons and to the rules to be observed to keep in harmony with their changes (see fig. 27). A number of the practices as described here were common in Tang texts, such as 828 Youzhen xiansheng funa yuanqi jue.

Kristofer Schipper

Baosheng ming 保生銘

1 fol.

Attributed to SUN SIMO 孫思邈 (581?–682?)

835 (fasc. 571)

"Inscription on Preserving Health" This is an abstract of the main principles for maintaining good health as found in most of the Tending Life texts, such as SUN SIMO's 1163 Sun Zhenren beiji qianjin yaofang 81.9b; 1427 Taiqing Daolin shesheng lun 1b, 10b, 11b; and in 838 Tangxing yanming lu.

This short text was engraved on the gate of an anonymous person. Baosheng ming is quoted in 766 Siqi shesheng tu 2b.

Catherine Despeux

FIGURE 27. The spirit of the lungs (766 12a–b). Ming reprint of 1598. Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale de France (Chinois 9546/759)

Taiqing zhonghuang zhenjing 太清中黃真經

2 juan

Text attributed to Jiuxian jun 九仙君; commentary to Zhonghuang zhenren 中黃真人; Tang (618–907)

817 (fasc. 586)

"The Most Pure Veritable Book of the Yellow Center." This is a didactic poem in seven-character verse. Both the Jiuxian jun and Zhonghuan zhenren are mythical figures, the latter being considered the master of the Yellow Emperor (see Xianyuan benji 軒轅本記 in YJQQ 100. 26b–27a). Zhonghuang is the center of the body. It is also a name for the spleen. According to the unsigned and undated preface, this Zhonghuang jing 中黃經 was also called Treatise on the Womb Receptacle (Taizang lun 胎藏論) or Book of the Yellow Center of the Womb Receptacle (Taizang zhonghuang jing 胎藏中黃經). The eighteen sections (zhang 章) originally formed a single juan. This is also the version preserved in YJQQ 13, which is identical with the present one, except for some elements (the preface has a commentary, but part of the commentary we have here is missing). A version of the present work in one juan is listed in the Zhizhai shulu jieti 12.2b under the title Book of the Yellow Center of the Inner Landscape (Neijing zhonghuang jing 內景中黃經; see VDL 80).

The form and content of the present work is comparable to 402 Huangting neijing yujing zhu, with its commentary by Bo Lüzhong 白履忠, hao Liangqiu zi 梁丘子 (fl. 722–729). A Zhonghuang jing is quoted by Bo in YJQQ 11.24b and 34b, and 12.6a, 19b, 20b, and 21b, but the citations do not correspond to the present work.

The work explains how one can gain inner vision through physical exercises. The first chapter concerns the abstention from cereals, the Three Worms, and the Three Cinnabar Fields. The second chapter describes Embryonic Breathing, how to visualize body energies, and heavens and palaces inside the body. The necessity for concentrating one's mind through an impeccable moral conduct, among other things, is stressed (2.11b). The commentary adds that practicing Embryonic Breathing requires the help of an assistant (2.2b), which may indicate that these practices were carried out in communities of adepts.

Lidia Bonomi

Taishang laojun yangsheng jue 太上老君養生訣

7 fols.

Early Tang (618–907)

821 (fasc. 569)

“Instructions of the Most High Lord Lao for Nourishing Vitality.” This work consists of a collection of diverse gymnastic and respiratory practices, arranged in four paragraphs. Each of these short texts can be found in works of the early Tang (618–907), and the present collection should date to the same period.

The text states that it was “transmitted by Hua Tuo 華佗 to Wu Pu 吳普,” reflecting the usual attribution of its first technique to Hua (see Hou Han shu 82B.2739). Song catalogues mention a Laozi wuqin liuqi jue 老子五禽六氣訣 (VDL 102) that undoubtedly corresponded to our work. The first two paragraphs of the present text are entitled “Wuqin 五禽” (Dance of the Five Animals; cf. 838 Yangxing yanming lu 2.7a–8a) and “Liuqi 六氣” (The Six Breaths), respectively. The liuqi method is extant in numerous analogous versions (e.g., 131 Taixi biyao ge jue 1b–2a). The third paragraph, a general discours on dietary methods, is also reproduced in 842 Baopu zi yangsheng lun. The final paragraph concerns respiratory techniques, in particular the method of the Six Breaths for healing diseases of the Five Viscera. An analogous version is found in 1163 Sun zhenren beiji qianji yaofang 82.5b–8b.

Jean Lévi

Shenxian shiqi jingui miaolu 神仙食氣金櫃妙錄

18 fols.

By Jingli xiansheng 京里先生

836 (fasc. 571)

“Marvelous Record from the Golden Chest on Qi-Eating [as Practiced] by the Immortals.” The identity of the Master of the Capital City, Jingli xiansheng, is unknown. We also have a collection of alchemical methods, 420 Shenxian fuer danshi xingyao fa, from the same author. He is mentioned in the Sui shu bibliographies as the author of a Jingui lu in twenty-three juan. This title is also mentioned in Song catalogues (VDL 130).

The present text contains a selection on dietary, “breath-swallowing” (fuqi 服氣), and gymnastic methods that are extant elsewhere in Tang collections. In particular, the part on curing various diseases through daoyin 導引 gymnastics (9a–13b) can be found in 818 Taiqing daoyin yangsheng jing (9a–13a); many other excerpts are included in 837 Zhenzhong ji (e.g., 7a–9a and 14a–18a in the present text correspond to 9a–10b and 1a–4b in the Zhenzhong ji and in 838 Yangxing yanming lu).

Jean Lévi

Sandong shuji zashuo 三洞樞機雜說

13 fols.

Tang (618–907)

839 (fasc. 572)

“Various Accounts of the Essential Elements of the Three Caverns.” This is a small notebook with prescriptions on miscellaneous subjects, culled from a number of well-known sources, none of them later than the Tang (618–907). The text begins with instructions for daily gymnastic exercises for novices. There are precise indications, and no source is given. The next item is on self-massage, with excerpts from 1016 Zhen'gao and other Shangqing texts. Another item treated in some depth is rheumatism and other ailments that provoke stiff and painful joints. For these ailments, a Spell of the Northern Sovereign for Curbs and Twists (4b–7b) is given. Other topics concern herbs, the classification of immortals, and different kinds of incense. This work looks like a scrapbook of a Taoist amateur of the Tang dynasty.

Kristofer Schipper

Shesheng zuanlu 攝生纂錄

28 fols.

Tang (618–907)

578 (fasc. 321)

“Collection of Texts for Conserving Health.” This work is concerned with gymnastic exercises (daoyin 導引), breathing techniques (tiaoqi 調氣), the siting and protection of dwellings (juchu 居處), and the choice of auspicious days for traveling (xinglu 行旅).

The title of this work is quoted in the bibliographical chapter of the Xin Tang shu (59.1542), which indicates that the author is a certain Wang Zhongqiu 王仲丘, whereas the Song catalogues give Wang Liqui 王立丘 (see VDL 167) and state that the work had three juan.

The first part, on gymnastic exercises, draws on well-known sources of the Jin period (265–420) or even earlier, such as the Yangsheng yaoji 養生要集 of Zhang Zhan 張湛 (fl. 370) and the Daoyin jing 導引經, mentioned in the biographical chapter (juan 19) of 1185 Baopu zi neipian. In addition to these exercises, the present work gives a series of twelve exercises named Brahman Gymnastics (poluomen daoyin fa 婆羅門導引法; 2a–3a) that are also found in 1163 Sun zhenren beiji qianjin yaofang 81.1a–2a and in 1427 Taiqing Daolin shesheng lun (without the mention of Brahman Gymnastics). This is the only reference to Indian gymnastics in the Daozang.

Among the breathing exercises, we find a Method for the Harmonization of Qi by Master Luan (Luan xiansheng tiaoqi fa 欒先生調氣法; 10b) that probably comes from the Tiaoqi fang 調氣方 of the Buddhist monk Luan mentioned in the bibliographical chapter of the Xin Tang shu (59.1568). The part on siting page 19 quotes 283 Huangdi longshou jing.

Catherine Despeux

Sun zhenren sheyang lun 孫真人攝養論

5 fols.

Attributed to SUN SIMO 孫思邈 (581?–682)

841 (fasc. 572)

“Discourse of Sun Zhenren [i.e., SUN SIMO] on Dietary Rules and Hygiene” This work is in fact a manual of calendrical observances. It may be related to the Qianjin yueling 千金月令 of SUN SIMO, of which a few fragments are preserved in Shuofu. Some of its formulæ are also found in Sun’s 837 Zhenzhong ji. The text lists alimentary interdictions and prescriptions concerning hygiene corresponding to each month of the year.

Jean Lévi

Hunsu yisheng lu 混俗頤生錄

2 juan

Liu Ci 劉詞; tenth century?

848 (fasc. 573)

“Notes on [Methods of] Nourishing Life for Common Use.” Liu Ci was a recluse of Maoshan 茅山 (Jiangsu). A biography of a Liu Ci figures in both the Jiu Wudai shi 124 and the Xin Wudai shi 50. A native of Hebei, Liu was famous for his military prowess. He died during the reign of Shizong (954–959) of the Later Shu. No mention of Taoism is made in his biography, and it is uncertain whether its subject is the author of our text.

The present work is listed in Chongwen zongmu 9.17a as Hungu 谷 yisheng lu (cf. VDL 135); the Song shi, “Yiwen zhi,” 205.5195 notes only one juan.

In the preface, the author confesses to having fallen ill due to overindulgence in food and drink. His condition led him to the discovery that the art of prolonging life did not lie in the ingestion of drugs or the search for immortality, but simply in achieving the proper balance (1b).

The text comprises ten basic rules for the observation of diet hygiene. The first two sections deal with food and drink in general, followed by certain precautions to take during the Four Seasons and some prescriptions to combat fatigue and diseases caused by noxious winds. The last two sections concern rules related to sexual hygiene and prohibitions regarding hours and days of the year.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Baopu zi yangsheng lun 抱朴子養生論

2 fols.

Tang (618–907)

842 (fasc. 572)

“Baopu zi’s Discourse on Tending Life.” This work is mentioned in the Song shi among the works of GE HONG (VDL 113). The title of this brief tract is explained by its opening citation of a celebrated and frequently quoted passage from the Baopu zi (BPZ 18.368), which was in turn inspired by the Huangren jing 皇人經.

This work is an assemblage of commonplaces on the art of nourishing vitality. Most of its constituent elements are derived from Tang (618–907) writings. The same text is also found, with small variants, in 821 Taishang laojun yangsheng jue. In addition to the passage taken from the Baopu zi, the work contains quotations from the Xiaoyou jing 小有經 (cited also in 837 Zhenzhong ji 2b and 838 Yangxing yanming lu 1.5b) of Feng Junda 封君達 (838 Yangxing yanming lu 1.10a; 837 Zhenzhong ji 3a). Compare also 2a with 838 Yangxing yanming lu 1.9a.

Jean Lévi

Baosheng yaolu 保生要錄

10 fols.

By Pu Qianguan 蒲虔貫 (fl. 934–965)

849 (fasc. 573)

“Essentials for Preserving Life.” The author held the post of siyi lang 司義郎 (secretary) in the chief secretariat of the crown prince. Although this official title was of Tang origin, it was equally used in the early Song (960–1279; cf. Xin Tang shu 39.1293 and Song shi 168.3997).

The name of the author and the date of the text are problematic. The Junzhai dusku zhi 1a–6b lists a Zhouyi yigui 周易易軌 by Pu Qianguan of the Later Shu (934–965). The Song shi, “Yiwen zhi,” 206.5265, however, does not mention the Zhouyi yigui but attributes another work to the author (written 蒲乾貫), a Zhouyi zhimi zhaodan jue 周易指迷照膽訣. The Shuofu 84 virtually reproduces all of the present text (until page 7a, guolei 果類), but it indicates the name of the author as Pu Chuguan 蒲處貫.

The text itself concerns dietetics. In his short preface, the author explains that the entire work is a result of his own experiences. He therefore undertakes the task of correcting certain errors found in ancient books. The latter include, for instance, substances of little use in dietetics, whereas he mentions only those substances that actually reinforce or “nourish” (bu 補) the organism.

The text begins with a brief summary of the shen 神/qi 氣 (spirit and breath) theories and daoyin 導引 gymnastics. This summary is followed by advice on clothing and habitation, the main object being “to avoid (noxious) winds in the same way as one would avoid an arrow” (4b). In the sections concerning drugs and food, the author advocates herbal and plant medicines (6b) and stresses the importance of sesame (huma 胡麻) among cereals. The list of alimentary substances for dietary purposes includes some varieties of fruit, meat (mutton, venison), fish, and fowl. Of note is the absence of vegetables in the list and the mention of Angelica root (bozhi 白芷; Dahurian Angelica) of the country of Wu, considered the best variety during the Song dynasty (cf. 769 Tujing yanyi bencao 30.8a).

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Taishang baozhen yangsheng lun 太上保真養生論

5 fols.

Five Dynasties (907–960)

852 (fasc. 575)

“Discourse on Tending Life and Preserving Perfection by Taishang.” This short anonymous treatise is mentioned in the Chongwen zongmu 9.7b, which omits the term Taishang 太上. The present title is listed in the Song shi, “Yiwen zhi,” 205.5202 (cf. VDL 120), which also includes another work with a similar title, the Da dongxuan baozhen yangshen lun 大洞玄保真養生論.

The book is a collection of quotations and excerpts: it begins (1a–2a) with an extract from 641 Taishang laojun neiguan jing followed by the text of 840 Pengzu shesheng yangxing lun. Although the latter shows some variants, the version of our text seems far more complete. Another passage, in a reduced version, figures in 263.17 Zazhu jiejing 18.5b, where it is attributed to YANLUO ZI. The latter was a Taoist of the Five Dynasties (907–960), the date of our text must be placed between that period and the early Song (960–1279).

The work discusses humanity’s place in the universe, the formation of the embryo, the reasons for the loss of vital energy, dietetics, and rules to observe in everyday life. When the adept has succeeded in the practice of all of these disciplines, notes the author, he or she may proceed to ingest drugs, at first of plant, later of mineral origin. The final step is ataraxy, the only state in which adepts can avoid the scattering of their internal deities or spirits (shen 神), for their departure from the body is considered as the cause of disease and death.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Xiantian Xuanmiao yunü Taishang shengmu zichuan xiandao

先天玄妙玉女太上聖母資傳仙道

9 fols.

Tang (618–907)

868 (fasc. 579)

“The Tao of the Immortals Conferred by the Most High Holy Mother, the Jade Maiden of Obscure Mystery from the Prior Heaven.” This short and clearly incomplete text contains the instructions concerning the arts of Long Life revealed to Laozi by his mother, the Jade Maiden of Obscure Mystery, immediately after his birth.

Laozi’s mother, Mother Li, was canonized as Great Empress of the Prior Heaven (Xiantian taihou 先天太后) by Empress Wu Zetian in A.D. 666; it is likely that her title here refers to this canonization.

Several passages of the present work can be found, with many variants, in 770 Hunyuan shengji by XIE SHOUHAO (twelfth century). It is probable that both works had a common source in a now lost Xuanmiao jing, which is quoted in 1129 Daojiao yishu 4.3a and YJQQ 12.5b and 21.13a. The present text is also close to 954 Taishang hunyuan zhenlu, which was likewise among the sources of 770 Hunyuan shengji.

Among the secrets of Long Life that Laozi receives, elixir alchemy occupies an important part (page 3a–4b). From page 5a on, the text describes the initiation of Yin Xi 尹喜. As a guidebook for practicing meditation, Laozi gives his disciple a Yuli zhongjing 玉曆中經 in thirty-five chapters (zhang 章; see page 6a). This text must be 1168 Taishang laojun zhongjing, and “thirty-five” appears to be an error for “fifty-five,” the actual number of that work’s chapters.

Kristofer Schipper

Huangting dunjia yuanshen jing 黃庭遁甲緣身經

10 fols.

Tang (618–907)

873 (fasc. 580)

“Book of the Hidden Period and the Causal [Karma] Body of the Yellow Court.” This work is a manual of life-preservation methods. It combines the meditation and invocation practices of the Book of the Yellow Court, and more specifically of the “Inner Landscape” version of this text (see 331 Taishang huangting neijing yujing), with the dunjia magic, which consists in marshaling the spirits of the six jia and six ding periods for help and protection.

There is another text in the Daozang with this title, juan 14 of the YJQQ. Both texts are different but clearly related in subject and style. The YJQQ version mentions, within the text on page 3br, a more complete title, adding the two terms neijing 內景 (Inner Landscape) and biyao 秘要 (Secret Essentials): Huangting neijing biyao liujia yuanshen jing 黃庭內景秘要六甲緣身經.

The dunjia method consists of writing a Talisman of the Causal Body of the Six Jia (liujia yuanshen fu 六甲緣身符) and swallowing it. This remedy will heal all diseases and also bring about the presence of the Jade Maidens of the Six Jia (liujia yunü 六甲玉女). Other methods consist in breathing exercises, including the famous absorption of the Five Shoots (fu wuya fa 服五牙法; 4b–7b). One of the texts presented here, the “Taiji zhenren fu siji yunya shenxian shangfang 太極真人服四極雲牙神仙上方,” may well be a fragment of a Shangqing text annotated by TAO HONGJING, as found in 421 Dengzhen yinjue. The meditation methods are indeed related to the Huangting jing. Those in the YJQQ versions are illustrated (see fig. 28).

The YJQQ version is far more complete and more structured as a “canon.” The pres-

FIGURE 28. The spirit of the spleen (YJQQ 14.9a).

脾
藏 圖

ent work is composed of fragments, some quite unrelated to their title. Possibly, they all derive from the same source.

Kristofer Schipper

Dongxuan lingbao daoshi mingjing fa 洞玄靈寶道士明鏡法

3 fols.

Tang (618–907)

1245 (fasc. 991)

“The Clear-Mirror Method for Use by Taoists of the Sacred Treasure Register.”

This text provides no indication of authorship or date. It is a shortened version of 1206 Shangqing mingjian yaojing. It is also identical, apart from two brief passages in the text (on pages 2a and 3a), with 1126 Dongxuan lingbao daoxue keyi (2.7b). With minor variations, the text as a whole is to be found in YJQQ 48, Biyao jue fa, in the sections titled “Laojun mingzhao fa xushi 老君明照法叙事,” “Mingzhao fa 明照法,” and “Mozhao fa 摩照法.” The text is a medley of selected passages dealing with the use of mirrors for meditation practices.

Pauline Bentley Koffler

Changsheng taiyuan shenyong jing 長生胎元神用經

19 fols.

Tang (618–907)

1405 (fasc. 1050)

“Book of the Function of the Spirit of the Origin of the Matrix, Who Bestows Long Life.” This is a small manual of Embryonic Breathing (taixi 胎息) and other common Tending Life practices popular during the Tang. The author, who terms himself a “rustic” (yeren 野人), relates that he met a certain Mr. Wang on Mount Luofu 羅浮山 (near Canton) during the Dali era (766–779; see page 10a; cf. 824 Songshan Taiwu xiansheng qijing).

Kristofer Schipper

Taiqing Daolin shesheng lun 太清道林攝生論

24 fols.

Tang (618–907)

1427 (fasc. 1055)

“Discussion on Conserving Health according to the Forest of Taoists, a Taiqing Book.” This is a collection of prescriptions on lifestyle, housing, eating, self-massage, gymnastics, and breathing exercises.

The present work is listed in Song catalogues (see VDL 151). The name Daolin 道 林 (Forest of Taoists) may refer here to Zhi Dun 支遁, whose religious name was Daolin and who was one of the authors of the now lost Yangsheng yaoji 養生要集, a forerunner of most compilations of the Tang period on Tending Life techniques (see 838 Yangxing yanming lu, preface).

The present text is similar to juan 81–83 of 1163 Sun zhenren beiji qianjin yaofang, by SUN SIMO (fl. 673). There are, however, many discrepancies and, at times, the order of the rubrics differs. The Yigu tang tiba quotes the table of contents of a Northern Song edition of the Qianjin yaofang 千金要方, which seems to indicate that that edition, which was not reedited by Lin Yi 林億, was closer to the present text (see Okanishi Tameto, Song yiqian yiji kao, 593).

The second rubric in the present work is entitled “Huangdi zaji 黃帝雜忌” (Miscellaneous Interdictions of the Yellow Emperor; 9a–13b). It is possible that this rubric preserves the text of an otherwise lost work titled Huangdi za yinshi ji 黃帝雜飲食忌, quoted in the Sui shu, “Jingji zhi,” 34.1043.

Catherine Despeux

Pengzu shesheng yangxing lun 彭祖攝生養性論

3 fols.

Tang (618–907)

840 (fasc. 572)

“Discourse on Conserving Health and Tending Life according to Pengzu.” This work consists of a series of general considerations on precautions to observe, exhortations to moderation, and prescriptions of hygiene for the prolongation of life. The prescriptions are typical of life-tending literature of the Tang period.

Jean Lévi

Yangsheng bianyi jue 養生辯疑訣

3 fols.

SHI JIANWU 施肩吾, hao Qizhen zi 栖真子; after 806

853 (fasc. 575)

“Oral Formula for the Dispersal of Doubts Concerning [the Practice of] Tending Life.” The treatise was well known in the early Song (960–1279), although not always under the same title. Both the Chongwen zongmu 9.8b and the Xin Tang shu, “Yiwen zhi,” 59.1523 list a Bianyi lun 辯疑論 in one juan. The Xin Tang shu adds that the author, SHI JIANWU, a presented scholar (jinshi 進士) of the Yuanhe period (806–820), was a recluse of Xishan 西山 in Jiangxi. The present title figures in YJQQ 88, but only the section on pages 11a–12b corresponds, with some variants, to our text (1a–2b). The rest of the YJQQ text is actually an excerpt from another work, the Sanyuan pian 三元篇 (cf. 1017 Daoshu 30.9a, YJQQ 88.13b, and the postface).

The text existed in its present form during the early period of the Southern Song dynasty. This is evident from the slightly abridged quotations in 1017 Daoshu 35.3a, although the order is slightly different (cf. 2a, 1b, and 3b of our text).

The essential ideas contained in the work resemble those in SHI JIANWU’s Sanzhu pian 三住篇 (see 1017 Daoshu 30). Much emphasis is laid on the preservation of xing 形 (body), qi 氣, and shen 神 (spirits or divinities) through the practice of Holding the One (shouyi 守一). The author adds that if adepts could live secluded from common mortals in a state of ataraxy, they would be able to keep both their qi and shen within the body.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Sandong daoshi jushan xiulian ke 三洞道士居山修鍊科

29 fols.

Tang (618–907)?

1272 (fasc. 1003)

“Codex for Taoist Masters of the Three Caverns Who Live in the Mountains and Practice Physiological Refinement.” This small manual opens both with instructions for absorbing the qi (fuqi 服氣) and the ritual for the transmission of the instructions. It contains directions for making various elixirs, abstaining from cereals, ingesting fu for healing, and collecting minerals and plants in the mountains.

The respiratory exercises at the beginning of the work contain an otherwise unknown technique, for which 120 breaths in three series, named bayin 八引, siyin 四引, and yiyin 一引, are inhaled. Also the “apothecaries’ measure” used in the alchemical practice (25a) is worth noting: one “inch-square spatula” (fangcun bi 方寸匕) is equivalent to two “pinches” (cuo 撮), equivalent to four “spatulas” (daogui 刀圭), or to eight “beans” (dou 豆). This manual seems to have been largely compiled from other texts: 11b–15b is the same as “Gushen miaoqi jue 谷神妙氣訣,” YJQQ 61.10b–15a; 20a–23b derives from “Qingling zhenren Pei jun zhuan 清靈真人裴君傳,” YJQQ 105.15a–17b, 105.4a–5a; for 24b–25a, cf. 837 Zhenzhong ji 26a–b.

Hans-Hermann Schmidt

Guqi huanshen jiuzhuan qiongdan lun 固氣還神九轉瓊丹論

13 fols.

Five Dynasties (907–960)?

418 (fasc. 192)

“Treatises on the Mutation of the Spirit through Keeping the Qi Firm and on the Nine-Times-Transmuted Precious Elixir.” The first treatise (“Guqi huanshen lun 固氣還神論,” 1a–2b) is a short prose text arguing that one should preserve the “essence,” that is, semen (jing 精), not simply by refraining from ejaculation but also by recycling the semen inside the body through the “return of the essence” (huanjing 還精) technique advocated in the Huangting jing 黃庭經. The term guqi 固氣 (keeping the qi firm) is defined in the (presumably) Tang work Taiqing Wang Lao kouchuan fa 太清王老口傳法 (in YJQQ 62.20a) as “avoiding ejaculation.”

The second treatise is the “Jiuzhuan qiongdan lun 九轉瓊丹論” (3a–13b). It is composed of a main text and a commentary, apparently both by the same author. The treatise advocates spiritual alchemy above laboratory alchemy, which it terms danfa 丹法 (the usual expression, neidan 內丹, does not occur). The vocabulary recalls the Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契 and related works. The source materials and argumentation of both treatises suggest a pre-Song (960–1279) date.

Kristofer Schipper

Taishang chu sanshi jiuchong baosheng jing 太上除三尸九蟲保生經

25 fols.

Five Dynasties (907–960)?

871 (fasc. 580)

“Scripture of the Most High for the Protection of Life through the Elimination of the Three Corpses and the Nine Worms.” This is an illustrated handbook presenting these agents of decay and death as well as various apotropaic and medical methods for expelling them (see figs. 29–31).

Whereas the Three Corpses are clearly identified as demons of human and animal morphology, the Nine Worms are given shapes similar to insects and germs, which has led some scholars to propose that the existence of harmful bacteria was known to the Chinese of the time (see Liu Ts’un-yan, “Taoist knowledge of tuberculosis”).

The text itself (14a–b) attributes the discovery of these worms to the great physician SUN SIMO. Sun is said to have showed them to a student by the name of Zhou 周, who drew pictures of them. Later these pictures passed into the hands of a daoshi from Mount Qingcheng 青城山, who transmitted them to the prefect of Pengzhou 彭州, Geng He 庚河. The latter tried out Sun’s remedies and commissioned a skilled draftsman to make paintings of the harmful agents. The author obtained these paintings from his friend, a certain Chen Lingzhang 陳靈章 from Dongping 東平, who during the Yuanhe era (806–820) traveled to the northern part of Sichuan to practice the Tao. There in the early years of the Changqing era (821–824), together with a fellow Taoist named Li Xuanhui 李玄會, he abstained from cereals during 100 days, performed breathing exercises and ingested drugs for the elimination of the worms. In the end, some strange insect-like creatures were evacuated from his body.

Elsewhere (6a–7a), the author tells the story of two brothers who obtained immortality, also in Sichuan. The facts were reported to the authorities by a daoshi named Yang Yuanyi 楊元一, the head of a temple (guan 觀) on Mount Qingcheng 青城山, in the year 900 (Guanghua 3). Since the text mentions explicitly the Tang dynasty (618–907) at this point, it is likely that it was compiled at a later date.

FIGURE 29. The seven po-spirits (871 3a–b).

FIGURE 30. The Three Corpses (871 7a–b, 8b).

FIGURE 31. Pathogenic agents in the body (871 14a).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Liu Ts’un-yan, “Taoist knowledge of tuberculosis.”

Kristofer Schipper

Nantong dajun neidan jiuzhang jing 南統大君內丹九章經

6 fols.

Attributed to WU YUN 吳筠; Five Dynasties (907–960)?

1054 (fasc. 727)

“The Scripture in Nine Sections on Inner Alchemy.” This is a spurious work attributed to WU YUN (d. 778, cf. 1051 Zongxuan xiansheng wenji). The book is first mentioned in the Tongzhi, “Yiwen lue,” 5.22b.

Both the preface, dated 818, and the colophon are also ascribed to WU YUN, but the former states that the text was transmitted to the author by Li Bo 李白 (701–762), whereas the latter writes “by an old man.” The colophon also indicates another title for the present text, the Neidan shenjue 內丹神訣, and criticizes another text revealed by a certain Nantong Fan dajun 南統樊大君 in 818 (cf. 761 Taishang laojun yuandao zhenjing zhujie). Consequently, the present work must postdate the latter.

The “scripture” deals with the techniques of preserving life transmitted by Lord Mao 茅君 to Fan. The text is divided into nine short sections, each with a heading. It belongs to the Maoshan tradition and describes simple techniques of visualization and pacing the Dipper; absorption of the rays of sun, moon, and the Seven Luminaries; the method of the Six Qi; and so on.

The text also places emphasis on good deeds in order to accumulate “hidden merit.” Through the practice of these techniques, the divinities are moved to descend and inhabit the adept’s body, thereby assuring the latter of immortality. The term neidan 內丹 is not used in the alchemical sense and is defined as the collection of divinities within the body (1a). Both the preface and the colophon consider Embryonic Breathing as an ineffective technique for preserving life when practiced on its own.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

2.A.4.b Respiratory Techniques

Taixi jing zhu 胎息經註

3 fols.

Commentary by Huanzhen xiansheng 幻真先生 (late ninth century?)

130 (fasc. 59)

“Commentary on the Book of Embryonic Breathing.” This is a small, somewhat theoretical work. The authors of the Siku quanshu zongmu tiyao 28 consider the commentator to be also the author of the book itself. However, the Taixi jing also exists in a separate version, without commentary (see 14 Gaoshang yuhuang taixi jing).

The real name of Huanzhen xiansheng is unknown. He is considered to be the author of 828 Youzhen xiansheng funa yuanqi jue (where you 幼 stands for huan 幻), an important treatise on Embryonic Breathing. This text is also included in the Yunji qiqian (YJQQ 60.14a–27a), where it is followed immediately by the present text (27a–28b), called simply Taixi jing.

828 Youzhen xiansheng funa yuanqi jue has a preface mentioning the Tianbao era (742–756). The same preface can, however, also be found with 824 Songshan Taiwu xiansheng qijing, ascribed to a certain Taiwu xiansheng 太無先生 (on the relationship between these two texts, see Maspero, “Methods,” 460–61 n. 3), and the same preface is found again at the beginning of a short treatise entitled Taiwu xiansheng fuqi fa 太無先生服氣法 (YJQQ 58.8b). Here, instead of Tianbao, the Dali era (766–779) is indicated.

The commentary on the Taixi jing uses a vocabulary unlike that of other Tang texts on the same subject. For instance, on pages 1a and 3b the term taixi 胎息 is said to be equivalent to neidan 內丹. The YJQQ version is slightly shorter and has a few variant readings. Also, both a passage at the end of the commentary, beginning with fan taixi 凡胎息 (3a), and the final Inscription on Embryonic Breathing (Taixi ming 胎息銘; 3a) are lacking in the YJQQ version. The passage beginning with fan taixi was actually taken from 825 Yanling xiansheng ji xinjin fuqi jing (17b), yet another treatise on the same subject, which dates from the late Tang period (see Maspero, “An essay on Taoism,” 339 n. 57). In its present form, the work under discussion may, therefore, be a compilation of a later period, prior to the publication of the YJQQ.

The commentary explains that the practice of Embryonic Breathing enables one to keep the Primordial Qi (yuanqi 元氣) and the gods (shen 神) within the body and thus to attain immortality.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Gaoshang yuhuang taixi jing 高上玉皇胎息經

1 fol.

14 (fasc. 24)

“Book of Embryonic Breathing.” This text is, but for the first line, identical to 130 Taixi jing zhu (see above), also found in YJQQ 60.27a–28b.

Kristofer Schipper

Taixi biyao ge jue 胎息祕要歌訣

4 fols.

Tang (618–907)

131 (fasc. 59)

“Oral Formulas and Songs on the Principal Secrets of Embryonic Breathing.” This small, anonymous work treats, in prose and verse, the same topics as those found in 820 Taiqing tiaopi jing, and is thus probably of a later date. The substitution of the character li 理 for zhi 治, in observation of the Tang taboo, is another indication of the possible date of the work.

The author recalls briefly the main points concerning the absorption of qi: dietetics, sexual hygiene, the exercises of the Six Qi (liuqi 六氣) to be practiced in times of illness, and so on. The last exercise is to be found nowhere else and may have been invented by the author himself.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Zhenqi huanyuan ming 真氣還元銘

17 fols.

By Qiangming zi 強名子; first half of the tenth century

264 (fasc. 131)

"Inscription on the True Qi Returning to the Origin." An epigrammatical text on the subject of breathing and meditation, in classical, four-character phrases in the style of Ming inscriptions, accompanied with an explanatory commentary. The author, using the pseudonym Master of the Forced Name (i.e., the Tao), tells us in his undated preface that during the Zhenming years (915–920) of the [Later] Liang dynasty he visited Mount Taishan and met an immortal who transmitted to him the "art of spitting out [the old] and inhaling [the new; tuna 吐納] and perfecting the body [lianxing 鍊形]." The immortal told him not to divulge these secrets before twenty years had passed. Now that this was the case, the author worked these instructions into a new scripture (xinjing 新經) for inscription in public places and on holy mountains.

The commentary draws on a number of sources, such as the Huangting jing 黃庭經 and the Taixi jing 胎息經.

Kristofer Schipper

Xiuzhen jingyi zalun 修真精義雜論

25 fols.

By SIMA CHENGZHEN 司馬承禎, hao Boyun zi 白雲子 (647–735)

277 (fasc. 134)

This text is part of the 830 Fuqi jingyi lun by SIMA CHENGZHEN (q.v.).

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Taishang yangsheng taixi qijing 太上養生胎息氣經

9 fols.

Tang (618–907)?

819 (fasc. 568)

"Most High Scripture on Embryonic Breathing and Tending Life." This is a short treatise compiled from a number of well-known texts. The names of the Three Cinnabar Fields and the stages of the transformations of the body are the same as in 824 Songshan Taiwu xiansheng qijing.

Our text differs, however, from the latter treatise, since it also adopts some specific Shangqing techniques for the absorption of astral concretions, corresponding to the viscera and to particular periods of the calendar cycle. Each of the viscera and periods is put in correlation with a specific type of expiration. The Tables of the Five Viscera (the illustrations have been lost) are summarized here from 1402 Shangqing huangting wuzang liufu zhenren youzhu jing (see also YJQQ 14.4a–13a). The text claims to belong to the Maoshan movement, since it places itself under the patronage of Fusang dadi jun 扶桑大帝君.

Jean Lévi

Taiqing tiaoci jing 太清調氣經

22 fols.

Tang (618–907)?

820 (fasc. 569)

"Great Purity Scripture on the Harmonization of Qi." This text, in one juan, is mentioned in the Song catalogue Bishu sheng xubian dao siku quesu mu (VDL 92). It shows close affinities with certain passages in 825 Yanling xiansheng ji xinjiu fuqi jing (compare 9b and 17b–18b with 825 Xinjiu fuqi jing 2b and 1a–2b, respectively). Similarly, the three techniques of smelting, letting roam, and closing the qi are practically identical with those in Yanling's anthology (compare 18b–21b with 825 Xinjiu fuqi jing 23b ff.). The relationship with 824 Songshan Taiwu xiansheng qijing (q.v.) is problematic; both works appear to be based on the same kind of materials.

The present work, seeking to break with earlier tradition and the practices of its time, attacks the old manuals on breath absorption as offering nothing but vacuous visualizations, calendrical rules, and a plethora of useless if not harmful prescriptions. The treatises on Tending Life (yangsheng 養生) of the early Tang, such as 837 Zhenzhong ji (9a–10b), seem to be particularly singled out for criticism. Instead, this work advocates spontaneity and natural harmony, as well as more flexible practices of breath absorption that would be compatible with the life of an official.

Jean Lévi

Taiqing fuqi koujue 太清服氣口訣

8 fols.

Tang (618–907)?

822 (fasc. 569)

"Oral Instructions on Breath Absorption of Taiqing." This work is mentioned in numerous Song catalogues (VDL 91). The Tongzhi, "Yiwen lue," attributes these instructions to Fan Zongshi 樊宗師. According to the YJQQ, the instructions convey the method of Wang Lao 王老 (see YJQQ 62.1a, "Taiqing Wang Lao kouchuan fa 太清王老口傳法," and 59.12a, "Taiqing Wang Lao kouchuan fuqi fa 太清王老口傳服氣法"). The preface in the present text also places the work under the patronage of Wang Lao (see also YJQQ 62.11a and the postface, "Wang Lao zhenren jing houpi 王老真人經後批," 21b ff.).

The edition in YJQQ 62.1a–2b resembles an extract of the same work in YJQQ 59.11b–13b; it is sufficiently different from the present work to suggest that the two might be separate elaborations of a common source. The following passages correspond: 1a–3b and YJQQ 62.1a–4a; 4a–b and YJQQ 62.13b–14b; 5a–b and YJQQ 62.7a–8a; 6a–8a and parts of YJQQ 62.8b. Beginning on 6a, the two texts diverge. The YJQQ version is longer but does not represent the original text (62.9b).

This manual, despite indications to the contrary in the preface, is primarily addressed at novices who might experience serious troubles when practicing the breathing techniques. It offers a survey of common breath absorption and dietary techniques that were current under the Tang, respresented by such works as 820 Taiqing tiaopi jing and 824 Songshan Taiwu xiansheng qijing. The closing invocation corresponds to the one used in the establishment of the sacred area in 1226 Daomen tongjiao biyong ji 7.9b–10a.

Jean Lévi

Zhuang Zhou qijue jie 莊周氣訣解

4 fols.

Tang (618–907)?

823 (fasc. 569)

“Explanations of the Breathing Method of Zhuangzi.” This is a small manual on breath absorption. The work probably dates to the Tang (see Bishu sheng xubian dao siku quesu mu 2.27a; VDL 138). Li Quan’s commentary in 110 Huangdi yinfu jingshu 1.2a, close to the Zhuangzi’s 莊子 famous parable (chapter 3) of the fire that passes from log to log (see 1a in the present text), is explained in terms of Tending Life (yangsheng 養生). The final part, concerning Embryonic Breathing (taixi 胎息), is closely related to 831 Qifa yaoming zhijue (see 11a–b).

Jean Lévi

Songshan Taiwu xiansheng qijing 嵩山太無先生氣經

2 juan

Eighth–ninth century?

824 (fasc. 569)

“Breath Scripture of Master Great Nonbeing of Mount Song.” This work is preceded by a preface in which the author declares to have received its method of Embryonic Breathing (taixi 胎息) in the Dali reign period (766–779) in the form of oral instructions by Master Wang (Wang gong 王公) of Luofu shan 羅浮山 (cf. 1405 Changsheng taiyuan shenyong jing). According to the version in YJQQ (see below), the encounter took place at Gaoyou 高郵.

This work is mentioned in several Song catalogues (see VDL 90). The entry in Tongzhi, “Yiwen lue,” identifies the author as Li Fengshi 李奉時 (fl. 825), otherwise known for a method cited in 825 Yanling xiansheng ji xinjin fuqi jing 6a–b. YJQQ 59.25b states that this master was from Songshan. 1017 Daoshu 15.10a–13a reproduces a series of breath absorption methods, corresponding by and large to the present text. They are attributed to a “Saint of Songshan,” identified in a note as Li Fengshi. Another version of this text (see below), however, ascribes it to Huanzhen 幻真, the annotator of 130 Taixi jing zhu (q.v.).

While Master Wang has not been identified, he is cited in 831 Qifa yaoming zhijue 5b and 8b. A note explains that the Longgang 龍崗 method in question was transmitted by ZHANG GUO. The present work refers to Wang Lao 王老 (cf. LZTT 43.11b–12b) and the Wang Lao jing 王老經, frequently associated with ZHANG GUO in hagiographic writings. One of the methods in the present work appears under the name of ZHANG GUO, who died at the beginning of the Tianbao era (742–756), in 825 Yanling xiansheng ji xinjin fuqi jing 4b–5a. These indications suggest that the present work represents Taoist writings belonging to the second half of the eighth century.

The Huanzhen version is found in 828 Youzhen [i.e., Huanzhen] xiansheng funa yuanqi jue and YJQQ 60.14a–27a. It represents essentially the same text, with slight divergences. More complete if less systematically organized versions of most of the methods in the present work are found in 820 Taishang tiaopi jing. Other Tang and Song collections reproduce the work partially (see YJQQ 59.8a–10 and 73.11a–b; 818 Taiqing daoyin yangsheng jing 13a–14b and 16a–b).

The contents of this work can be grouped under three headings: respiratory practices (1.1a–10b), dietary regimens and general recommendations (1.10b–13b), and the theory of Embryonic Breathing (1.13b–2.4a). By defining Embryonic Breathing as a form of natural alchemy or “hidden cinnabar” (yindan 陰丹), it suggests an inner alchemical approach to its subject.

Jean Lévi

Youzhen xiansheng funa yuanqi jue 幼真先生服內元氣訣

Preface + 13 fols.

828 (fasc. 570)

“Instructions of Master Huanzhen [for Youzhen, read Huanzhen 幻真] for the Absorption of Primordial Breath.” This is another version of 824 Songshan Taiwu xiansheng qijing (see preceding entry).

Jean Lévi

Yanling xiansheng ji xinjiu fuqi jing 延陵先生集新舊服氣經

26 fols.

Annotated by Sangyu zi 桑榆子; late Tang (618–907) or Five Dynasties (907– 960)

825 (fasc. 570)

“Master Yanling’s Collection of Ancient and Modern Treatises on Breath Absorption.” This text is mentioned in several Song catalogues (see VDL 109). Master Yanling and Sangyu zi have not been identified. The two appellations may refer to the same person. Internal evidence, such as the references to ZHANG GUO, date the work to the period between the mid-eight century and the Five Dynasties (907–960).

Items 1–13 of the work’s fifteen methods, together with Sangyu zi’s commentaries, also appear in YJQQ 58, 59, and 61. The two versions are textually close. However, in the YJQQ version the methods from the present work are found interspersed among passages from other sources. Other extracts in YJQQ 58–61—for example, from Taiqing Wang Lao kouchuan qijing 太清王老口傳氣經 (59.11b–13a) and Zhongshan yugui fuqi jing 中山玉櫃服氣經 (60)—are found in more complete versions elsewhere in YJQQ (62 and 83, respectively), which suggests that the YJQQ version of the present text is cited, but via an anthology incorporating extracts from other works as well. The present work is also quoted in 829 Taixi jingwei lun (q.v.).

The methods involve breathing techniques related to Embryonic Breathing (taixi 胎息). There are no references to the Maoshan methods of astral absorption and few to visualization. The commentary of Sangyu zi is of a practical nature, emphasizing spontaneity and regular but measured application.

Jean Lévi

Taixi jingwei lun 胎息精微論

7 fols.

Tang (618–907)

829 (fasc. 571)

“Discourse on the Subtleties of Embryonic Breathing.” This work precedes another with a similar title, 830 Fuqi jingyi lun, a treatise by SIMA CHENGZHEN (647–735). The present text criticizes certain techniques found in the latter (2a). The work is listed in the Chongwen zongmu as comprising 3 juan, but the Tongzhi, “Yiwen lue,” mentions a Taishang hunyuan shangde huangdi [i.e., Laozi] taixi jingyi lun in one juan (see VDL 88 and 124) that seems to correspond to the present work, also ascribed to Laozi. Our text was well known at the end of the ninth century (see Xianji zhi jue by PEI XING in YJQQ 88.8a ff.).

The work comprises three different texts: “Taixi jingwei lun 胎息精微論” (1a–3a), “Neizhen miaoyong jue 內真妙用訣” (3a–5b), and “Taixi shenhui neidan qifan jue 胎息神會內丹七返訣” (5b–7b). Of these three texts, only the first is quoted in its entirety in another Tang text, the 825 Yanling xiansheng ji xinjiu fuqi jing 14b–16a (the version in YJQQ 58.1a–3b is identical, except for its omission of the first sentence). This version is much longer than our text and includes practical instructions (cf. 825 Xinjiu fuqi jing 15b4–10; 16a4–8; 16b3–7). Both our text and 825 Xinjiu fuqi jing also feature different commentaries, anonymous in the case of the present text and by Sangyu zi 桑榆子 in the case of 825 Xinjiu fuqi jing. The taixi 胎息 method described is actually the absorption of the Inner Breath (neiqi 內氣) through holding the breath and swallowing the saliva seven times.

Of the next text, the “Neizhen miaoyong jue,” there exists an expanded, Buddhized version in YJQQ 59.14b–18a: “Damo dashi zhushi liuxing neizhen miaoyong jue 達磨大師住世留形內真妙用訣”; this version, according to Fukui Fumimasa (“Key to longevity”), is based on our text. Other versions of the text are incorporated in 1405 Changsheng taiyuan shenyong jue 1a–4b and in 826 Zhuzhen shengtai shenyong jue. In both of the latter versions, the commentary of our text is presented as part of the main text. The first sentence is from the present text (1a and 1b). The “Neizhen miaoyong jue,” ascribed to Liu jun and entitled Liu jun bizhi 劉君祕旨, then follows.

The “Neizhen miaoyong jue” is a discussion of taixi with hardly any practical instructions (cf. the long instructions in 1405 Changsheng taiyuan shenyong jue, missing in our text). The importance of shen 神 is emphasized as the controller (zhu 主) of qi (the technical term zimu 子母 is used for shen and qi).

The last text, “Taixi shenhui neidan qi fan jue,” deals with the technique huanjing bunao 還精補腦 (Repairing the Brain with Seminal Essence), inspired from the Huangdi neidan qifan [jue] 黃帝內丹七返 [訣] (now lost). Part of this text (6b–7b) can be found in abridged form in 1405 Changsheng taiyuan shenyong jue 6b.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Fuqi jingyi lun 服氣精義論

12 fols.

By SIMA CHENGZHEN 司馬承禎, hao Boyun zi 白雲子 (647–735)

830 (fasc. 571)

“Essays on the Quintessence [of the Method of] Absorbing Qi.” The author’s name is given as Boyun zi beneath the title; this was the hao of SIMA CHENGZHEN according to an inscription dated 742 (see 603 Tiantai shan zhi 12a). A Jingyi lun by Sima lianshi 司馬鍊師 is mentioned in 901 Shiyao erya 2.4a (preface dated 806). The Bishu sheng xubiandao siku qieshu mu 2.25b lists the present title in three juan, the Song shi, “Yiwen zhi,” 205.5195, however, writes one juan.

The difference in the number of juan can be accounted for, since the present text is only a fragment of the original, which comprised altogether nine essays (lun). The fuller version can be found in YJQQ 57.1a–30a. Our text comprises only the first two essays: “Wuya lun 五牙論” and “Fuqi lun 服氣論.” A note on 6b announces that the daoyin 導引 gymnastics techniques are explained in the essays, but the essays in question, including the one on daoyin, are found elsewhere in the Daozang (cf. 277 Xiuzhen jingyi zalun).

There are some variants in our text (including the version found in 277 Xiuzhen jingyi zalun) with respect to the YJQQ version. Although the latter is sometimes more complete, (see, e.g., YJQQ 57.10b–12b, “Wuling xindan zhang 五靈心丹章,” missing in the present text), it omits some of the methods and all the diagrams of the fu.

The “Wuya lun” and the “Fuqi lun” describe techniques for the absorption of the Five Shoots (i.e., the qi of the Five Directions) and of swallowing breath. The former technique is based on methods described in 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu 1.11b. The methods used for the absorption of breath were intended primarily to permit the adept to survive without cereals (duangu 斷穀).

For a description of the other techniques, see 277 Xiuzhen jingyi zalun. The “Daoyin lun” comprises seventeen gymnastics techniques (the YJQQ includes only one). These techniques, which should not be employed at the same time, were considered as an aid for the absorption of breath. The next two essays, “Fushui lun 服水論” and “Fuyao lun 服藥論,” deal with the ingestion of fu and drugs, mainly to avoid hunger and thirst, thereby facilitating the absorption of breath. The “Shenji lun 慎忌論” and the “Wuzang lun 五臟論” concern dietary rules and the Five Viscera. The last two essays, “Liaobing lun 療病論” and “Binghou lun 病候論,” discuss diseases and their cures. The “Liaobing lun” (YJQQ: “Fuqi liaobing lun 服氣療病論”) describes the use of gymnastics and the absorption of breath for curing various ailments.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Qifa yaoming zhijue 氣法要妙至訣

12 fols.

Late Tang (618–907)

831 (fasc. 571)

“Arcane Instructions on Breathing Techniques.” This is a small treatise on Embryonic Breathing. The work mentions the title given to ZHANG GUO by the Tang emperor Xuanzong (r. 712–756) and must therefore be later than the mid-eighth century. The text discusses methods for harmonizing breath and the use of the Six Qi. The author warns of the dangers of his method to novices and praises its miraculous effects.

Jean Lévi

Shangqing siming Mao zhenjun xiuxing zhimi jue

上清司命茅真君修行指迷訣

6 fols.

Tang (618–907)

832 (fasc. 571)

“Instructions Pointing out Errors in Practice, by the True Lord Mao, Director of Destiny of Supreme Purity.” This is a small guide for breathing exercises. Lord Mao is Mao Ying 茅盈, the eldest of the three Mao brothers and one of the divine patriarchs of the Shangqing revelation. His hagiography survives partially in YJQQ 104.10b–20a (Taiyuan zhenren dongyue shangqing siming zhenjun zhuan 太元真人東嶽上卿司命真君傳). Here, however, in spite of the title, there seems to be little or no connection with the Shangqing scriptures (see part 1.B). The breathing exercises are straightforward and practical, and the instructions do not use Shangqing terminology. The daily practice is coordinated with the time cycles of the decade and the twelve months. Part of the text can be found in YJQQ 61.17b–18b under the title “Method for the Absorption of Qi during the Twelve Months” (shier yue fuqi fa 十二月服氣法).

Kristofer Schipper

Shenqi yangxing lun 神氣養形論

3 fols.

833 (fasc. 571)

“Spirit and Breath as Sustenance for the Body” is mentioned in a Song catalogue (VDL 131). An abridged version is found in YJQQ 34.15b. The work should therefore be of a Tang (618–907) or Five Dynasties (907–960) date. After a brief discussion of the relationship between Breath (action, mother of Spirit) and Spirit (word, son of Breath), on the one hand, with Form, or the body, on the other, the text adduces the Laozi and the Yellow Court Scripture Huangting jing (waijing 外經) for exalting the merits of interior meditation.

Jean Lévi

Cunshen lianqi ming 存神鍊氣銘

3 fols.

Attributed to SUN SIMO 孫思邈 (581?–682)

834 (fasc. 571)

“Inscription on Concentrating the Spirit and Refining Breath.” This work is a short piece on the steps of the Tao, ascribed to Sun Simo. This attribution is doubtful. Note that the work is listed in Song catalogues as anonymous (VDL 101). It is probably of a Later Tang (618–907) or Five Dynasties (907–960) date.

The work is entirely reproduced, under the title Taiqing cunshen lianqi wushi qihou jue 太清存神鍊氣五時七侯訣, in YJQQ 33.12a–14b, where it follows a partial citation of 837 Zhenzhong ji, hence perhaps the attribution to SUN SIMO. A similar text is found in 400 Dongxuan lingbao dingguan jing zhu 6b–7a. The term dingguan 定觀 (intent contemplation or samādhi) also occurs in the present work (3b).

The text is divided into three parts: a general introduction on respiratory practices, in four-character verse; five preliminary steps for attaining the Tao; and seven subsequent grades for the advanced adept.

Jean Lévi

Baopu zi biezhì 抱朴子別旨

2 fols.

Attributed to GE HONG 葛洪 (283–343); probably Tang (618–907)

1186 (fasc. 870)

“Separate Instructions from the Master Who Keeps to Simplicity.” This text contains two paragraphs: one on Embryonic Breathing (taixi 胎息), the other on gymnastics (daoyin 導引). The text does not correspond to any passage in 1185 Baopu zi neipian but is mentioned as a separate work in Song bibliographies (VDL 113). The bibliography of the Song shi lists it as having two chapters. The present version is therefore but a fragment of a Tending Life manual, dating from the Tang (618–907).

Kristofer Schipper

Taiqing yuandao zhenjing 太清元道真經

3 juan

Ninth century?

1423 (fasc. 1055)

“Veritable Scripture of the Original Tao of the Taiqing [Heaven].” This scripture is mentioned in the Chongwen zongmu 9.8b and other Song catalogues (VDL 85). The text was originally revealed by Laozi to nineteen persons, who subsequently attained immortality (3.2b). The scripture was, however, first diffused in 818 when Nantong Fan dajun 南統樊大君 revealed it to Meng Zhexian 孟譎仙.

The latter transmitted it to Wang Xuwu 王虛無, who recorded it in writing (3.2b). The scripture is criticized in a postscript attributed to WU YUN, in a text with a preface also dated 818 and revealed by Nantong Fan dajun (cf. 1054 Nantong Fan dajun neidan jiuzhang jing 4a).

The 761 Taishang laojun yuandao zhenjing zhujie, with a commentary by Yin Zhi 隱芝, is a Southern Song version of the scripture based upon another edition. Although the first juan in both versions is identical, except for the last line, juan 2 and 3 in the present text contain many lacunae (see, e.g., 2.1a–1b, 3b, 4a, and 3.1a). A long passage of the same scripture is quoted in 1017 Daoshu 13.10a–11b, which seems to have been excerpted from yet another edition. Finally, the observance of a Tang taboo (1.1b, 2.3a), suggests a late Tang (618–907) date.

The scripture deals with Embryonic Breathing (taixi 胎息), a technique that enables the adept to return to his origin. Yuandao 元道 is defined as the unsurpassable method of the Most High Lord Lao of returning to the root (1a). The yuandao method is superior to the techniques described in the Huangting jing because of its relative simplicity: it can be practiced by anyone under any circumstances. The method is divided into three different grades.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

2.A.5 Alchemy

We know from history that alchemy enjoyed great popularity during the Tang period (618–907; see Sivin, Chinese alchemy), and this popularity is borne out by the large number of texts found in this section. Most of these texts deal with alchemy in much the same way as their predecessors in earlier centuries, and they incorporate elements from Han (20c B.C.–A.D. 220) as well as Six Dynasties (220–589) Taoism. Some works, however, are different in character and make use of a theoretical framework provided by certain texts that, although reputed to be very old, in fact became current only in the Tang dynasty. The most important of these theoretical works are the Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契, the Guwen longhu jing 古文龍虎經, and the Jinbi jing 金碧經 (the question of the dating of these texts is discussed in the introduction to part 2.A.1.d).

The difference between the two kinds of texts, those that deal with laboratory alchemy (waidan 外丹) and those that transpose the alchemical process within the human body and that in Tang times therefore received the name of Inner Alchemy (neidan 內丹), is often stated clearly. In some instances, however, it is difficult to say whether the names of alchemical ingredients are used in a concrete or in a metaphorical way. The difficulty is compounded by the fact that the majority of the texts in this section are placed indiscriminately in the Ming Daozang in the Fangfa 方法 division of the Dongshen. Often we have to resort to comparisons with other texts in order to establish the true nature of the work. For instance, the YJQQ, in its section on alchemy (juan 63–73), does distinguish between neidan and laboratory manuals.

All in all, the distinction between operative laboratory alchemy and contemplative Inner Alchemy has been so fundamental since Tang times that the two have to be presented as separate categories, in spite of some unresolved uncertainties with respect to the classification of specific texts.

2.A.5.a Laboratory Alchemy

Huangdi jiuding shendan jingjue 黃帝九鼎神丹經訣

20 juan

Juan 1, presumably Han (206 B.C.–A.D. 220); juan 2–20, Tang (618–907)

885 (fasc. 584–585)

“Canon and Instructions for the Divine Alchemy of the Nine Cauldrons of the Yellow Emperor.” The first juan is generally considered to be the original canon (jing 經), as its text corresponds, in a general way, to the quotations given in the BPZ 4 (“Jingdan pian 金丹篇”) of a Huangdi jiuding shendan jing. In spite of many differences, the relationship between the two texts is undeniable. According to GE HONG, the work called Jiuding danjing 九鼎丹經 should have been in the possession of Zuo Ci 左慈 (Zuo Yuanfang 左元放, ca. 155–220), who gave it to GE HONG’s grandfather, GE XUAN (BPZ 4). According to Chen Guofu (Daozang yuanliu xukao, 296–97), the text is of Han date.

The remaining nineteen juan contain the instructions (jue 訣), which are sometimes of a practical, sometimes of a theoretical nature. Each of the parts begins with the words “This servant remarks” (chen an 臣按). These chapters should date to the Tang. A date suggested by place names (e.g., Chenzhou 辰州, a name in use during the period 659–686) and by quotations from books such as the pharmacopoeia Bencao 本草 by Su Jing 蘇敬, who lived in 659. A final, more circumstantial indication is given in 14.2a, where we find a discussion on the price of realgar (xionghuang 雄黃). The text states that “as this dynasty has unified the world,” the price of the ingredient, formerly extremely expensive, has fallen drastically. A similar statement was made by SUN SIMO, as quoted in 837 Zhenzhong shu 21a. Chen Guofu has shown that juan 10 quotes a poem titled Zhenren ge 真人歌 that features Han period rhymes (Daozang yuanliu xukao, 293). As the use of Han rhymes remained widespread in later periods, this does not necessarily indicate a Han date.

The present work, in ten or in twenty juan, is mentioned in several Song catalogues (see VDL 146). The work contains a certain number of references to medical and alchemical sources, some of which no longer exist. Chen Guofu has listed these works (Daozang yuanliu xukao, 329–30).

The first juan expounds the names and characteristics of nine kinds of elixirs. Each elixir has a different efficacy, but all confer on those who ingest them the power of rising up to Heaven. This juan also explains the manufacturing of the alchemical vessels and the all-important lute (liuyi ni 六一泥). According to the tradition given by the text itself, this alchemical text was transmitted by the Dark Maiden (Xuannü 玄女) to the Yellow Emperor. For the transmission, as a token of faith, gold figurines of a human being and a fish were to be thrown into an eastward flowing stream (1.1b). This fundamental text mentions certain alchemical terms, such as “the beautiful maiden” (chanü 姮女), that also occur in the Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契 and that therefore have become important in Inner Alchemy.

Among the many studies on the alchemy of the Huangdi jiuding shendan jingjue, the work of Sivin is noteworthy for reconstructing some of the experiments and their theoretical implications (see Sivin, “Theoretical background, 225–27, on the recipe for the Yellow-and-Black preparation [xuanhuang 玄黃]).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Pregadio, “The Book of the Nine Elixirs”; Sivin, “The theoretical background of elixir alchemy.”

Kristofer Schipper and Yuan Bingling

Jiuzhuan lingsha dadan zisheng xuanjing 九轉靈砂大丹資聖玄經

12 fols.

Tang (618–907)?

886 (fasc. 886)

“Scripture of the Mystery of the Nine-Times-Cycled Marvelous Mineral Great Elixir That Assists the Saints.” This is a small composite treatise on the theory and the practice of laboratory alchemy. The first part (1a–9a) expounds the alchemical procedure in a most unusual Taoist sūtra form. Here we find the Zhenren of the Supreme Ultimate (Taiji zhenren 太極真人) in Heaven preaching a doctrine of “salvation through refinement” (liandu 鍊度), not, as in later liturgical practice, through the symbolic Inner Alchemy of the Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契 tradition (compare 1220 Daofa huiyuan) but through laboratory alchemy. In keeping with the title and with the accepted practice, the alchemical process is carried out in nine phases. The great elixir having been completed, the adept rises up to Heaven in broad daylight and enters the court of the Golden Portal, in order to join the ranks of the True Persons who attend to the Heavenly Emperor.

The scripture on the great elixir is followed by two paragraphs devoted to fire-phasing: the low fire (wenhuo 文火) and the blazing fire (wuhuo 武火). Finally there are four alchemical recipes.

The liturgical form of the present scripture suggests that it dates from the Tang dynasty.

Kristofer Schipper

Lingbao zhongzhen danjue 靈寶衆真丹訣

16 fols.

Compiled before 1020; probably Tang (618–907)

419 (fasc. 192)

“Instructions on the Elixirs of the Zhenren of Lingbao.” This text is a collection of eleven recipes, introduced by a preface concerned with their efficacy for curing illnesses caused by “winds” (feng 風). The original title of the compilation was Lingbao huanhun danfang 靈寶還魂丹方 (Lingbao Recipes of the Elixirs for Returning the Hun Soul). Under this title, which in the Daozang edition is the name of the first recipe (1a–5b), the text is partially included in YJQQ 76.1a–13b (corresponding here to 1a–5b, 7a–10a, and 13a–16b) and is listed in Bishu sheng xubiandao siku quesbu mu 2.36a (cf. VDL 171–72). The inclusion in the YJQQ shows that the work was compiled before 1020. The mention of the daliang 大兩 and dafen 大分 weight measures suggests that it is not earlier than the Tang (618–907).

The three recipes on 7a–8a and 15a–16b are also found in 918 Zhujia shenpin danfa 3.10a–11b, 6.7a–8a, and 6.8b–9a, respectively. The last recipe in the YJQQ version, 76.14a–b, does not appear in the Daozang text.

Fabrizio Pregadio

Shenxian liandan dianzhu sanyuan baozhao fa 神仙鍊丹點鑄三元寶照法

7 fols.

Preface dated 902

863 (fasc. 578)

“Method of the Divine Immortals for Refining the Elixir and Casting by Projection the Precious Mirrors of the Three Originals.” This is a short text giving instructions on the preparation of three mirrors through an alchemical process. According to the preface, the method was revealed to the anonymous author by Guigeng zi 歸耕子.

The Three Originals (sanyuan 三元) here are Heaven, Earth, and Humanity. To each of them is devoted a mirror, to be cast with the Elixir of the Fiery Dragon (huolong zhi dan 火龍之丹) and inscribed with emblems (1a–2b and 7a). The properties of the elixir, obtained from the Five Metals (wujin 五金; 1a), are described in 2b–3a. The process includes a procedure of fire-phasing (huohou 火候, 4a–7a) that extends over a period of one year. The names of the procedure’s seventy-two stages are derived from sentences found in the “Yue ling 月令” (Monthly Ordinances) chapter of the Liji 禮記 (Book of Rites).

Fabrizio Pregadio

Taiqing shibi ji 太清石壁記

3 juan

By Chuze xiansheng 楚澤先生; compiled in 758 or 759 on the basis of an earlier version

881 (fasc. 582–583)

“Record from the Stone Wall of the Great Purity.” This text attributed to a master of Chuze, is a collection of alchemical recipes, followed by sections dealing with rules for the ingestion of the elixirs. According to Xin Tang shu 59.1521, the text was edited in three juan during the Qianyuan 乾元 period (758–759) of the Tang by an anonymous officer of Jianzhou 劍州 (in modern Sichuan), on the basis of an earlier version attributed to Su Yuanming 蘇元明, who appears as Su Yuanlang 蘇元朗 in Gujin tushu jicheng 古今圖書集成 18:240.9b–10a, quoting from a version on the Luofu shan zhi 羅浮山志 (Monograph of Mount Luofu). He is ascribed there a Shibi ji 石壁記 and is said to have retired on Mount Luofu at the end of the sixth century (cf. CGF 435, n. 16; Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao, 314–15; and Soymié, “Le Lo-feou chan,” 122).

More than sixty recipes are given altogether in this important collection. Their sources are not mentioned, but the Shibi ji appears to be closely related to the corpus of writings developed around the Taiqing jing 太清經 during the Six Dynasties (220–589). The recipes are often followed by details of the medical properties, and the third juan is mainly concerned with rules for the ingestion of the elixirs and descriptions of their effects.

Many alternative names of the elixirs, usually listed together with their recipes, are the same as those given in SUN SIMO’s Taiqing danjing yaojue 太清丹經要訣 (YJQQ 71.2a–3b) and in 901 Shiyao erya (cf. Sivin, Chinese alchemy, 76–79, 258–59). Both a Shibi ji and a Chuze jing 楚澤經 are mentioned in Shiyao erya 2.3b and 2.7a, respectively. No relationship, on the other hand, is found between the synonyms of the substances given in juan 1 of Shiyao erya and those in the two lists of the present text (2.9a–10a). The short accounts of minerals in 3.12b–14a form the basis of those in 907 Jinshi bu wujiu shu jue.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao, 314–15; Sivin, Chinese alchemy; Soymié, “Le Lo-feou chan.”

Fabrizio Pregadio

Zhang zhenren jinsbi lingsha lun 張真人金石靈砂論

10 fols.

By Zhang yinju 張隱居; between 742 and 770

887 (fasc. 586)

"Treatise on Metals, Minerals, and the Numinous Powder [i.e., Cinnabar] of the Zhenren Zhang." The author of this text, the zhenren or recluse (yingju) Zhang, can be identified as Zhang Jiugai 張九垓, hao Hunlun zi 渾淪子. In the bibliographies of the Jiu Tang shu, 59.1518, and the Song shi, 205.5191, he is attributed commentaries, now lost, to the Zhuangzi and the Longhu jing 龍虎經. According to the former catalogue, he was active during the reigns of Daizong (763–779) and Dezong (780–805). A sentence in the present text (4b) shows that he was born in 720 or slightly earlier, and that his work dates from between 742 and 770.

Together with the Qian tong jue 潛通訣, the Longhu jing is the main textual authority of this treatise. The passages excerpted from these texts are not found in their present versions: some sentences quoted as deriving from the Longhu jing are now in the Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契 (e.g., those on 2b, 3a, and 9a correspond to 1002 Zhouyi cantong qi fen zhang tongzhen yi 1.23a, 2.1b, and 2.21a, respectively), while the passage quoted on 5a–b as coming from the Qian tong jue is found in 996 Guwen longhu jing zhushu 3.8b.

The text is divided into twelve pian 篇 (chapters) and is devoted to as many substances or alchemical preparations (cf. Kaltenmark, "Summary," 64–65). Each pian generally describes the cosmological associations, the function in drug prescriptions (jun 君, chen 臣, etc.), and the action on the human body of a substance; the latter aspect is emphasized in the final section. The passages on the cosmological associations of cinnabar and mercury (5a) and the yin and yang substances (6a–b) are summarized in 938 Dadan pian 2b.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kaltenmark, "Compte rendu 1974–75."

Fabrizio Pregadio

Dadong lian zhenbao jing xiufu lingsha miaojue

大洞鍊真寶經修伏靈砂妙訣

21 fols.

890 (fasc. 586)

Dadong lian zhenbao jing jiuhuan jindan miaojue

大洞鍊真寶經九還金丹妙訣

17 fols.

By CHEN SHAOWEI 陳少衛, zi Ziming 子明, hao Hengyue zhenren 衡嶽真人; between 712–734

891 (fasc. 586)

"Wonderful Instructions for the Subduing of Cinnabar" (890) and "Wonderful Instructions on the Golden Elixir of the Nine Cycles" (891), both "Supplementary to the Dadong Scripture on the Refining of the Authentic Treasure." These works describe two complementary methods for the refining of cinnabar and its transmutation into an elixir. Several statements (e.g., preface of 890 Lingsha miaojue 1a and 4b; 891 Jindan miaojue 1b) show that the two works originally had different titles and formed a single treatise, said to contain instructions on the Dadong lian zhenbao jing. The latter is also attributed to CHEN SHAOWEI in Chongwen zongmu 9.19b and Song shi 205.5194 (cf. VDL 78).

The place names mentioned in both texts were in simultaneous official use only during the first four decades of the eighth century. The dating suggested by this evidence is confirmed by the expression tianyuan 天元 (preface of 890 Lingsha miaojue 1a), which probably refers to the Xiantian 先天 and Kaiyuan 開元 reign periods, that is, 712–741 (cf. Zhang Zigao, Zhongguo gudai huaxue shi, 209–10). The original treatise was not written later than 734, when a reduced version of the two parts was submitted to the throne by ZHANG GUO (cf. article on 896 Yudong dashen dansha zhenyao jue).

CHEN SHAOWEI refers to the first section of the present work as "Lingsha qifan lun" 靈砂七返論 or pian 篇 (Treatise on the Seven Cycles of Cinnabar) and to the second as "Jindan erzhang" 金丹二章 (Two Essays on the Golden Elixir). The two sections retain titles close to these in YJQQ 69 (Qifan lingsha jue 七返靈砂訣) and 68.9a–25a (Jiuzhuan jindan erzhang 九轉金丹二章). The inclusion of these texts in reverse order in the YJQQ shows that the separation into two distinct works had already taken place by the early eleventh century; this separation is also suggested by the Chongwen zongmu entry cited above, which lists only the title of the first text in a form similar to the present one. The original title of the first section appears in the present work as its subtitle.

CHEN SHAOWEI's work is one of the main sources of Tang alchemy (cf. Sivin, "Theoretical background," passim). In the first text, centered on cinnabar, the main process of each cycle consists of the treatment of the product of the previous cycle, yielding each time a "gold" (jin 金) that can be ingested or used as the main ingredient in the next cycle. In the second text, the final product of the previous seven cycles, now defined as "mercury" (gong 汞), is used as the main ingredient for the preparation of a "cyclically transformed elixir" (huandan 還丹). The treatment by fire-phasing (huohou 火候) includes here six cycles rather than nine, as would seem to be implied in both the original and the current title of this section (jiuhuan or jiuzhuan, "nine reversions" or "nine-times cycled").

The descriptions of cinnabar in the first text (preface and 1a–3b) and of mercury in the second (9a–b) form the basis of those given in 909 Longhu huandan jue 1.1a–10b and 913 Tongyou jue 3b–4b. A summary of the preface of the first text, as well as part of its instructions on fire-phasing (5a–b), are found in 1017 Daoshu 31.1a–2a. The beginning of the preface is reproduced in Quan Tang wen 901.7a–b.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sivin, "The theoretical background of elixir alchemy"; Zhang Zigao, Zhongguo gudai huaxue shi.

Fabrizio Pregadio

Taishang weiling shenhua jiuzhuan dansha fa 太上衛靈神化九轉丹砂法

7 fols.

Seventh or eighth century?

892 (fasc. 587)

"Method of the Highest Nine-Cycled Cinnabar, Protecting the Spirit and Divinely Transmuting." This text describes the preparation of an elixir through the treatment of cinnabar in nine stages. In a different and often more reliable version of the same method, found in 895 Yinyang jiuzhuan cheng zijin dianhua huandan jue, the final product is said to transmute (hua 化 or dianhua 點化, "transmute by projection") other metals into gold. The expression shenhua 神化 (divine transmutation) in the title of the present text refers, strictly speaking, to this property.

The title of this work is not listed in any bibliography, with the possible exception of 901 Shiyao eryl 2.3b, which mentions a Weiling jue 衛靈訣. On the basis of this evidence, and of references to place names officially adopted during the Tang period (618–907), the dating would be restricted to between the seventh and the eighth century.

The various steps of the process are related to passages of the Zhouyi cantong qi 周易參同契, usually quoted and briefly commented upon at the end of each section (cf. article on 895 Huandan jue). The quotations are missing in the last two sections. The text of the final section seems in fact to be either incomplete or altered, as it does not include the description of the ninth stage of treatment.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Spooner and Wang, "The Divine Nine Turn Tan Sha Method."

Fabrizio Pregadio

Yudong dashen dansha zhenyao jue 玉洞大神丹砂真要訣

21 fols.

By ZHANG GUO 張果, hao Gushen shan ren 姑射山人; submitted to the throne in 734

896 (fasc. 587)

"Veritable Essential Instructions on the Great Divine Cinnabar." This is an abridged version of CHEN SHAOWEI's treatise, now found in the Daozang as 890 Dadong lian zhenbao jing xiufu lingsha miaojue and 891 Dadong lian zhenbao jing jiuhuan jindan miaojue. ZHANG GUO's summary is identifiable as the text listed in Chongwen zongmu 9.21a as Fu dansha jue 服丹砂訣 (Instructions on the Ingestion of Cinnabar), and in the bibliography of the Xin Tang shu 59.1521 as Dansha jue 丹砂訣 (Instructions on Cinnabar; cf. VDL 114). The entry in Xin Tang shu adds that the text was submitted by ZHANG GUO to the emperor (i.e., Xuanzong) in 734.

The elaborate construction of CHEN SHAOWEI's treatise is lost in ZHANG GUO's abridgment, which omits important sections, such as the whole preface, and gives short summaries of others. Most passages concerned with doctrinal rather than practical instructions (e.g., 891 Jindan miaojue 9b–10a and 10a–b, on the cosmological associations of mercury extracted from cinnabar) are excluded. At the end of this version (17a–21a) are four methods not found in CHEN SHAOWEI's work and unrelated to the main text.

Fabrizio Pregadio

Shiyao eryl 石藥爾雅

2 juan

By Mei Biao 梅彪; preface dated 806

901 (fasc. 588)

"Synonymic Dictionary of the Mineral Materia Medica." This is an alchemical lexicon followed by lists of names of elixirs and methods and by a bibliography of alchemical and other texts. The preface is by Mei Biao (b. ca. 750), who was a native of Jiangyuan 江源 in modern Sichuan. He states there that his work was compiled to supply the lack of entries concerning minerals in the Erya 爾雅, but he also alludes to the widespread use of "secret names" (yinming 隱名) in the alchemical literature.

The first juan gives a list of more than 500 synonyms for 164 (or 167, also counting subentries) names of mineral, vegetal, animal, and human substances, as well as laboratory instruments (cf. Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao, 383–442). The sources of the various synonyms are not mentioned. The second juan includes three lists of names and synonyms of elixirs, a list of names of alchemical methods, and a list of about 100 texts mostly concerning alchemy.

Thirteen names in the second list of elixirs (2.1b–3a) appear together with their synonyms, with occasional variants but in the same order, in juan 1 of 881 Taiqing shibi ji, where the corresponding methods are given. Several of these names and synonyms are also found in SUN SIMO's Taiqing danjing yaojue 太清丹經要訣 in YJQQ 71.2a–b. The latter also includes twenty-four names of elixirs found here in the third list (2.6b–7a; cf. YJQQ 71.3a–b), which shows the close relationship among Shiyao eryl, Danjing yaojue, and juan 1 of Shibi ji (cf. Sivin, Chinese alchemy, 76–79, 258–59). There is, on the contrary, no direct relationship between the synonyms of substances given by Mei Biao and the “secret names” listed in Shibi ji 2.9a–10a, nor between these synonyms and the collection of glosses found in other alchemical sources (cf. Pregadio, “Un lessico alchemico,” 16–21).

According to the preface, the work was originally in one juan, and as such it is listed in Chongwen zongmu 10.4a and in Tongzhi, “Yiwen lue,” 67.28a (cf. VDL 100). Against Zhu Yizun's 朱彝尊 (1629–1709) opinion that the second juan is a later addition (see the colophon reproduced at the end of the Biexia zhai congshu 別下齋叢書 edition) stand Mei Biao's own words asserting that his work is divided into six pian 篇 (chapters), as we have it today. All the later editions, both Chinese and Japanese, are derived from the Daozang edition.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao; Liao and Ding, “Daojiao waidan shu”; Pregadio, “Un lessico alchemico”; Sivin, Chinese alchemy; Wong Shiu-hon, Daozang danyao yiming.

Fabrizio Pregadio

Jinshi bu wujin shu jue 金石簿五九數訣

10 fols.

Tang, after 686

907 (fasc. 589)

“Instructions on an Inventory of Forty-five Metals and Minerals.” This is a short treatise on the materia medica dealing with substances used in the preparation of elixirs. Both Bishu sheng xubiandao siku quesu mu 2.38b and Tongzhi, “Yiwen lue,” 67.28a (cf. VDL 100) include its title, omitting the word jue 訣 (instructions). The reference to Jinzhou 錦州 as a source of cinnabar (dansha 丹砂; 1a) shows that the work dates from after 686. The entry on talc (huashi 滑石; 8a) mentions Caizhou 蔡州, the name given to Yuzhou 豫州 in 762 because of a taboo on the personal name of Emperor Daizong, but this name probably reflects the date of the copy on which the Daozang edition is based. Other details suggest that this edition descends in fact from a Song copy: the largest administrative unit of the empire is called lu 路 (6b), and the Tang dynasty is referred to as jin Tang 近唐 (“recently, under the Tang”; 5b). Apart from the inclusion in the two Song bibliographies there is no definite evidence on the latest possible date of compilation, but the references to substances coming from foreign countries and to the pilgrimage on Mount Wutai 五臺山 of the Indian Buddhist monk Zhi Falin 支法林, said to have taken place in 664 (5b–6a), suggest that the work dates from the Tang.

The main source of the treatise is a text now lost, known only through a quotation in 881 Taiqing shibi ji 3.12b–14a, which does not mention either its title or its author. About a dozen descriptions of the present text, as well as its short introductory passage, essentially correspond to those found there. One third of the hundred or so indications of sites of occurrence are derived either from TAO HONGJING's Bencao jing jizhu 本草經集註 or, through the latter, from the Mingyi bielu. Three entries—those on shi guiyi 石桂英 (splendor of the stone cassia; 5a), shi liudan 石榴丹 (vermilion of the stone pomegranate; 8b), and shi zhong huangzi 石中黃子 (yellow seeds of the stone; 10a)—are similar to passages found in BPZ 11.199.

The descriptions, usually short, are concerned with the places of origin, shape, and properties of the various substances. All of the descriptions refer to minerals, with the single exception of hutong lu 胡同律 (resin of balsam poplar; 8a–b), which was used as flux in mineral preparations. The earliest descriptions of selenite, halite, and asbestos in an extant pharmacological source are found here. Reference to sites of occurrence include Persia, Uddyāna, the Western Regions (xiyu 西域), modern Vietnam and Cambodia, and the modern provinces of Gansu, Qinghai, and Xinjiang.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Liao and Ding, “Daojiao waidan shu.”

Fabrizio Pregadio

Longhu huandan jue 龍虎還丹訣

2 juan

By Jinling zi 金陵子; Tang or Song (compiled before 1042)

909 (fasc. 590)

“Instructions on the Cyclically Transformed Elixir of the Dragon and the Tiger.” This text, attributed to a master of Jinling (a place in modern Jiangsu), includes sections dealing with the huandan 還丹, followed by a collection of other methods. A reference to the dajin 大斤 and daliang 大兩 weight measures (1.15a) suggests that the text is not earlier than the Tang (618–907). It was compiled before 1042, as shown by the mention in Chongwen zongmu 9.22b of a Longhu huandan jue in two juan, attributed to Jinling zi.

The contents of the text may be divided into two parts. The first part (1.1a–13b), concerned with mercury and lead, is almost entirely based on quotations from CHEN SHAOWEI's 890 Dadong lian zhenbao jing xiufu lingsha miaojue (preface and 1a–3b), dating from the beginning of the eighth century. While CHEN SHAOWEI's work deals with the extraction of mercury from cinnabar and the preparation of a huandan using that mercury as the main ingredient, the passages quoted in the present text are employed to refer to a mercury-lead process, described in 1.13a–b.

The second part, which comprises more than eighty methods including variant recipes (cf. Guo Zhengyi, "Cong Longhu huandan jue"), opens with two methods for the preparation of the danyang 丹陽 (a copper and arsenic compound, 1.14a–20a; cf. other methods in 953 Gengdao ji, juan 6) and continues into the second juan, which deals mainly with the production of hongyin 紅銀 (red silver, i.e., copper) and with methods for removing the halo (yun 量). CHEN SHAOWEI's work is explicitly mentioned here (2.40a) as Qipian dansha jue 七篇丹砂訣. Several characters, substituted by blank spaces, are missing in the final pages (2.33b to end).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Guo Zhengyi, "Cong Longhu huandan jue kan woguo liandan jia dui huaxue de gong-xian."

Fabrizio Pregadio

Tongyou jue 通幽訣

28 fols.

Tang 618–907)?

913 (fasc. 591)

"Instructions for Penetrating [Alchemical] Secrets." This short treatise on alchemical theory is first mentioned in the Chongwen zongmu 9.22b. However, some details in the text could indicate a Tang date: the use of the place name Langzhou 朗州 (3b), which was changed to Huzhou 湖州 in the early Song 907–1279), and the title Hunyuan huangdi zhenjun 混元皇帝真君 for Laozi. This title could also be an abbreviated form of Taishang laojun hunyuan shangde huangdi 太上老君混元上德皇帝, conferred on Laozi in 1014. Our text also mentions a lost work (11a), the Yinyang tonglüe 陰陽統略 (cf. VDL 142), the exact date of which, however, remains uncertain. The long passage on the provenance of cinnabar (4a–b) seems to be an abbreviated version of 890 Dadong lian zhenbao jing xiufu lingsha miaojue 2a by CHEN SHAOWEI (fl. eighth century).

The text discusses both the number of years needed for the natural elixir and the different names for cinnabar (1a–4b). The remainder of the work deals with the theory of correspondences, fire-phasing, and, finally, two recipes for a drug made with zhu 朮 (atractyle).

Most of the text is also found elsewhere. For the first part (1a–20b), compare 915 Huandan zhouhou jue 1.1a–18a (the latter is quite abridged). For the second part (12b–27a), see 947 Yuging neishu 1a–7a.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Danfang jianyuan 丹方鑑源

3 juan

By Dugu Tao 獨孤滔, hao Zige shansou 紫閣山叟; 836

925 (fasc. 596)

"The Original Mirror of Alchemical Prescriptions." This text was listed during the Song period under various titles (see VDL 80). The dating of the text (836) is based on 919 Qiangong jiageng zhibao jicheng 1.2a. The text of "Danfang jingyuan 丹房鏡源" in 919 Zhibao jicheng 4.3a–8b differs from the present work. Dugu Tao compiled the names of essences and products of operative alchemy (maidan 外丹).

There are twenty-five paragraphs listing the names of metals, minerals, alloys, and medicines, all according to their categories. The accompanying indications either give the place names where the essences can be found or describe their physical structure, colors, and qualities. The text indicates how such essences may react with each other. It appears that lead and mercury, which are difficult to define and to fix, are the most prized products. The term huangbo shu 黃白術 (yellow-white techniques) pertains to the majority of the practical instructions in this text (1.3a). However, only the last section gives a detailed description of an alchemical production ("Dianzhi wuhuang wanzi fang 點制五黃丸子方"; 3.6b–7b).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ho Peng Yoke, Daozang Danfang jianyuan.

Florian C. Reiter

Dadan pian 大丹篇

9 fols.

Tenth century?

938 (fasc. 598)

"Book on the Great Elixir." Read da 大 for tai 太 in the title. A Song catalogue (see VDL 77) lists a Dadan shi 大丹詩 in one juan that could refer to our text. The present work, a collection of quotations excerpted from Tang (618–907) or Five Dynasties (907–960) sources, includes both prose and verse.

The section on elixir poisoning (1a–1b) is an abridged version of a preface attributed to Yuanyang zi 元陽子 and ZHANG GUO[LAO] in 239 Huandan jinyi ge zhu 1a–1b. The “Shu zhongjing 術中經” (6b–8a) is an extract from 922 Huanjin shu 5a–6b by TAO ZHI (d. 825). For Li Tuo 李託 and Zhang Tao 張陶 (fl. 803), mentioned in 4b, see 1083 Longhu yuanzhi 8b, which, however, writes Li Fen 李汾 instead of Li Tuo. That work, attributed to Qingxia zi 清霞子 (Sui or Tang), also includes many other passages from the present text.

The present collection also contains material from lost works such as the Jinshi lingtai jue 金石靈臺訣 (6a), mentioned in 901 Shiyao eryl 2.3b of the early ninth century as Jinshi lingtai ji 記 and also listed in the catalogue of lost books, the Daozang quejing mulu 2.6a. The Guigu xiansheng jiuzhuan jinyi da huandan ge (see 8a of the present text) is mentioned in a Song catalogue (see VDL 132) as Guigu xiansheng huandan ge 鬼谷先生還丹歌 in one juan.

The prose and poetry of the Dadan pian deal with numerous aspects of laboratory alchemy.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Dadan wenda 大丹問答

4 fols.

Tang (618–907)

939 (fasc. 598)

“Questions and Answers on the Great Elixir.” This is an alchemical treatise presented in the form of a dialogue between Zheng Siyuan 鄭思遠 (i.e., ZHENG YIN) and his disciple GE HONG. Although the title is not mentioned in any of the bibliographies, the text was often quoted in alchemical books of the Tang (618–907) and Song (960–1279) dynasties. The quotations, however, are mainly excerpts from the first section of the text (1a–3b; see the somewhat reduced version in 927 Taiqing yubei zi 1a–3b).

The first quotation in a book with an established date figures in 233 Huandan zhongxian lun 11a (preface dated 1052). The present text is also quoted (without title) in 1017 Daoshu 32.27a–27b and 20.4b where the quotation is attributed to Qingxia zi 清霞子. During the Song dynasty, there were many books in circulation ascribed to Zheng Siyuan (i.e., ZHENG YIN) and GE HONG, excerpted from other books ascribed to these two Taoists. One example is 940 Jinmu wanling lun 4a–4b, which also quotes a passage from our text (2b).

The first section of the Dadan wenda is on the qualities of the elixir, which should be composed of metals and minerals, that is, a mixture of gold or metallic essence (jin zhi jing 金之精) and mineral solution (shi zhi yi 石之液). The remainder of the text deals with the natural formation of the elixir and fire-phasing, information that can be found also in other texts, such as the first chapter of 915 Huandan zhouhou jue, also attributed to GE HONG (compare 1.3a, 18a, and 21a ff. with 3b–4a of our text), and 947 Yuqing neishu 18b, 19b.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Jinmu wanling lun 金木萬靈論

4 fols.

Attributed to GE HONG 葛洪 (283–343); probably Tang (618–907)

940 (fasc. 598)

“Discourses on the Myriad Efficacies of Metal and Vegetal [Elixirs].” These discourses claim the superiority of GE HONG’s teachings. They also affirm the existence and value of the elixirs that confer immortality. This title is listed in Chongwen zongmu 9.20a (cf. VDL 116).

The text partly combines, sometimes with mistakes, abridged versions of texts signed by GE HONG, such as BPZ 4, “Jindan 金丹” (see also 917 Baopu zi shenxian jinzhao jing 2.1a–5a, which can be compared with 1a–3b of the present text and 939 Dadan wenda 1a–1b, 2b, which can be compared with 4a–4b). The diction of the variants proves that this text was composed long after GE HONG’s 1185 Baopu zi neipian.

Florian C. Reiter

Hongqian ru heiqian jue 紅鉛入黑鉛訣

6 fols.

Tang (618–907)?

941 (fasc. 598)

“Formulas for the Addition of Red Lead to Black Lead.” The terms hongqian 紅鉛 (red lead) and heiqian 黑鉛 (black lead) were already in use during the Five Dynasties period (907–960), as can be seen from the alternative titles of the Huandan neixiang jin yaoshi 還丹內象金鑰匙 (YJQQ 70) by PENG XIAO (d. 950): Heiqian shuihu lun 黑鉛水虎論 and Hongqian huolong jue 紅鉛火龍訣, where the terms stand for lead and mercury, respectively.

This work is a short alchemical treatise belonging to a group of cognate texts with a common source, a Yuanjun jue 元君訣, discussed in 947 Yuqing neishu 玉清內書 1a. The latter gives more details, whereas our text is terse and practical. Moreover, it classifies its procedures under various headings lacking in the Yuqing neishu; the sequence of the headings suggest that the two texts are based on different versions. The treatise comprises methods for making a reaction vessel (1a) and fixing mercury (1b, 5b); indications on fuel quantities, fire-phasing (2b ff.), and projection (5a); as well as a discussion on the ingestion of the drug and its aftereffects (4a). It is clearly a work on laboratory alchemy.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Tongxuan bishu 通玄祕術

21 fols.

Edited by Shen Zhiyan 沈知言, hao Buyi 布衣; late ninth century, based on an earlier version

942 (fasc. 598)

“The Secret Arts for Penetrating the Mystery.” This is a collection of alchemical recipes edited by Shen Zhiyan, a native of Mount Jin’e 金鵝山 in modern Sichuan. According to the preface, in 864 the author received the Secret Essentials of Various Masters on the Divine Elixirs (Shendan zhujia biyao 神丹諸家祕要) in three juan from a Master Zheng 鄭公 from Huainan 淮南. The latter is probably Zheng Xuan 鄭玄, to whom Chongwen zongmu 7.19a and other Song catalogues (VDL 126) ascribe a Putian tongxuan bishu fang 圃田通玄祕術方 in three juan. As stated in the preface, Shen Zhiyan’s compilation also was originally in three juan. The bibliography of Song shi 207.5314 assigns the Tongxuan bishu the same number of juan. The same catalogue ascribes a Tongxuan biyao shu 通玄祕要術 in three juan to an anonymous author of the Xiantong period (860–874), while Bishu sheng xubiandao siku quesu mu 2.37b attributes a Tongxuan miaojue 通玄妙訣 in one juan to Bo Zhiyan 波知言, likely to be a mistake for Shen Zhiyan 沈知言 (cf. VDL 126 and 139).

The text includes recipes for more than two dozen elixirs, occasionally giving details of their medical properties. There is a gradual shift from mineral to vegetal substances in the lists of ingredients. One of the compounds (pishu dan 辟暑丹, or Elixir to Escape the Summer Heat; 14b–15a) is said to have been offered to and ingested by Emperor Yizong (r. 860–874). The last recipe is followed by the description of a rite (18b–19a) in which the officiant is instructed to wear the robes of a daoshi 道士, visualize divinities, and utter an invocation before the ingestion may take place.

Fabrizio Pregadio

Lingfei san chuanxin lu 靈飛散傳信錄

6 fols.

By Qi Tui 齊推; 812

943 (fasc. 599)

“Record of the Truthful Transmission of the Divine Flying Powder.” This short treatise begins with a testimony, dated 812, in which the author demonstrates the efficacy of the lingfei san 靈飛散—a powder based on mica—and relates how he succeeded in obtaining the best recipe for it. The text is reproduced in YJQQ 74.20b–26a and quoted in Song catalogues (see VDL 169).

According to his testimony, Qi Tui, from Gaoyang 高陽 (Hebei), was befriended by his uncle Huishu 晦叔, a member of the Censorate (Xiantai chashi 憲臺察史). Huishu told Qi that juan 28 of SUN SIMO’s Qianjin fang indeed contained this recipe (1163 Sun zhenren beiji qianjin yaofang 82.22a; the Northern Song edition of the same medical handbook quotes it in juan 27). Moreover, a Taoist called Wu Dan 吳丹, client of the honorary supernumerary secretary (xun yuanwai lang 勳員外郎) Cao Junyi 曹君彝, told his patron that the best version of the recipe was to be found in the Taiqing jing 太清經. Later, Cao indeed happened to discover a manuscript of the Taiqing jing containing the recipe, in the chapel of the house of the late Li Bi 李泌 (d. 754) of the imperial secretariat.

The YJQQ version of the present text specifies that the recipe figured in juan 153 of the Taiqing division of the Taoist canon. In 1163 Qianjin yaofang, the recipe is attributed to a zhenren of the Western Peak (Xiyue zhenren 西嶽真人), and instead of the herb atractilis (zhu 朮), ginseng is prescribed.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Yoshikawa Tadao, “Reihi sanpo denshinroku.”

Catherine Despeux

Yuqing neishu 玉清內書

22 fols.

Tang (618–907)?

947 (fasc. 599)

“Inner Book of Jade Purity.” This is an alchemical treatise that is mainly theoretical in nature but also contains some practical instructions. The statement “At present, in our great Tang empire . . .” (3b) could indicate a Tang date. The Bishu sheng xubiandao siku quesu mu 2.38b lists a Jindan zhouhou jue yuqing neishu dayao zhongpian 金丹肘後訣玉清內書大藥終篇, which could be an alternate title of our text. The present title first occurs in the Chongwen zongmu, which records two juan (VDL 99). The treatise belongs to a group of cognate texts that all mention a Yuanjun jue 元君訣, but the sentence on transmission by Yuanjun (7a) occurs also in an Inner Alchemy text (cf. 22b Zi yuanjun shoudao chuanxin fa 7a).

Most parts of the present work can be found in other alchemical texts. For the Yuanjun jue (1a–7a), see 913 Tongyou jue 20a–27a, which contains some variants. Each version includes sentences missing in the other (cf. 2a and 5b of our text and 913 Tongyou jue 24a, 25a, and 25b); in one case (3a), the text seems to have been deliberately altered (cf. 913 Tongyou jue 22b). For the Jindan fushi bianhua wujin zhi gong 金丹服食變化五金制汞 (2b–11a), compare 941 Hongqian ru heiqian jue 1a–6b. The latter employs a different order of presentation and a slightly different terminology. This section includes practical procedures for fixing mercury, making a reaction vessel, casing, and so on.

A third section describes a helical type of fire-phasing (11a–17b) similar to that described in 233 Huandan zhong xian lun 16b–17b (preface dated 1052); this section explains the increase and decrease in the weight of fuel over a period of nine months.

Finally, an abridged version of the Yuanjun qianyun shoujing jue 元君潛運手鏡訣 (17b–21a) can also be found in 915 Huandan zhouhou jue 1.21a–24a. This section also deals with fire-phasing over a period of nine months; this period is considered to correspond to the Nine Tripods (jiuding 九鼎).

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Taigu tudui jing 太古土兌經

3 juan

Tang (618–907)

949 (fasc. 600)

“Scripture of Earth and the Trigram Dui of High Antiquity.” Earth and the trigram dui 兌 are symbols of minerals and metals, respectively. Although the title writes jing 經, this work is not a scripture. The Chongwen zongmu 9.20a, the first bibliography to mention the book, lists it as Duitu jue 兌土訣 in three juan. The correct title should, therefore, read Taigu duitu jue 太古兌土訣. Even though it appears in a Song (960–1279) bibliography for the first time, the geographical names used date to the Tang dynasty (618–907) or earlier (3.1b, 3b, 7a). According to Chen Guofu (Daozang yuanliu xukao, 336), the work can be dated between 702 and 749.

The book is ascribed to a certain Master Zhang 張先生 (1.4b). It is difficult to judge how much of the text was indeed written by Zhang, since there are remarks and notes by an anonymous compiler scattered throughout the text. Several references to other editions are made in the body of the work such as “one edition says 一本云” (1.6b, 2.4b) or “according to the Wu edition 吳本云” (2.5a). The work mentions TAO HONGJING and the Zhang jun Wupian 張君五篇, often quoted in books of the Five Dynasties (907–960) and the early Song (cf. 239 Huandan jinyi ge zhu, preface, 4a, and 924 Zhenyuan miaodao yaolie 4b).

Much of the work deals with processes of subduing minerals and metals (fufa 伏法). Many of these methods are attributed to Hugang zi 胡剛子. The methods, however, do not correspond to those attributed to Hugang zi in other alchemical texts (compare, e.g., the xuanzhu fa 玄珠法 with the method of the same name in 885 Huangdi jiuding shendan jingjue 3.5b). Hugang’s poems in the first juan (1.2b–3b), however, are quoted in 909 Longhu huandan jue 1.16b and in 1004 Zhouyi cantong qi zhu 2.24a under the heading “Wujin jue 五金訣.”

The last section, entitled “Jinshi chao lu 金石抄錄” (3.7b–12b), shows a marked influence of the theory of categories, similar to that 905 Cantong qi wu xianglei biyao (cf. 3.2b–3a, ming junchen 明君臣, and 3.9a–9b, ming xianglei 明相類, of our text).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao, 336.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Xuanjie lu 懸解錄

9 fols.

Preface dated 855

928 (fasc. 597)

“Record of Arcane Explanations.” Read xuan 玄 for xuan 懸 in the title, which is first mentioned in the Chongwen zongmu 9.25a. The Xin Tang shu, “Yiwen zhi,” avoiding a taboo, writes Tongjie lu 通解錄 and notes that the preface was written in the Da-zhong period (847–860) by Hegan Ji 紇干戩, governor of Jiangxi (see VDL 166). This corresponds to the preface of our text which, although anonymous, is dated 855.

The book was known under different titles: Xuanjie lu 玄解錄, Xianjie lu 賢解錄, Yanmen gong miaojie lu 鴈門公妙解錄, and Tongjie lu 通解錄, (see Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao, 327–28). Moreover, Hegan Ji wrote a Liu Hong zhuan 劉洪傳 that Chen Guofu believes to be identical with the Xuanjie lu (Daozang yuanliu xukao, 328).

The book also appears in YJQQ 64; 944 Yanmen gong miaojie lu (see following entry) is a shorter and incomplete version. It is possible that the title Lord of Yanmen 鴈門公 (in Shanxi) refers to the author.

The Xuanjie lu is considered to be the first printed book on a scientific subject (see Needham, “The historical development of alchemy,” 167, and Carter, The invention of printing, 59). The book deals with elixir poisoning and its antidotes. It was first revealed to the Han alchemist Liu Hong 劉洪 by Jiuxiao jun 九霄君 in 122 (1b). Liu Hong engraved it on stone; in the eighth century it was discovered by ZHANG GUO[LAO], who presented the text to Emperor Xuanzong (7b).

The author extracted only the most important sections from this work, those on the identification of mineral ingredients and the formulas for neutralizing toxicity (1b).

The text (1b–7b) is presented as a dialogue between Liu Hong and Jiuxiao jun. The latter explains the danger of preparing and ingesting mineral elixirs without understanding both the true nature of the ingredients and natural laws (4b), since each ingredient possesses its own particular poison. Liu Hong’s recipe for an antidote based on five ingredients (Shouxian wuzi wan fang 守仙五子丸方; 8a) is followed by a poem of praise by ZHANG GUO.

Of interest is the cultivation of the “Three Ones” (sanyi 三一) within the body as an alternative path to immortality (6b). The expression sanyi is also used to designate the three perfect elixirs (zhiyao 至藥), such as shenfu 神符, baixue 白雪, and jiuzhuan 九轉. For these elixirs, see also 906 Yin zhenjun jinshi wu xianglei.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Carter, The invention of printing; Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Yanmen gong miaojie lu 鴈門公妙解錄

8 fols.

Tang (618–907)

944 (fasc. 599)

“Lord Yanmen’s Record of Marvelous Explanations.” This work on elixir poisoning and its antidotes is discussed in the preceding article on 928 Xuanjie lu, of which the present text is a shorter version. This text contains some variants, the most important being the use of the character bao 保 instead of shou 守. The pages Xuanjie lu 8a–9a are missing from the present text.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Yin zhenjun jinshi wu xianglei 陰真君金石五相類

42 fols.

Attributed to Yin Changsheng 陰長生 (Former Han period, 206 B.C.–A.D. 9); before 1052, probably Five Dynasties (907–960)

906 (fasc. 589)

“Yin Zhenjun’s [Treatise on the Theory of] Categories of Minerals and Metals.” This work, ascribed to the immortal Yin Changsheng, is not listed in any of the bibliographies, but it is quoted in 233 Huandan zhongxian lun 5b (preface dated 1052). Another text, most probably of the Five Dynasties (907–960), seems to allude to it (266 Jinyi huandan baiwen jue 6a).

Most of the books quoted in the text are of the Tang (618–907) or Five Dynasties period; the Biyao jue 祕要訣 mentioned on page 35a could be a reference to 905 Cantong qi wu xianglei biyao. Moreover, Chen Guofu dates the text between the Tang and the end of the Five Dynasties on the basis of the place names. The date of the work, nevertheless, poses problems: on two occasions it quotes a Shilu 實錄, the first time regarding three grades (sanpin 三品; 1b), then concerning the story of Yu the Great 大禹 and the perfect medicine (18b–19a; cf. the tale recounted in 388 Taishang lingbao wufu xu 1). The classification of the elixir in three grades, of which shenfu 神符 is the most important, can be found in such pre-Song (960–1279) works as 928 Xuanjie lu 5a (preface dated 855) and 954 Taishang hunyuan zhenlu 7a–b (for GE HONG, shenfu is a drug only of the second category, cf. 1185 Baopu zi neipian 4.7b). However, the source of the Shilu is unclear.

The work is divided into twenty sections, each of which is devoted to a mineral or metal. Each section is followed by a discourse on the mineral’s or metal’s category and best possible combinations (or “marriage”) with other substances. The esoteric names of substances used are commonly found in other alchemical texts, such as 901 Shiyao eryl and 885 Huangdi jiuding shendan jingjue. It may be noted that Bo He 帛

和 is presented as the teacher of Yin Changsheng (37a), and that lead from Persia is considered superior to lead from Jiazhou 嘉州 (32b–35b, 37a–37b).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chen Guofu, Daozang yuanliu xukao, 331.

Farzeen Baldrian-Hussein

Penglai shan xizao huangdan ge 蓬萊山西竈還丹歌

2 juan

Attributed to Huang Xuanzhong 黃玄鍾; Tang (618–907)?

916 (fasc. 593)

“Song of the Refining of Cinnabar in the Western Still on Mount Penglai.” The Song shi, “Yiwen zhi,” mentions this work with Huang Xuanzhong as its author (see VDL157). Both the Tongzhi, “Yiwen lue,” and the Chongwen zongmu mention a Penglai shan caoyao huandan jue 蓬萊山草藥還丹歌 in one juan by the same author (VDL158). The latter title corresponds better to the text we have here, inasmuch its contents concern almost exclusively the description of many kinds of medicinal herbs. The author is indicated at the beginning of our text as acting director of the Department of State, grand master of the Palace with Golden Seal and Purple Ribbon of the Han dynasty (Han jianjiao puyi jinzi guanglu dafu 漢檢校僕射金紫光祿大夫). This title, however, corresponds to Tang not Han (206 B.C.–A.D. 220) nomenclature. The misleading element comes from the presentation (1a–2b) of the work, where the “author,” who signs as an immortal official of Penglai shan (one of the islands of Immortals in the Eastern Sea), tells a fable about his acquisition of his esoteric alchemical knowledge and the presentation thereof to Emperor Wu of the Han (compare 292 Han Wudi neizhuan). At the time of the presentation, the author was already retired on Penglai, and out of compassion for the emperor sent one of his divine pages to bring the book to the court.

The text consists of some 170 poems on vegetable substances to be used in alchemy. Each poem is accompanied by a paragraph giving the various (poetic) names for the herb. Chen Guofu (Daozang yuanliu kao, 334–35) has shown that some place names used in the text correspond to Tang administrative geography.

Kristofer Schipper and Yuan Bingling

Taiqing xiudan bijue 太清修丹祕訣

8 fols.

Tang (618–907)?

884 (fasc. 583)

“Secret Instructions for the Practice of Alchemy according to the Taiqing Tradition.” The text is divided into two parts. The first concerns the making of lingsha 靈沙, an elixir that enables the adept to become an Earth Immortal. This elixir is in fact excrement obtained after a period of feeding on rich food, followed by a short period of vegetarianism. The excrement has to be eaten in small portions over a period of fifteen days, followed by another period of rich food, and again one of eating excrement.

